

.

THE MODERN PART
OF THE
UNIVERSAL HISTORY.

Compiled from ORIGINAL WRITERS;
BY THE AUTHORS of the *ANTIEN*T.

Which will perfect the WORK, and render it A Complete Body of HISTORY, FROM THE EARLIEST ACCOUNT of Time, to the PRESENT.

Ἱστορίας ἀρχαίας ἐξέρχεται μὴ κατανόει, ἐν αὐταῖς γὰρ εὐρήσεις ἀκόπως, ἅπερ ἕτεροι συνῆξαν ἐγκόπως.
Basil. Imp. ad Leon. fil.

V O L. VI.

L O N D O N:
Printed for T. OSBORNE, C. HITCH and L. HAWES, A. MILLAR, J. RIVINGTON, S. CROWDER, P. DAVEY and B. LAW,
T. LONGMAN, C. WARE, and S. BLADON.

M. DCC. LX.

MODERN HISTORY:

BEING A

CONTINUATION

OF THE

UNIVERSAL HISTORY.

BOOK XXI.

CHAP. III.

The Modern History of EGYPT.

SECT. I.

Containing some curious and necessary observations on the present state with respect to its natural history, by way of connecting it with its ancient.

Edin. Ser. Fac. Bib. Lib.

<sup>a</sup> WE cannot more aptly begin the modern history of this once opulent and celebrated kingdom, than by connecting our former and subsequent account of it (so unlike, The design of this section. or rather vastly different from each other, that one would hardly imagine them to belong to the same country) by such curious and necessary remarks on its natural history, as may best lay open to our readers the springs and causes of so great a change, and at the same time clear up such other doubts and difficulties as might otherwise arise in their minds at the sight of so wide and apparent a contrast. And this method we the more readily proposed to ourselves, as it will, moreover, give us the wished-for opportunity of retracting and exploding some errors on that curious subject, in which we too hastily followed the far greater part of the ancients and moderns; as well as add some valuable and useful observations which had escaped us in the ancient part.

<sup>b</sup> WHETHER the so much extolled fertility and populousness of Egypt hath or hath not been, in some measure at least, exaggerated by ancient writers, when they tell us that the former could not only supply so many millions of the latter with wheat and other grain more than sufficient, but send such vast quantities of it abroad<sup>a</sup>, we will not pretend to decide. At present, when its inhabitants are scarcely the twentieth part so numerous, and every spot as much cultivated as then, it very rarely yields enough to support them, insomuch that they are forced to have recourse to other product for their sustenance; of which their bread is but a small part. Neither is it made, as anciently, of the finest wheat; but mostly, except among the great and rich, of barley or millet-flour; and this last of a larger and coarser kind, called by the <sup>c</sup> Arabs dowra; which commonly yields fifty for one; whereas wheat at the best seldom above ten, and some not five for one.

<sup>a</sup> Anc. Hist. vol. i. p. 176. & seq.

Whence the greater or less overflow of the Nile.

Its water free from mud.

ONE main cause of this, with respect to the greater or less product, but not sufficiently attended to, is, on the Nile's inundation, the north wind, which commonly blows more or less about that season, and makes a kind of bar across its several mouths, hinders the waters from flowing so swift and abundantly into the sea, as they are known to do when any other blows; which causes them to rise considerably higher. Whereas, as soon as the wind shifts from that point, they are observed to decrease as much in one day, as they did in four whilst it continued in it. The fertility, which its waters give to the lands, hath been ascribed to the great quantity of fat mud which they bring down with them, and is a kind of rich manure. But, at present, there is no such mud to be seen in them; for they continue clear from the very beginning of the inundation till they are risen above seventeen feet; at which time, being swelled higher in the chanel than usual, and running with greater rapidity, they bring with them a brownish sort of loam, which they wash off from the borders, and which gives them a reddish colour, with the thickness or consistency of milk; but is quite different from the clayish mud above-mentioned, from which they are quite exempt. This is demonstrable from the sediment which they leave behind in those vessels wherein they are commonly preserved; which being at first rubbed with a paste made of the powder of bitter almonds, whether to accelerate their subsiding, or to stop the pores, we are not told, when emptied exhibit nothing at the bottom but the above-mentioned reddish colour, without any mixture of other mud or earth. So that, upon the whole, that foul scurf, which those waters leave upon the land after they are drained away, seems to be nothing else than the sediment of their ferment; which, after a forty days stagnation, corruption, and other changes they have undergone during that sultry season, intermixed with a large quantity of nitrous and concreted salts, with which they are impregnated, prove a much better manure than any supposed quantity of mud.

THOUGH this were not the case, it will be next to impossible to imagine, how that river could yearly bring such vast and extensive supplies of that pretended fertilising mud, and the whole soil of Ethiopia (whence its torrents sweep it down in such prodigious quantities, as to supply Egypt not only with so many thousand annual strata of it, but lay the foundation of a future addition in the sea, to the distance of twenty leagues; for so far, we are told, is this mud found, by sounding, to extend *) not have been long since exhausted of it. As to what a later traveller tells us, that the mud which settles in the Milchias is commonly about five feet deep, he only gives it upon hearsay †; and, if true, may be no other than the sediment we have been speaking of, and not a real mud; but to proceed.

Soil of Egypt short of its ancient fertility.

Many grievous diseases.

ALL that hath been written likewise by ancient writers concerning the extraordinary fertility not only of the soil, but of the women and cattle, if not more exaggerated than real, is now so far forgot, and contradicted by common experience, whatever may be the cause of that great decay, that it is hardly credited either by the present inhabitants, or by those who have been the most diligent enquirers into that so much cried-up fecundity; there being now no such superior degree to be observed in their females of all kinds above that of other parts of Africa, Asia, or any other warm country. Neither doth the climate here answer the character which hath been given of it, either with respect to its pleasantness or healthiness: for we need no stronger proof than the many and grievous diseases which reign in it during the whole year. One of them, and that no inconsiderable one, is that which attacks the eyes of vast multitudes, with such violence as not to be repelled by any remedy; they who are affected with it seldom escaping the loss of their sight: which hath given occasion to some travellers of the faculty to style it the land of the blind (A).

* SHAW's observations on Egypt, p. 432. Anc. Hist. vol. i. p. 419, & seq.

† Pocock's observations on Egypt, vol. i. p. 200.

<sup>b</sup> See

(A) This, tho' chiefly said of Grand Kayro, and other great cities of Egypt, where scarce one half their inhabitants escape being affected with that disorder; yet is, in a less degree, applicable to the whole country; for which various authors assign different causes; as first; the great quantity of quick lime which is used in building and white-washing of their houses; the sublimer particles of which being loosed and carried about by the wind, sticking close to the eyes, cause inflammations there, which commonly end in an almost, if not total blindness; and, what is still worse, mixing with the mass of blood, cause the distemper, in some measure, to become hereditary; so that even infants are not exempt from it, but many of them seem to bring it with them into the world from the womb.

To this, Sandis and other travellers add the excessive height and heat of the sun, reflected from a salt and sandy soil; their copious sweating, which, if not washed away by frequent bathing, shuts up the pores, infects the blood with prurigenous particles, and amongst the poorer sort especially, who are seldomer able to bathe, is still increased by the meanness of diet, and the brackishness of their water. All which must proportionally affect the eyes, being most tender and delicate; seeing it is not less detrimental to the other parts of the body, where it not only causes those grievous tumours already mentioned, but itch, scabs, and other scorbutic and leprous humours, to which they are all, in some degree, subject. To all this, some add their excessive proneness to venery, and other causes of the like kind, which are too obvious as well as nauseous to be mentioned (1).

(1) Vide Theven. Sandis, Pocock, & al. sup. citat. Greenhill's art of embalming, lib. ii. p. 163, & seq. Grang. voy. into Egypt, p. 21, & seq.

- a THE next is a kind of pestilential fever, which rages from the vernal equinox to the next solstice, and carries off vast multitudes. The autumn is usually attended with grievous carbuncles, and other swellings in the knees and thighs; which seldom fail of dispatching a patient in two or three days. The small-pox, which rages mostly in the winter season, causes likewise a dreadful havoc among them: and during the whole time of the swelling of the Nile, the inhabitants are universally afflicted with the most stubborn dysenteries and bloody fluxes, occasioned by the great quantity of salts with which the waters of that river are then impregnated. The same may be said of the most refreshing winds, those northern ones which blow from April to September, that is, during the most sultry season of the year; and which, though they greatly contribute to allay the excessive, and otherwise intolerable heat, yet prove very dangerous to those who expose themselves to them, especially while in a sweat; for then they occasion the most excruciating pains in every part of the body, and often end in an incurable dead-palsy<sup>c</sup>.

Autumn very unhealthy.

Cooling winds often dangerous.

- We omit some others, with which this country is afflicted in common with other neighbouring countries, such as the plague; which is the more prevailing in all countries where Mohammedism is professed, because they use no means either to prevent or remedy it, being firmly persuaded that they are not only vain and ineffectual, but contrary to their doctrine of predestination (B). It is seldom found to have its rise in Egypt through the putrefaction of the air, unless the waters of the Nile spread too far, and rise to too great a height, and occasion it by their long stagnation and the excessive heat of the season; but is commonly brought thither from Barbary, or from Greece and Syria; that from the former of which lasts much the longest, and is most violent; that from the latter much shorter and milder. But let either of them rage ever so severely, as it doth chiefly in the first summer months, yet it is always observed to cease at the sun's entrance into cancer, which is the time of the Nile's overflowing; from which scarcely one in ten thousand dies of it. The reason of which sudden change is owing to the wind's chopping about from the moist and sultry south, to the dry and refreshing north corner, which clears the air of all its infection.

Egyptians neglect all precautions against the plague.

Whence chiefly brought.

- THERE is another disease which the Egyptians are subject to, occasioned by their too frequent eating of beets, and other such olitories; which breed a viscous phlegm in the blood, and in time swell their legs to a monstrous bigness; which, though not painful to the persons so afflicted, doth yet render them unweildy and sluggish both in walking and business. But there is still one more dreadful disease in Egypt, and especially about the territory of Grand Kayro; which we must not omit, as it seldom fails of affecting the inhabitants once every year, and carrying off multitudes daily all the time it lasts. The Arabians call it Dem al Muyab, from the nature of its effects, it suddenly seizing on the brain like an apoplexy, and carrying off the patient almost as soon. About the same time children are usually seized with a malignant kind of pox, occasioned probably, like the other, by the infectious damps of the waters of the Keileg, which is a branch, or rather canal, cut from the Nile to Alexandria. Every year, when that river rises about eight or ten cubits, it falls into the canal, which runs quite through the city; and, on its relaxing, leaves the waters in a state of stagnation and corruption. They quickly turn green, then black, and at length exhale such pestilential streams as quite infect the air. Therefore, to prevent the children being destroyed by the poisonous stench above-mentioned, they are commonly removed, some time before the infection begins, to some remote and healthier habitations<sup>d</sup>. If therefore these be the dire effects, upon young and old, of one single canal of stagnated water, what must they be through the whole space of the low country, which is all over intersected with them. And yet this is that place which hath been most cried-up by the ancients for its amenity and healthiness. But we have said enough to shew, if their accounts were really true, and not exaggerated, how much it is altered since for the worse, not only in those respects, but likewise with regard to the so much boasted fecundity of its animals, and the product of its soil. All which, being but the unavoidable effects of that arbitrary go-

Drop y, whence occasioned.

Apoplexy in Grand Kayro, how occasioned.

Its dreadful effects.

The country unhealthy and poor.

<sup>c</sup> Vide GRANGER's voy. to Egypt, anno 1730. THEVENOT's travels, part i. c. 80. Pocock's observations on Egypt, p. 95, & seq. <sup>d</sup> Ibid. Vide & MAILLET, let. 13. NORDEN, & al.

(B) We are indeed told, that the Turks at Constantinople, and some other parts of the Ottoman empire, have been prevailed upon, by the practice of European merchants settled amongst them, to use all proper precautions and means against that destructive distemper*. But the Egyptians, more tenacious of their prejudices, not only despise, but condemn all such wise precautions as vain and impious; and, in consequence, scorn to avoid infected persons or places, or even to wear the cloaths of those who have died of that distemper: insomuch that their apparel, bed-furniture, and household goods, are immediately exposed to sale in the public markets by the common cryer, and bought up without fear of being infected by them. By which surprising obstinacy, the distemper hath often been so far propagated, that it hath carried off a much greater number of people; and in the city of Kayro hath, within the short space of six or seven months, been observed to have destroyed above five hundred thousand (2).

* De hoc, vid. sup. vol. i. p. 678, & note (M). Maillet, & al. ubi sup.

(2) Vide Greenhill's art of embalming, let. ii. p. 166.

vernment they have so long groaned under, will be easily accounted for by taking a short view <sup>a</sup> of their present.

Crocodiles and sea-horses not to be seen below the cataracts.

BUT before we come to speak of that grand spring of these great changes, we shall beg leave to subjoin some others, no less curious, with respect to their animals. We have seen in the ancient part of this work, this kingdom infested with some of the most dangerous and destructive, not only to man and beast, but to the very product of the land : such as the crocodiles and sea-horses, which swarmed along the banks of the Nile, both in the Lower and Upper Egypt ; but which have been so effectually destroyed in the former, that there are rarely any to be seen of either kind below the cataracts ; or if, by chance, they are, the sight is as strange to them as it would be to an European *. The natives, as well as the Arabs, have proved equally industrious and diligent in finding means, at all hazards, to extirpate them in <sup>b</sup> this, though they suffer them, more through indolence than cowardice, to range and ravage in most other parts of Africa.

The ibis

starved out of it.

ON the other hand, the Ibis, anciently so numerous, and esteemed for the vast destruction they made among the whole serpentine species, are now become as rare and scarce for want of their proper food. They have been succeeded by a sort of inhabitants, known by the name of Ophiophagi, or serpent-eaters ; of whom our learned author tells us †, as he was informed, that there are above 40,000 at Kayro, and the adjacent villages, who live upon no other food than lizards and serpents ; upon which account they were allowed, among other peculiar privileges, the honour of attending more immediately the black embroidered hangings, which are yearly sent from thence to the kaaba at Mecca ; of which we shall speak more fully in the <sup>c</sup> sequel.

Succeeded by the stork.

To the Ibis hath since succeeded the stork, a bird scarcely known in that country ; but since then become so excessively numerous, that the same reverend author tells us, he observed three flights of them, in their passage from Egypt into Syria, as he lay at anchor at the foot of Mount Carmel, each of which took up more than three hours in passing by, and extended itself about half a mile ‡.

Now as numerous, and no less esteemed.

The stork is, moreover, held in great esteem and veneration, not only by the natives, but among the superstitious Mohammedans, who would deem it a horrid piece of prophaneness in any one either to hurt or molest, and much more to kill it. And this not barely on account of the great service it is of in destroying an infinite number and variety of noxious insects, which cover the face of the earth after the inundation is over, as well as swarm <sup>d</sup> on their lakes, ponds, and other stagnated waters and fenny lands ; but for the great share of conduct and prudence they display in their assembling, removing from, and settling in, divers parts of the world, at proper and regular seasons of the year : more particularly still, on account of some of their motions and peculiar gesticulations ; which they interpret as acts of religion and adoration of the Supreme Being (C), and on that surmise esteem him no less sacred than the ancient Egyptians did their Ibis.

Why deemed sacred by the Mohammedans.

BUT the greatest and most sensible changes that this country hath undergone, are those which have been occasioned by the tyranny of its various governments.

Tyrannical government.

No sooner was this kingdom freed from the long and severe tyranny of the Mamluks, than it was made to feel the weight of a still severer yoke under their Othman conquerors, and their more rapacious bashas, or governors under them. Whether Selim, under whose banners it was reduced, did himself lay the foundation of its present government, or whether his successors have made any considerable change, is what we neither dare assert, nor indeed is it very material with respect to our present point, its sensible decay in wealth, strength, populousness, and <sup>e</sup>

* SHAW'S observations on Egypt, p. 427.

† SHAW, ubi sup. p. 430.

‡ Id. ib.

(C) These gesticulations, tho' peculiar to that bird, and strange and singular enough to attract the attention of the beholder, could yet hardly raise such an extravagant notion in any but an enthusiastic Mohammedan, or half-crazed Pythagorean. They chiefly consist in its throwing back its head, as often as it alights on the ground, or returns to its nest ; and this they interpret as a posture or act of adoration : it next strikes its upper and lower bill together several times, like a pair of castanets ; and that noise is deemed as equivalent to a vocal prayer, or ejaculation, at least. Lastly, it bends its head down to the ground two or three times ; and that they judge a devout prostration.

The degree of rationality they ascribe to them, from their conduct and oeconomy in removing from country to country, is not quite so absurd, tho' it hath nothing in it but what is common to other birds, even down to the wild geese. They constantly resort upon such occasions, for about a fortnight before their flight, from all circumjacent parts, into some spacious plain, and there form themselves into a dewan, or grand council, as the people phrase it ; where they determine the exact time of their departure, and the place of their next abodes †.

Those that frequent the fens of Barbary, are observed to assemble three weeks before their flight, tho' they are supposed to come from Egypt, whither they also return a little after the autumnal equinox, when the Nile is returned within its usual banks, and the country in a condition to supply them with proper nourishment.

† Shaw's observations on Egypt, p. 428, & seq.

fertility.

- a fertility. It is, however, more than probable, that the avarice and ambition of those bashas have gradually contributed to sink its condition from bad to worse, as it is the richest govern- Avarice of the bashas, &c.
- b ment the sultans have in their gift, and usually bestow it either on their greatest favourites, or on those who can bid most money for it ; who seldom, if ever, enter into it with any other view than to enrich themselves at the expence of the subjects, and never want means nor pretences for turning every thing to their advantage. Neither, indeed, can it turn out otherwise, con- The vast charges of their post.
- c sidering that, lest the post hath been obtained by favour or bribery, it seldom costs them less than between 4 and 500,000 crowns before they can reach Grand Kayro, the usual place of their residence °. Add to this, that their commission, being limited to one single year, if any of them obtain a prolongation of it, as some have to three or four, each year's hath been pur- Yearly sum paid to the sultan,
- d chased at no less a price than 100,000 crowns and upwards, besides the usual yearly sum of 600,000 more, which he is bound to transmit to Constantinople at a vast expence ; the carriage from Kayro thither being very chargeable, and wholly to be defrayed by him. Besides that annual sum, which was called Hafnab, and must be paid in ready specie, he is obliged to furnish the seraglio with a certain quantity of provisions ; such as sugar, coffee, sherbet, rice, corn, and other commodities, which are computed to amount to very near the same sum. He is, moreover, obliged by his post to defray the whole charge of the grand pavilion, which the sultan sends yearly to Mecca, and to send thither with it 100,000 crowns for the entertain- to Mecca and Damascus.
- e ment of that city and mosk, and the like sum to Damascus, to defray the charges of the caravan which sets out from thence for Arabia. Over and above all these vast sums, and other commodities, which he is bound to convey out of Egypt at his own expence, he is likewise to pay all the forces of that kingdom (of which we shall give a full account in the sequel) out of Payment of all the forces.
- f the yearly and other accidental revenues thereof, with which he is invested in full by his commission ; by virtue whereof he enters into his government in the month of September, which is the first of the old Coptic year ; and if continued longer than one year, which is often the case, hath a fresh one transmitted to him from the Porte about the same time : but it is a favour which cannot be obtained without a considerable expence.

Now to give our readers an idea how a basha is enabled to support such vast annual disburse- Great reve- nue ;

d ments, we should lay before them some kind of estimate of his yearly income : and here we are told by a proper judge, who resided a considerable time at Kayro, as consul of the French nation †, that it might easily be made to amount to double the value of what he pays to the grand signor, exclusive of the maintenance of his forces, were it managed with suitable œconomy. This is more distinctly confirmed by a later author ‡, who tells us, that the whole land-revenue of that kingdom amounts to 10,000 purses ; of which the basha pays only 1200 to the grand signor ; and that the rest goes to the payment of the army, the maintenance of the temple at Mecca, and other purposes already mentioned.

BUT, adds the former of these authors, the most considerable part of it arises from the pesti- especially in time of pesti- lence.

e lence, which so frequently rages in that country ; inasmuch that, during the three or four months it commonly lasts, it brings him such a vast income, that one single day may be worth to him 2 or 300,000 crowns, by the deaths of those who are possessed of large villages ;

f for these lands, which, by the laws of the Ottoman empire, revert to the grand signor, do of course fall to the share of the basha, who is intitled to them by virtue of his commission, and frequently amount to immense sums ; especially as, by the rapid deaths with which the pur- Inherits the estates of the dead.

chasers are often snatched away, one after another, he is enabled to sell the same estate to three or four different persons in one week, no land-purchase being longer than the life of the purchaser. But herein is the great misfortune, that the basha sells those lands to the highest bidder ; who, upon all such occasions, attend in great numbers, and usually outbid one another ; the consequence of which is, that, in order to make the most of their purchase, they farm them out at such high rates, that the poor tenants find it difficult to get a bare maintenance by them.

BESIDES the above-mentioned income arising from the cultivated lands, he hath likewise another considerable one arising from the farming of the customs, and several other crown-revenues, amounting commonly to 1440 purses ; of which he pays no more to the Porte than 800, and sinks the remainder into his own coffers. To all these we must add a variety of other privileges and perquisites belonging to those governors, which are too obvious to want mentioning ; and which are equally grievous to the common people, and no less contribute to the misery that rages among them ; at the same time enabling the Egyptian basha and his court to maintain that lustre and grandeur, which it enjoyed under its former monarchs.

THE basha of Egypt is obliged to have twenty-four beighs under him, and seven bodies of militia, without whose consent he cannot undertake any thing. But it seldom, if ever, His assistant beighs and militia.

° MAILLET, & al. ubi sup.

† MAIL. desc. de l'Égypte, let. 12. GRANGER, NORDEN, POCOCK, & al.

‡ GRANGER's voyage into Egypt, p. 231, & seq. ubi sup.

Their number seldom complete.

happens that the number of the former is complete ; their pay, which amounts to 500 aspers a per diem, and 1000 whenever they take the field, being a great temptation to him, who alone hath the nomination of them, to sink as much of it as he dares. So that that dignity is seldom purchased at a less price than between 20 and 30 purses ; each purse amounting to about 500 crowns.

Seven corps of militia.

Their offices.

It is much the same with respect to the militia or land forces, which is seldom found to be above half its complement ; and with this only difference, that, in this last, the officers sink the rest into their own pockets, though not without making some suitable acknowledgement to the basha for winking at the deficiency. We hinted above, that these were divided into seven distinct bodies or classes, called by them ports ; two of which are infantry ; viz. the Janissaries and Agars ; the other five are cavalry, and distinguished by their different names b of Jumeli, Tuffekhi, Charaksas, Matafarrakas, and Chiaus. The complement of the Janissaries should consist of 20,000 ; that of the Agars, and the other five, of 20,000 more : but it is a question whether they amount to half that number <sup>a</sup>. The infantry is chiefly kept to guard the city and castle at Kayr, or Kayro ; the Matafarrakas are sent to garrison other maritime cities, as Alexandria, Rosetta, Damietta, and some other inferior ports. The rest of them are chiefly used as guards and attendants on the beighs, or governors of provinces ; and the Chiaus to be sent out upon any extraordinary parties, or occasional excursions, as the basha and his dowan shall think fit to order them (D).

The dowan, or grand council.

THIS dowan is held twice, some say thrice, a week, at his palace at Kayro ; viz. on Sunday, Tuesday, and some add, Thursday <sup>i</sup>. Those beighs and officers of the militia are the constant attendants of the basha, unless sent on some public expedition or service of the state, and from his dowan or grand council. These are they who may be truly said to engross the whole power and authority, he not being allowed to undertake any thing without their consent. Yet as he hath the sole right to nominate them, and winks at those abuses by which they enrich themselves in their respective posts, his influence over them is usually sufficient to attach them to his interest, and agreement with his measures. If there be any among the agas, of the militia especially, who betrays an ambitious view of gaining a superiority over the rest, he is sure to be set up as a mark of their jealousy ; and though he may sometimes succeed, yet his reign seldom lasts longer than till his co-rivals have found means to form a stronger party against him, which will quickly bring him to a tragical end. A politic basha never fails of having a watchful eye d over these intestine feuds, and improving them to his own advantage ; not only as they add so much weight to his authority as they take off from that of the dowan, but much more so by the spoils of those who become the victims of such commotions ; for, being thereby declared traitors to the government, they usually forfeit their lives and estates to him. Thus, tho' his power be ever so limited and cramped by the constitution of that state, a wise governor never wants means to support and strengthen himself against the opposition and cabals of his dowan.

Their mutual jealousies and cabals.

<sup>a</sup> GRANGER, MAILLET, NORDEN, & al. ubi sup. into Egypt, p. 227, & al.

<sup>i</sup> Confer. MAILLET, ubi sup. & GRANGER'S voyage

(D) It will not be improper to apprise our readers, that the consul above-named, who resided there about 30 years before our author's arrival, gives a different account of the Egyptian militia, both with respect to the number of their bodies, their offices, and some of their names ; from which we conclude, that the corps is like to change according to the pleasure of the Porte, or of the basha and his dowan.

In the next place, he names but five orders or bodies of it ; viz. 1. the Mustapharagas ; 2. the Azaphs ; 3. the Spahis ; 4. the Bachasuchs ; and 5. the Janissaries. The first of them, whom he styles the most noble, tho' the least useful and esteemed, have the basha at their head. They are, according to him, a kind of nobility, consisting partly of those of his household and some beighs, and partly of rich merchants, who, for some private reasons, are obliged to put themselves under his protection ; but, being for the most part undisciplined in the military art, are kept more for show than service.

The second corps, which is the Azaphs, are infantry, not unlike that of the Janissaries, and also quite independent on the basha ; but are ever opposite and irreconcilable enemies to each other.

The Spahis are the next corps of cavalry to the Musta-

pharagas : they are divided into three banners ; viz. the green, the yellow, and the red ; each consisting, or should consist, of 1000 men, and each of them bearing the like ill-will both to the Janissaries and Azaphs.

The fourth corps, which our author calls Bachasuchs, is a small body of infantry, not exceeding 500 men, and governed much like that of the Janissaries, if it may not be rather looked upon as part of their body, as it includes much the same number of widows, whose husbands have died in the service.

The fifth and last corps, according to this author, tho' in itself the most considerable and powerful that the Porte maintains in this kingdom, is that of the Janissaries ; which consists of six or eight thousand effective men, besides almost an equal number of supernumerary ones, being chiefly merchants, tradesmen, and other natives, who enlist themselves among them merely for the sake of protection, and to be admitted to the same privileges and immunities which that corps enjoys ; but the pay of this last sort of Janissaries is commonly swallowed up by the former, who are looked upon as the true ones ; and when the former are summoned to the wars, or any of them die, a great part of their effects is seized upon by, and shared among, the latter. Thus far this author (4).

(4) Letter 9, ubi sup.

- <sup>a</sup> THIS grand council sits in a spacious and magnificent hall, which hath a most noble square or court before it, where the members of it parade with all their retinue, and make such a splendid appearance, not only by the vast number of their servants and horses, richly dressed and caparisoned, and glittering with gold, silver, and precious stones, but it is affirmed, by those who have seen both, to exceed even that of the grand signor in his metropolis. And it is upon that account, we are told, that sultan Selim, who subdued that kingdom, having held his dewan at this city of Kayro, and in the stately hall of the royal palace of the Egyptian monarchs, forbade the then basha and all his successors to meet any more in that magnificent apartment, lest the sight of so much grandeur and opulence, joined to the splendid appearance of their dewan, should inspire them with a desire of shaking off their loyalty to the Porte, and of making themselves absolute masters of Egypt. So that this hall, where the dewan now meets, is quite different from that of the ancient Egyptian kings; and, excepting its extraordinary largeness and spacious court lately mentioned, is almost destitute of every other ornament, there being nothing in it worth observation but only seven deal planks, each about half an inch thick, and closely fastened together by an arrow which that sultan shot quite thro' them. These are kept suspended over the place where the basha sits, as a monument of that prince's superior strength (E). The hall where they sit. Grand appearance. Forbid to sit in the ancient hall. A monument of Selim's prodigious strength.
- <sup>b</sup> BESIDES the vast revenues and privileges already mentioned, appertaining to the basha, his beighs, and military officers, they have found out many other ways of enriching themselves by various other oppressions of the people, especially of the richer sort, whom, by some artifice or other, they either enlist, or pretend to have enlisted, under some one of their bodies; by which they fleece them while alive, and seize on the better part of their effects after their death; the basha conniving at all those abuses, either as a sharer in the spoil, or out of fear of obliging such a powerful body by discountenancing or suppressing them. The bashas extortion on the Arab cheyks.
- <sup>c</sup> THEY carry this arbitrary proceeding as far as Upper Egypt, and among the Arabian cheyks, or chiefs, from whom they extort the most exorbitant contributions, under the specious name of tribute for living under their protection; by which pretended title they likewise claim the largest share of their estate when they die, and divide the rest among the children or relations of the deceased, according to their own discretion. This last kind of oppression is a privilege properly belonging to the corps of the Janissaries; which their griping officers have found means to usurp within these fifty or sixty years, in spite of the wise regulations of sultan Selim, that excluded every kind of military corps from possessing any lands; so that they have by this time got the far greater part of them into their hands by main force, and are in a likely way of becoming masters of all the rest. Moreover, we are told, these Janissaries are so bent upon this point, that they keep an exact roll of the various states, trades, and occupations in the kingdom; of all the rich and poor; of the various ways by which they have hitherto extorted many sums from them; and are ever concerting new ones to complete their purpose. What adds to the wonder is, that the Othman Porte, though fully apprised of it, doth not take any care to suppress an abuse, which may some time or other end in the total loss of that rich province <sup>m</sup>. Janissaries, their usurpation and policy.
- <sup>d</sup> THESE extortions fall equally on the Europeans and other trading nations that are amongst them; and these Janissaries are never at a loss for a pretence to quarrel with them, sometimes about their dress, at others about their behaviour, as not paying a due respect, or for admitting some of the Mohammedan women into their quarters by night, and such other pretexts, whether real or false, in order to extort money from them; there being no other way to avoid their resentment than by a quick submission, and some answerable atonement, as speedy as valuable, according to one of their favourite adages, that the egg of to-day is preferable to the chicken of to-morrow. But, of all nations, that of the Jews is most hated, despised, and oppressed by this tyrannic government, though so numerous and so highly encouraged in all the
- <sup>e</sup> Extortions on the Europeans and others, often bought off by a bribe.

<sup>m</sup> MAILLET, & al. ubi sup.

(E) It is added, as a farther proof of it, that the arrow of the strongest of those, who shot with him at that time, penetrated no farther than the third board, though he was famed for the prodigious strength of his arm. But might he not, adds our author (5), be glad to slacken it upon this occasion, in order to ingratiate himself to his master, or out of fear, lest aiming imprudently at the victory it should have a contrary effect. However that be, the shooting thro' such a vast number of boards, of which, he says, the first was of deal, but does not tell us what the rest were of, would still be a sufficient proof of that monarch's extraordinary strength, though any of the rest had done the same (6).

Dr. Pocock mentions likewise some leathern shields shewn here, above half an inch thick, and pierced by sultan Amurat with several spears; which he ordered still to remain in them (7).

(5) Maillet, & al. ubi sup.

(6) Maillet, ubi sup.

(7) Observations on Egypt, p. 33.

other Turkish dominions ; and we may add in this kingdom too, where they were once very a numerous, rich, and employed in some of the most important posts of the state ; but now, by this new set of oppressors, dwindled to a very considerable number, except at Kayro, and reduced to the lowest poverty ; but of this we have had occasion to speak in a former volume. This much may suffice to give our readers an idea of the tyranny and iniquity of the present Egyptian government (F), as well as the extreme indigence and misery of those who live under it.

The people often ravaged by the Arabs.

Splendid equipage of the beighs.

How they avoid the basha's anger.

THOSE who live in the upper provinces of the kingdom may be said to be still more miserable, being not only equally oppressed by their voracious governors, but frequently exposed to the inroads and dreadful ravages of the Arabian cheyks ; who, by way of reprisal for the hardships they suffer from these petty tyrants, watch all opportunities to pour down upon the poor villagers with their numerous adouars, and carry all before them that comes in their way. It is true the beighs, who have the government of these provinces, are obliged to entertain a certain number of forces to suppress those freebooters ; but, as we lately observed, the number of the beighs, and much more that of their forces, is never complete ; nor are the latter kept in such a condition, and under sufficient discipline, to repel them, especially as their incursions are ever sudden, fierce, and desperate against all opposition : whilst, perhaps, those beighs, whose business and duty it is to curb and oppose the invaders, are parading it at Kayro, in such splendid equipages as would by far eclipse those of many of our European princes (G). If any such disasters happen to any of those beighs as the ravaging a province or canton, through his neglect of keeping a sufficient force against the Arabs, the basha hath power to punish him c with the loss of his place, with fine or confiscation of his goods, and even with death. The same he may do in case of any male-administration, other default, or even on any mere pretended one, and with no other view than to seize on their wealth : there have been instances of all these severities, tho' but seldom of late years. They are, properly speaking, little better than farmers of the lands which are in their respective provinces, and for which they are to pay a proportionable sum to the government ; but have found out an essential way to screen them-

(F) It will not, however, be improper to subjoin here, as a farther proof of what goes before, the abuse and corruption which gradually crept into the method of paying this militia, especially the corps of the Janissaries ; which is such as is hardly to be matched in any government we know, or have read of.

The stated stipend of every private man is three pence per diem, which is paid to them every three months by their respective treasurer, at the castle of Kayro. But every one of them is intitled to an augmentation of one or more pence by paying a certain sum, not indeed proportionate to the augmentation, but such as returns whole to him within the space of three years ; so that a monied man can get his pay increased from three or four, to ten, twenty, or an hundred pence per diem, according to the sum advanced, and which is as regularly paid as that of the lowest rate. The basha is the person who receives the sum, by way of security ; and, having received the principal, often leaves the interest to be paid by his successors. The worst of it is, that this high pay is continued after the death of the person who is intitled to it, and another of a lower pay is put in his room, tho' without receiving any advantage from it, the basha and officers sinking the rest into their pockets, to the impairment of the imperial revenue ; which, however, the sultans seldom fail of obliging them to refund in a great measure, by the frequent and large demands they make upon them, and which they are obliged to comply with, to avoid the loss of their all, if not of their lives (8).

(G) We have already hinted something of the superb appearance the beighs and militia officers make at the basha's court ; but, lest the reader should think that last expression exaggerated, we shall here subjoin a short description of the pompous equipages they commonly appear in, from one or two eye-witnesses, even upon the most trifling occasion ; such as their shewing themselves upon the public walks of the city, or on their weekly attendance at the dewan on the appointed days. Imagine then, says one of our authors, one of these grandees, most magnificently dressed, and mounted on a stately horse, adorned with variety of gold and silver embroidery, and other rich embellishments, followed by thirty or forty beautiful youths, no less superbly mounted and accoutred, marching with all the grandeur and dignity peculiar to the Turkish nation, and this will give you an idea of their pride and gallantry.

But this is still inconsiderable in comparison to the appearance of the chief beigh, who hath the command of the Mecca caravan, and seldom appears on public days without a retinue of three hundred men, as sumptuously habited, and mounted on some of the finest horses in the country, covered all over with the richest trappings and housings, reaching to the ground, and adorned with costly embroidery ; the meanest of which are valued at 200, but some of them at above 500 crowns.

It must be owned that Mr. Norden hath, in one note, taken upon him to censure this account as extravagant ; but without producing either authority or reason to the contrary, tho' confirmed by other writers. Whoever reads his censure on the same author, and compares the account he has given of Pompey's pillar with his own (vol. i. p. 16, & al.) will find little cause for his severe remarks, but a pregnant instance of that spirit which too often prevails among gentlemen of his profession, and seldom fails to give a check to the pleasure, as well as the benefit, one might otherwise reap in reading of them.

But here it must be observed, that the height of their pride is mostly confined to such splendid equipages. They are much more frugal in the furniture of their houses, if we except the apartments of their women, which they spare no cost to adorn with every thing that is rich and delightful ; but, as to their own, they are less careful about their furniture, being uncertain how long they may continue in their posts, after which it all goes to the next successor (9).

(8) Maillet, ubi sup. 9 & 12.

(9) Maillet, Granger, & al. sup. citat.

a selves from such punishments, by putting themselves under the protection either of the Janissaries, Azaphs, or Spahis, or even, to be still more secure, of all these three bodies; which is no difficult thing to obtain, provided the delinquent, whether really or pretendedly, be but rich enough to bribe his protectors to espouse his cause: for it is not to be supposed, that any of them will do so merely from a principle of justice or equity. In that case, a basha who hath no authority over them, but rather every thing to fear from their resentment, sees himself obliged to give up his views, and to drop the prosecution, be the accused ever so guilty; unless he can, by the same method of bribery, or by fomenting some dissension amongst them, secure a majority on his side; which last is the surest engine he hath to play against their cabals, in all emergencies of that nature.

b ANOTHER show of grandeur, which not only these beighs and militia officers, but all the opulent and wealthy, generally affect, is to have a vast number of slaves of both sexes, and in this respect they are to the full as lavish as in their other retinue; insomuch that there are some of them, whose number and value amount to 20 or 30,000 crowns; which is the more to be wondered at, because the plague, which so frequently rages there, seldom fails of carrying off one third or more of them, and by that means raises the price of them to such a height, that their loss cannot be repaired but at a prodigious expence. And as that distemper commonly makes a much greater havock amongst them in proportion, than amongst their masters, it often happens that one master lives long enough to see three or four hundred slaves drop into their graves before he dies. Another thing that enhances the price of them is, the great quantities which every basha is obliged to send yearly into Turky, both to the Porte and to all his friends at court. If it be asked how they are supplied with such vast quantities of them? we answer, that the inland parts of Africa are an inexhaustible source, and have actually, for these two or three centuries last past, furnished not only Egypt, but Asia and America, with myriads of them yearly, as we shall have farther occasion to shew in the sequel of this African history. And as they come from very different parts, so are they of different complexions, tempers, and qualities; some are white, others tawny or brown olive, and others almost white, who would in all likelihood be more esteemed for their rarity, were it not for the disadvantage they have above the rest of losing their whiteness through the heat of the climate: but this is not the case of the females, who are less exposed to the weather, and therefore are most esteemed, by the Egyptians and Turks, and those who are brought from Abissinia, on account of their charming eyes, regular features, and fine shape (H). Vast numbers of slaves carried off by the plague.

c THE last instance of grandeur, which the Egyptians of rank and wealth affect, is to have a stately burying-place, or burying-place, peculiar to their family, surrounded with a stately wall, and adorned, if not with imagery, yet with grand monuments, pavilions, pompous inscriptions, and other decorations; which yield a noble vista at a distance. They are, moreover, divided into partitions; one of which is for the males, another for the females, belonging to the family, and the rest for the domestics. But in no case doth the structure of these sepulchral, or any other of their finest edifices, come up to the ancient architecture for which this country was once so justly famed; the most celebrated of which we have given an account of in a former part of this work*. Their taste for that and other arts seems now as much absorbed, as if these noble and ancient monuments, which have ever been, and are still, the admiration of the world, had all been buried as deep under the sands and dust (as a great part of them actually are) as the vast Colossian sphinx formerly described, of which nothing now is to be seen but the head and neck<sup>1</sup>; and many other stately temples and structures, of which nothing is to be seen but the roof, must be digged down to some of the windows, in order to get into and view the inside<sup>m</sup>. And yet there is a sufficient number left every where, still visible and entire; to have preserved their taste for that noble art, had not the decay of its ancient Whence brought.

* See Anc. Hist. vol. i. p. 193, & seq. ad fin. <sup>1</sup> See ibid. p. 183, & seq. Vid. & Pocock, p. 44, & seq. NORDEN, vol. i. p. 121, & seq. & al. <sup>m</sup> Ibid. Vide & MAILLET, ubi sup. GRANGER'S voyage into Egypt, ch. iv. & seq. Stately burying-places.

(H) Some add, for the sweetness of their temper, they being wholly free from that sullenness which is natural to the blacks; some of whom will carry it to such a height as to starve themselves to death to vex their masters. The former, therefore, are more commonly chosen of either sex, but especially the males, to make presents to a basha, beigh, or great officer, and seldom fail of meeting with a gracious reception, and suitable return.

We are told farther, that the Christians and Jews are not permitted to have any slaves, except of the negro kind; and even those they do not suffer them to send or take away with them out of the kingdom, lest they should oblige them to change their religion; tho' the greater part of those, which belong to the Jews, have been already induced by their masters to do so, and privately profess Judaism; but whether sincerely or out of policy is the question (7).

(7) Maillet, &c. ubi sup.

fertility and populousness, the extreme misery which the people are reduced to by the tyrannical government of so many new masters, as the Saracens, Mamluks, and now, more than ever, the Turks, so totally destroyed it, that those, who have been eye-witnesses of it, could hardly conceive how it was possible for such a nation so totally to degenerate into the opposite extreme of rudeness and stupid ignorance. If any faint remains of ancient ingenuity are still found amongst them, it is chiefly in the construction of their stair-cases, especially of the winding kind; which are pretty numerous, and requisite in the womens apartments, and which they carry on with great skill and nicety, as well as ease and speed. And this, we are told, is chiefly owing to an excellent sort of cement, or mortar, mixed with quick lime; which makes it whiter and more durable, quick in drying, and, when fully so, grows as hard, or even harder than the stone it binds: so that they can rear, our author assures us, such a stair-case without scaffold, by laying one step upon another; which is immediately dry enough for them to stand upon and place the next, and so on to the top.<sup>a</sup> If it be true, how far might such a cement be improved in the rearing of other kinds of structures? but the Egyptians, it seems, are too indolent and stupid to aim at improvements, as well as too stubborn to be directed to them.

THEIR painting is still more rude, whether in oil or water colours, and may be more properly called a dawbing, without taste, keeping, or any of that masculine and beautiful coloris, which is still to be seen in some of their ancient paintings that yet remain. Their gilding comes likewise infinitely short of that brilliancy, which, in their old ones, appears still as if newly laid on. They have, moreover, lost the art of burnishing the gold: for want of which every thing they do of that kind is rude and lifeless. The only curious branch of this kind they have preserved, is that of dissolving their gold to the liquidity of ink, and writing not only letters and books with it, but intermixing it with their paintings; which appears very beautiful, and preserves its lustre: but this is no secret peculiar to them; for we see it among the Persians and Indians in the same perfection.

IT would be needless, in a work like this, to descend to their other arts, trades, and manufactures, in all which one may observe the same visible decay of the genius and elegance for which that country was once so justly famed; nevertheless we shall, for the sake of the curious, subjoin in the margin a small scantling of them (I), by which they may frame an idea of the sad effects of tyrannic government, and how destructive it is to every thing that is conducive to the grandeur and happiness of a nation, and how soon, as well as naturally, it sinks it into the lowest degree of indolence and misery.<sup>b</sup>

THE only manufacture, therefore, amongst them, worth mentioning, is the weaving, and is chiefly reducible to three branches; viz. the silken, linen, and woollen. With regard to the first, their raw silk is brought from Syria to Damiata, and is woven into large handkerchiefs or veils for the women; and a very rich sort of them is worked with gold, and flowered with several colours, to throw over such presents as they send from one to the other; some are made into cushions, sofas, and most of them very costly. Besides these, they have a considerable manufacture of several sorts of sattins and taffatees, in imitation of those which are brought from India, but vastly short of them in beauty and goodness.<sup>c</sup> They weave likewise some other sorts of silks, and even velvets, but all vastly inferior to those of India and Europe,<sup>d</sup>

<sup>a</sup> MAILLET, ubi sup. p. 13.<sup>b</sup> Id. ib.<sup>c</sup> Pocock, ubi sup. p. 174.

(I) Thus, for instance, we are told, that a joiner sits, instead of standing to his work, the ground serving him for a bench, and his feet in place of a hold-fast to keep his work tight. His tools are a wretched plane, an ax, and two or three chissels. They have no notion of the lathe or wheel for turning, nor of squares, compasses, gauges, and a vast number of other instruments in use amongst us; without the help of which their work must come clumsy and rude out of their hands. But this is a defect, which, we shall shew in the sequel, is common to every part of Africa, except where the Europeans are settled, and have shewn them a better method: tho', even there, it is with great difficulty that they will be prevailed upon to improve by their example and instructions, or to exchange their old rude and laborious way for a better.

Of the metallic manufactures they are still more ignorant; and, except some knives, scissars, razors, and such-like, which are wrought amongst them, and owe their value more to the goodness of the metal, than the ingenuity of the workmen, most of their commodities of that sort come to them from Europe, by the way of Venice and Constantinople.

That of glass, of old so admired for its transparency, beauty, variety of colours, and useful works, is now dwindled into the making of some oil-lamps, and coarse bottles for brandy and other such liquors; nor indeed is it possible for them to come at a greater perfection for want of proper fuel: for tho' they have all other necessary ingredients in plenty, yet having no other firing than that of straw, which is not strong enough to give them a thorough fusion, the metal must of course come out of a foul and disagreeable colour. The truth is, the better sort of it is little in use amongst them, either for drinking, glazing of windows, or other such uses. So that looking-glasses, and these commonly of the small kind, and beads of all colours, are in vogue, and brought likewise to them from Venice and other parts of Europe (8).

(8) Maillet, &amp; al. ubi sup.

a as well as to those which their own country produced. The same may be said of their cotton Cotten and woollen. and linen, though they have both in great plenty and goodness; particularly their flax which grows in the Deltba. They have not the use of the wheel, but spin all with a distaff and spindle; which is a more tedious, as well as coarse way. The chief manufacture of it is at Rosetto, where they weave variety of linen, mostly striped, and used about their beds as a fence against the gnats (K). But the very best linen in the whole country is that which is made at Mabal'a in the Deltba, and at Damiata; it is mostly plain, and well woven, though not fine, and is used for the table; but there is a dearer sort, which is striped, with a silk border<sup>a</sup>, for those of higher rank.

ALL their woollen manufacture consists only of an unnapped sort of carpets, used mostly for the seats of the dowans, or for sophas, and are woven with broad stripes of different colours, with little variety of any other kind.

THE only handicraft in which they excel, is the mounting of their hand-guns, and in pre-paring and shaping of the wood; in which great numbers are continually employed. The chief advantage of which, we are told, consists in the use of a peculiar plane, the under part of which is of well-tempered steel, about two inches thick. This much may suffice to shew the melancholy decay of their arts and manufactures, and the sad causes to which it was owing: and if these so necessary and useful branches of knowledge could be thus liable to so surprising a change, what devastation may we judge the same cause must have produced amongst the more liberal and intellectual ones, and the whole circle of those sciences for which this kingdom was once so justly celebrated<sup>c</sup>, and looked upon by the rest of the world as the original source from whence they flowed unto them; especially from that fatal period which reduced it under the yoke of a succession of ignorant and barbarous tyrants, who took as much pride in eliminating the very memory and all the venerable and valuable monuments of them, as their natural princes had done in cherishing and promoting them. By these tyrants, however, we are far from meaning either the Romans, under whose government, though degenerated and vitiated in their taste for them, they yet maintained themselves in a flourishing condition: nor much less can we mean the Arabs, by whom they were next subdued, and especially the Fatemite khalifs<sup>d</sup>, who both loved and encouraged them, and will be ever remembered with honour for that vast and noble repository of books, which they caused to be brought from all parts at a vast expence, and set up in their capital; of which we shall have occasion to speak more fully in the sequel. The devastation we mean was that which Salah'd-din, the first introducer of the Mamluks into Egypt, caused to be made of that noble library; which, Makrifi tells us, consisted of above 100,000 volumes, collected from several other parts of Africa, Syria, Arabia, Greece, Spain, Sicily, Sardinia, and other countries of Egypt and Asia, and from some of the most celebrated universities and monasteries of these countries, the greatest part of them transcribed in letters of gold; a collection of the whole was looked upon as an inestimable treasure, till that ignorant and superstitious prince, before-mentioned, became the possessor of it, and, by the havock he made of those noble monuments, introduced that ignorance and barbarism, which have reigned in it ever since, both under the Mamluk usurpation, and since its conquest by the Turks. It is true, that a vast number of them were preserved from the flames, by the ignorance and avarice of the minister who was the chief judge and executioner of the sultan's orders; and if we may give credit to Makrifi, above-mentioned, instead of saving only those which treated of Mohammedism, and of the conquests of the Mohammedan princes, he luckily preserved those only which were the best written and most richly adorned, as these would fetch the most money; by which means they not only escaped the fire, but were bought at a vast expence by the great ones of the court, to adorn their own libraries, or those of their principal mosks. But even these, in time, became neglected, through the sordid ignorance or want of taste in those who had the care of them; for they looked upon them either as unintelligible, or not sufficiently interesting to set a due value upon them. Add to this, that, since the reduction of Egypt by sultan Selim, the bashas and other officers of the Porte have been ordered to search out for the most valuable and curious books of every kind, in order to get them conveyed to Constantinople. How, therefore, should there be any learning, or learned men, in a country that hath been stripped of all its valuable books of every kind, and under a government which hath, for above these two centuries

<sup>a</sup> Pocock, ubi sup. p. 174. 512, & seq.

<sup>c</sup> See Anc. Hist. vol. i. p. 217, & seq.

<sup>d</sup> De his, vide sup. vol. i. p.

(K) This sort is likewise made at Kayro and Farame; at the latter of which places is also made a great quantity of sack-cloth, which is conveyed to the former. There is likewise a considerable manufacture of linen at Sciout, in Upper Egypt, and in some other places, for sheeting and other uses; which we need not dwell upon (9).

(9) Pocock's observations on Egypt, p. 174.

past, taken the most effectual means to discourage both the one and the other; so that we may date the decay of both from the fatal period in which this kingdom passed from the dominion of the noble Iatemite khalifs to the tyrannical usurpation of the rude and barbarous Mamluks: that of the Turks since having rather added to than remedied the evil<sup>a</sup>.

Decay of military discipline.

ONE might, however, imagine that Selim, who first subdued it from the former, and settled it into a form of military government, under which it hath continued ever since, might have proved a means, how destructive soever to the liberal arts and sciences, of improving its military ones. But from what we have already said of the present state of the militia here, and the abuses which the officers of it have, by degrees, introduced into it, partly with the connivance of the basha, and much more by the power they have usurped over him, even this branch is sunk into as low an ebb as any of the rest, though formerly reckoned the best in the Othman empire. And the only benefit which the subjects may be said to have reaped from it, if it be any, is that of their being freed from the plague of long and vexatious suits, and the iniquitous practices of their cadis, and other courts of justice; the decision of all such controversies being wholly referred to the beighs and other militia officers, who command in the cities and provinces; whose sentence is commonly decisive, without appeal; and though, for the most part, in favour of the party that bribes highest, is at least prompt and free from these troublesome and expensive delays that usually attend most of the European ones.

Form of government, how settled by Selim.

THE truth is, that that conqueror, having once reduced this kingdom, and totally suppressed the power of the Mamluks, was naturally induced to settle the government of it and its militia upon the same footing as it had been in Turky by his predecessors; and accordingly fixed it upon a certain number of men, who were to be raised mostly out of that country, and only intermixed with some others drawn out of different provinces of his empire, together with some of his Turks who had lived some time in Egypt, and were best acquainted with it; and these he reduced into seven bodies or ports, and allotted to each their respective offices and posts, as hath been already mentioned. As for a naval force, he did not think it necessary, or perhaps convenient, to maintain one there, nor have any of his successors; but have nevertheless been able to keep that country in subjection by the sole help of their militia, dispersed, as we have already observed, through the several parts of it, and in their respective castles or garrisons.

Egypt maintained no naval force.

Its castles and garrisons, how governed.

THE most considerable of these are as follow; 1. at Kayro; 2. Rosetto; 3. Alexandria; 4. Damiata; 5. the Labyrinth; 6. Adjeroute; and two or three more of less consequence; the greatest part of which are ill kept, and worse garrisoned, since Selim ruined all that were in a condition to defend themselves. All these have their respective garrisons, consisting of Janissaries, or Azaphs, commanded by a beigh or other military officer, whose post gives him the title of aga. They have their subalterns under them, called Schorbassis, with whom they form the dowan. Their power, however, extends no farther than the fortress they command, though they seldom fail of stretching it beyond these limits, whenever they have an opportunity of enriching themselves by intermeddling in any affairs in their neighbourhood; where, as we have lately observed, they set up for judges, without appeal, and commonly decide in favour of the highest bidder: though if the other party hath friends powerful enough, which is sometimes the case, he may bring his cause before a higher tribunal, and be able not only to obtain not only a reversion, but be a means of punishing the unrighteous judge.

As to what regards the castles above-mentioned, it will not be expected that we should, in a work like this, enter into a description of them, which hath been so fully done by so many hands<sup>b</sup>; and we hope it will be sufficient for our present purpose to give our readers some idea of their strength and garrisons, in order to shew with how small a force the Turkish emperors have been able to keep this once potent kingdom under their subjection and oppressive government.

City and castle of Kayro.

THAT of Kayro, which is now the metropolis of the kingdom, the residence of the basha and dowan, was once a spacious strong structure, but since gone to decay. It stands on a rocky hill, which seems to have been separated by art from the hill or mount Gebel D'wise, and is surrounded by a stout high wall; but is commanded by a higher hill on the north-east, and can, therefore, be a place of no strength since the invention of cannon, whatever it might be before. On the west side are still the remains of very grand apartments, some covered with domes, and adorned with Mosaic pictures of trees and houses, that doubtless belonged to the ancient sultans; but this part of the castle is now only used for weaving, embroidering, and preparing, the hangings or coverings that are sent yearly to Mecca. What strength and quantity of artillery this castle contains is not known, admittance into it being denied to all Europeans. However, we may suppose it hath a sufficiency of every thing to keep that vast and populous city in awe. The Janissaries are the chief guards of it, and of the town. Old

Garrisoned by Janissaries.

<sup>a</sup> MAILLET, & al. sup. citat.

<sup>b</sup> Vid. POCOCK, NORDEN, & al. sup. citat.

- a Kayro is also guarded by another corps of them, under a beigh who resides there, and, we are told, is changed every month; whilst the Azaphs guard the country about it*. Another <sup>and other</sup> officer, stiled valla, answering to the Turkish soubasha, patrols through the city night and <sup>officers,</sup> day, but especially in the night. His business is to take up all loose and idle persons, all breakers of the peace, thieves, drunken and disorderly people; and, in some flagrant cases, <sup>who abuse</sup> he cuts off their heads upon the spot, or causes them to be bastonaded and imprisoned, <sup>their power,</sup> according to the nature of the offence or offender: for if it be one of those who put themselves under the protection of the Janissaries, or other military bodies, he comes off much cheaper, is punished in private, and not on the spot. This officer, who is, or should be, the terror of rogues, is frequently prevailed upon, by some proper present, to become their protector; without which they must suffer immediate death. He is, moreover, the person to whom great men apply to have any offender delivered up, and they are sure of having him given up accordingly. There is another officer, called metelib, who hath the care of all weights and measures, and to see that all things be done according to them<sup>y</sup>. We may, however, wonder upon the whole, considering the general corruption which rages in this vast populous city, from the basha, or governor, down to the lowest of his officers, the power and insolence of the Janissaries and other military bodies, the prodigious number of inhabitants, both natives and foreigners, which swarm in it (L), and the vast commerce that is carried on there, that the people in general live so quietly and peaceably as they are said to do. But it must be remembered, that the natives are kept under by main fear, and the others by mean policy: the former knowing, and for the most part feelingly, the severity of the government they live under, become by degrees so accustomed to the yoke, that they naturally chuse to submit to it, rather than incur a worse fate: the latter, by being timely admonished of the most effectual means to avoid giving any umbrage or handle to those in power, or any occasion to a Turk to quarrel with him, may chance to live quiet enough and unmolested among them. But if through passion, inadvertency, or even in spite of all his caution and resolution to avoid either, he has incurred their censure, there is still an expedient at hand to bring him off; viz. by submission, and an equivalent present to the affront or injury, whether pretended or real<sup>z</sup>.

- It is now time for us to give our readers a short account of what is most worth their observation in this vast and opulent metropolis. It is commonly known to the Europeans by the <sup>Cairo, or</sup> name of Cairo, Kayro, and Grand Kayro; and to the natives by that of Kabirah, or Al Ka- <sup>Grand Kayro</sup> berah, from the name of the planet Mars, stiled by the Arabs, Caber or Kaber, the victorious, <sup>described.</sup> under whose influence the great conqueror of Egypt, Giaffar, or Jawbar, general of Moss- <sup>Whence so</sup> Ledin'illah, the first khalif of the Fatemite race in Egypt, did lay the foundation of it; in <sup>called.</sup> which, we are told, he took the advice of the ablest astrologers and horoscope-mongers, as was usual among the Arabs; and, from the assent of that warlike planet, called his new city Al Kabirah, or victorious, which the Venetians and Genoese, the earliest European traders into * Pocock, ubi sup. lib. iv. c. 2. ad fin.

y Id. ibid. Vide &amp; MAILLET, NORDEN, &amp; al. sup. citat.

z Pocock, l. i. c. 4. NORDEN, MALLEY, GRANGER, &amp; al.

(L) Which, if not exaggerated, amount to about two millions, and is computed from the number of people that die in the time of the plague, which is positively affirmed to have amounted to 7000 in one day; whereof they pretend to make an exact computation by the number of biers that are let out to carry them to the burying-places (10). However that be, the city is, by all writers and travellers, allowed to be very full of people of a mixture of nations, such as original Egyptians; among whom are comprehended the Coptic Christians, Arabians, people of Barbary and other western parts of Africa, Berberines from Nubia, great numbers of their men coming hither to offer themselves as servants. These last are Mollotas, and keep a kind of government among themselves, under a cheyk, or head, to whom all the new-comers apply to be recommended to places; and, if in need, to supply them with money out of the public purse, when out of service through sickness, or any other accident; which money, when able, they are bound to refund.

Besides the nations already mentioned, here are also Turkomen, who are either sent hither from Constantinople, or brought by the bashas, and settle themselves there. A much greater number, if not the greatest part of its inhabitants, are supposed to be of the Mamluk race; who obtained and held the government of Egypt 200 years, and of whom we shall give a farther account in its proper place. To these we may add the Greeks, Armenians, and Jews; and, among the Europeans settled there, the English, French, Italians from Venice and Leghorn, and a small number of monks of different orders, who have their several convents, and are protected by the English and French consuls; they are maintained partly by a small allowance from the court of Rome, and partly by the charity of their protectors and disciples.

The European merchants that are settled here, considering how much they are confined in that metropolis, do yet live agreeably enough, and sociably among themselves, there being no want of any thing to make their lives easy and pleasant. So that the morning is usually consecrated to business, and the rest of the day to diversion, either in riding abroad among pleasant fields and gardens, or in other recreations which the town affords. When English protestants die there, they are buried in the cemetery belonging to the Greeks, and have their funeral service read over them, unless they have a chaplain of their own to perform that office according to the English liturgy (11).

(10) Pocock's observations on Egypt, l. i. c. 4.

(11) Id. ibid. Vide &amp; Maillet, Granger, &amp; al. sup. citat.

this kingdom, afterwards corrupted into that of Kayro, and, on account of its largeness and opulence, Grand Kayro.

Its ancient and present names. Its most ancient name was Mezr, from whence the whole country is supposed to take the name of Mizraim; of which we have given an account in the former part of this work <sup>a</sup>. The place that warrior chose to build it on was near the ancient one, which, like that, hath had a vast variety of other names besides; as Moph, Memphis, Al Mosser, &c. and at that time was called by that of Fostbad, which signifies a tent or pavilion, and was given to it by Amru ebn Aaz, the lieutenant-general of Omar, second khalif of Baghdad, on account of some pigeons which had hatched on the top of his tent as he was laying siege to it.

Raised on decay of the old. JAWHAR, or, as others call him, Giaffar, was no sooner become master of Fostbad, than he set about rearing the spacious walls of his new Kabirah; in which he made such extraordinary dispatch, that both they and the city were finished in little more than four years, they being begun in the year of the Hejrab 358, of Christ 968, and completed in 362 of the same Hejrab, in which the khalif Moez made his public entrance into it <sup>c</sup>. From this time it began to thrive, grow populous and opulent, though not without the visible decrease of the old one, in spite of its more convenient and advantageous situation on the eastern bank of the Nile; whereas the other is seated, at about a mile distant from it, on a burning sandy plain, and about a league northward of the old one, and stretching itself along the foot of the mountain whereon the castle stands; which reflects the rays of the sun with such force upon it, that it is, in the hot season of the year, almost intolerable; but which is greatly allayed in the cold by the refreshment which that river brings along with it. Notwithstanding all which, such was the fondness of these khalifs for this new city, and so attractive the splendor of their court, that they suffered it to rise daily on the ruins of the other, without taking the least step to prevent it, during the whole time of that dynasty. The only chance it had since for retrieving its ancient splendor, was under the brave sultan Salah Addin, commonly called Saladin, the prince who deprived the Fatimites of the khalifat; who attempted to join these two cities into one, by surrounding them with a common wall, said to have been 26,000 cubits in circumference: but not living to see his design take effect, his successors wholly neglected it. The walls are, indeed, still standing; but the ancient city, with its fine buildings, erected by the Saracens, went gradually into decay <sup>d</sup>.

Old Kayro joined to the new by a wall.

Its buildings described.

THE greatest part of its buildings now, if we except what they call Joseph's Granaries, of which we have given an account formerly <sup>e</sup> (M), and the noble water-house, once a stately work of the khalifs, to serve their new palace and city with water (but since much neglected, and now in a sorry plight); these, we say, excepted, and the habitations of workmen and artificers; chiefly consist in houses of pleasure, belonging to the great officers and rich men of New Kayro, to which they resort for diversion, at the season when the waters of the Nile begin to rise; the rest of the ground being mostly taken up with gardens, vineyards, orchards, with stately palms, and variety of other fruit-trees. Neither have these houses any thing grand or regular, either within or without; but are mere saloons, some larger than others, and fit only for such recreations. To these we may add about half a dozen mosks, with minarets or towers, the famed synagogue of the Jews (N), the hospital belonging to the Roman <sup>e</sup>

<sup>a</sup> Anc. Hist. vol. i. p. 174, & seq. vol. i. p. 340, note.

<sup>c</sup> See Biblioth. orient. sub voc. & sup. vol. i. p. 56. SHAW'S trav. vol. i. p. 453.

<sup>d</sup> MAILLET, NORDEN, & al.

<sup>e</sup> Anc. Hist. vol. i. p. 453.

(M) This structure, though it occupies a large square piece of ground, surrounded by a wall, and artfully divided into variety of partitions, wherein the corn paid yearly to the Porte is kept, hath nothing that shews that pretended antiquity they ascribe to it; much less any thing that can be compared to the grandeur of the other Egyptian antiquities. The walls, which seem to have been originally of stone, about 15 feet high, flanked at proper distances with semi-circular buttresses, look more like, at least in part, the work of the Saracens, as the reader may see by the account which Dr. Pocock and others have given us of it. The corn-chambers, being opened on the top, serve to feed a great number of pigeons and other birds, for which a certain quantity is allowed by way of abatement: the doors are secured with nothing but wooden locks, and the inspectors put a piece of common clay on the key-hole, upon which they stamp the impression of their seals.

We are told there were seven of these granaries; of which, however, there is none remaining but this that receives the tax-corn from Upper Egypt, for the use of the soldiery: the others are either gone to ruin, or have been put to some other uses (*).

(N) Famed more for its boasted antiquity, and some valuable relicks in its possession, than for the fineness of its structure; which is said to be 1600 years old, and not unlike the Christian churches of those parts. The old reading-desk, they tell you, stands just over the spot in which the prophet Jeremiah was buried; whereupon they have long since forbore entering into it out of respect, and read their law in another. Dr. Pocock saw there, likewise, two ancient manuscripts of the pentateuch, and they pretended to have another of the whole Old Testament, written by Ezra; who, they told him, omitted, out of reverence, the writing of the name of God; but found it written throughout on the next day after he had finished it. This Jewish relick is kept, with great veneration, in a niche about ten feet high, and hath a rich curtain drawn, and a lamp always burning before it (†).

(*) De his, vide Pocock's observations on Egypt, lib. i. c. 4. Norden's Old Kayro, Maillet, Perry, Granger, & al. mult.

(†) Pocock's observations on Egypt, lib. i. c. 4.

a catholics of the Holy Land, and about ten or twelve other churches and chapels, belonging to them and the Copts; among which is that of St. Macarius, where the Coptic patriarch is elected and consecrated; and another, in which is the pretended grotto, where the virgin Mary and her small family dwelt during their retreat into Egypt, and is held in great veneration amongst all the Christians of those parts; insomuch that the Roman catholics pay a certain yearly sum to the Copts, who are in possession of it, for the liberty of saying mass in it <sup>c</sup>.

There stands on the same eastern bank of the Nile, about a mile and a half north of Old Kayro, the town of Boolac, formerly a suburb of it; and hath maintained itself by its vicinity to the new city, of which it is the staple and harbour. The number of ruins and old mosks, which are seen in the neighbourhood of the old town, gives one room to conjecture that Boolac was not the only suburb belonging to it. It hath, on the north side of it, the khalish, or canal, which conveys the water from the Nile to New Kayro, after its overflow; but which, like the granaries and other useful works, is suffered to fall into decay, through the avarice of the beigh who hath the care of it, and gets about five hundred purses yearly by it, to the great detriment of the whole province, whose fertility is greatly diminished by it <sup>f</sup>. Boolac hath a considerable custom-house, as being the port to which the boats and barges from all parts of the Delta repair; and is likewise remarkable for a fine bagnio. And thus much may suffice for Old Kayro. The port of Boolac, once a suburb of Kayro.

The new one is computed at about seven miles in circumference, exclusive of the old, and New Kayro the town of Boolac. We have already mentioned its disadvantageous situation along the foot of a mountain, and a mile distant from the Nile; to which we may add its sensible decay, both in extent and opulence, since it hath ceased to be the center of commerce from the East Indies, though it hath still continued to be the chief mart of the kingdom, as we have elsewhere shewn *; though it is to be feared, that the accounts we have of its former extent, populousness, opulence, and delightful climate, have been too much exaggerated for us to rely upon, or follow implicitly. described.

With respect to the latter, its situation is allowed to be under the 23d degree and 58th minute of north latitude †, and cannot be reckoned a moderate or delightful climate; especially as the heat of it is increased by the burning sandy soil about it, and the mountainous ridge which reflects it in a kind of focus. And this, in a great measure, explodes what some encyclopaedic writers have likewise said concerning its healthfulness, if what we have already observed, with regard to the many and dangerous diseases which rage in it, and sweep away such myriads of its inhabitants, was not sufficient to confute it. To all which we may add the narrowness and crookedness of its streets, that, amongst us, would hardly bear the name of lanes; and the slovenly manner in which they are kept, being neither paved, nor cleaned from dust and dirt, and only watered twice or thrice a day, and that before the houses of the better sort of people, not so much for cleanliness as coolness. The houses, likewise, are neither airy nor pleasant, the best of them being commonly built round a kind of court, without ornament, or even windows fronting the streets; the lower part built of stone, and the upper of timber-work, fitted up with unburnt brick; and others with earth whited over with lime. The inside is as plain as the out, nothing but use being regarded in their apartments and furniture, excepting their saloons, wherein they receive their friends and acquaintance, which are a little more ornamented. So that, upon the whole, they have hardly any fence against the torrid heats of an almost vertical sun, except that of the north winds, which commonly blow during the hot months of June, July, and August, and sometimes with such piercing coldness, as to oblige the better sort to exchange their lightest garments for others lined with fur. So that, whenever these winds fail them at that season, they are forced to endure a more scorching heat than those under the torrid zone; and, when they chance to blow by intervals, the transition from extremity of heat to that of cold, and vice versa, is not only disagreeable and painful to a great degree, but frequently occasions as dangerous diseases as the poisonous steams arising from their canal, when drained of its water; of which we have taken notice a little higher ‡. Its situation hot.

KAYRO hath a very great number of mosks; some reckon them to amount to 720, with minarets or towers, and each its preacher; and about 420, which have neither towers nor preachers, but are a kind of chapels or oratories. Some of the former are grand and beautiful; one in particular, called the Mosk of Hassen, is really magnificent, both with regard to the strength and solidity of its structure, and a certain grandeur which strikes the eye in a surprising manner. It is built in an oblong square form, very spacious and high, and surrounded at the top with a fine cornice, which projects a great way, and is embellished with variety of grotesque figures, carved after the Turkish manner. The entrance into it is likewise very beautiful, being inlaid with several sorts of marble, and carved as on the top. The ascent to it is Narrow streets.

<sup>c</sup> NORDEN, ubi sup. POCOCK, GRANGER, MAILLET, & al. mult. before, vol. iv. p. 100.

† MAILLET, ubi sup. vol. i. p. 239, & al.

<sup>f</sup> NORDEN, & al. ubi sup. * See MAILLET, POCOCK, GRANGER, by a flight of steps, but which are much broken, and the door walled up, because, in time of public insurrection, the mutineers often made it a place of retreat. The place is so strong, that there is now a constant guard of Janissaries kept within its precinct, in some adjacent apartment. Between it and the castle is a spacious piazza, and the only one in the whole city <sup>h</sup>.

That called Kubeel-Azabs,

a noble edifice.

To the north of the city is another stately mosk, called Kubeel-Azabs, or the cupola of the Arabs; because it properly belongs to the military order. It is sixty feet square, and adorned with a stately dome, raised on a base of sixteen sides, in each of which is a window. The inside of the mosk is wainscotted round, about eighteen feet high, in pannels, the rest is of the most beautiful marble; among which are several slabs of red and green porphyry; the borders round the pannels are carved and gilt, and a sort of frieze ranges round, in which are sentences cut in large golden Coptic characters. The walls above it were likewise adorned with Arabic inscriptions, in letters of gold, and the cupola above is painted and gilt in the most elegant manner. The mosk is hung with a great number of lamps, and ostrich eggs; adjoining to it are several apartments for the priests, and some still finer for great persons, who come to reside there. This great edifice is said to have been built by Jawbar, or Jaasar, who begged leave of the sultan to prepare him a place fit to offer him sherbet on his return from Mecca <sup>i</sup>.

The grand aqueduct described.

We have already taken notice of the castle of Kayro, its wretched fortifications and garri- son; we shall now add two curious pieces of antiquity still remaining, and which were kept in good repair during the reigns of the khalifs and Mamluk sultans, though since much ne- glected. The first is the noble aqueduct, which brings the Nile water to it. We find it mentioned by Ctesias, Diodorus Siculus, Strabo, and other ancient writers, as a grand piece of work. It consists of a prodigious number of arches and piers, of different dimensions, in the rustic stile. The arches are mostly from ten to fifteen feet wide, and the piers from eight to ten. Dr. Pocock counted them to the number of 289; but others to a much greater number, and Granger to 320 of each sort; only in some places there runs a slip of a continued wall with- out any arches.

The structure likewise at the end of it, which draws the water from the Nile into the refer- voir, is a beautiful strong edifice, of an octagon figure, and in the same rustic stile; both the work of, or more properly new-faced by, the Mamluks.

Joseph's Wells described.

Their vast depth and spiral descent.

The other curious work, worth mentioning in this castle, is what the natives stile Joseph's Wells; not from the patriarch, but from a grand vizir of that name, as some pretend. The Arabs call it the Spail or Spiral Wells, on account of their spiral descent. They are of an oblong-square form; their mouth is 16 feet in breadth, 24 in length, and in depth 276, from the bottom to the upper wheel. This depth consists of two divisions, the first of which goes down no lower than 146 feet, at the end of which is a slope or resting-place; upon which they draw the water from the lower division, by means of another wheel, turned by oxen, which hath a string or rope of earthen pitchers.

Water brack-
ish.

The second division is neither so wide, long, or deep, as the first; being only 15 by 9 wide, and 130 deep. Both divisions are neatly cut in the rock, and with such art, that the rock serves as a rampart on the west side to the descent; in which are cut, at certain distances, apertures to let in the light for the oxen and their drivers, which go down the spiral descent to the first platform. From this to the bottom of the other is much more dangerous, because narrower, and without a parapet. The water at the bottom is about nine or ten feet deep, but brackish and unfit for drink, except during the time of the inundation; and the same may be said of all the wells of the city. The reader may see this extraordinary well, and the noble aqueduct, more amply described and delineated, than our limits will permit us to do, by the curious Dr. Pocock *; whilst we continue our review of the other garrisons of this kingdom.

Castle of Rosetto.

2. ROSETTO is the next castle and garrison; the Egyptians call it Rasbid. It is pleas- antly situated on the west side of that branch of the Nile called by the ancients Bolbitinum, affirmed by Herodotus to have been formed by art; so that you have the town and castle at your right hand as you enter the mouth of that river. It is esteemed one of the pleasantest places in Egypt; the length of it is about two miles, and consists only of two or three streets. The country about it is most delightful and fertile, as is all the whole Deltba on the other side of the Nile, and presents you with the most pleasant prospect of gardens, orchards, and of the finest fruit and corn fields, excellently well cultivated (O).

<sup>h</sup> Pocock, Granger, &c.

<sup>i</sup> Pocock, ubi sup. l. i. c. 4.

* Observations on Egypt, lib. i. c. 4. Vide

& Norden, Granger, & al. sup. cit.

(O) We are told, that a great part of the land about it belongs to Mecca. There is a tradition amongst them, that one of Mohammed's relations lived there; and they have built a mosk on the place where he dwelt, which stands on the north end of the town. They have like- wise a notion, that, if Mecca was taken from the Turks, the devotion of it would be removed to this city (3).

(3) Pocock, ubi sup. l. i. & ii.

- <sup>a</sup> THE castle stands about two miles north of the town, on the west side of the river. It is a square building, with round towers at the four corners, and port-holes at the bottom of it, and some pieces of brass cannon. There were likewise some others, made after the ancient way; that is, of bars and hoops of iron, with some flowers de luce, and other ornaments. The walls are of brick, cased with stone, and are supposed to have been built in the time of the holy war, though since repaired by cheyk Begb; who is said by some to have been the builder of it. At a little distance lower, on the other side of the river, is a platform, mounted with some guns; and to the east of it are the salt lakes, out of which they gather great quantities of that commodity. At some farther distance, sailing up the river, one sees a high mountain, on which stands an old tower and some other ruins; it is from this tower that they spy the vessels that sail to and from this court. From this eminence, likewise, is discovered a large and deep gulph, in form of a crescent, and appears to have been the work of art, though it be now filled up, and discovers nothing but its ancient bed. This the consul Maillet supposes to have been the old Canopus. Our readers may see his reasons for it in his description of Egypt.<sup>a</sup> For as to Rosetto, which some believe to have succeeded that ancient port, once so intamous for its lewdness and dissolute diversions, it plainly appears to be very modern, not above 150 years standing, and which, he thinks, was built to serve instead of Fowa; which was become so distant from the river, that the vessels could not come up to it. However that be, Rosetto is now grown a considerable place for commerce, and hath some good manufactures in the linen and cotton way; but its chief business is the carriage of goods to Kayro, all the European merchandizes being brought thither from Alexandria, by sea, and carried in other boats to that capital; as these that are brought down from it, on the Nile, are there shipped off for Alexandria; on which account, the Europeans have here their vice-consuls and factors to transact their business; and the government, a beigh, a custom-house, and a garrison, to keep all safe and quiet.<sup>b</sup>

<sup>a</sup> Its situation and strength.

<sup>b</sup> The old gulph of Canopus.

<sup>c</sup> Traffick of Rosetto with Kayro.

- THE third garrison, as well as second sea-port of Egypt, is that of Alexandria, once the metropolis, and the largest and most opulent city in the whole kingdom; but now reduced within the compass of a small neck of land, and stripped of all its ancient splendor; but, for some obvious reasons, we shall postpone the farther description for an article by itself, after we have given an account of the other three; and so pass on to the fourth in rank, called Damiata, and which is situate on the opposite extremity of the Delta to that of Rosetto, and on the eastern, called Bobastie or Pelusiæ, branch of the Nile. This city answers to the ancient Portusium, though it now stands at a greater distance from the bar than it was observed to do at the time of the holy war. It is a place of great traffick, as well as Rosetto, and there hardly passes a year, in which there are not above 100 vessels laden in it with different merchandizes, especially rice. The misfortune is, that it is no less infested with corsairs, who catch them either sailing in or out.<sup>c</sup> The town is large, but ill built, and chiefly inhabited by fishermen and Janissaries, who are said to be the very worst people in the whole Turkish empire, and the most uncivil and insulting to strangers, especially the Europeans, against whom they bear a mortal aversion; which hath continued ever since the time of the Crusade, this city being the scene of their war in Egypt, and the place where the French monarch St. Lewis was made a prisoner. No person, therefore, dares to appear here in an European dress; and they mention instances of some Christian consuls having been massacred there, and of others who have been forced to leave the place to avoid the like fate. They are, moreover, arrant thieves, and will steal the cables and other cordage or tackle of ships, and make use of persons of credit to treat with the captain about a price for the restitution of them; and this in spite of their laws, which strictly forbid the taking away part of a ship's tackle, under the severest penalties.

<sup>a</sup> Port and castle of Damiata.

<sup>b</sup> Its great traffick.

<sup>c</sup> The inhabitants hate and insult the Europeans.

- <sup>d</sup> DAMIATA is defended by an ancient stout castle, which, we are told, cannot be less than 800 years old; though a later author mentions two, and both standing by the water-side; but neither strong, nor over furnished with artillery.† Dr. Pocock mentions only a large round tower, built of hewn stone, and takes it to have been the work of the Mamluks, after they had recovered this city from the Christians.<sup>e</sup> The fishery of this place is carried on in great plenty, on the lake called by some Menslet, by others Tanis and Bebeir, and is farmed, we are told, for 40,000 piasters.<sup>f</sup> This lake, which is reckoned the largest in all Egypt, extends itself above twenty leagues in length, and about eight in breadth, where broadest. It begins in the neighbourhood of Damiata, stretches itself east and west to the ancient Pelusiæ, and is parted from the sea only by a sandy bank of about half a league in breadth. During

<sup>d</sup> The castle.

<sup>e</sup> Large fishery on the lake Menslet.

<sup>a</sup> Vol. i. let. 3.

<sup>b</sup> Vide Pocock, l. i. c. 2. NORDEN, GRANGER, & al.

<sup>c</sup> MAILLET, ubi sup.

<sup>d</sup> Id. ibid.

† GRANGER, c. 9.

<sup>e</sup> Pocock, ubi sup.

<sup>f</sup> GRANG. voy. en Egypt.

the season of the Nile's overflow, it discharges itself into the Mediterranean by three large branches, which form three mouths called Mendez, Tanis, and Pelusium; but they remain dry after the overflow. This lake abounds with variety of fish, which are cured and salted upon a vast number of small islands near the shore, and are greedily bought up by the Syrians and Nubian Arabs. They cure likewise great quantities of what they call Bootargos, which are the roes of mullet, that are caught here in great plenty; and, when dipped in wax, are carried and sold all over Turky. They have here two ways, among many others, of fishing in this lake, which are no less curious than peculiar; the one is by the help of a tame pelican that they bring to it; who, by his exquisite scent, finds out where the fish are, and drives them into their nets, which are spread in a semicircular form, at a proper distance; and, to prevent his eating the fish in too large a quantity, as he drives them before him, the fishermen guide him on each side, by a thread they have run through his eye-lids, whereby they make him swim with his eyes shut; whilst they on each side, rowing in their boats, prevent the fish from straying from the net<sup>s</sup>.

Two curious ways of fishing in it.

Its importance and commerce.

THE other is by means of the dolphins, which are in great plenty there, and drive the fish towards the shore into little ponds digged for the purpose, the entrance of which they close with a net after they are got in. And our author adds, that these fishermen are stupid enough to look upon the dolphins as a kind of friendly genii to them. He likewise adds, that the Damiatans are of late become more reconciled and friendly to the Europeans, and even to the French, whom they most detested, on account of their monarch's making himself master of their city; which he was, however, obliged to restore, as part of his ransom. It is reckoned one of the keys of Egypt, on account of its important harbour on the Mediterranean, and to contain about 25,000 inhabitants, exclusive of its suburb on the other side of the Nile; which is chiefly inhabited by sea-faring men. There are likewise about 400 Greek families settled in Damiata; which, in some measure, carry on the whole commerce. They have a church, a bishop, and the free liberty of their religion, except that of ringing the bell. Besides these, there are multitudes of strangers of various nations and religions. It hath one long street, which reaches quite from the water-side to the other extremity of it, along the river; and there it is that the merchandizes are laden and unladen. It is surrounded with walls, except on the side next the water, and is governed by an aga and a kadi, both which are nominated by the basha. Its chief commerce is that of various sorts of fine linen cloth, of all colours; which are exported thence into various countries; besides the salted mullets, and their preserved roes, already mentioned<sup>h</sup>.

The castle of the labyrinth.

Lucas's account fabulous.

THE next castle, in rank, is that which hath its name from the famed ancient labyrinth, or is rather only what remains of that once magnificent structure. We have given a description of it in a former part of this work†, according to the ancient authors, as well as of its present ruinous state, from some of those modern ones, whom we thought had given the most accurate account of it. And here we freely own one error we committed, in giving too much credit to one of them, who gave himself out, in his pompous description of voyages, for an eye-witness, and a more exact observer of what he wrote about this, and other parts of Egypt, than those who had wrote before<sup>1</sup>; little suspecting at that time, that he had only imposed upon the public what he had found in other authors, or supplied out of his own brain, in order to answer the idea of a most intricate labyrinth; though from the principal walls standing, and other parts of the edifice which are thrown down, it appears to be a quite different structure. It cannot, however, be doubted that he hath been in Egypt, and even upon this spot, as some have suspected, from his misplacing it on the south end of the lake; as his name is still to be seen engraved on one of the columns‡. But what still further convinces one of his inaccuracy, is his affirming that the pillars, and other stones of that noble building, are of hard marble; whereas they are found to be, as Pliny affirms, only of white stone. However, we are not the first, by many, who have fallen into the same error out of credulity; and the least we thought we could do, was to take the first opportunity that offered itself, in the course of this Modern History, to acknowledge it to our readers, and to make them the best amends we could, by giving them a more genuine account of the present condition of that once superb structure, from more faithful hands, on whose veracity, as well as skill, judgment, and diligence, they may now safely rely.

Described by
Dr. Pocock.

THIS castle, which is, by the Arabs, called Casr Caroon, and is supposed to be the remains of the ancient labyrinth, stands west-south-west of the lake Mæris, formerly described §, about two, or, according to others, three miles from it, and may now be easily pervaded and examined without a clue. It is, according to the accurate Dr. Pocock, one hundred and sixty

<sup>s</sup> GRANGER's voy. en Egypt. Vide & Pocock, & al. ubi sup.
VANSTEB, & al. sup cit. † Anc. Hist. vol. i. p. 193, & seq. 265.
GER, ubi sup. c. 8. § Anc. Hist. vol. i. p. 195, & seq.

<sup>h</sup> COPPIN's voyage into Syria, c. 18.
<sup>1</sup> LUCAS's voyages. ‡ See GRAN-

- a feet in length, and eighty in breadth<sup>k</sup>. The porch, which was rustic work, is almost destroyed, in no part above six feet high; and, from the remains of a flight of stairs on the east side of it, one may conclude that there were some apartments under it. He adds, that he should not have supposed it to have been covered, had he not seen the remains of pillars in the middle of it. The front of the building is more ruinous than any other part of it; the upper story in the middle is fallen down, and is entirely gone almost from this break. As the building now remains, there are forty-four tiers of stone, each nine inches deep, and consequently it is thirty-three feet high. There are signs of a cornice ranging round; notwithstanding which, the building must have been carried up higher. The three other fronts of the structure appear to have had some rows of fine brown marble and other stone taken off, which were adorned with cornices, and other sculptures and ornaments, and had a niche cut into them, of a size capable to contain some marble head; and might probably be designed to have some object or other of their worship placed in them, representing every sacred crocodile that might be deposited in them; and these stones were then lying on the north side of the temple<sup>l</sup>.
- THIS edifice consists of four spacious halls, but of different sizes, and a smaller one about twelve feet long, which form the whole extent of the building; and on each side of them are smaller apartments<sup>m</sup>. The four large halls have door-cases crowned with double cornices, adorned with winged globes. The insides of these rooms, before they were filled with earth, are supposed to have been twenty feet high, and are covered with stones of such a length as to reach from wall to wall: the narrow apartments, on the sides and at the farther end, might be designed for tombs, or depositories for the dead. Over each of them is a work like a false door, adorned with cornices, and one of them charged with sculptures of hawks. The passage from the cell to the west leads up to one of the large apartments, by a hole that seems to have been broke in, and to come out at another. These our author supposes to have been designed to deposit the sacred crocodiles in: one of them being thirty feet by three, and the other eight by two. A way is broke in from the end of the long room to the apartments above. There are several other particulars relating to these apartments, which we shall not dwell longer upon, seeing he found it so difficult to offer any probable conjecture concerning their use and design<sup>n</sup>; and all that we can conclude from them, as well as from what we have described from him, and another traveller lately quoted, is, that the whole edifice rather bears the face of some ancient palace or other public structure; but hath nothing remaining that could lead a judicious observer into the notion of its being the ruins of the famed labyrinth, described by the ancients. The misfortune is, that those celebrated edifices, of which they give us an account, are so disfigured and mutilated by time, and other changes which they have undergone, and the spot whereon they stood so altered, either by the building of new ones upon, near to, or at some distance from them, and our modern travellers have proved so emulous in defending their several conjectures against each other, that a reader is more easily bewildered than informed by them.
- As for the wonder which both the ancient and modern writers have expressed at this edifice's being built altogether of stone, without the least appearance of timber in any part of its remains, there is nothing in it, but what may be observed in the other ancient buildings in that superb taste; especially since, according to Julius Cæsar's report, all the buildings of Alexandria were erected in the same way, without any rafting or other timber, and the several parts of each were held together by arches and mortar, and covered at the top by rough stone or Mosaic work, probably, as he himself hints, to preserve them from fire. However, this ancient and wholesome precaution hath been long enough set aside, as we shall shew when we come to speak of its present state.
- BEFORE we leave the castle of Caroon, we shall only observe, that it is governed likewise by an aga and a kadi, both named by the basha; the former appointed to receive the tribute of this government, part of which he is commissioned to send to Constantinople, and the other to Kayro, for the sustenance of the soldiery<sup>o</sup>.
4. THE next castle and garrison is that of Adjeroute, supposed to be the ancient Hierapolis. It is distant about twenty-nine hours from Kayro, on the road to Mecca (N); but hath nothing worth observing, save that the castle is an old square building, the garrison inconsiderable;

<sup>k</sup> Observations on Egypt, lib. i. c. 7. p. 63.

<sup>l</sup> Pocock, NORDEN, & al. sup. citat.

<sup>m</sup> Pocock, ibid.

<sup>n</sup> GRANGER, ubi sup.

<sup>o</sup> Pocock, ibid.

(N) The Arabians compute it to be 32 hours, or 480 derajes, of which 15 go to an hour; the difference is owing to the road that the caravan takes farther about:

that being much about the distance which the lake of the pilgrims is from Kayro, where the caravan encamps and begins its journey (3).

(3) Pocock, ubi sup. l. iii. c. 1.

ill kept, and worse disciplined<sup>p</sup>, since the time that soltan Selim thought proper to dismantle a it of the most material part of its strength, and ruined all that he thought in a condition to defend itself.

The present state of Alexandria.

Why necessary to be known.

Stripped of all its ancient magnificence.

The two ports described.

The new one inconvenient and dangerous.

Its two castles.

Called the Great and Little Pharillon.

Their two moles leading to the port.

We come now to give our readers a short description of the once celebrated city of Alexandria, not so much on account of its ancient grandeur, which hath been fully described in a former part of this work, much less of its present, seeing it retains no more of it than the melancholy remains of what it hath been, when in its most flourishing state under Ptolemaeus; but as it is the place which those, who travel into Egypt, should be most acquainted with before-hand, as it is the first port they land at, and must begin to familiarize themselves to the strange manners and customs of the country, the disagreeable inconveniencies they must expect to go through, and the contempt, affronts, and insults, they must arm themselves against, from a rude and unpolished people, and undergo a kind of probation of the various objects they are likely to meet with, as well as of their fare and treatment amongst them, and so learn experience from those who have gone before them<sup>q</sup>.

FIRST then, instead of those ancient and magnificent structures they may have heard or read of, they must expect to behold little else but their ruins, fragments of stately walls, tottering towers and castles; whose architecture, being neither Greek nor Roman, induces one to believe them the work of the Saracens. Here they will see the most sumptuous temples turned into plain mosks, some of the finest pieces of architecture artlessly scattered, and employed to patch up an ordinary dwelling; the royal palace become a common prison for slaves, the once numerous and opulent inhabitants dwindled into a small parcel of strangers, and a multitude of miserable wretches, servants, and slaves, employed in lading, unlading, and carrying of merchandizes to-and-fro, and in other laborious branches of its commerce; which is now the only thing it is considerable for, and is wholly owing to its convenient situation for it, and to its double port, one on each side; the old one destined for the vessels that belong to the subjects of the grand signor, and the new for those that come from Europe and other parts of the world, answering to their ancient distinction of ports of Asia and Africa<sup>r</sup>. There is, however, a considerable difference between them; the former being large, commodious, deep, safe, and neatly kept; and hath only this inconveniency, that its entrance is difficult and dangerous, on account of its narrowness, and being clogged up with rocks; but, being once passed, one enters into a fine spacious haven, about a league in length, and capacious enough d for 1000 vessels to ride in commodiously and safely.

THE other, on the contrary, since called the new, on account of its having been severed from it in the time of the Greek monarchs, by a dyke which reached from the terra firma to the eastern point of the isle of Antirbodus; whereby all communication was stopped between them, except at one aperture left open for that purpose<sup>s</sup>, is so very shallow in many places, and the bottom so rocky and craggy, that the ships are obliged to throw in, at certain distances, some empty casks under the cables, to prevent their being fretted and worn by it. Though this precaution usually preserves them, the vessels are still exposed to the danger of being lost by every violent blast, or stormy wind, because the anchors are prevented by it from holding so fast at such times, and frequently lose their hold; so that the vessel, once loosened, is frequently e cast away, even in the harbour, for want of sufficient depth and sea-room. The entrance into this last port is defended by two castles, of a bad structure, after the Turkish taste, which have nothing remarkable but their situation; all the rest coming vastly short of those noble structures, for which this city was once so justly famed. The Great Pharillon hath a small tower in its center, which terminates in a lanthorn, which is lighted up every night; but is so ill served that it seldom gives a sufficient light. The island was anciently joined to the land by a causeway, and two bridges, 900 paces long, which have long since been covered by the waters, as well as the famous mole which Adrian had caused to be built at the end of the cape Possidium; some of the ruins of both may be seen in clear and calm weather<sup>t</sup>. It is much the same with the other castle, or Little Pharillon, as it is called, on which one sees no footsteps of f that celebrated library, which, in Ptolemy's time, was esteemed the noblest and most beautiful that had ever been seen. These two Pharillons are joined to the land, each by a mole, of which that of the island of Pharob is the longest, built partly of brick and partly of freestone, and is vaulted from end to end; which our author computes to be about 10,000 paces in extent; the vaulting is after the Gothic stile, and the water flows under the arches. The other mole hath nothing remarkable, but two zigzags, which serve for a defence in case of need; and both together; one on the right, and the other on the left side of the port, conduct insensibly to the shore. But as there are here and there many dangerous rocks, some above, others under p. 38. oct. edit.

<sup>p</sup> Pocock, ubi sup. l. iii. c. 1. GRANGER, c. 13. MAILLET.

<sup>r</sup> Id. ibid. MAILLET, ubi sup. let. 4.

GRANGER, ubi sup. c. 12. Pocock's obser-ations on Egypt, l. i. c. 1.

<sup>s</sup> MAILLET, ubi sup. let. 4.

<sup>q</sup> NORDEN's travels into Egypt, vol. i.

<sup>t</sup> De his, vide Anc. Hist. vol. iii. p. 627.

<sup>a</sup> water, the safest way is to take a Turkish pilot, appointed for that end; who guides you safe through them into the port <sup>u</sup>.

THAT part of the city which borders on the old, and extends itself quite to the new one, on approaching it, offers to one's view a strange mixture of objects, of ancient and modern monuments, some entire, others decayed, broken, or one half above, and the rest buried under, a heap of ruins. The outer walls of the said city are still very beautifully built of hewn stone, though they appear to be ancient, all the arches being true and regular, and the workmanship of them very good. They are flanked with semicircular towers, 20 feet in diameter, at about 130 feet distance from each other. At each of them are stairs to go up to the battlements, there being a walk round the top of the wall, built upon arches; and, as they now stand, they seem to have inclosed all the city, except the royal palace, on the north-east. The inner walls of the old city, which seem to be of the middle age, are much higher and stronger than the others, and are defended by high towers; two of which are particularly large and well built, and stand to the north-west, towards the new city, on the strand, as the reader may see them delineated by the reverend author often quoted <sup>w</sup>. To whom we shall refer him for the further display of such other remaining ancient edifices, and monuments, as we had not room to describe in our Ancient History <sup>x</sup>. The truth is, these ancient relics have been so disfigured by time and other accidents, or are so far buried in the sand and rubbish, that there remains little else in and about this city, worth the attention of the curious, except the famous Corinthian column, vulgarly called The Pillar of Pompey, and the two obelisks, called The Needles of Cleopatra, the one still standing, and the other thrown down; all which have been so fully described, by every writer and traveller into this country (O), that it would be superfluous to dwell longer upon them in such a work as this <sup>y</sup>. If any thing besides has escaped the injuries of time, in this city, more than others, it is the great number of its cisterns, which are filled yearly with the waters of the Nile, by a canal that goes under the name of Cleopatra, and begins about two leagues from Rosetto, from whence it conveys them to this city, they being the only water they have in it; and, when that fails, they are obliged to supply themselves with it from Rosetto <sup>z</sup>. And yet these noble reservoirs, which once supplied this populous city, are reduced to six, which are in the old one, and are but ill looked after; whilst the far greater part of the rest are filled up with earth, as well as the noble pillars which supported them; which, we are told, were made of brick, and covered over with a matter impenetrable by water <sup>a</sup> (P).

The prospect of the city.

Walls and towers.

The Pillar of Pompey, and two obelisks.

The old cisterns and conduit.

Number and character of the inhabitants.

Commerce.

Jews carry on the larger share.

<sup>u</sup> NORDEN, ubi sup. 37, & seq. & alib. pass. ubi sup. c. 12.

<sup>w</sup> Pocock, ubi sup. p. 3, & seq. & plate 3.

<sup>x</sup> Vol. i. p. 183. vi. p.

<sup>y</sup> De his, vide MAILLET, POCOCK, NORDEN, & al. mult.

<sup>z</sup> GRANGER,

<sup>a</sup> NORDEN, ubi sup. p. 19.

(O) With respect to the three last-mentioned monuments, it will not be improper to inform our readers, that the authors quoted in the margin do somewhat differ in their accounts of them, especially with regard to their present condition; and that one of the latest of them hath not only censured the fabulous father Lucas, but hath more vehemently inveighed against the late Maillet's description of them (4); though, upon farther examination of both their accounts, it doth not appear to us, that the consul's oversights, if they be really such, deserved the severe censures he has bestowed upon him.

(P) These columns, we are farther told, appear to be of different sorts, and the greatest part in a Gothic, or rather in a Saracenic taste. And as it is not to be conceived, that they should have been placed in that manner from the beginning, it is reasonably supposed, that their gradual decay has occasioned a successive supply of them, and that some of them have taken the place of others, as occasion required; but, in the repairing of those reservoirs, they have made use of the cheapest materials (5), from which we may judge in what manner the rest must have been treated since they have fallen into still worse hands.

(4) Norden, vol. i. p. 6—16. & al. ib. 8vo. edit.

(5) Id. ib. p. 19, & seq.

their more frugal way of living, they at once out-vie them in traffick, and get profit enough <sup>a</sup> to grow rich. Besides, the farmers of the customs know full well, that, if they do not pay some private regard to them, they can cause the fewer merchandizes to come into this port, during the two years that their farm lasts; upon which account they generally tax them lower than they do the French, or other Franks <sup>b</sup>. The Christians, particularly of the Greek and Coptic churches, are mostly poor, their once-famed cathedrals of St. Mark ( Q ) and St. Catherine are gone to decay, and have little left of their ancient splendor <sup>c</sup>. The former hath been long since turned into a mosk, and still retains the name of the mosk of a thousand and one pillars; of which, we are told, it hath still four rows on the south and west side, but only one on the other two <sup>d</sup>. That of St. Albanasius hath likewise undergone the same fate. However, both Greeks and Copts have still each their own churches, which they call by the names of St. Mark and St. Catherine, in which they perform their cathedral worship, according to their respective rites, and pretend that they are those which were originally erected to these two saints, and on or near the place of their martyrdom; and each likewise pretend to shew some ancient relics of them; the one the patriarchal chair of the evangelist, and the other a fragment of the pillar on which the she-saint was beheaded, with some red spots in it, pretended to be drops of her blood. A late traveller tells us, that these two churches are so much alike, that one description may serve for both; and all he adds to the traditional account of them, above-mentioned <sup>e</sup>, is, that they are both very dark, dirty, and so full of lamps, that one would rather take them for pagods than for the temples of the true God; from whence he concludes, that St. Mark is infinitely better served in his church at Venice, than in this of Alexandria. The Latins have likewise a convent of Franciscans, which belongs to that of Jerusalem, and their chapel serves the French merchants instead of a church; and the friers, who are mostly maintained by them, serve instead of curates or chaplains <sup>f</sup>.

THE city is governed, like the other cities in this kingdom, by an aga, who hath a kadi and sub-basha under him, and all nominated by the head-basha. It hath likewise a small garrison of soldiers, who are lodged in the great castle on the south-west corner of it; but into which no European is admitted. Here are likewise continually some Arabs incamped within the walls around; which makes it dangerous to be abroad after sun-set, when the inhabitants are retired to their own homes. But the chief part of the garrison, which consists of a small number of Janissaries and Affafs, are lodged in the two Pharillos lately mentioned; where also resides the aga or governor, who commands them, in one of the ancient balwarks. This doth not hinder them from being very haughty and insolent, not only to strangers, but to the mercantile and handicraft part of the inhabitants, though ever so considerable and useful; the government being more remiss in favour of the former than of the latter, insomuch that one of these Janissaries, we are told, made no difficulty to kill the farmer of the customs there, for refusing to take less of him than the duty imposed, and went off unpunished <sup>g</sup>; it being a common salvo among them, that what is done cannot be undone. However, to prevent the like disorders for the future, the governor hath caused a guard to be kept at the custom-house <sup>h</sup>.

EVEN the French, who carry on such considerable commerce with them, as we are told by one of their chancellors there, who counted no less than 940 of their ships in one year at that port ( R ), and moreover keep a constant consul there, under that of Kayro, have met with the

<sup>b</sup> NORDEN, ubi sup.

<sup>c</sup> GRANGER, Pocock, ibid.

<sup>d</sup> & MAILLET, & al. sup. citat.

<sup>e</sup> GRANGER, ubi sup.

<sup>f</sup> NORDEN, ubi sup. vol. i. p. 41, 8vo edit.

<sup>g</sup> Pocock, ubi sup. p. 7.

<sup>h</sup> NORDEN, vol. i. p. 42.

<sup>i</sup> Id. ibid. p. 42. Vide

( Q ) This once stately structure, said to have been dedicated to that evangelist, and erected on the spot where he suffered martyrdom, stands now to the west of the city, and near the gate of Necropolis ( 6 ); but that which the Christian Copts enjoy, and perform divine service in, hath nothing of that superb colonade, or other marks of grandeur; tho' it be pretended to be the ancient patriarchal seat, and they shew in it the chair on which the evangelist sat, as first planter and patriarch of the Alexandrian church. His successors are pretended to have sieged here ever since, as we shall shew in the sequel, whether in this or any other church, and have made this city their chief residence the greatest part of their time; tho' of late years, whether by the grand signor's or his basha's order, or on any other account, they reside mostly at Kayro ( 7 ).

The Greeks and Armenians are likewise settled here in great numbers, and some of them drive a considerable trade, tho' they make but a small figure, being mostly very poor, oppressed by the government, and cruelly insulted by the Turks, especially the soldiery, who hate and despise them ( 8 ).

( R ) The farther particulars, relating to the commerce of this and other cities of Egypt, being out of our province, we shall refer our readers for them to the authors quoted in the margin; especially to the first of them, who hath been the most exact and diffuse on that subject ( 9 ), as well as in his account of the various commodities imported and exported, whether to or from Marseilles, Leghorn, or Venice, together with the several prices they bore in the year 1673.

( 6 ) Norden, Pocock, Maillet, Granger, ch. 12. Dr. Edw. Pocock.

( 7 ) De his, vide & Eutychii annal. Alexandrin. ex interpret.

( 8 ) Norden, & al. sup. citat.

( 9 ) Vansleb, Perry, Pocock, Maillet, Norden, & al. mult.

a "greatest difficulties, and been forced, by dint of interest, and presents to the basha at Kayro, to procure redress from this government against the insolence of one of those Janissaries. The instance, as related by an eye-witness, being too long for our narrow limits, we shall refer our readers to the account which hath been given of it <sup>i</sup>.

THE ground, for a great way round Alexandria, is so low and flat, that the navigators have scarce any land-marks to steer by, except the tower of the Arabs, which stands about twelve leagues west of it, and Pompey's Pillar, lately mentioned; which frequently obliges the vessels to steer towards the isle of Cyprus, and sometimes into Syria, especially in thick foggy weather. Neither doth the soil around it produce either grain or pasturage, but is every-where sandy, and barren of every thing but a few dates <sup>k</sup>; so that one may justly wonder, that the famous founder of it should pitch upon such a wretched spot to build so large and magnificent a city on, which was so difficult of access to the navigators, and so destitute of water, firing, and of almost every necessary of life; whilst, at the same time, one cannot sufficiently admire the magnificence of the Ptolemies, under whom, in spite of all these disadvantages, it became one of the most populous, opulent, and plentiful cities in all the world.

BEFORE we leave this city, which, as we have already observed, is the patriarchal see or metropolitan of all the Christian, Coptic, or Eutychian sect, it will be expected that we should give some account of the nature, extent, power, origin, antiquity, and election of its patriarchs, as well as of the particular tenets in which this church differs from the Greek, Roman, and other Christian churches. We need not here repeat what we have formerly mentioned concerning the Copts in general, that they were the ancient inhabitants of Egypt, and whence they came to be called by that name; which the Turks afterwards, upon their conquering of Egypt, where they found the Christians very numerous, gave them in mere contempt, and, perhaps, not without a glance on their patriarch, and the high title he assumes, of successor of the evangelist St. Mark, who is generally allowed by all the Christians to have been the first apostle and planter of Christianity in Egypt, and the first founder and bishop of this see. He calls himself, moreover, the head and supreme bishop of the Coptic, and, in that quality, thinks himself equal to that of the Roman church. However, though we have followed the generality of writers, in calling them by that nick-name of Copts or Coptes, they despise it, and call themselves Eutychians and Jacobites; which last is that which they have affected almost ever since Jacobus Zanzales, al. Baradeus, the learned bishop of Edeffa, revived their favourite doctrine of one nature in Christ, upon its decline, and travelled over the greatest part of the east to preach and propagate it; and, after having enjoyed the Edeffan see near 37 years, died in it anno 578 †.

THE last town of note in this kingdom is that of Suez, which, though placed by some geographers in the Arabia Troglodytis, is nevertheless reckoned by Ptolemy, who calls it the city of heroes, one of the principal ones in the Egyptian kingdom, and is now, accordingly, under the government of the basha of Kayro. It is a considerable sea-port on the isthmus of its name, which joins Afric and Asia together, and advantageously seated on a small peninsula, that juts into the utmost verge of the Red Sea, and about 31 leagues south-east of Kayro; and by its commodious distance from thence, and the port of Gedda, is become the staple and magazine of all the merchandizes that are transported from the one to the other, as it was formerly of those that were brought from India, till the exactions of the government put a final stop to it. Notwithstanding which, it continues to be still the rendezvous of all the Ethiopians, who bring thither the richest of Indian commodities, as spices, drugs of all kinds, amber, musk, a great variety of precious stones, and other rarities; which are thence conveyed to Kayro, by land on camels, and from that place to Alexandria, on the Nile, by the Christian merchants; where they are shipped, and brought into Europe.

THE town is governed by a chief officer, who has the title of captain, or admiral, who presides over the maritime, and hath a kaymakan under him, who is at the head of civil affairs. He hath besides about 300 men, one half Janissaries, the rest Arabs; and these last are commanded by a cheyk, or civil officer of their own, stiled sadar. Both captain and kaymakan act in their separate provinces, or jointly, as their interest leads them. The latter has his constant residence in the city, the former only as long as the ships remain in the port. But, upon the whole, the Arab cheyk bears the greatest sway, and hath, in some measure, all the power whenever he is pleased to interfere; because the city, having no fresh water but what is brought thither from places eight or ten miles to the east-south-east, on the other side of the Red Sea, he can, upon any disgust, hinder it from being supplied with it. And even this water, when brought so far, though very brackish to the taste, and no less unwholesome to the body, is sold at the rate of five or more pence per pail-full.

<sup>i</sup> NORDEN, ubi sup. p. 43, & seq. POCCOCK, ubi sup. p. 10. <sup>k</sup> GRANGER, & al. sup. citat. † Vide Annal. Alexandr. sub indice. || GRANG. voy: en Egypte, cap. 10. POCCOCK's observ. on Egypt, vol. i. p. 133. LA CROIX, RAMUSIO, DAPPER, & al. plur.

Provisions brought from Kayro.

The port small and shallow.

Poorly defended.

Some guns and culverines.

Time of the ships sailing in and out.

Fish ill-tasted and unwholesome.

Metropolitan, number of bishops under him.

NEITHER is this the only scarcity Suez labours under, the whole country round about producing hardly any one necessary of life ; so that they are obliged to have their provisions, even down to their pot-herbs and roots, brought to them from Kayro. There is nothing to be seen all around it, for above 60 miles in compass, but a barren dry sand, without house, men, cattle, or any kind of verdure. The inhabitants are, for the greater part, Moham- medans, there being only about 60 Greek families, and a few other schismatics settled in it.
The town is small, but the houses, especially the public edifices, the key, which is a very handsome long one, the magazines, mosks, &c. are of a curious sort of stone, which is compounded of a great variety of sea-shells of all sizes ; yet so closely cemented together by nature, that nothing but the chissel or hammer can part them ; and, when carved and polished, bear a fine gloss, little inferior to marble. There are four handsome mosks in the town, and a Greek church in a house. The haven runs from north to south, but is neither large nor deep ; so that, at low water, it hath not above five feet in depth, whereby neither the gallies, nor other large vessels, can come up to it, without first unlading one half of their cargo.
The rest anchor at another place, about five miles from it, where they find good riding. The ships that go from Suez to Gedda are mostly built after the Indian manner, and, from their clumsy make, most probably built in some of the Dutch settlements in India, carry between 80 and 100 ton weight, and have port-holes for 30 guns, though the best of them have hardly above two, and the rest only two pattereroes, and them only to give the usual salute. They have no pumps in them, but use leathern buckets to draw the water, with the help of a windlass * ; for they never trouble themselves with stowing their provision of it in hogsheads ; which is the less necessary in such kinds of navigation, where they only sail along the coasts, and with the wind mostly behind them ; and these wells or cisterns serve them instead of barrels, of which they commonly have two or more, according to the number of passengers, so as to contain a sufficient quantity for their voyage.

THE town is not much better furnished with artillery than their trading vessels, having in all no more than twenty-two old cannon, mostly unmounted, and in such a dismal plight, as well as about five or six culverines, that they are scarcely fit for use. And it is well that there is so little need of them, and so little to be feared from an enemy. Thevenot tells us of a kind of barrack on the port, inclosed by a wooden lattice, in which are nine culverines, of different sizes, the largest of which is of a prodigious length and bore. At a small distance are to be seen, on an eminence, the ruins of an old castle, supposed to have been formerly built by the French, in which there is still a large cannon ; under or near which the people imagine some great treasure to be buried, but guarded by demons. The captain of Suez keeps two small gallies, and some few inferior vessels, to scour on this part of the Red Sea. The time of the merchant vessels sailing out of the port, is in spring and summer, when the winds commonly blow briskly from the north ; and, for their return, in autumn and winter, when they blow from the opposite point. The fishery about Suez is hardly worth mentioning ; what fish is caught near it on that part being neither numerous nor wholesome, but unpalatable and hard of digestion ; though we are told, that the Red Sea water is nothing so salt as that of the ocean or Mediterranean †. The rest consists chiefly in naces, and some other shell-fish, which they send to Kayro ; but which is neither more pleasant nor wholesome than the fish.

WE have had frequent occasion to speak of the isthmus of Suez, and of the various attempts that have been made by the Roman emperors, and kings of Egypt, to cut a chanel through it, and join the two seas together. All that we need add is, that there is to be seen a deep ditch, which runs across from north to south, at about three miles distant from the town, and seems to extend itself still farther through the adjacent sands, but all the way covered and filled with them ; and is supposed to be a relique of that vain project, which gave birth to the expression of fodere isthmum.

BUT to return to our Alexandrian metropolitan ; he is affirmed to have no less than one hundred and forty bishopricks, either in Egypt, Syria, Nubia, or other parts which are subject to his patriarchate ‡ ; besides the abuna or bishop of the Abissinians, who is likewise nominated and consecrated by him, as we shall see in a subsequent chapter. The misfortune is, that those diocesans, as well as the whole Coptic clergy and laity, are so oppressed by the government, that they have laboured not only under the greatest poverty, but, what is still worse, most stubborn and deplorable ignorance, ever since they embraced, in part, the Eutybian heresy (S) ;
which

* See these vessels more fully described in Pocock, ubi sup. p. 134, & seq. † GRANGER, ubi sup. c. 10.
‡ Eutychn. annal. Alexand. See the list of them in RENAUDOT's hist. patriarch. Pocock, ubi sup. p. 279, & seq.
& al.

(S) We call it by the name of heresy, in conformity to the generality of controversial writers, tho', in reality, it was little more than a logomachia, as their learned patriarch Gregory Abulpharagus rightly styles it, a dispute about words, and might have been easily compromised, if the bishops and monks of those days had been endowed with

- a which having been soon after condemned by the fourth council of Chalcedon, without any success, with respect to them, they became liable to all the anathemas and persecutions both of the Greeks and Latins, and were used by them, especially by the former, as irreclaimable heretics, outcasts from the Christian church, and unworthy of the Christian name <sup>m</sup>.
- In this state of enmity, contempt, and misery, which contributed only the more to confirm them in their obstinacy and hatred, they continued till the invasion of Egypt by the Turks; when, partly out of revenge to the Greeks, and partly in hopes of obtaining better quarter from these powerful invaders, they joined them with great readiness, glad of so favourable an opportunity of retaliating the severities and cruelties they had suffered under them, with interest. Accordingly, they are taxed with having displayed a more than ordinary zeal against them, and of having cut off a much greater number of them than the Turks did; by which means they got the patriarch confirmed by those conquerors in all his privileges and liberties, which the rest have enjoyed ever since; and have preserved a kind of superiority of regard from the government, above that of the Greek church, who doth likewise reside in that metropolis, as head of his own flock, since their separation from the western or Latin church. Hence proceeded that virulent animosity and unchristian hatred, which hath reigned between the Copts and Greeks, ever since their becoming subject to the Turks; and which the Romish missionaries have endeavoured to put an end to, by trying every way and means to reconcile both to their antient mother, the church of Rome.
- b

A. D. 451.
Now much oppressed by the Turks, hated
by the Greeks,
&c.

Side with the Turks against them.

Obtain a confirmation of their patriarchate.

<sup>m</sup> See the authors quoted under the note.

with the same irenic spirit, instead of that unchristian zeal which flamed amongst them, even in controversies of much less moment. But as this dispute was whether Christ had two natures, the human and divine, as was the general belief of the church, or whether those two natures were so absolutely, or the one absorbed in the other, as Eutychius affirmed, it was esteemed a point of too great moment to be so easily compromised between such furious opponents on both sides.

Eutychius, patriarch of Alexandria, was the first who maintained this new doctrine of one nature in Christ; for which he was excommunicated, and died in exile, though not before he had drawn a vast number of disciples, and some of the highest rank. He considered the opposite doctrine of two natures as too near akin to that attributed to Nestorius, of two hypostases, or persons, which he strenuously opposed. He was supported herein soon after by Dioscorus; who, to revenge his predecessor, called a new council at Ephesus, in opposition to that of Chalcedon, which had condemned him, and consisted of 630 prelates and fathers, with pope Leo the great at their head, and caused both pope and bishops to be excommunicated in their turn. And hence sprung the fatal breach between the Latin and Alexandrian churches; which hath continued ever since, in spite of the most strenuous efforts of the Roman missionaries to reconcile them to their church.

From this time, the Alexandrian patriarchs threw off the title of Papa, which they had assumed in common with those of Rome, and made an express law, forbidding any of their successors to resume it. However, tho' the Chalcedonian council might be too rash in their proceedings against Eutychius and his disciples, nothing can excuse the virulent treatment of the Ephesine against them, especially against so great and venerable a pontiff; and Dioscorus was justly punished for his indiscreet zeal, and, in his turn, anathematized, banished his patriarchate, and forced to die in exile, for his obstinacy in refusing to appear before the council. The consequence of which was, that Proterus, whom the court of Constantinople had nominated in his room, was assassinated in the cathedral, on Good Friday, 477, in a sedition raised by the Monophysites, who had already chosen another patriarch. From that time, there have been two patriarchs; the one of the Greeks, stiled the orthodox, and the other of the Copts, stiled schismatics; between whom hath reigned a perpetual war, till the Divine Providence permitted them both to fall under the heavy yoke of the Mohammedan Khalifs, and next under the present one of the Turkish monarchs (11).

However, the Coptic party had, long before, the mortification to see that of the Greeks gain considerable ground of them, and their own to decline in proportion, both in number and credit; and it was actually sunk to a very low ebb, when their great restorer, the learned Jacobus Zanzales, bishop of Edeffa, appeared in defence of the Monophysite doctrine; and by his writings, as well as his indefatigable travels through most parts of the east, did so effectually revive and spread it, that he hath been revered and esteemed ever since by the whole sect, who have affected to call themselves Jacobites from him; tho' the other Christians, as well as the Turks, call them still by their old name Copts, and some of the former, in contempt for their being circumcised, gave them the nick-name of KUFTI, or GIRD-LERS; meaning by it, that they are Christians only from the girdle upwards, but carry the scar of Judaism below it (12). For they have, since their first separation, whether out of a spirit of opposition, or in imitation of their neighbours the Abissinians, adopted both that and a multitude of other Jewish rites; of which we shall speak in the sequel. Their monks, likewise, who are dispersed all over the Upper Egypt, in poor wretched convents, amongst the most rocky and solitary parts, have adopted so much of the ascetic life of the old Jewish hermits, called Essenians, in Judea and Syria, and Therapentes, in Egypt, of whom we have given an account in a former part of this work (13), that they are looked upon as their spiritual offspring, and imitate them in nothing so much as in their long fasts, singing, and prayers, and other still more extravagant severities. Their patriarch commonly resides in the monastery of St. Macarius, with about 20 other monks, who live chiefly on the product of the ground, which they themselves cultivate. Their churches, church-utensils, as well as their dress, cells, gardens, &c. are as poor and mean as their diet, all over Egypt. Those of Syria and Palestine, where they are also very numerous, keep their churches and convents in better order, and are commonly more learned and civilized; whilst those of Egypt, by their ascetic way of life, contract a certain sourness in their temper, which, joined to their ignorance and tenaciousness, disqualify them for any conversation but among themselves (14).

(11) De his, vide Eutych. annal. Alexandr. Asseman. Biblioth. orient. let. 2. pass. Renaudot, Liturg. orient. tom. 2. Hist. patriarchar. Alexandr. Baluzii collect. conciliar. p. 902. Concil. Ephes. tom. iii. & al. auct. sup. citat.

(12) Purchas's Relat. lib. vi. c. 5. Rogers terre sainte, lib. ii. c. 4. Pori additions on Leo Afric. p. 390.

(13) See Anc. Hist. vol. iv. p. 169, & seq.

(14) Roger, ubi sup. Vide Pocock, Granger,

Tamper'd with in vain by Roman missionaries.

Ignorance and tenaciousness.

Avoid disputes.

Their great power formerly.

It must be owned, however, upon the whole, that, though both sides have hitherto shewn a themselves equally averse to any such re-union, the Copts are they that say least against it. The Greeks, who are more learned, and thoroughly versed in that controversy, have been always able to defend their separation from that church, by solid arguments from scripture, the fathers, and the belief and practice of the primitive church; whereas the very best of the Copts can allege little else than the traditions and customs they have received from their antient bishops and doctors, which is the whole canon they think themselves obliged to follow.

THE principal doctrine which they hold with great strenuousness, in opposition to other Christian churches, is, as we have observed in the last note, that of the Monophysites, or of one single nature in Christ. This error was at first propagated in Egypt and Syria, rather by sword and slaughter, like that of Mohammed, than by dint of reason and argument. The patriarchs of Alexandria, at that time the second in all Christendom, were both rich and powerful enough to claim an excessive authority over the clergy and laity; of which the ecclesiastical history of those times give many pregnant and dreadful instances<sup>n</sup>, which we willingly omit, as out of our province. And we need not wonder if it hath been maintained much in the same way, and with the like obstinacy, ever since. Their prelates and priests, conscious of their ignorance and incapacity to defend it, either industriously avoid entering into a controversy with the Greeks or Latins, or, if they cannot shun it, only appeal to their traditions and customs; alleging, that it would be impious, as well as presumptuous, to pretend to be wiser than our forefathers, who believed as we do; and would it be pardonable in us, to forsake the tenets they have taught us? If you press them so far with scripture-proofs, or the writings of the fathers, &c. or even from their own confession; that is, if you ask them, whether Christ was perfect man, they will answer in the affirmative; when you ask again, whether he was perfect God, they likewise answer, with an asseveration, yes, certainly; but when you infer to them from thence, that there must necessarily have been two natures in that Divine Redeemer; instead of yielding to the conclusion, they only give this short reply, Stak far allab, forbid it God! an expression they commonly use, when any thing is said to them that is contrary to their belief or inclination (T). And this is commonly the result of every dispute one hath with them<sup>o</sup>.

*Circumcision
in both sexes.
1686.*

Remissness in baptism.

The patriarch's answer about it.

THIS stubborn tenaciousness extends itself no less to matters of practice and belief. They have adopted sundry Jewish rites, in common with the Abissinians, which, though abolished d from the first ages of the Christian church, they still observe with equal, if not with greater exactness and zeal, than they do the most essential ones of Christianity. Witness their circumcision and baptism, the former of which, if we may judge from their practice, they look on as so essential, that they administer it to both sexes; and so scrupulous are they in that point, that, in the year 1689, one of their most considerable persons at Alexandria refused to espouse a young woman of 16 years of age, who had been granted to him in marriage, till she was first resigned into the priest's hands, and been made to undergo that operation<sup>p</sup>; whereas they are so remiss with respect to baptism, that they suffer their children to go without it, not only several months, but frequently years, without shewing the least concern about, or anxiety for, the many that die deprived of it. It is true, that, according to what they e stile their canon, that ceremony ought to be performed on the males forty, and on the females eighty days after their birth, according to their adopted Jewish ordinance for the purification of women<sup>q</sup>, to the end the mother might be present at it. But when the patriarch hath been reminded of the danger there was of the infant's dying before that time, and of the unreasonableness of running that risk in mere compliance to a law which only affected the Jews; his answer was, that it was better a soul should perish, than that an ancient received canon should be infringed<sup>r</sup>.

BUT it is much more to be feared, that this blind and uncharitable opposition is owing to the innate hatred which the Copts have conceived against the Greeks, Armenians, and Latins, who are more exact and scrupulous on that point, and, in case of danger, permit children to f be baptized at home, and by lay hands, or even by women; all which the Copts condemn, as uncanonical and unlawful.

<sup>n</sup> Vid. SOCRAT. chap. 14 & 15. & EUTYCH. annal. Alexand. sub an. 410, & seq. ASSEMAN, Biblioth. orient. tom. ii. pass. RENAUDOT, Liturg. orient. LA CROZE hist. Christian. Ethiopizæ, & al. mult. <sup>o</sup> MAILLET, Pocock, & al. ubi sup. <sup>p</sup> MAILLET, ubi sup. let. x. <sup>q</sup> Levitic. xii. 1, & seq. <sup>r</sup> MAILLET, ubi sup.

(T) Accordingly we are told, that some of the sprightly French belonging to the consul, having asked some of their women, whether, in their confessions (which are commonly public, and only in general terms) they ever confessed any of the gallantries they indulged themselves with, in the absence of their husbands; they made them the same answer, Stak far allab, God forbid (15)!

(15) Maillet, ubi sup. let. x.

a THERE seems to be the same indecent contrast in all the other branches of the Coptic rites Confession and and church discipline. They admit of confession; but, instead of a private auricular and absolution. particular detail of their sins, exact no more than a public and general one, at proper appointed seasons, in which it sufficeth them to acknowledge themselves sinners; immediately after which, the good bishop or priest gives them his absolution, in the same general terms; God absolves or forgives you; and, without any other ceremony, reproof, or exhortation, dismisses them. In some cases of meum and tuum, and the like, they may be summoned to a private confession, where the person is examined about the fact; but it seldom produces the desired effect.

b If they are more strict in one thing than another, it is in their fasts; whether during their Lent, which begins with them fifty-five days before Easter, or their Advent, which lasts full forty-three days before Christmas, or on the eves of their holidays, or on other fast-days; during which they eat neither flesh, fish, fowl, nor eggs, and use neither butter or oil with their lenten fare; nor do they drink any thing but water all that time; and never break their fast with any thing till a little before sun-set. They even oblige their sick and dying, as well as Strict fasting, children, after they are ten years old, to the same strictness<sup>a</sup>. They preserve no regard for long advent, the sabbath; and, for that reason, not only exclude it from being a fast-day, but inveigh and lent. much against those that do otherwise, as being contrary to their ancient canon.

c Their courtships and marriages are pretty much after the manner that is observed all over Courtship and the east. The maids are kept strictly out of sight, and not seen by their future spouses till marriage. the day of marriage; so that the addresses are performed by the relations of the man to those of the woman, and the terms of marriage concluded between them. When these are agreed upon, the ceremony is performed, without great shew or pomp, at the house of the intended wife; to which the bridegroom repairs with his friends. The priest is called in, who reads over the marriage-office before them; which, like the rest of their liturgy and divine service, is performed in the ancient Coptic, though understood by few even of their learned clergy. The ring is blessed, and exchanged from the finger of the man to that of the woman; who appears covered all over with a large veil, and discovers little else but the finger or hand that is to receive it. The priest's blessing concludes all, or rather introduces such a banquet, and other rejoicings, as their circumstances can afford; for, as we observed before, the Copts, as well as all the rest, are commonly very poor. The marriage-knot, how- Divorce al- ever, is so far from being esteemed indissoluble among them, that not only the man, but, lowed to both what is rarely permitted or seen in those eastern parts, the woman, hath power to apply to sexes, the patriarch for a divorce; which he seldom fails of granting, not only in cases of breach and upon tri- of conjugal fidelity, but of any other dislike, whether mutual or only on one side, no matter pling occasions. which; the motive that induces the patriarch to this ready condescension is twofold; viz. the money which is commonly given for obtaining it; and, 2dly, that his refusal would not prevent their parting; for the displeased party would do it without his leave<sup>b</sup>. Other branches of the Coptic faith, discipline, and worship, we shall refer to a subsequent chapter, in which we shall give the history of the great empire of Abissinia, where they make up the whole of the established religion, are most strictly and universally observed, and whence they have been transmitted to Europe, in a more ample and explicit manner, by unexceptionable hands. All, therefore, that needs be added with relation to the Alexandrian patriarchs, Those patri- is, that they are the only ones who cannot be deposed by their bishops or government, ex- archs not to be cept for apostacy or heresy; whereas those of the Maronites, Greeks, and Armenians, are deposed, but often liable to it, through the avarice of the Egyptian Bishops, and the feuds that reign among for heresy. their suffragans and clergy. So that, from the moment of his election and consecration, he becomes independant on any or all his diocesans, in all cases but that of heresy and defection from the Monophysite faith; for which several of them have been deposed and excommunicated<sup>c</sup>. And, with respect to their authority, they retain so much of it, with regard to f their election, that they are still chosen to that dignity by and from among their bishops. These, at first, give their suffrages, vivâ voce; but if any dispute arises about the majority, or if the number of voters happens to be equal, the suffragans then give the name of the candidate in writing, and lay it, with great solemnity, on the high altar. However, the richest of the laity have a great influence in all these elections, and frequently cause them to be cancelled, if they like not the person chosen, they being the persons who lay down the money with which their firman, or patent, is purchased; which is afterwards repaid to them out of his revenue. When the election is over, he is first installed in the great church of St. Macarius, at Kayro, where he is elected; and afterwards at that of St. Mark, at Alexandria. He is obliged to preach once a year to his clergy; whilst they are all exempt from, or, to speak more properly, are unfit for, that duty; instead of which they read homilies and legendary books to the laity, on set days, from the pulpit. They chuse young deacons a to serve in the lower offices of the mass, and other parts of the divine service; and who, tho' but eight or nine years old, receive the sacrament as often as it is administered †. And so much shall suffice with respect to the Coptic religion.

<sup>a</sup> Vide EUTYCH. annal. Alexand. sub indice Heretic. sub verbo Jacobitæ. Vide & MAILLET, let. xii. Pocock, p. 246.

<sup>b</sup> Vide MAILLET, & al.

<sup>c</sup> De his, vide ASSEM. in disert. in Monophys.

As for the others, which are tolerated in Egypt, such as the Jewish, Greek, Armenian, and Latin, there will be the less occasion for us to expatiate upon them, as they have been amply spoken of in a former part of this work, as the reader may readily find by consulting the general index of our Ancient History <sup>a</sup>, for each of them. Much less need we add any thing to what we have already said concerning Islamism, or the Turkish religion; which is the established one in this country, and which will be found fully treated of in the beginning of this Modern Part <sup>w</sup>; where, in the course of the Arabic history, we have also taken b notice of the reduction of this kingdom under their obedience, by the warlike Khalif Al Moktafi <sup>x</sup>, by whom that religion was first established in it, and hath been the reigning one to this present time, and is, in all respects, the same in Egypt as it is in the heart of the Ottoman empire; excepting, perhaps, that they are not quite so strict in observing it in the former, as they are in the latter; so that we have now no more to say upon that article, except their grand pilgrimage to Mecca, the center of the Mohammedan faith, which every Moslem is obliged to make at least once in his life (U), and which sets out from Kairo once a year, and is one of the most splendid and numerous cavalcades, or, as they term it, caravans, in all the East; and such is the zeal of the Mohammedans for that venerable city, that numberless multitudes of pilgrims, of all ranks and conditions, croud yearly thither from c Turkey in Europe, from Asia, and Africa, notwithstanding the vast expences, fatigues, and dangers, which attend that pilgrimage, and repair to Kairo, the place whence the caravan sets out, from Morocco, Fez, Algiers, Tunis, and other parts of Barbary, through long and dreadful deserts, and at the greatest perils, such as we have described in a foregoing chapter, for the sake of joining with them in that meritorious pilgrimage, which, among the other blessings it is attended with, intitles those who have performed it but once in their lives, to be esteemed and revered at their return, as great saints, by all their countrymen (W).

Vast zeal of the Moslems for their pilgrimage;

who are greatly respected after it.

Route to Mecca interrupted by a war, and a new one discovered.

We observed, at the beginning of this chapter, that the governors or Bashas of Egypt d are they who have the ordering of this caravan, appoint the chief officers and escorte which are to attend it, and furnish the grand pavilion and other hangings, which are designed for the grand mosk at Mecca, and which are wrought for that end at the castle of Kairo; the reason of which seems to be, that the route which they take from Kairo to Mecca is the very same which the Mohammedans of Africa followed, both in going and coming, before Egypt

† Pocock, ubi sup. p. 508, & seq.

<sup>a</sup> In fin. vol. vii.

<sup>w</sup> Vol. i. p. 17, & seq.

<sup>x</sup> See before, vol. i.

(U) This famed pilgrimage is affirmed to be of much antienter date than Mohammed; not indeed on account of Abraham's tomb, or of his offering his son Isaac there, as the Mohammedans pretend, but on account of the famed oak of Mambre, or Mamre, under which that patriarch dwelt, and entertained the three angels, and, as Nicholas Damascenus tells us, became famous for the pilgrimages which all the neighbouring nations, Heathens, as well as Jews and Christians, made to it. And Eusebius and St. Jerom assure us that it was a place of great resort in their time, not only on a religious but commercial account; so that Mohammed only enforced the continuation by new motives, which, added to the old ones, could not but prove effectual. Nevertheless his followers have not thought it of such absolute necessity, in order to their admission into paradise, but allow that it may be performed by proxy, provided the principal pay the charges of it (15).

(W) Meaning, doubtless, the ignorant and superstitious part of them; for the wiser sort know full well, that pride, avarice, and other worldly ends, have as great a share in these pilgrimages, as religion and superstition; seeing the city of Mecca is, at that time, no less a place of commerce than devotion, or, to speak more properly, one of the greatest fairs, at which the richer part of those pilgrims exchange the commodities of their own country, which they bring thither with them, for the noblest, richest, and most valuable mer-chandizes of Persia and the East Indies, which are brought thither by the Red Sea; so that if of the 40,000 persons, of which these caravans usually consist, one excludes the mercantile part, and their numerous servants, the Emir Hadge, or chief commander, and his vast retinue, as well as the Janissaries, Spahis, and their officers, who guard the caravan (and are all considerable gainers in proportion to their posts), if to these we add the vast multitude of idle vagrants, who follow them merely to live upon their charities; it is to be feared the number of true devotees will be considerably lessened; and this will more fully appear by the account, which shall be given in the sequel, of the caravan itself, and those that compose it (26).

Moreover, with respect to those Meccan pilgrims, so much revered by the vulgar, we must not omit a common observation, stamped by experience into a kind of proverb, That they are commonly worse after a pilgrimage than they were before. And it is a common saying amongst them, If a man hath been at Mecca once, beware of him; if he hath been twice there, have nothing to do with him; and if he hath been three times to Mecca, remove out of his neighbourhood (17). Our author indeed tells us, that this is rather an observation of the Jews and Christians, than of the Mohammedans; but by all the accounts we have of it, it plainly appears, that few of the latter deny the truth of it, except the ignorant and superstitious.

(15) See Mr. Prideaux, Mr. Sale, and other commentators on the Koran. Levant, l. ii. c. 17, & seq. Maillet, ubi sup. Pocock, lib. iv. c. 5, & al.

(16) Thevenot's voyage to the
(17) Ibid. iid.

- a was subdued by the Turks, and consequently the best known and beaten; though these caravans were, in all probability, as often interrupted, as the wars between the Ommiyad and Alid khalifs raged, of which we have given an account at the beginning of this Modern Part<sup>u</sup>: so that, to satisfy the devotion of the pilgrims on the one hand, and the greediness of the merchants on the other, they had been obliged to seek out for a safer route, which was by sailing up the Nile, quite to the farthest part of Higher Egypt, towards the small town of Alessowan, and thence to cross the ridge of mountains called since Moccatem, from the road which they were obliged to cut through it<sup>x</sup>, in order to come to the small sea-port of Aydab, on the Red Sea, which took them up seventeen days; thence they cross over to Giddab, distant about two days sailing, in transports, sent thence for that purpose, which, in two days more land them on the Arabian coast.

- b THIS is the route they had been forced to trace for these caravans at an immense cost, not only in cutting a road fit for them through such a ridge of mountains (X), but in digging wells, of a great depth, in the rock, to supply them with water, and which, though so brackish that it was hardly fit for either man or beast, they were forced to dispense with. But no sooner were those bloody wars between the successors of Mohammed happily terminated, than every thing began to run in its antient chanel, and the former route again resumed, which hath been followed ever since<sup>y</sup>, with this farther conveniency, that when Omar had made himself master of Egypt, and had chosen Mecca for the place of his residence, he sent orders to Amru, whom he had appointed governor of it, to cleanse the old Khalis, or, as others have it, to cut a great canal from Kayro to Suez, for the more easy conveyance of the merchandizes which are sent from thence to Mecca†: the misfortune was, that this canal was, thro' the negligence of the Egyptians, suffered in time to be quite choked up with the mud of the Nile, by which this carriage by sea from Kayro to Mecca was quite set aside, and the caravan deprived of the benefit of it. Another inconvenience attending it, is that the day of its departure (as well as the length of its continuance, which is 100 days in all) is fixed to a certain day of their year; but as they reckon it only by moons, which makes it shorter by four days than the solar, it must of course happen, that, in the space of 33 of theirs, or 32 of ours, that day runs through all the four seasons, whether convenient or not for so long a march. It consists of two encampments, which are likewise fixed; those of Kayro, Constantinople, Damascus, and other places, compose the first; and those of Africa, from Morocco, quite round to Tripoly, make up the second; and this, on their departure, sets out one day after the former, and serves as a kind of a rear-guard, and encamps each night on the spot where the other did on the foregoing. But on their return the order is inverted, and these march first, and form the van-guard to the latter. The reason of which is, to

<sup>u</sup> Vol. i. p. 258. & seq.
 & al. ubi sup.

<sup>x</sup> See SHAW'S Travels, p. 341.

<sup>y</sup> THEVENOT, MAILLET, POCOCK,

† See before, vol. i. p. 240, & seq. vid. & MAILLET, ubi sup. letter 13.

(X) In this ridge, we are told, were found those mines of emeralds mentioned by Strabo, and so famed for their beauty and hardness, but which have been either exhausted, or, as others will have it, forgot and lost long since. The Arabs, we are told, are still in search of them, and find the roots or refuse of them in great abundance, as well as, sometimes, precious stones, chrystal, old medals, and small images of earthen ware, but few of these intire. These emerald roots are neither pellucid, nor of a deep green, like the fine old ones above-mentioned; whence it is imagined, that the mine is exhausted. Yet it is not improbable that the Arabs only keep it concealed, or, perhaps, quite covered over, to prevent the Turks, who are their masters, reaping the benefit of them; and to prevent being suspected about it, tell a tragical story of one of their princes, named Muley Hassein, who was lord of them, and the last of that royal race of kings who had heretofore reigned over Egypt; but had been driven out of it by the Turks, and reduced to a small canton within this ridge of barren mountains, and under tribute to the conqueror; but where he comforted himself for his loss with the possession of this rich mine, which enabled him to exercise the greatest liberalities among his neighbouring Emirs, among whom he quickly grew in the highest esteem, and was adored by all his own subjects. To all these comforts he added one more in a spouse, no less beloved than beautiful, and endued with all the excellencies of her sex. In this height of contentment his ill fortune raised him a powerful enemy in the Basha of Egypt, who became at once enamoured with his emerald mine and his favourite wife, and ceased not accusing him to the Porte of sundry treasonable designs, till he received orders from thence to seize on him and his country; which he accordingly did, with a powerful army. The prince, with the small handful of his subjects, defended himself with his usual valour near six months; but being at length overpowered and surrounded by his enemy, beyond the power of escaping him, thought now of nothing but how to prevent their coming to the knowledge of the mine, and then fall, sword in hand, in the midst of the slaughter.

There were, it seems, but six of his most favourite servants that knew the entrance into the mine, and these he called to him, and declared to them the design of the Basha, in such moving terms, as easily persuaded them to submit their necks to the bow-string, to prevent their being tortured into a discovery. These were no sooner dispatched than he hastened to his wife's apartment, who, being apprised of his design, before he took his leave of her, he had the melancholy satisfaction to see her die at his feet, of a dose of poison which she had already taken, by way of precaution against the Basha. Hassein was not long in completing his design; for running with a desperate fury among the thickest of the enemy, he fell at length incircled with a multitude of them*.

* De hoc, vid. Maillet, ubi sup. vol. ii. p. 59, & seq. in lett. vii.

Turks afraid of an old prophesy.

prevent those Barbaric Africans attempting to make themselves masters of the city of Mecca; the Turks pretending that there is some old prophecy, or prediction, that they would do so<sup>2</sup>. And though that prophecy respects all the Magharbin, or western nations, and may as well mean the Europeans, or Christians, who have a greater claim to that situation; yet, as they are not sure which of the two it may mean, it is natural for them to take all proper precautions against both; though they are more afraid of the former, because they are of the same religion, and equally the disciples of Mohammed<sup>3</sup>.

Escorte of the caravan.

The commander in chief, or Emir Hadge.

His vast power and profit.

WE hinted in a late note, that these caravans joined to their devotions a considerable commerce, and returned home laden with the richest goods from Persia and India, which come to Gedda by the Red Sea, and are thence conveyed to Mecca; and this, joined to the richness of the presents which are carried thither, and the strong prepossessions of the Turks about the prophecy above-mentioned, makes it necessary that they should be attended by a sufficient guard, for which end there is always a draught made of all the best troops in Egypt to escorte them, at the head of which is the Emir Hadge, or prince of the pilgrims, who is commonly some opulent Bey, appointed by the Bascha, and hath, besides the guard above-mentioned, between 400 and 500 horsemen, well mounted and armed, whom he keeps in pay at his own charge, and for which the Porte allows him 100,000 sequins, over and above his other perquisites, arising from the immense quantity of provisions, which he causes to be conveyed on a vast number of camels, going and coming; the letting out most of those that carry the trading pilgrims merchandizes; the presents which those who make use of their own, and a vast number of officers and other inferiors, such as victuallers, cooks, &c. are obliged to make to him; all which put together amount to a much larger sum. His power is still greater, or in some measure absolute, from his first setting out of the gates of Kairo to his re-entering. He hath power of life and death over the whole caravan, is sole judge of all crimes, misdemeanors, and contests, which happen during the whole pilgrimage, condemns to fines, bastinado, or even death, at his discretion, without being called to any after-account, either for that, or for the vast sums which he sinks into his pockets during the journey<sup>b</sup>.

Ceremony at his entrance into the Dowan.

A DAY or two before his setting out, he repairs to the castle, with a vast retinue of his own friends, domestics, and all the officers belonging to the escorte; and being entered into the hall or Dowan, is received there with great ceremony by the Bascha, at the head of that grand court, consisting of near 3000 persons. There his Khathe Scharif, or patent, which confirms him Emir Hadge, is publicly read, together with the inventory of all the precious things, which the Bascha then commits to his care, in their presence; namely, the new pavilion, the number of purses which the Grand Signor sends as presents to the city and temple of Mecca, and of those which are allotted by him for the defraying of the charges of the pilgrimage. The Bascha then presents him with a splendid vest of superfine cloth, richly lined, and a number of others of less value to his officers; to which he usually adds a large quantity of provisions, such as cattle, fowl, rice, sugar, coffee, &c. to the value of about 2000 crowns, in lieu of which, the Emir, at his return, presents him with some of the richest Indian merchandizes to an equivalent. Upon his leaving the Dowan, he rides through the castle and several streets of Kayro, attended with the same splendid retinue, and clothed with his new magnificent vest, the rich pavilion being carried before him to his own palace, where he gives them and the grand officers of that city an elegant entertainment. The day, and especially the evening, before his departure, is wholly spent in feasting and all kinds of rejoicings between the pilgrims and their friends, who come to take their leave, and appear in the finest dresses and equipages; the very ladies and their women, tho' on all other occasions so closely kept, are permitted to assist at this festivity, and come thither in their covered litters, or sedans; so that the city and the camp, where the general rendezvous is kept, on the banks of the lake, about three or four miles from the city, affords one of the most delightful and magnificent spectacles of the whole year, nothing being seen or heard, during that short interval, but the finest illuminations and fireworks, accompanied with the greatest profusion of the richest fare, and the greatest variety of concerts of music, both vocal and instrumental. The common report is, that on the morrow, which is the day of the caravan's departure, the number of those who return from the camp to the city, either on horseback or in sedans, on mules, asses, or on foot, amounts to 150,000: and though our author, who had seen it more than once, owns it to be exaggerated, yet he allows that there could not be less than half that number<sup>c</sup>.

The presents delivered to him there.

The grand pavilion carried before him.

Great rejoice-ings and feasting at the camp.

Number of pilgrims.

WE have already hinted, that the number of those which compose the caravan seldom amounts to less than 400,000, but is often much greater, in times of peace and plenty, when

<sup>2</sup> MAILLET, ubi sup. lett. ult. Pocock, ubi sup. lib. iv. c. 5. & al. sup. citat.

<sup>b</sup> Ibid. ubi sup.

<sup>c</sup> MAILLET, ubi sup. lett. ult.

<sup>a</sup> Ibid. ibid.

- a the commerce is not obstructed; and all the Mohammedans in general are brought up from their infancy with such an ardent desire of making that pilgrimage, that neither the fatigue and dangers, nor even the great expence that attends it, though naturally parsimonious (Y), can allay their zeal and devotion for it, their very women being allowed to perform it with the pilgrimage amongst the Turks, as well as it doth among some Christian nations, no less scrupulous and delicate than they in that point. However, they are very careful of performing it with all the decency and reservedness that the case will allow. The rich ones travel in close litters, or sedans, carried between two camels; and those of the lower rank in large covered baskets, two of which are thrown over and hang on each side of a single camel, wherein they sit conveniently, and sheltered from wind and rain, as well as from sight. Others, who cannot afford this kind of conveniency, have a way of riding on a single beast, yet so covered as to be quite out of sight: and all proper care is taken, and strict discipline kept, to prevent all that are of that sex from being insulted by the others.

- ALL the camels belonging to the caravan are painted yellow, and have some kind of ornaments on their heads, breasts, and harness, especially those that go at the head of every company, which are known by the plumes of red ostrich feathers on their heads, a fine flag on each side, and their trappings are bespangled with variety of shells. The second and third of each drove have bells on each side, about a foot long; and all of them under their saddle a coarse carpet, to cover them at night<sup>d</sup>. Those which belonged to the Emir Hadge, and to the richer sort of pilgrims of both sexes, are still more richly adorned: but none more magnificently so than those which are made choice of to carry the presents to Mecca, especially that which carries the great pavilion called Mahmel, or covering of Mohammed and Abraham's tomb, which is made in the shape of a pyramid, with a square base, all richly embroidered with gold on a green and red ground, the view of the house of Mecca being embroidered upon it, with a portico around it. The camel designed to bear it is said to be bred for that purpose. This is, like the rest, painted yellow, with a powder called Henna, and is covered with a rich carpet that comes down to his feet, so that nothing is seen of him but his head, neck, and crupper; which are richly adorned. After he has performed this office, he is esteemed sacred, and never more put to any use<sup>e</sup>. The sum total of the camels belonging to the Emir Hadge amounts to 3000, but the rest is beyond computation.

- WE shall subjoin at the end of the article the order of the march, that it may be seen at one view. As for their encampments, they are so settled, as that the caravan shall arrive at Mecca in thirty eight days, neither more nor less, let the roads and weather prove favourable or not, unless the wild Arabs chance, as they sometimes do, to attack and plunder them; at which times they are obliged to join all their forces to beat them away, which will retard their arrival a day or two. On this account, besides the great guns which attend the caravan, they load some of their camels with a smaller sort, which serve to give the signal for encamping, marching, &c. as well as to fright away those free-booters, of whom we have given an account in a preceding chapter<sup>f</sup>, when they approach them too nearly.

<sup>d</sup> Pocock, ubi sup. lib. iv. c. 5.
MAILLET, & al. ubi sup.

<sup>e</sup> Pocock, ubi sup. MAILLET, & al. sup. citat.

<sup>f</sup> Vid. &

(Y) This expence may be easily guessed at, if we consider the length of the journey, which, as hath been already hinted, is full 100 days, and of the carriage not only of themselves, but of all their provisions, to the very water and fuel; they passing through no towns going or coming, except the city of Medina, and that only in their return, and meeting with no supplies of water, but once in three or four days, nor any eatables, except what some of the wild Arabs come on purpose to offer to sale, and that commonly at an extravagant rate. Those likewise which are bought up at Mecca, in order for their return, are commonly sold there three times as dear as at Kayro; these caravans bringing a dearth into every place they pass through.

Another no less considerable expence attending them is the fine appearance which every one endeavours to make at them, many of them above what their condition will allow; the large liberalities they affect to distribute among the multitudes of idle miscreants that follow them, with no other end than to live upon their bounty; and the rich presents they vie to make to the holy city and temple of Mecca. To all which if we add the extravagant price they must pay for every thing, which either their curiosity or pride induces them to purchase, or sickness, or any other accident by the way, obliges them to procure, and the presents which must be made to the Emir Hadge and his officers for their escorte, protection, and any other accidental favours, it cannot appear, upon the whole, other than a very expensive journey, to those who undertake it merely out of devotion, how profitable soever it may be to the rest; and plainly shews how liberal and profuse they can be upon this occasion, who on all others are so noted for their fordid parsimony.

There are, indeed, vast quantities of lands and houses, and other revenues, belonging to Mecca, amounting to an immense yearly sum; a sufficient portion of which is appropriated to the service of this pilgrimage, to defray all those charges, and prevent all those impositions. The misfortune is, that the receivers find pretences to elude the right application of them, and sink a great part of them into their pockets; and what is appropriated for this caravan, is as much abused by the Emir Hadge (18).

(17) Vid. Maillet, Pocock, Norden, Perry, et al. sup. citat.

Manner of their marching.

In great danger from the southern winds, clouds of sand, and other frightful accidents

Are met by other caravans.

Arrive at Mecca, and go to Mount Araffat.

Visit other places.

How the old pavilion is disposed of.

Vast traffick
of that fair.

THE departure of the caravan is fixed to the 27th day of the moon which follows their Ramadan<sup>s</sup>. They commonly set out every day about four or five hours before the sun rising, and continue their march till about two in the afternoon. But when the season proves excessive hot, they begin to move an hour before sun-set, and march on till two hours before sun-rise the next morning. At such time the north wind commonly blows very brisk, and is so refreshing to them, that they not only open that side of their tents to it, but hang vessels in the air full of water, which quickly contract a most delightful coolness. But whenever that wind chances to fail them, as it sometimes doth, though rarely, the heat becomes so intolerable, that the people are seized with diseases, accompanied with lowness of spirits, that they seldom bury less than 300 or 400 in a day, which are perfectly stifled for want of breath; and if the wind chance to blow from the south, it carries with it such a fiery heat, as kills one in an instant. We have given an account in the foregoing chapter of this kind of winds, and the precautions which the Africans take to avoid the dreadful effects of them, though too frequently to no effect: and it often happens that these winds bring with them such clouds, or rather mountains of sand, as serve to bury the bodies of those whom they have smothered with their fiery heat; by which means they quickly become so dry and light, that the subsequent caravans, by taking the same route, have not only marched over them, but felt them under their feet; and sometimes, by treading upon their toes, have reared the withered carcases full against their faces<sup>b</sup>.

WHEN the caravan hath got safely through all these dangers, and is arrived at Beddar, or Beddr, six days journey from Mecca, it is joined by that of Damascus; which setting out from that capital the same day this doth from Kayro, and keeping the same number of encampments, arrives there at the same time; after which they march jointly to Mecca. In this last they stay three days, waiting the arrival of those of Bagdad, Balsora, and other parts of Asia, as well as those which come from India by sea; all which usually get thither by that time, which is the day fixed for their repairing all in one body to Mount Araffat, distant about six hours from Mecca, and supposed by them to be the same mountain on which Abraham offered up his son Isaac<sup>i</sup>. There they celebrate the festival called Korban Beyram, or second Beiram, or, as the Arabs style it, Je-Al-Korban, and Je-Al-Adbâ, the feast of the sacrifice<sup>k</sup>; from the immense numbers of oxen, sheep, goats, fowl, pigeons, and other poultry, which are slaughtered on that festival, and given to the poor, all over the Moslem world, and here in particular, either upon, or more probably at the foot of, the mountain, by every pilgrim, according to his circumstances or devotion<sup>l</sup>.

THIS preliminary ceremony being ended, they all begin to pare their nails, shave their heads and beards, and wash themselves all over, some only covering their nudities with a small piece of linen, whilst others, neglecting that superstitious nicety, as they think it, expose their naked bodies to public view; and repeat their prayers, suitable to the occasion, with all possible intenseness. This being ended, they return to Mecca by the same way, and pay their next visit and devotions to the house or station of the patriarch Abraham, the Kaaba, and other holy places of devotion in that city, of which we have given an account in a former volume<sup>m</sup>, and then prepare for their return. During that time it is that the grand new pavilion, or covering, brought thither from Kayro, and lately described, is put up there instead of the old one, which is delivered up to the Emir Hadge, to be conveyed by him to Constantinople, and presented to the Grand Signor, as was formerly done, who then used to have it cut in pieces, and distributed among all the Mohammedan princes and great officers, as most valuable presents. But whether it is their regard for such sort of relics, or on what other account we know not, but those Emirs have long since claimed a right to it, and cut it into small shreds, and sell them among the pilgrims at an extravagant price, they being all ambitious to purchase some small particle of it; and happy is he that can carry away the smallest bit either of this or of the old hangings, which are likewise sold<sup>n</sup>.

ALL this time not only the mercantile part of the caravan, but all that come to this solemn fair, are either exchanging their merchandizes for those of Persia and India, or buying for themselves and families such wares and other nicknacks and trifles as they are able, and suit with their circumstances; the poorest and meanest among them being no less ambitious to carry home something from that celebrated city, by means of the great and general liberality which at that time reigns among the rich and devout. As we have elsewhere described the city of Mecca<sup>o</sup>, we need not remind our readers here that its smallness makes it altogether unfit to contain such a vast concourse of people, wares, beasts, and carriages, as resort to it at this season, and that each caravan hath its respective encampments in the plain about it,

<sup>s</sup> De hoc, vid. sup. vol. i. p. 48, & (H).

<sup>b</sup> Vide auct. sup. citat.

<sup>i</sup> Genesis xxii. 2, & seq.

<sup>k</sup> De hoc, vid. vol. i. p. 181.
& seq.

<sup>l</sup> Vid. ibid. p. 102, & seq.

<sup>m</sup> Vol. i. p. 98, & seq. 102,

<sup>o</sup> Vol. i. p. 98, & seq. & alib. pass. & auct. sup. citat.

<sup>n</sup> Ibid. ibid.

- a where care is taken that both merchants and pilgrims be accommodated with all necessary conveniencies during their short stay. And it is a surprising thing to see what prodigious quantities and variety of the richest and most valuable commodities from Persia, India, and other parts, are bought and sold during that short space, besides the coffee, myrrh, incense, and other products of Arabia, amounting to several millions; and what is still more surprising is, the extraordinary ease and silence with which the business is dispatched; the whole time of the caravan's stay there being confined to twelve days; which being ended, the Emir Hadge gives his signal for their departure. However, it often happens that the wealthy merchants, not having been able to expedite all their affairs by that time, are forced to apply to him for a respite of two or three days longer; but this is seldom obtained without some valuable
- b presents; after which they may easily recover that time, by making a shorter stay than usual at the places through which they pass on their return. From their departure from Mecca, they arrive again at Beddar or Beddr in six days; from which they reach the city of Medina in three more, where the first Mohammedan Khalifs resided, before they removed their seat to Damascus, and where they pay their devotions at Mohammed's sepulchre, which we have elsewhere described<sup>a</sup>, as well as the stately mosk erected over it. Here they likewise make their presents to the place, every one according to their ability; and after a stay of three days, return by the way of Yamboos, whilst that of Damascus leaves them here in its return to Syria. On its march, that of Kayro meets in its way, and at four different encampments, a fresh convoy with a plentiful supply of provisions and refreshments, sent from thence for that purpose; the last of which they receive when they are come within ten days journey of that city<sup>c</sup>. But nothing, in their reckoning, affords them a more delicious refreshment than that of tasting again the waters of the Nile, after those brackish and distasteful ones which they had been forced to take up with during that long and fatiguing journey. Their next delight is the sight of their friends and relations, who fail not to meet them at the place where they had parted from them, and where, after the first congratulations, they are received with the same rejoicings, feasting, and other tokens of mirth, as had accompanied their parting.

Visit Mohammed's tomb at Medina.

Return to Kayro.

- FROM this time those who have had the good fortune to return home safe, are dubbed with the title of Hadge, or Pilgrim, which is always tacked before their own name, as Hadge Mebamed, Hadge Mustapha, &c. and have a particular respect paid them above the rest. When introduced into their own houses by their near relations, they find the entrance adorned with garlands, and other trophies, and the inside splendidly decorated with domestic ornaments, for their reception. As for such of them as died in the pilgrimage, as they are destitute of those marks of joy, so are they likewise of those of mourning and sorrow. We may add here, however, that those that have happily survived it, appear so sunburnt, emaciated, and so strangely altered, that their relations can hardly know them; and the poor camels, which have borne the greatest burdens, bring little more of their own with them than their skins and bones; and though laden with the richest merchandizes, are no sooner rid of the loads than they are turned out by their inhuman masters, to starve in the barren
- e sands, being neither fit for sale nor thought worth their keeping; even that which was chosen to carry the pavilion, and is intitled to a plentiful and agreeable maintenance for the rest of his life (there being more than a sufficient provision made for it by the Grand Signor) is commonly dispatched in a little time, by poison, or some other private death, by those who are intrusted with the care of it<sup>d</sup>. And thus much may suffice for a short sketch of this grand pilgrimage; there remains only that we subjoin to it the promised detail and order of the cavalcade, which guards and escorts it, and this the reader may see at one view under the following note (Z).

IT

<sup>a</sup> Vol. i. p. 128, & seq.

<sup>c</sup> MAILLET, ubi sup.

<sup>d</sup> Ibid. ibid. vid. & al. sup. citat.

(Z) The order of the cavalcade which escorts the caravan's march.

1. One iron cannon, and six brass ones, each drawn by two horses.

2. Four frames, embroidered, and supposed of leather, drawn by men on foot, and carrying the powder and ball.

3. Seven camels laden with the provisions of the Emir Hadge, or prince of the pilgrims.

4. Four persons mounted on camels, and playing upon some musical instruments.

5. A Tartavan, or litter, carried by four mules.

6. Eight light litters of the Emir Hadge, each carried by two camels.

7. Seventy camels laden with biscuit.

MOD. HIST. VOL. VI.

8. Fourteen camels laden with oil and butter.

9. Fifty camels laden with corn, and one with two boxes full of long wax candles, for the service of the house of Mecca.

10. Ten camels laden with coffee, sugar, &c.

11. Four camels carrying kitchen utensils.

12. Nine camels laden with plates.

13. Eight camels laden with the kitchen tent, and dressers for the cooks.

14. Eighty-six camels unladen, belonging to the Emir Hadge.

15. Twelve others in the same manner, richly caparisoned.

16. Sixty more, belonging to the Emir Hadge.

17. Fifty-four more, laden with water.

K

18. Ten

It is not, however, to be supposed, that the commerce which that caravan carries on with Mecca, considerable as it is, is the only one belonging to this kingdom; though it is allowed 18. Ten more, loaded with tents.

19. Eight more, loaded with water.
20. Twelve ditto, carrying each a large box on both sides, for the use of the sick; two of them covered, and containing medicines, and one with two boards, with holes, for washing the dead; all of them provided by private benefactions.
21. Two camels, on which were the persons who take care of the sick.
22. Kettle-drummers, mounted on camels, and beating on them. The same almost at the end of every string of camels, at the distance of near half an hour, follow the rest.
23. Six camels laden with iron frames, in which they make their fire.
24. A single litter.
25. Four loaded camels.
26. Another kettle-drummer, mounted on a camel.
27. Twenty camels unladen.
28. Twenty cases, with balls and powder, on camels.
29. Six camels laden with tents and other things.
30. Five more cases of powder and ball.
31. Ten camels laden with water.
32. One camel mounted by a kettle-drummer, &c.
33. More cases of powder and ball.
34. A single litter.
35. Two loaded camels.
36. Another with music.
37. Thirty camels unladen.
38. Ten overseers of the water camels.
39. Three camels more; and a fourth with music.
40. Twenty more with loads.
41. Two with water.
42. Sixteen water overseers on horseback.
43. Three camels mounted by men.
44. Forty unladen.
45. Four more cases of powder and ball.
46. Two camels laden with water,
47. The Imam, or head Sheik, who is the chaplain of the caravan, and offers the sacrifices on Mount Arafat; his garment of ceremony white; he carries a green flag with his right hand, with which he blesses the people, by waving it gently to and fro.
48. Eleven camels unladen.
49. Three more mounted by pilgrims.
50. Two others with music.
51. Two mounted by the Sheiks who lead the van.
52. Twenty more without loads.
53. Twenty laden with water, and one with drums.
54. Ten others unladen.
55. Five more with water.
56. The banner of the Spahes, called Cherites.
57. Thirty of their body.
58. Twenty Iskiars of the same body, each having a pike carried before him.
59. The Sardar of the Sheiks, and his lieutenant.
60. Some of his led horses.
61. Two Seraches who serve under him.
62. Twelve slaves on horseback.
63. Thirty Iskiars, or elders of them.
64. Four slaves in coats of mail made of wire.
65. Sixty of the body called Tuphekies.
66. One-and-twenty other slaves.
67. Twenty men on camels.
68. Twelve camels for the Sardar.
69. Two others without loads.
70. Two others with kettle-drums.
71. Seven more with baggage.
72. Fifty of the body of the Giumelues.
73. Their Sardar.
74. Twenty soldiers, with ten slaves, carrying bows and arrows.
75. Thirteen camels with men on them.
76. Two with kettle-drummers.
77. Four laden ones.
78. Two officers called Oda Bashas.
79. Two led horses.
80. Two Sabaderiks in Castans.
81. Seven camels laden.
82. Two led horses.
83. Two Oda Bashas.
84. One camel.
85. Thirty-four Chouxes, or messengers of the Dowan.
86. Other officers of it.
87. The officers of the Emir Hadge, in the following order;
88. A Choux, or messenger, in black.
89. Three standards.
90. Five saddled camels.
91. Eight led horses.
92. Two Seraches.
93. Two Janissaries.
94. Two Kajas of the Emir Hadge.
95. His Hafnadar, or treasurer.
96. Twenty-six saddled camels.
97. Five led horses.
98. One saddled camel.
99. Twenty-eight men on camels, two of them playing on musical instruments.
100. Five laden camels.
101. The body of the Afabs.
102. Their two Cabadericks.
103. Other Oda Bashas.
104. The standard of the Afabs.
105. Three in Castans, who walked.
106. Three others in the habit of ceremony.
107. The Sardar and his lieutenant.
108. Saddled camels.
109. Men on laden camels.
110. Players on instruments.
111. Another body of Afabs.
112. Another of Janissaries.
113. Two Sabadericks of that body.
114. Two Janissaries.
115. Two Seraches.
116. A standard.
117. Three men walking in Castans.
118. Three Janissaries.
119. Their Sardar.
120. His lieutenant.
121. Two Janissaries.
122. Two saddled camels.
123. Thirty-four men on camels.
124. Eight loaded camels.
125. Another body of Janissaries.
126. A standard bearer.
127. Another in a leopard's skin.
128. One-and-twenty Chouxes.
129. The Aga of the seven military bodies; with silver chains hanging from their horses bridles to their breastplates.
130. Twelve Beys, and before each two Shatirs in blue:
131. The Trogoman Aga.
132. The mute Serica Bashee.
133. His guards.
134. The Chooster Caja.
135. The Chouxes guards.
136. All the attendants of the Emir Hadge.
137. Eight Janissaries in the habit of ceremony.
138. Four officers of the Basba.
139. Four Janissaries.
140. A standard.
141. Two more after that.
142. Four Arab Sheiks.
143. Two mad Sheiks, bareheaded, and in white shirts.

a allowed by all writers, to be greatly diminished from what it was under their antient monarchs. We have already mentioned some of their manufactures which are exported into most parts of the east; besides which, a very considerable share of its product is likewise exported into Europe; viz. flax, both in ramo, combed, and spun into thread; cotton spun, calicoes of of all sorts and dyes, yellow wax, saffron, fenna, cassia, sugar, and sal armoniac. To all which we may add, a great variety of feathers, variously dressed and wrought, as well as an immense weight of coffee, of Mocha, and a prodigious variety of other merchandizes and drugs, as silks and calicoes, spices, gums, &c. from the East-Indies, which are yearly landed at the port of Suez, by thirty or forty vessels, and thence conveyed by the merchants to Kayro, who send them back again, laden with commodities of Europe and Egypt. These ships go no farther from Suez than to Gedda on the east of the Red Sea, near the city of Mecca, from whence they return laden with coffee, frankincense, and some Indian and Persian commodities, the richest and most valuable of them being brought to Kayro by the caravan, as we have hinted already. There is one misfortune that often attends them on that sea, which is, that they must set out from Gedda in the Hamseen season, that is, 50 days before the middle of May, when the south wind usually blows, and, if they chance to be too late, must wait another year; and when those winds fail them, are often forced to stay a whole twelvemonth in some sorry and inconvenient harbour.

BESIDES those ships already mentioned, there are others which bring the coffee from Fezeka, in Arabia Felix, among which there are five or six belonging to the English and French, and are continually employed in that branch. Five of those ships which come to Suez belong to the Grand Signor, and the rest to private merchants. Every bag of coffee weighs between three and four hundred pounds, and pays 30 medins when it comes from Fezeka (A). It must be observed, here, by the way, that though the exportation of coffee and rice out of the Turkish dominions is absolutely forbidden, yet is that prohibition easily eluded by suitable presents; so that great quantities of both are brought thence into Europe, in spite of that severe prohibition; and this is so much the more remarkable, with respect to the former, because it is not, like the latter, which grows here in great plenty, a natural plant of this country, but is imported from Yemen, and other parts of Arabia and Africa. There have been frequent attempts made to reconcile it to the Egyptian soil and climate, but all to no purpose, though it thrives so well in Upper Ethiopia, from whence it is affirmed to have been originally transplanted into Arabia. What is worth our observation is, that the Abissinians

Produce and exports.

Coin.
Coffee and rice forbid to be exported.

* MAILLET, NORDEN, &amp; al.

* Pocock, ubi sup. lib. iii. c. 1. &amp; al. sup. citat.

144. The Emir Hadge, richly mounted and dressed, attended by

145. About 40 soldiers.

146. Two Janissaries.

147. The Kaja of the Dowan.

148. Sixty slaves with bows and arrows.

149. Two Imams.

150. Four led horses.

151. Three standards.

152. A band of music.

153. Four led camels.

154. Twenty-six laden.

155. Two men on camels.

156. The Sheiks of the mosques, followed by several companies of tradesmen, with their standards, some of them dancing, the fishermen carrying fish like serpents, probably eels, tied to the ends of their fishing rods.

157. Four Chouxes of the Dowan.

158. Sixteen Janissaries in their high dress.

159. The Sheik called Cassani.

160. The great standard carried by a proper officer, mounted on a camel.

161. Five camels, three of them with long trappings, richly embroidered.

162. The pavilion, or covering, as described above.

(A) A medin is a small piece of money, about the bigness of a silver three-pence, and of the value of three of our farthings, so that 30 of them amount to something less than two shillings. Mr. Norden calls this a silver coin; but it is more likely, from its value and bigness, to be only, as Dr. Pocock says, of iron, or brass, silvered over (19). However, it is by this that they reckon the value of their other coins.

Thus their fendoocli, which are the largest of their gold coins, are valued at 146 medins; and their genzerli, and mahbub, two lesser pieces of the same metal, are valued at 110 medins each.

They make use likewise in commerce of an imaginary piafter, valued at sixty medins, if there be not some error crept into the French edition, with respect to the figures; Vansleb reckoning the piafter at 30, and Mr. Savary at 33 medins (20).

As for the European coin, which goes current here, whether gold or silver, it rises and falls according as it has lost more or less of its intrinsic weight, or the fluctuation of the common exchange. And here we cannot but observe one misfortune which attends the commerce of this country; viz. the Jews commonly obtain the privilege of coining, and enjoy that of the common exchange, in both which branches they commonly prove great cheats. A much more dangerous abuse they are guilty of with relation to the richest and finest drugs, gums, &c. of Arabia, especially those of the medicinal kind, none of which escape being by some means adulterated, counterfeited, or contaminated, that go through their hands; particularly the fenna, which the Basha allows them the sole privilege of buying. It is commonly granted to one person only, who is also obliged to purchase all that is brought to Kayro, no one else being permitted to do so but he; after which one English merchant only is allowed to buy it of him; by which means the price is considerably advanced from a hundred medins, or about 12 shillings, the usual price of a camel load of it, at the first hand (21).

(19). Conf. Journey into Egypt, vol. i. p. 66. Eng. edit. 8vo. Pocock, ubi sup. lib. iii. c. 1. du commerce.

(21) Pocock, ubi sup. lib. ii. c. 5.

(20) Diction.

and

and Arabs make their infusion, not of the roasted berries, but the shells, or capsules, which a inclose them, and esteem it much more reviving and delightful than that from the berry * (B).

Imports.

THE chief imports are English, French, and Venetian cloths, silks from Leghorn and Venice, some drugs and dyes, tin from England, lead and marble blocks from Italy, great variety of small wares from France, Venice, and Constantinople, and from this last furs, and all sorts of copper vessels, and plates tinned over, which are much in use. All their iron is brought thither from Salonica in Turkish ships, to prevent its being exported out of the Turkish empire, which is likewise forbidden. Several of the Barbary woollen manufactures are likewise imported hither; and carpets from Asia Minor, and great quantities of coral and amber, are also brought hither to be sent to Mecca, to be wrought into a variety of ornaments and other toys. There is likewise a considerable commerce between Upper and Lower Egypt, by which each supplies what the other wants. But all these put together come vastly short of what it was wont to be before the way to the East-Indies by the Cape of Good Hope was found out, when it enjoyed a much greater share of it, by landing all Indian and Persian goods at Cossir, on the Red Sea, and bringing them by land to Kept, or Coptas, in four days, and thence conveying them to Alexandria, whence they were dispersed through all parts of Europe by the Venetians and Florentines. This inland traffick, whether by caravans or upon the Nile, is moreover greatly obstructed by the wild Arabs, those especially who dwell on the mountains opposite to El Guzzoo, a most dreadful sort of robbers, who plunder all that fall in their way, either by land or water; and, though not very numerous, and continually pursued in their inroads by the Bey of Girge, do yet prove too strong to be dislodged from their rocky habitations, from which they are continually infesting the navigation of that river, whilst others of the same extract and profession do the same to the caravans by land <sup>w</sup>.

Cause of its great decay.

Some considerable branches still preserved.

NOTWITHSTANDING all these inconveniencies, and the loss of so considerable a branch, it is still found to carry on no inconsiderable share of that traffick; for though the Europeans have found out a much easier and expeditious way for their own, yet by that of Egypt all Turkey and Barbary are furnished with all those Indian and Persian goods, by means of the navigation that is still kept up by the Turkish vessels from Surat to Mocha, and especially with Indian muslins, and other fine linens, silks, &c.

THEIR commerce with Asia is still greater, which is carried on by the caravans, which come yearly hither laden with the richest commodities from thence, and which are conveyed to Kayra by that branch of the Nile which falls into the Mediterranean, near the port of Damiata, as we have hinted a little higher; which commerce consisting of constant and mutual imports and exports of the most valuable commodities to and from Mecca, and other parts of Arabia, Syria, Palestine, &c. must of course be still very considerable and advantageous <sup>x</sup>.

Commerce with Europe.

WE need not repeat here what hath been already observed of that which is carried on at Rosetto, on the other branch of the Nile, a vast quantity and variety of goods from England, France, Germany, and other parts of Europe. But there is still another no less advantageous, though less reputable branch, carried on between that port and the cities of Constantinople, and Salatia in Anatolia, consisting of white and black slaves of both sexes, which are yearly sold or exchanged in prodigious numbers, the former of which are brought hither from those two cities, and the latter sent hence to them. The greatest part of the latter which one sees, whether males or females, not only in the seraglio, or in the city and suburbs, but also in all Turkey, being conveyed thither from Egypt. Both sorts are sold at a high price, but the whites, which are brought hither in exchange for the blacks, are set up at a higher value, especially those that are young, handsome, and well-shaped of either sex. The lowest price they commonly bring is 200 crowns; and there have been those of the female kind, whose beauty hath cost the purchasers as far as 2000 or 3000 crowns <sup>y</sup>.

With Constantinople of white and black slaves.

Great price given for the former.

Traffick with various African nations.

WE have lately, as well as in a foregoing chapter, taken notice of several caravans which travel through dreadful barren deserts from Fez, Morocco, Algiers, Tunis, and Tripoly into Egypt, with great variety of the commodities of their own countries, and appear at Kayro in a most strange variety of dresses and complexions, some of which spend between seven and eight months in that journey. Among those numerous nations, there are two who have some-

* MAILLET, ubi sup.

<sup>w</sup> NORDEN, ubi sup. MAILLET, ubi sup. POCOCK, ubi sup. lib. iv. c. 3. VANSTEL, & al.

<sup>x</sup> MAILLET, VANSLEB, POCOCK, & al. sup. citat.

<sup>y</sup> MAILLET, ubi sup. lett. 13.

PERRY, & al.

(B) Our author adds, that the Arabs call the berry Bian, and when roasted, ground, or infused, they give it the name of Cabone, or, as D'Herbelot, writes it, Caboweh; which is their general name for all potable liquors, though most particularly for this, as the most esteemed and in vogue amongst them (22). From hence the name of coffee is not only passed into Europe, from the similitude of the aspiration b to our gh or f, but hath been indiscriminately given not only to the infusion, but to the berry and the plant.

(22) Maillet, ubi sup. See also D'Herbelot Biblioth. orient. sub voc. Caboweh.

a thing curious and worth taking notice of in their way of traffick and behaviour; the one is that of the Croys (C), who bring thither gold dust, and exchange it for an equal weight of silver, with which they purchase copper vessels, cutlery work, and other trinkets, and in particular some sort of sea shells, which pass current among them instead of coin<sup>2</sup>.

THE other nation, whose name, country, and wares, our author doth not mention, are still more singular in their way of commerce, they stiffly refusing to conclude a bargain with their chapmen, let them offer ever so fair and advantageous an exchange, till they have been soundly thrashed with a bull's pizzle; after which they are all compliance, and come immediately to an agreement. Our author adds, that he never was present at any of these bargains, but it brought the Muscovitish discipline of the husbands on their submissive wives, of which we have given the origin in a former part of this work<sup>3</sup>, into his mind.

EGYPT still preserves one considerable branch by the way of the Nile, both with the great and opulent empire of Ethiopia, and other inland parts of Africa, which is no less considerable than those we have mentioned; it consisting in gold dust, elephants teeth, ebony, and other commodities we have spoken of in a preceding chapter<sup>b</sup>, and shall have occasion to mention in the history of Abissinia. For though these seldom trade so far out of their own country, yet they drive a large traffick of those commodities with the Nubians, whom they call Barbarians, and who transport them from thence into Egypt by their caravans, which chiefly consist of merchants, as they style themselves, though so poor and wretched, that the greater part of them, at their arrival at Kayro, appear in rags, and some of them almost naked, and so emaciated by the heats and fatigues of that long journey through rocky and barren deserts, and in want of all necessaries of life, that they might more easily pass for a regiment of poor starved slaves, than for men who drive so rich and considerable a commerce; there being scarcely a year in which there doth not one or two of these caravans arrive at this metropolis richly laden from these parts, not only with gold-dust, musk, amber, and variety of rich gums, but some thousands of black slaves, which are sold in Egypt, one with another, for between 80 and 100 crowns<sup>c</sup>. These, as well as the white ones which are brought hither from Turkey, are distributed into several large houses called Ostelli, and belonging to that particular Bazar, or market, the blacks on one side of the house, the whites on the other, where they are exposed to sale. There are several other Bazars in Kayro, the two most considerable of which, next to that of the slaves, are the Camilli, or mercers change, and the Sabamin, which is that of the druggists, in which last are sold vast quantities of yellow amber, in large sacks and boxes, and of the bigness of one's fist, some larger and some less. These are afterwards wrought into variety of trinkets, especially beads, which the Turks make use of to tell the number of their prayers. Among the various other drugs belonging to this Bazar, which we have no room to enumerate, is the famous powder, or earth, called Hannab, or Al-Hanna, in great vogue and esteem in all these eastern countries, and which is made use of both by men and women, to paint their hands and feet; the revenue of which, we are told, amounts to 18,000 ducats<sup>d</sup>.

e THERE are here several markets for cattle, and in particular for horses (D), and a vast commerce might be made of them, could the Egyptians be prevailed upon to let them be

<sup>2</sup> Ibid. ibid.
ubi sup.

<sup>3</sup> Anc. Hist. vol. ii. p. 283, in fin. not. (K).

<sup>b</sup> MAILLET, POCOCK, PERRY, & al.

<sup>c</sup> MAILLET, & al. ubi sup.

<sup>d</sup> LA CROIX Afric. part i. c. 5. sect. 5. MAILLET, & al.

(C) They are said to be situate on the coast, over-against the island of Pheasants, in the Atlantic ocean, and are so affected with the bad air of Kayro, and the unfavourable smell of the place, that they are usually taken notice of for their going along the streets with their mouths and noses muffled up, as in the time of pestilence; which disagreeable scent our author ascribes to the vast quantities of fish consumed in that city, and commonly fried in oil. This may be one cause; but from what we have before said of the narrowness and dirtiness of its streets, and of the many stagnated waters, dried canals, and other unwholesome steams in and about it (23), the reader will not be at a loss for a better apology for these Croys, who may, in all likelihood, be accustomed to a much sweeter air, and more moderate climate (24).

(D) It is agreed on all hands, that the horses of Egypt are very beautiful, fleet, and more fleshy than those of Barbary, and would consequently be more admired in Europe than they. They have them of two breeds; viz. the Arabian and Egyptian, both finely shaped, limbed, and of various colours; but the former are more strong and fiery, and the latter more fit for shew than use, and for the most part spoiled, lamed, and gouty, by being mounted too early, and rode too furiously, as is the fashion among them, and often designedly, in order to prevent the great officers coveting them for their beauty; so that those which have escaped that ill usage, bear an extravagant price at Constantinople; whither, in spite of their scarcity, they are sent yearly in great numbers, some by commission, but mostly in presents to the court, by the Bashas and great officers, to their friends and patrons there. Had the Europeans leave to buy them before they are fit to be mounted, and to rear them up in a better way for exportation, it is probable they would soon grow more numerous and useful, and become an advantageous branch of commerce; but that hath not hitherto been, nor is likely to be, obtained from the Porte; and, without a special catesherif from hence, it would be not only in vain, but dangerous, to attempt it (25), for the reasons alleged above.

(23) Maillet, ubi sup. letter 13.
ubi sup.

(24) See before, p. 2, & seq.

(25) Maillet, Pocock, et al.

Exportation of exported out of the Turkish dominions ; but that is what hath been often tried in vain by the Europeans ; neither merchants, nor even consuls, having been able to obtain leave to export one of them ; even the Basha himself is afraid to grant such a favour, though so highly bribed for it, for fear of causing an insurrection among the people. The truth is, that they are so tenacious of their ancient customs, that it is with great difficulty they are brought to suffer any of their merchandizes to be exported into Europe ; insomuch that the Alexandrians, we are told, rose up in arms at the first bale of coffee which was put on board for Marseilles <sup>c</sup> ; though they have since been prevailed upon, by proper bribes, to wink at those vast quantities which are now exported in spite of the Porte's severe prohibitions of it. However, we do not find that the like hath been attempted by any Europeans with respect to horses, which they will not suffer any Christians to ride on, except the consuls, either in this or any of the great cities in the Turkish dominions <sup>f</sup>.

Traffick on the WE have already hinted something of the Egyptian and Turkish traffick carried on by the Red Sea, by a small fleet of about thirty or forty vessels, belonging mostly to the Grand Signior, and the great inconveniencies it is frequently exposed to ; all which might not only be prevented, but that commerce greatly improved, if rightly conducted ; and if those vessels were better armed, manned, and equipped, and proper care was taken to have some men of war kept there for the security of their navigation to and from Persia and India to Kayro, by which means that metropolis would become the grand mart and magazine of all the richest commodities of these countries, from which they might be dispersed through all Europe at a much easier and cheaper rate. It is happy, therefore, for the maritime states in Europe that the Othman court is either so blindly inattentive or negligent in so important a point, which, if duly attended to, must, in a short time, inevitably ruin their whole East-India trade, but which, for that reason, they have cause to wish it never may <sup>e</sup>.

Antiquity and WE should now conclude this long, but curious and important article, with a short account of those beneficial caravans, which, in spite of the great decay which this new commerce into Judea hath caused to this of Egypt, do still contribute so largely towards its support. But as we have in some measure described the mercantile one in a preceding chapter, and the religious one to Mecca in this, we shall confine what we have further to say of those of Egypt to some few particulars which have not been yet taken notice of, but which we hope our readers will not think impertinent to the subject we are upon, as to the method in which they are carried on, and conducted forwards and backwards, and their way of bringing up and accustoming their camels (the chief beast of burden used in them) to those long and fatiguing marches, through sandy and barren deserts, with so little, and sometimes with no sustenance of food or water for days and weeks.

WE need not here observe, that the desire of gain, joined to the difficulties and dangers from wild Arabs, wild beasts, and other accidents, in such long voyages, gave the first rise to these caravans, which are no other than an association of a number of merchants and travellers bound to the same place or country ; and the antiquity of them, even from the time of the patriarchs <sup>b</sup>, is more than sufficient to demonstrate the usefulness and necessity of them in those hot and barren climates ; and, indeed, without such associations, no commerce of such lengths and difficulties could be carried on ; but when once a certain number of merchants have joined themselves in this design, fixed their place of rendezvous, the time of their departure, and taken all other necessary precautions and helps for conveniencies, safety, and dispatch, experience shews what may be performed by them, what long and barren deserts may be crossed, what difficulties and dangers may be surmounted, and what rich and extensive commerce may be carried on, and with what vast and diffusive benefit they may be managed to and from the remotest countries.

WE have already hinted what commodities these of Afric carry into Egypt ; some of which, as elephants teeth, ebony, and other kinds of wood, though of heavy and cumbersome carriage, as well as the water and provisions which they are obliged to take with them, even to wood for fuel, are, nevertheless, as much a part of their cargo, as the gold dust, gums, and other richer commodities ; and for this the Divine Providence hath amply provided those countries with plenty of camels, a beast exactly fitted for such burdens, and such other fatigues as necessarily attend this painful way of travelling, and so docile and patient, that, with a little care in the bringing them up, they are taught to carry very heavy and cumbersome burdens through these sandy and barren deserts, over long ridges of mountains, both hard and craggy, and with a scorching sun over their heads, without that constant refresh-a ment of food, drink, and in some cases of even rest (E); for want of which, horses, mules, and other beasts of burden, would expire, in less than a quarter of the time that they continue without it.

<sup>c</sup> MAILLET, lett. 13.<sup>f</sup> Pocock, lib. i. c. 2. MAILLET, & al. mult.<sup>e</sup> Idem ibid.<sup>b</sup> Vid. int. al. Genesis xxxvii. 25, & seq.

THE method commonly taken to rear them up to this wretched servitude from the beginning is, by keeping them muzzled from sucking, first for half, then for a whole day, and so longer by degrees to five or six days; they next train them up to crouch on their bellies whilst they are lading and unlading; and, when fit to go with a caravan, they prepare them for their short allowance by a gradual fast from one to seven days; after which they are fit to undertake the journey. They travel but slowly, seldom above twenty miles a day; but make amends for it by the weight they carry, and the small pittance that is allowed to them, as well as by the trouble they save their drivers from loading and unloading, being mostly accustomed to sleep with their burdens on their backs. We lately observed the dismal plight which those that went with the caravan of Mecca commonly came back in, at the end of 100 days; though they commonly fare better during their journey than those we are speaking of, whose journey being much longer and more painful, must not be expected to return in better case, nor to have their painful services meet with a kinder return, than they; that is, to be turned out to starve on some of the adjacent deserts. Such is the unnatural ingratitude of those who live and grow rich by their useful labour.

THAT we may not dwell too long on this subject, and yet give our readers a sufficient idea of the fatigues, dangers, and extraordinary expensiveness of these caravans, we shall close this article with a short sketch of that which comes from Nubia to Kayro, which we have already had occasion to mention, on account of the wretched equipage of its merchants, and the richness of its cargo, consisting of the most valuable commodities of both Ethiopias, and other kingdoms of Africa. The traffick of this caravan, which now seldom fails of coming twice a year to Kayro, was formerly carried on, with great difficulty and danger, on barges, or flat-bottom boats, which, in spite of its many and dreadful cataracts, used to sail or row up and down the Nile, from Dangola to Kayro, and from thence up thither again. This was done by coming as near to those cataracts with their vessels as they could; and there unloading them of their merchandizes, they carried them by land, together with the barges, which were made small and light for that purpose, on their shoulders, till they came to a proper place to put them on board again: and this trade they continued till they had mastered all the cataracts, which could not be executed without great labour and expence, to say nothing of the danger; and shews what pains and hazards these people would expose themselves to for the sake of gain.

THEY have since found a safer and more expeditious way of conveying these merchandizes from one kingdom to another on camels by land; by which means they can come twice a year to Kayro, and return back to Dangola, by crossing the Libyan desert, by the way of Gari, a town situate on the Nile, about four days journey on this side of Dangola, where the merchants from Sanaar, the capital of Fungi, or Fund (F), Gondar, capital of Upper Ethiopia, and many other trading cities of Africa, meet at a certain fixed time, with all their various goods, and form what is now called the Nubian caravan. And here, at their departure, they leave the banks of the Nile, and enter into the desert above-mentioned, which takes them up thirteen days in crossing; after which they come into a spacious valley, about thirty leagues

(E) This last we add, because it often happens, that these poor yet useful creatures, either by ill usage, being over-burdened, or fatigued, or through some hurt in their feet, legs, and such-like accidents, contract such weakness and torpors over all their limbs, that, were they allowed to lie down to rest, they would become so stiff as not to be able to rise or pursue their journey; upon which account they are obliged to keep them moving and walking about the encampment, with their burden on their back, which is seldom less, but often above, 500 pounds weight, till the caravan begins to march; and they are forced to follow in that dismal plight, till (which is often the case) their strength being quite exhausted, they sink under their misery, and are eased of their burden, which is immediately divided between some of their companions, whether able to bear it or not, and they left to expire in the burning sands, or be devoured alive by birds or beasts of prey (24).

(F) Mr. Ludolph is the author who calls it by this last name, and by that of Sennar, and reckons that country a part of the ancient Nubia (25). Mr. De Lisle differs somewhat from him, and says the Fungi are a people subject to the kings of Sennar, or Nubia (26). The Portuguese writers, on the contrary, say they border on the north of Abissinia, and are subjects, or tributary to it (27), springing from some old maps, made at random, or from fabulous memoirs, which placed the Nile to the lakes of Zaira, Zembra, and Zafflan, about five or ten degrees beyond the line, and the Abissinian empire to reach as far as the Mountains of the Moon, placing the Fungi, and their capital of the same name, on the west side of the lake Zafflan. But we are now fully assured that the limits of that empire come above six degrees short of the line: and some more recent and exact geographers have since placed the city of Fungi on the coast of Zanguebar.

They place likewise another of that name in the kingdom of Ambara in Abissinia; all which are now found to be erroneous, and not worth confuting (28).

(24) Maillet, Granger, Pocock, et al. ubi sup. of Nubia and Abissinia.

(27) Atlas ibid.

(25) Hist. Ethiop. lib. i. c. 2. n. 7.

(28) De his, vid. La Martiniere, sub voc. Fungi.

(26) See his map

long, and running almost from north to south, which is covered with palm-trees, and yields a plenty of fresh water, by digging about a foot deep into the ground; a stage no less comfortable and desired, after travelling thro' such a burning desert, than uncommon in most parts of Africa. Here they move on by slow journies, to refresh themselves from their late fatigues, and to prepare themselves for traversing a new ridge of mountains, which run from north to south along the Nile, on the Libyan side, till they come to Montfaloot, a town of Upper Egypt, where they pay the first customs to Egypt, consisting of a certain number of black slaves; and when the caravan comes in sight of the Nile again, for the first time from their departure from Kayro. At Montfaloot they embark on that river, and sail down to Kayro; and on their return remount it to the same place, and then resume their old route homewards through the same ridge of mountains, delightful vale, and barren deserts; through the last of which they b are forced to travel seven or eight days without meeting with any water, or place where they can dig for any; during which the camels must go without, or take up with a very scanty portion of it; and the people are forced to drink that which they bring with them, which is by that time become very unfavoury and distasteful.

Danger of losing their way.

Reject the use of the compass.

BUT this is not the greatest inconveniency they are liable to in their thirteen days march through this desert: there is another still more frightful and dangerous, namely, the difficulty of steering their course right through those vast pathless sands, where they meet with neither mountain, tree, or any thing to serve them for a landmark to direct their guides: so that, if they decline ever so little from their right course, they are in danger of being all lost for want of water; which is commonly all spent before they can recover the right point, if c ever they do, to come at a fresh supply of it. They have been often advised, we are told <sup>1</sup>, to make use of a compass, which would in a great measure prevent such dangerous deviations, but they have as often rejected that counsel, though told that other African caravans had followed it, to their no small satisfaction and advantage. These Nubians are either too stupid or conceited to be put out of their old way, and will run the risk of perishing in those dreadful deserts, or of being swallowed up alive by those clouds of sand, which we have elsewhere mentioned <sup>k</sup>, rather than owe their safety to the advice of an European. Besides, as they are all either Mohammedans, or poor ignorant idolaters, the former adhering to their doctrine of predestination, and the latter to their images, charms, and other superstitious preservatives, more than to any human means, though ever so well founded and experienced; of which we d shall now give a signal instance, not foreign to the subject we are upon, of their commerce with Egypt; and with it we shall close up this article.

BESIDES those rich merchandizes which the caravan brings into Kayro, the natives drive another traffick, which consists of a sort of light timber, or wood, which bears a great price there, and of a coarse sort of earthen ware, which they make in their country. These they venture to bring down to Kayro in large floats upon the Nile, at the time that its waters begin to rise, neither minding its rocks nor cataracts; but committing their wares and persons to the waves, both leap down each cataract with equal unconcern. The only danger they provide against is that of the crocodiles and sea-horses; to keep off which they light fires, and keep a watch at night, and make a dreadful howling at proper intervals. If their floats e chance to strike so hard against a rock as to break the cords that tie them fast, they have no other chance for their lives than to stick close to one or other of the fragments, till they come to some place where the current runs smoother, and there endeavour to get them all together, and tie them closely again. As for their earthen vessels, if ever so many chance to break, by that or any other accident, they make themselves amends by selling what is left so much the dearer, when they come to their journey's end. As soon as they find themselves drawing near to the last cataract, they shut their eyes, and stop their ears with their hands, to avoid being scared at the frightful sight and noise, and a few moments after find themselves shot away a mile below it <sup>1</sup>.

Modern History of Egypt.

At first subject to the Khalifs of Baghdad.

WE have, by this time, gone through all the material and curious particulars relating to f the modern state of Egypt: there remains only that we resume the history of it from the epocha where we concluded its ancient part; viz. at the end of the Greek emperor's reign, when that prince's avarice and breach of faith obliged the Egyptians to exchange the Roman yoke, under which it had been reduced by Augustus into a Roman province, for that of the Saracen Khalifs <sup>m</sup>, under the Khalifat of Omar, or Haumar, and the command of his successful general Amru Ebn Abaz <sup>n</sup>. From which time Egypt continued in subjection to those sovereigns, and became a province of that now largely aggrandized empire, and under special governors appointed by them, of whom Amru, the general above-mentioned, was the first; a subjection which, however heavy and displeasing to them at first, and whilst they were go-

<sup>1</sup> MAILLET, ubi sup. lett. ult.
Anc. Hist. vol. i. p. 12, & seq.

<sup>k</sup> See before, p. 32.

<sup>n</sup> See before, vol. i. p. 233, & seq.

<sup>1</sup> MAILLET, ubi sup. lett. 2.

<sup>m</sup> See

a verned by those vicegerents, did, in a short time, raise that kingdom nearly to as great a height of glory and splendor, as it had been under the Ptolemies, especially after that famed schism which broke out between the Khalifs of Baghdad, in the year of the Hejra 296, and of the Christian æra 908, under Abu Mohammed Obeida'llah, the famed founder of the Fatemite dynasty in Africa, who set up a new Khalifat at Kairwan, and took the title of Mohdi, or Al Mohdi, or director of the faithful, which, till that time, was peculiar to the Abasside Khalifs, as we have seen in a former volume °; which dynasty continued in his family during the space of 272 lunar years, either at Kayrwan, or in Egypt, where his successors removed their residence, under a succession of fourteen princes, or Khalifs, in the order following.

b 1. ABU MOHAMMED OBEIDA'LLAH, or Mohdi. 2. Al Kayem. 3. Al Mansur. 4. Moez The Fatemite Ledin'illah. 5. Aziz, or Al Aziz. 6. Al Hakem. 7. Dbaber. 8. Mostanser. 9. Mos- dynasty by tali. 10. Amer, or Hamer. 11. Haffedh. 12. Dbaffer. 13. Faez, or Al Faez. 14. Had- whom founded. bed, or Adhed. All these, from the fourth, took likewise the title of Ledin'illah from him; which signifies the faith or religion of God: but none of them were acknowledged by the Abasside Khalifs, but rather branded with the title of schismatics, and nicknamed Obeides, from their founder, or Alides, from their descent. Not that they own indeed that founder of theirs to be descended from Ali the son of Fatema, Mohammed's daughter, for that they utterly declare against; but call them so in derision, for presuming to claim such a noble descent (G). Their reigns, of which we have given an account in a preceding part of this history, are full of their mutual hostilities, and irreconcilable hatred; and one of them (Khalif Al Kader) so highly resented their laying claim to it, that he published a most virulent manifesto against them, in which he scruples not to charge them with manifest falsehood and imposture. We have elsewhere given the substance of that bitter and injurious piece in a former volume, to which our readers are referred p for further satisfaction.

c WHATEVER effect the Khalifs of Baghdad might promise to themselves by these hostilities, or even by publishing them in such a grand and solemn manner, it is plain it had no other on that of Egypt than to inspire him with a greater desire of outvying them in power, grandeur, wealth, and conquests. Accordingly we have seen, in a former chapter, the progress of these new Khalifs in extending their power, not only far beyond that part of Africa where they then resided, but even as far as Sicily q, and the surprizing strength and stupendous works of the city of Mohdia, which their founder built, and called by his new name, and which we have there described, are an ample evidence, though far from being the only one, of their early power and opulence, as the reader may see by what hath been said of these three African Khalifs in the chapter above quoted r.

d NEITHER have their successes proved less ambitious or less successful in enlarging their dominions, after they became masters of Egypt, and removed their court thither. And this it was that gave them an opportunity of raising it to such a height of magnificence, as the Arabic writers thought they could never sufficiently extol s. Nothing could be more grand or sumptuous than their palaces, divan, seraglios, mosks, and other public edifices; nothing more superb, splendid, and numerous, than their ministers retinue and attendants; nothing more rich or brilliant than their dresses and appearance, and the furniture of their apartments in the city, or their tents and other equipages in the field. Whatever successes they had in the latter, whatever conquests they made either in Syria, Palestine, or other provinces, whither they led their victorious armies, were always celebrated with the utmost pomp and splendor, and yet in such a manner, and with such circumstances, as shewed at once their grateful acknowledgements to the Giver of all victory, and a due sense of the vanity of all worldly pomp and glory.

e THEIR custom was not to return to their capital without being met in a spacious plain, at some small distance from it, by all the grandees and officers in the kingdom, in the most

° Vol. i. p. 511, & seq.

p Vol. i. p. 615, & seq.

q See their following history, pass.

r Ibid.

s De his, vid. LEBTARIC, ABU'LFEDA, EBN SHONAH, AL MAKIN, & al. plur.

(G) Accordingly one of their authors (29) affirms, that Obeid Allah's right name was Saed Ben Ahmed, the son of Abdallah Al Khadab, which last was given him on account of his having his eyes deeply sunk in his head. Another says, that none but the ignorant believed Obeid Allah's being descended from Ali. On the contrary, says he, we have very good proofs that his father was a Jewish Mage, and by profession a lock-smith, in the city of Salamiab, in Syria (30); which original is further confirmed by Abu'l Vahab, Al Bafri, and Abu Becr Al Balani. Some others have likewise endeavoured to explode this descent from Ali; and the most moderate of the Abasside writers make him to be descended from Ishmael Ebn Jaafar, of the posterity of Ali, and from him call the Fatimites the Ishmaelians of Afric, to distinguish them from the rest (31).

(28) Ebn Shonah, ap, D'Herbelot, sub voc. Fatimiab.

et sub voc. Moez et Obeidallah. See also vol. i p. 564, & seq. & al. passim.

(30) Dabeb ap. eund. ibid.

(31) Id. ibid.

splendid dresses and equipages ; these being attended with a numerous retinue not only of their a relations, domestics, and dependents, but with crowds of other wealthy subjects, who came to be spectators of the noble cavalcade, and to add to the number and grandeur of it. All these took care to have the richest pavilions and tents ready, dressed up in the grandest manner, for the Khalif's reception, as well as for themselves and retinue ; and, after his arrival, commonly spent three whole days at this brilliant encampment, with all manner of rejoicings, feastings, music, fire-works, &c. before he made his entrance into his metropolis. Nothing can be imagined more grand than the march and entry of this procession into the city, through roads covered with rich carpets and other fine cloths, and strewed over with flowers and other odoriferous plants and gums, and hedged on each side with crowds of his congratulating subjects ; the streets through which he was to pass being not only covered with the b same rich carpets, but hung on both sides with the finest tapestry. The Khalif, preceded by his guards and household officers, superbly mounted and dressed, and attended on each side with about an hundred pages on foot, all likewise in their richest attire, appeared mounted on a stately horse, whose harness and accoutrements were enriched with jewels, pearls, and curious embroidery ; himself arrayed with the utmost grandeur, and his turban sparkling on the left side with some precious stones of the greatest beauty and value. The first place in the city where he alighted was the head mosk, where he and his numerous attendants went to offer up their prayers and thanks for his safe return. From thence he was attended with the same pomp and ceremony to another no less sumptuous mosk, where were deposited the bodies of his an- c c e s t o r s , which Moez Ledin'illah, the first of the Fatemite race who subdued Egypt, had caused to be brought thither from Kayrwan, and where he himself and his successors lay also interred. A proper memento this to him, in the height of his successes, or in the midst of pomp, and of what it must all shortly end in. From thence he was conducted to his palace, and filled it and the whole city with festivity and joy *. From this scantling of their outward grandeur, one may see that they did not, like the Persian and other eastern monarchs, affect to be invisible to their subjects, but were rather delighted with every fit opportunity of shewing themselves to them in all their royal grandeur.

Grand apartments in the palace.

THE same splendor and magnificence ran through all the edifices and apartments of the castle, as well as their furniture, and the number and splendid appearance of officers and attendants ; but more especially the Dowan, where the grand council sat ; the halls of justice, d where they often presided, and those in which they received ambassadors, were all built in a grand and august taste. They were spacious and lofty, divided somewhat like our cathedrals into three or four ailes, adorned with stately cupolas, and supported by pillars of the richest marble and most beautiful workmanship. At the farther end of the middle aile, facing the grand entrance into the hall, was the Khalif's seat, embellished with very costly materials, and curious work : on each side stood his prime ministers, more or less near his person, ac- c c o r d i n g to their rank and dignity, and in the most decent and humble posture, folding their arms across their breasts. But when they held a council, or court of justice, they were allowed to sit on cushions. The same order was observed by those nobles and officers who were seated in the other ailes ; all of whom composed a numerous as well as brilliant assembly of e several hundreds of the grantees of the kingdom, besides a much greater number of other officers civil and military. The same solemn order was observed in the grand hall of justice, where the Khalif often assisted ; and next to him sat the lord chief justice, nearest to his per- son.

Manner of standing in the presence.

Requests of the subjects how presented.

The subjects, who appeared there for justice, were admitted into the middle aile, near the bottom of which was ranged a balustrade, which kept them from going farther. Here the petitioners presented their requests, which were conveyed by proper officers to the lord chief justice, who read them aloud to the Khalif, explained the nature of them to him, and answered to all the questions he asked ; after which they proceeded to give judgment, in dernier resort, this being the supreme court, from which there could be no appeal, but to which the inferior ones, both civil and military, might be appealed from : and here the appealing and plain- f tive subjects had another opportunity of seeing their sovereign, in the majestic pomp and grandeur of his court *.

Great profusion at their tables, by which many poor families are fed.

THEIR opulence was no less conspicuous in their tables, not indeed so much in the costli- ness of their meats, or the studied extravagance and luxury of their dishes, as in the vast variety and profusion of them, and the great number of persons who were daily and regu- larly fed by them, amounting to several thousands of different ranks and qualities, from whom the relics were afterwards distributed among a great number of poor families, and fed a still greater number of mouths. They were no less liberal and extensive in their other cha- rities, particularly in founding and endowing of mosks, monasteries, and hospitals ; but these we need the less dwell upon, having had so frequent occasion to take notice of them through g

* De his, vid. sup. vol. i. p. 564, & seq.

u Vid. auct. sup. citat.

- a the whole Mohammedan history; this kind of religious liberality being one of the principal virtues in which all the princes and great ones of that religion have strove to excel. Having thus far prefaced the history and reigns of the Fatemite Khalifs, with a display of their wealth, power, and magnificence, and given, in a former chapter, an account of the reigns and conquests of the three first princes of that dynasty in Africa propria, we shall now proceed to the history of the remaining eleven, who reigned in Egypt, from the first conquest of it by Moez Ledin'illab, to the abolition of that dynasty by the Mamlukes.

- ABU TEMIM MAHUD, the son of Mohammed Al Mansur, and surnamed Moez Ledin'illab, the fourth African, and first Egyptian Khalif of the Fatemite dynasty, began his reign in the former, in the year of the Hejra 341, and of Christ 953, and resided, like his three predecessors, in the cities of Kayrwan and Mobedia successively, till the year 358; at which time he sent his head general Jaawar, alias Giauhar, a Greek renegado *, but who, for his extraordinary valour, had been raised by his father from the condition of a slave to some of the highest posts, and made chief commander of all his forces, upon his long intended invasion and conquest of Egypt (H), at the head of a powerful army. Jaawar, with such a force, met with little or no difficulty in reducing a kingdom at that time so little prepared against it; and having penetrated as far as its capital, then called Fusthad, and anciently Mezr, and Babylon, and made himself master of it, presently after laid the foundations of a new city, to be for the future the residence of the Khalif his master and his successors, and from that time had the name of Al Kabirab given to it, but is better known to the Europeans by that of Kayro, or Grand Cairo, as hath been hinted a little higher †; so that the conquest of the kingdom, and the building of that city, were completed, according to the best Arabian chronologers, in less than four years from Jaawar's first setting out upon that expedition, and in less than two, according to others; of which difference we have taken notice in a former volume ‡, that the first, all things considered, seems to us by far the most probable of the two.

- HOWEVER that be, we learn from the former §, that Khalif Moez was no sooner informed of the success of his general, than he prepared himself, with all expedition, to go and take possession of his new conquest. Accordingly we are told, by the authors last quoted, that he ordered all the immense quantity of gold which he and his predecessors had amassed to be cast into ingots, of the shape and bigness of mill-stones (such, we may suppose, as were made use of in their hand-mills for grinding corn), and to be conveyed thither upon camels backs: to shew, moreover, that he was fully resolved to abandon his dominions in Barbary, and to make this new kingdom the seat of his and his successors residence, he caused likewise the remains of his three ancestors to be removed from the former to the latter, and to be deposited in a stately mosk, erected for that purpose in his new capital of Kayro. A most effectual motive this to induce them to do the same, as it was become an established custom and duty among those princes to pay their respectful visits to those sepulchres, not only on certain stated times among the Mohammedans by their Koran, but by his example on other public occasions, as that lately mentioned on their return from a successful expedition, and such-like.

- e THE next step of consequence which he took to confirm himself in his new Khalifat, was to suppress the usual prayers made in the mosks for the Abasside Khalifs, and to substitute his own name in their stead; which, according to some Arabic writers, was complied with not only in Egypt, but in Syria and Arabia, and even in the city of Medina, that of Mecca being the only one which refused to acknowledge him †. But this was not till two years, as we are

* De hoc, vid. sup. vol. i. p. 564, & seq.

† See before, p. 13, & seq.

‡ Vol. i. p. 566 (H).

§ ABU'LFED. chron. ad ann. ABU'L FARAJ. dynast. p. 314, & seq. AL MAKIN, lib. iii. c. 4. & al. EBN SHONAH ap. D'Herbelot, p. 595. See also before, vol. i. p. 564, & pass.

(H) Of the occasion of this important invasion, we meet with a long and strange account in a French author often quoted in this chapter (32), which he hath, we suppose, taken out of some Arabic romance, and spun into an amorous novel, interwoven with various and diverting episodes; so that the conquest of Egypt was owing chiefly to a violent passion which the Khalif had conceived for the then reigning queen of Egypt, who was a paragon of beauty, and other outward female excellencies, but which had unhappily kindled such an unnatural vice in her, as had rendered her odious to all her subjects. Those readers who are delighted with such romantic embellishments, may have recourse to him. Had love been the motive of that conquest, it is hardly to be supposed that the Arabic authors quoted above would have omitted making some mention of it, especially as the possession of so extraordinary a princess would, in the account even of those Arabic historians, add no small glory to the conqueror of Egypt. But it plainly appears from the whole tenor of their relation, and the behaviour of the Khalif, that the fertile and opulent kingdom of Egypt was the sole object of his wishes; which he had no sooner obtained, than he abandoned his dominions in Barbary, to make this new kingdom the seat of his and his successors residence (33).

(32) See his conquest of Egypt, in his 5th lett. of his description of Egypt, vol. i. p. 195—233. Hague edit. 12mo. 1750.

(33) Abu'lfed. et al. sup. citat. vid. & D'Herbelot Biblioth. orient. sub voc. Moez.

told,

told, after the reduction of Egypt by his general, when he began to assume the title of Fatimite Khalif, and successor of the family of Ali, in opposition to those of Baghdad, the descendants of Abbas, of whom we have formerly spoken, and ordered the following words to be added to the public prayer he enjoined to be made for him, Long live Ali, all whose actions were truly laudable; which words he caused to be inserted in the Collect, if we may so style it, for the Khalif, beginning with the words which preface every chapter of the Koran, and with which every Moslem begins his prayers, and almost every thing he doth, In the name of God, merciful, &c. From this time the schism between these Khalifs and those of Baghdad began to be publicly known and avowed, and wars and mutual anathemas pronounced against each other, as long as it lasted; that is, from the year of the Hejra 362 to 567, as we have shewn in a former volume <sup>a</sup>.

ALL this while Moez was strengthening himself in his new Khalifat, without much regarding the excommunications and other public censures against him and his adherents, which were fulminated from the pontif of Baghdad; nor much less the libels which were published against his pretended lineal descent from the family of Ali (1), but was taken up chiefly with his own secular affairs, especially the hastening the finishing of his new city of Kayro, which his general and wazir had begun under the horoscope of the planet Mars, called by the Arabs Kaber, or Kaer, from whom it had the name of Kaberab, vulgarly Cairo, given to it. He was no less profuse in adorning it with stately mosks, palaces, and other public buildings and embellishments. He died in the 45th year of his age, and 21st of his Khalifat, of which he spent eighteen in his capital of Kayrwan, and the last three in Egypt, and ordered his body to be interred in the magnificent mosk at Al Kayro, which he had erected, and in which he had deposited the remains of his predecessors, in the year of the Hejra 365. He is reported to have been a prince of singular justice and moderation, by all the African historians, and hath been highly celebrated by the famed Hani, a poet of Arabic extraction, but born in Spain, and who had accompanied him in all his expeditions, and highly extolled his virtues and exploits in several of his poems; but, upon some discontent or ill treatment, unfaid all he had said in praise of him, in a bitter satire which he afterwards wrote against him <sup>c</sup>.

Death and character.

Aziz Billah, 2d Khalif of Egypt, a favourer of the Christians.

Ill success in Syria. Year of the Hejra 381.

Strips and imprisons his Vazir.

Forced to release him.

Jawhar dies in disgrace.

MOEZ was succeeded by his son Abu Al Mansur Barar, surnamed Aziz Billah, who, being but twenty-one years of age at his entering into the Khalifat, committed the whole conduct of the government to the noble Jawhar, or Jaasar, his father's long-experienced general and prime minister, and caused him to be proclaimed, not only through his African dominions, but even in those of the Khalif of Baghdad. Aziz proved a prince of great humanity and generosity, and his government so mild and easy, that he was universally beloved by all his subjects. He married a Christian, by whom he had one daughter, in whose favour he created two of her uncles, named Jeremiab and Arsenius, her mother's brethren, the former patriarch of Jerusalem, and the other of Alexandria, both of them Melchites and orthodox <sup>f</sup>. He was not, however, so successful in his war against Al Aftekin, Emir of Damascus, against whom he sent his chief general Jawhar, at the head of an army, to drive him out; but, after a close siege of two months, was obliged to make that shameful and disgraceful retreat, of which we have spoken in a former volume <sup>e</sup>. Nor in his next expedition into Syria, and his siege of Aleppo, under his new general Mansabekin; which he was forced to raise at the approach of the Greeks, who were sent to its relief, in order to give them battle; and, having gained a complete victory over them, attempted the place with the same ill success, and thought fit, at length, to abandon it, without the Khalif's leave. The reader may see a fuller account of that expedition in the volume above quoted <sup>b</sup>.

NEITHER came he off more honourably in his attempt to punish his new vazir, Yakub Ebn Yusef, and his brothers, for their avarice and cruel extortions, by which they had amassed an immense wealth amongst them. He caused them, indeed, to be all seized, and each of them to be separately imprisoned, and their ill-gotten riches to be confiscated to his treasury; but this severity excited such an universal tumult through the whole city of Mesr, and so much outrage and plundering to be committed, that he was obliged to release them out of their confinement, and refund all the wealth, to prevent a general insurrection in their favour. In this year died the once successful and highly esteemed general Jawhar, to whom the Fa-

<sup>a</sup> Vol. i. p. 566 (H).

p. 578, & seq.

<sup>c</sup> D'HERBELOT, ubi sup.

<sup>b</sup> Vol. i. p. 594, & seq.

<sup>f</sup> See before, vol. i. p. 579.

<sup>e</sup> Vol. i.

(1) We are even told, that as he was one day reviewing his forces, he was boldly asked by some private man, what kindred and family he was of? To which he readily and unconcernedly answered, pointing to his troops, and to the sword which he held in his hand, Those are my family, and this my kindred (34).

(34) Rab. Allakiar, ap. D'Herbelot, p. 595, & seq.

a temites owe the swift and noble conquest of Egypt; but since then stripped of the honours and riches he had so gloriously acquired, on account of his ill success, and shameful disgrace, in Syria, lately mentioned <sup>i</sup>.

AL AZIZ, notwithstanding all the ill success he had met with in Syria, was still meditating Khalif's a fresh expedition thither against the Greeks, who were possessed of the most considerable death, 996. places, when he was suddenly snatched away by death, as some authors say, in Bath al Belbis, or Belbais, others say, by a complication of diseases, in the 386th year of the Hejra, being then forty-two years eight months and fourteen days old, and having reigned twenty-one years five months and seventeen days <sup>k</sup>. We have already observed, that he is represented, by the Charaïr. generality of the Moslem writers, as a prince of a most excellent disposition, singular justice, b lenity, and affection to his people: notwithstanding which he hath been severely lampooned during his life, for his too highly favouring the Christians and Jews, and suffering them to insult over and oppress his faithful Moslem subjects. He had actually one of the former, named Isa, for his secretary, and one of the latter for his treasurer, whose name was Manasseh; who, they complained, upheld them in their insolence; both whom he discarded, and stripped of all their wealth, on that account. And this very thing might be the motive which induced him to treat some other satirists, who had wrote against his Vazir, and other ministers, with such generous lenity as he did; of which, and some other particulars relating to his character, we have elsewhere given an account <sup>l</sup>.

He was succeeded by his son Abu Al Mansur, since surnamed Al Hakem, but under the Al Hakem guardianship of one of his white eunuchs, named Arjuan Al Arghevan, a minister of great Beamr'illah, experience and approved integrity; to whom Aziz committed that important trust before his 3d Khalif of death, his son being then no more than eleven years old. We find nothing remarkable concerning the former part of his reign, till the year of the Hejra 396, or, according to others, 397, and in the 11th of his reign, when a strange insurrection was made in his dominions, A dreadful re- under the conduct of an obscure water-carrier of the city of Mesr, though descended, or volt raised pretending to be descended, from Hesham Abd'al Malek, of the house of Ommiyah <sup>m</sup>. against him.

He was chiefly known by the nick-name of Abu Rawak, or rather Butler, from his carrying his water about in bottles.

He began this dangerous enterprize, as all upstarts of that stamp usually do, by preaching d and crying aloud for a reformation of life and manners, both in the streets and highways, among the zealous Moslems; and, by a more than ordinary shew of sanctity, captivated such vast multitudes of them by degrees, that he saw himself, at length, at the head of a considerable army; by whose assistance he made himself master of all the Upper Egypt, whence, having defeated the troops that were sent against him, he led his own to the kingdom of Barka, which he as quickly reduced. Al Hakem had till now seemed to despise these forces, Rebels de- and their contemptible leader; but at last, alarmed at their prodigious success, thought it high feated. time to gather up his best troops from all parts of his dominions, even from Syria, to send against him; who attacked them with such bravery and speed, that they were all either cut in pieces, or put to flight, and their leader, who had by this time assumed the title of Al Nayer e Beamri'llah, taken and brought prisoner to Mesr; and, after having disturbed the state several months, was put to death by the Khalif's order, and, as some write, was beheaded in his very presence (K). Upon which his revolted followers were quickly dispersed, and an end put to the insurrection, after several bloody battles fought on both sides <sup>n</sup>.

THE next considerable event, during that Khalifat, was the virulent manifesto issued out at Baghdad against the Egyptian Khalifs, and exposing their false pretensions to the Fatemite line. A severe ma- We have already given a full account of this extraordinary piece, and the probable occasion nifesto against which gave birth to it, in a former volume <sup>o</sup>, and shall only observe here, that that politic the Egyptian pontif had got it subscribed by a good number of the real descendants of the house of Ali, as Khalif's well as by a much greater of Kadis, and other eminent men in the law, in order to give the 1015. greater sanction to the contents of that declaration, and to explode more effectually the pretensions of the Egyptian Khalifs to the Fatemite lineage. Hakem was horribly piqued at this f

<sup>i</sup> AL MAKIN, ABU'LFED. & al. sup. citat. vid. & sup. vol. i. p. 595.
vol. i. p. 600, & seq. <sup>l</sup> Ibid. p. 600, & seq.

<sup>k</sup> AL MAKIN, ABU'LFED. ubi sup.

<sup>m</sup> De hac, vid. sup. vol. i. p. 5, & vol. i. p. 258. 610,
<sup>n</sup> Vol. i. p. 615, & seq.

(K) According to D'Herbelot, and his authors, the Khalif ordered him to be tied, hands and feet, on a camel's back, and to be led through the streets of Mesr, with an ape fastened to his back, which kept thumping him on the back of the head with a hard stone till he died (35); but Al Makin and Abulfeda only say, that he was beheaded in the Khalif's presence, and his head exposed to public view in all the streets of the capital; after which, both that and the rest of his body were publicly hung on a gibbet reared for that purpose (36).

(35) Biblioth. Orient. p. 411.

(36) Ubi sup. vid. & vol. i. p. 610.

manifesto, which had been artfully spread through his Syrian and Egyptian dominions, as well as those of the Khalifat of Baghdad; but, as he knew he could not explode the greater part of its contents, he satisfied himself with issuing one of his own, full of invectives and bitter anathemas against the whole race of the Abbaside Khalifs. Not long after which, he had the mortification to hear, that his favourite Kayed Abu Shajah, whom he had raised to the government of Aleppo, renounced his dependance and subjection to him, and set up for Emir of that metropolis.

Al Hakem
runs mad, and fancies himself
God.

AL HAKEM, by what accident we are not told, did at length run quite mad, and issued out the most preposterous edicts; one, in particular, enjoining all the shops and houses in Al Kayro to be kept open and lighted, forbidding the women to stir abroad on any pretence, and the hosiery and shoemakers to make neither shoes nor hose for their use. He ordered also, that whatever other necessaries were brought for their use, should be reached in to them at the door half-opened, and at the end of a fork, pallet, or slice; and the women to receive it from behind the door, unseen, and with their hands covered with their long sleeves. His madness grew to such a height, as to fancy himself a god; and, insisting upon being addressed as such, ordered a long catalogue to be written of above 16,000 persons, who complied with his folly.

The Dararian
sect acknow-
lege him such.

THESE were mostly the Dararians, a new sect sprung up about this time, and were so called from their chief, one Mohammed Ebn Ishmael, surnamed Darari, who is supposed to have inspired the mad Khalif with that impious conceit; and who, setting up for a second Moses, taught his followers, and openly affirmed Hakem to be the great Creator of the universe: for which blasphemous impiety a zealous Turk made no scruple to stab him in the Khalif's chariot. His death was followed by the plundering and pulling down his house at Kayro, and the massacre of many of his wicked followers, during a three days uproar in that city; all which time the gates being shut up, the poor Turk was taken, condemned, and executed, by order of the Khalif.

Pilgrimage to Mecca suppressed, 1017.

THIS abominable sect, of which we have elsewhere given a full account<sup>p</sup>, and which, our authors tell us, had propagated itself from Persia, where it had its rise, quite through Syria, Egypt, &c. as being artfully calculated to strip Mohammedism of every thing that is disgusting to corrupt nature, and to introduce all kinds of licentiousness, did not expire with its author. Darari left a disciple behind him, named Hamza, who, encouraged by the infatuated Hakem, spread it far and wide through his dominions; so that there quickly followed a total abrogation of all the Mohammedan fasts, festivals, pilgrimages, the grand one to Mecca in particular, together with the usual yearly presents of tapestry from Kayro to Mohammed's tomb; of which we have given an account in a former section<sup>q</sup>.

The Turks alarmed for their religion.

THESE, and many other the like insults and indignities, committed in this and in his Syrian dominions, to which that sect had spread its poison, justly alarmed the zealous Moslems, and made them apprehensive, that his design was to abolish Mohammedism, and introduce his own worship, with its licentious tenets, throughout his two kingdoms. They were, however, rid of all their fears soon after, by the unexpected murder of the Khalif; which had been some time hatching against him, between his own sister Setar Molcha, and the head general of his troops, who hired a man for that purpose, named Ebn Dawas, who, under pretence of the Khalif's designing to cut him off, caused him to be assassinated, with his small retinue, on Mount Al Molkatton, where he usually repaired with them every morning before day-light, to have, as he gave out, his close intercourses with God, as Moses did on that of Horeb<sup>r</sup>.

Al Hakem
assassinated, 1020.

THUS fell the impious Khalif, in the 411th year of the Hejra, the 26th of his reign, and the 37th of his age, unregretted by any, and abhorred by all his subjects, not only on account of his strange impieties, but of his frequent and mad sallies of tyranny and cruelty; of which the reader may the better judge by the instances we shall subjoin in the margin (L). Immediately

<sup>p</sup> Vol. i. p. 623, & seq.
<sup>r</sup> AL MAKIN, ABU'LFED. RENAUD. ubi sup. & vid. sup. vol. i. p. 624, & seq.

<sup>q</sup> See before, p. 28, & seq. vid. & pass. RENAUDOT Hist. Patriarch. Alexandr. p. 390—397.

(L) We have already given a large account of this Khalif's character and mad extravagancies, and shall here only recapitulate, in few words, some of the most flagrant and inhuman, by way of specimen; and among them we may reckon his ordering the city of Mesr, or Al Kayro, to be plundered and burned, and its inhabitants to be massacred by his troops, for a lampoon, full of complaints against his tyranny, and his atrocious behaviour at that most dreadful scene (37). He forced, moreover, all the Christians and Jews, by sundry cruel methods, to renounce their religion, and in a little while after permitted them to return to, and make open profession of it; but obliged all men and women, of both religions, to wear a mark of distinction upon their upper garment, to prevent their being taken for Moslems. He caused some of the churches of the former to be demolished, particularly that of Calvary, or resurrection, at Jerusalem, and to be rebuilt some small time after.

(37) See before, vol. i. p. 625.

a diately after his death, which his sister kept concealed till she had privately made away with his murderers, she took upon her the reins of government, and caused his son to be proclaimed his successor, under the title of Thaber Ledini'llah.

AL THAHER was but seven years of age, when he was proclaimed Khalif of Egypt and Al Thaher, Syria: he was before called Abu'l Hasan Ben Ali, but was then saluted by the surname of Abu 4th Khalif of Al Thabur Leezar-dini'llah; and his aunt took upon her the regency of the two kingdoms of Egypt and Syria, and, surviving her brother four years, died in the year of the Hejra 415, as we have elsewhere shewn<sup>s</sup>. Al Thaher reigned, after her decease, eleven years, but so b obscurely, that the Arabic writers have not left us any thing considerable concerning his reign, excepting what some of them say, in opposition to the rest, that he made the strictest enquiry after his father's assassins, as the most public and severe objects of his justice and resentment; whereas the others tell us, that his aunt caused them to be privately murdered before she declared openly the death of her brother<sup>t</sup>. The former give it to us as one of the most shining parts of his Khalifat, and the latter as a pregnant instance of his courage and policy. However that be, some of them add, by way of panegyric, that he was a prudent and peaceable prince, and a lover of poetry. He reigned fifteen years and some months, and died at Al Kayro, in the year of the Hejra 427, and was succeeded by his son Abu Zamim Ma'bad, an infant, under seven years of age; who in time assumed the title of Al Mostanser Bi'llah, and enjoyed the Khalifat sixty years, though not without sundry deep-laid conspiracies, which were formed against him during his long reign; but which, however, he found means either to detect or defeat, by his extraordinary address and sagacity, and was, in other points, a prince of great moderation; and, by his mild government, gained the love of his subjects. He had, however, the mortification, in the third year of his Khalifat, to see himself publicly disclaimed by Saleh Ebn Warshal, the Emir of Harran, one of his vassals, who forbade him to be prayed for through all his dominions, and ordered the name of Al Kayem, Khalif of Baghdad, to be substituted in his room<sup>u</sup>. His death, 1035. Mostanser Bi'llah, 5th Khalif of Egypt.

ANOTHER revolt happened against him in his Syrian dominions, whither he speedily sent a powerful army, under the command of Anushtekin, or Anush-Takin, who quickly reduced those parts, and added some farther conquests to his dominions there. This expedition happened in the sixth year of his Khalifat, and 433d of the Hejra. But the most shining part of his reign was his assisting the revolted Al Bassasiri against Al Kayem, the Khalif of Baghdad, both with troops and money; insomuch that he was at length obliged to apply to Togrol Bek for assistance against that successful rebel. As we have given a full account of that transaction in the history of the Khalifs, we shall refer our readers to it, to avoid repetitions<sup>x</sup>, and only observe here, as most pertinent to our history of the Egyptian Khalifat, that Mostanser carried his success in that revolt so as to cause himself to be proclaimed Khalif of Baghdad, in that grand metropolis, and to be prayed for as such in the principal mosk of it, in the 450th year of the Hejra. So that nothing less, in all probability, than the powerful interposition of the great Togrol, in favour of Al Kayem, could have prevented his making himself master of his Khalifat and dominions. How all these prospects and measures were defeated by that conqueror, the proud Bassasiri defeated and slain, and Al Kayem restored in great triumph to his capital, by the superior force of that generous prince, we have shewn in the volume above quoted<sup>y</sup>: and from this æra we may date the gradual decline of the Egyptian Khalif's glory. His disappointment, by the defeat and death of his chief instrument and assistant, was soon followed by the defection of the city of Aleppo, in favour of Mahmud Azzo'ddawla, the defeat of that powerful army which he sent to reduce it, and the total loss of that important place<sup>z</sup>, with its rich and considerable dependencies; and, what was still more deplorable, by the horrid ravages and butcheries which that tyrannic rebel committed, not only in that principality, but in all the adjacent provinces, which he put to fire and sword, not sparing age, sex, or condition, without opposition. Succes in Syria, 1041. against Al Kayem, 1054. Proclaimed at Baghdad, 1058.

<sup>s</sup> Vol. i. p. 626.

& al. <sup>u</sup> ABU'LFAR. p. 343.

<sup>t</sup> Conf. AL MAKIN, ABU'LFED. ABU'LFARAJ. & LEBTARIK EBN AMID KONDEMIR, Vol. i. p. 653, & seq.

p. 656, & seq.

<sup>y</sup> Ibid, p. 656, & seq.

<sup>z</sup> Ibid.

In like manner he revoked the manifesto which he had published against all the Khalifs which had reigned since Ali, as usurpers of the succession; but confirmed his former interdiction of pilgrimage to Mecca, the fast of Ramadan, or lent, the keeping of Friday holy, and the five prayers of the Moslems on work-days, though all enjoined by the Koran (38); and, instead of visiting Mohammed's tomb at Mecca, ordained that devotionary journey to be made to another mosk in Arabia Felix; to which he himself made one journey, according to the rites and tenets of Hamza, the successor of Darari, who now set up for chief director of that impious sect, which, amongst other monstrous licentiousnesses, allowed of marriages between fathers and children, brothers and sisters, &c. and forbade all the fasts, festivals, and pilgrimages, enjoined by Mohammed (39).

(38) Ibid, vol. i. p. 48. 181, & alib. pass. ubi sup. & al.

(39) Vol. i. p. 623. D'Herbelot, Al Makin, Abu'lfar. Renaud.

A grievous famine, 1066.

Direct effects of it.

Extreme misery of the people.

The Khalif's singular generosity to them.

A grievous pestilence.

Invaded by the Turks.

1067, 1068.
New revolts in Syria.

The Khalif's poetic taste.

THESE dreadful disasters were followed by a most terrible famine, which raged with such a fury, not only in Syria, but over all Egypt, in the year 459 of the Hejra, that cats and dogs were sold at the rate of four or five Egyptian dinars, and every kind of provision in proportion. Myriads of inhabitants died in Al Kayro for want of food; insomuch that the very Vazir's domestics were so reduced by it, that he had but one servant left who was able to attend him to the Khalif's palace, and to whom he gave the care of his horse, at his alighting at the gate; but, at his return, found him, to his great surprize, carried off, killed, and eat, by three poor almost-famished men. He went back, and complained of it to Mostanser, who ordered them to be apprehended, and hanged on gibbets erected for that purpose; and, to his much greater astonishment, was told, on the very next morning, that a fresh famished troop in that neighbourhood had torn the flesh off their carcases, and left nothing hanging but the bare bones. And to such a degree of misery were the people reduced by that time, that, not only in his capital, but in many other cities and towns of Egypt, the carcases of those that died, either through want, or any other distemper, were boiled, and the small remains of flesh publicly sold, at a vast price.

ALL this while the Khalif had shewed the most exemplary instances of charity and generosity towards his subjects; but finding all too little to supply the wants of such vast multitudes, thought it incumbent upon him to enlarge his beneficence; which he did to such a degree, that of above 10,000 horses, camels, and mules, which he had in his stables, he had not above three horses left when that calamity was happily removed. He had, moreover, not only parted with all the money, jewels, and other things of value, with which his predecessors had enriched the royal treasury, but had likewise parted with all the costly furniture of his palaces and seraglios, as well as an immense wealth which Bassasiri had brought away from those of the Khalifs of Baghdad, at his taking and plundering of that capital; of which the reader may see a more diffuse detail in a former volume<sup>a</sup>, together with that of sundry other dreadful disorders committed by the Khalif's troops during that calamity, which need not be here repeated.

A most grievous pestilence, that immediately followed the famine, which is commonly the natural consequence of it, occasioned by the great variety of unwholesome food, which, greedily devoured by the famished multitudes, helped to complete the misery of this unhappy kingdom (M), not only by the myriads of its remaining inhabitants, which it carried off, but by the encouragement that its calamitous and desolate condition gave the lately-revolted Abu Ali Al Hasan Nasreddowla, to invade it at the head of his numerous Turks and Curds<sup>b</sup>, the very next year. He began with besieging the Khalif in his own palace; who, being then in no condition to oppose his progress, was constrained to buy himself off, at the expence of all the valuables that were left in his exhausted treasury and capital; yet did not that hinder the merciless plunderers from ravaging all the Lower Egypt, from Al Kayro quite down to Alexandria, and committing the most horrid cruelties through all that long tract, quite to the desert of Al Kolzon; in which they were sure to meet all the way with fresh reinforcements from amongst the poor ruined inhabitants, whose desperate condition made them readily join themselves to them<sup>c</sup>. In the two subsequent years there happened two very considerable revolts in his Syrian dominions, the first at Damascus, and the second at Aleppo, in which the revolted Emir of it ordered the Fatemite Khalifs to be suppressed through his dominions, and those of Baghdad to be substituted in their stead<sup>d</sup>.

TOWARDS the latter end of his life Mostanser committed the care and government of Egypt to his favourite minister, named Bedr Al Gemmal, an Armenian, who was his Vazir-general and fac-totum, whilst the Khalif had little more left than a nominal power; and, as he had a good taste for poetry, he seems to have employed his time in reading and composing some

<sup>a</sup> Vol. i. p. 661. & seq. & al.

<sup>b</sup> De his, vid. sup. vol. i. p. 661, & seq.

<sup>c</sup> AL MAKIN, ubi sup. p. 376, & seq.

<sup>d</sup> Vol. i. p. 661, & seq.

(M) It will not be amiss here to remind our readers, that Al Mostanser was the Khalif who, we formerly took notice, is said, by Al Makin, to have sent an embassy to the Abissinian emperor, to intreat him, in the humblest terms, and by magnificent presents, to restore the river Nile to its ancient course and chanel, the obstruction of which had almost ruined his country (1). This passage hath been censured, as well as its authority, by some learned moderns, though without any foundation, as the reader may see by what we have said there.

It is, therefore, more likely that the grievous famine above described was caused by some accidental suppression of that river's usual overflow; but which that Khalif and his counsellors supposed to be designedly done by the Ethiopian monarch. However, the Egyptian writers tell us, that that calamity had been preceded the year before, not only by the appearance of some strange comets, but other portentous phenomena in the air, which had spread an universal terror through these and his Syrian dominions, which, as we have already shewn, are in the main fictitious, and are not mentioned by any authentic Arabian historian (2).

(1) See before, vol. i. p. 679, & seq. note (N).

(2) Ibid. p. 661, & ant. ibi citat.

- a performances of that kind; one of which Ebn Ahmed hath preserved to us; namely, a letter to his Vazir, on the topic of some revolted subjects, the expediency of whose punishment and execution that minister had been urging to him, but whom he rather judged the proper objects of his clemency and pardon. He died in the 60th year of his reign, and of the Hejra 487; and was succeeded by his son Abul Kasem, whom he had, at the request of his Vazir, nominated to the succession a little before his death<sup>c</sup>; and who, at his installation, took the surname of Al Mosta'li. He was Al Mostanfer's youngest son; but was raised to the Khalifat by the intrigues of the old Vazir, or, as others will have it, of the new one, surnamed Afdal, who had conceived a prejudice against the eldest, named Nezar, on account of some slight affront; of which we have given a detail in the volume last quoted<sup>f</sup>: the consequence whereof was, that Mosta'li having, by the interest of the prime minister, been proclaimed, and acknowledged by all the grandees of the court and army, and by all the learned lawyers and judges, as lawful successor to the deceased, who were all his creatures, and had been advanced by him to their respective posts for that very end, Nezar, his eldest brother, fled, as soon as he could, to Alexandria, with all his friends, and there maintained his title against him. The Vazir, however, did not suffer him to contest it with him, but marched speedily thither at the head of a powerful army; and, having laid close siege to the place, soon obliged him to surrender it, and himself prisoner. It was at first expected, from the nature of his crime, and the grudge which he bore to that prince, that he would have sent him in irons to his brother, and have got him to be put to death; yet, whatever might be his motive for it, he freely gave him his life, and procured his pardon from the Khalif, in hopes that it might prove a means to reduce him, by kindness, to acknowledge his title and authority, as all his other brethren had done by that time. Instead of which, this clemency proved only a short reprieve, or rather the fore-runner of a much severer punishment; for Nezar was not long before he betrayed the same ambitious inclination to revolt; upon which he was clapped in irons, and condemned to be starved to death in a dungeon, or, as others stile it, between four walls, just wide enough to contain him<sup>g</sup>.
- THE most remarkable transaction of this Khalif's reign was the re-taking the city of Jerusalem from the Franks, or Crusaders, in the year of the Hejra 492, and the immense plunder which Afdal, his general, brought from thence; but of this we have given an account formerly<sup>h</sup>, and shall enlarge no longer upon it, nor upon several other less considerable events, which lie interspersed in the volume last quoted, and chiefly relate to his Syrian dominions.

- He died in the eighth year of his reign, or, to speak more properly, he reigned seven years and two months. His death happened in the 495th year of the Hejra, and of the Christian æra, 1101, his son and successor, named Abu Ali Al Mansur, being then but five years of age; who was, nevertheless, proclaimed and inaugurated immediately after his father's death, though too young to sit on that occasion. This probably encouraged his uncle, Abu Mansur Berar, to attempt to dethrone him; to which end he hastened to Alexandria, which was then commanded by a bought slave of the prime Vazir Afdal, named Aftekin, who, upon some specious promises, suffered him to be proclaimed Khalif in that city.
- c Al Afdal, who governed the kingdom during the young Khalif's minority (who had taken the surname of Amer Beahcami'llah), was no sooner apprised of that revolt, than he hastened to besiege the two traitors in the castle of that place, and quickly obliged them to surrender both it and themselves into his hands. How he disposed of them afterwards we are not told; but Al Afdal returned victorious to Al Kayro, and continued to act under the young prince as his Vazir, and with such moderation and patience, that he gained the affections and esteem of all the Egyptians; whilst the Khalif his master enjoyed, through his means, a quiet and happy reign of thirty years; but justly censured, by most historians of his time, for his cruelty, craftiness, pride, debauchery, excessive love of gaming, and more especially for his ingratitude to his prime minister the noble Afdal, and for his being, like his father and predecessor, too great a favourer of the Shiites, a sect amongst the Moslems; of which, and of their tenets, we have given an account in a former part<sup>i</sup>: though, in other respects, he is represented as a prince of no inconsiderable parts and learning, and master of an elegant stile. He was, at length, murdered by a set of Batanists, or mercenary and resolute assassins, formerly described<sup>k</sup>, and hired, as is justly supposed, for that end, by the malecontent grandees of his court or army, as he was returning from one of his usual walks. Thus fell that unhappy prince, unpitied and unregretted (the seventh Khalif of Egypt of the Fatemite race, and the tenth of the African Khalifs, who had revolted from the Abbasides of Baghdad), in the 35th year of his age, and 30th of his reign, and of the Hejra 524. He had no male issue, but was

<sup>c</sup> AL MAKIN, ABU'LFED, ABU'LFARAJ. EBN AHMED, & al. sup. citat. vol. i. p. 678, & seq. p. 678, & seq. <sup>e</sup> AL MAKIN, ABU'LFED. & al. sup. citat. p. 277, & seq. <sup>k</sup> Before, vol. i. p. 698.

<sup>f</sup> Ubi sup. <sup>i</sup> Vol. i.

<sup>h</sup> See vol. i. p. 683, & ii. 177.

<sup>g</sup> Affassinations, 1126.

succeeded by his first cousin Abu'l Maimun Abd'al Majid, and grandson to Al Mostanser; <sup>a</sup> who, with the Khalifat, assumed the surname of Hafedh Bedini'llah; but was neither inaugurated, nor acknowledged by the Egyptian states, till they were assured whether the deceased's widow, who was left pregnant, would be delivered of a male or female; being determined, if it proved the former, to declare him the lawful successor to the throne, and to proscribe his uncle, in case he refused to acknowledge; but, in case he complied with their determination, he was to be appointed regent of the kingdom during his minority. Happily for him, the widow was brought to bed of a daughter; upon which he was proclaimed and acknowledged Khalif at Al Kayro, though not without some strenuous opposition from Abu Hamed, the then Vazir, and one of the late Afdal's sons; who had been privately making all the interest he could amongst his father's creatures to be himself raised to that dignity, as he was then the <sup>b</sup> chief commander of all the Egyptian forces<sup>1</sup>

Hafedh, 8th Khalif of Egypt,

obliged to depose his Vazir.

HAFEDH was no sooner seated on the throne, than he deposed him, and raised the noble Barham to that dignity; a person of great wisdom and merit, of noble extraction, and highly esteemed for his virtues; but was quickly after obliged to remove him, and to substitute in his room, an ambitious fellow, named Redwan Ebn Wabakshi, or Ebn Walabakshi, upon the following occasion. Barham's administration was, in all respects, unexceptionable, excepting only that he favoured the Christians more, perhaps, than became a Moslem Khalif's prime minister, and this was thought a sufficient pretext for the ambitious Redwan to attempt to get him deposed, and himself chosen in his place, by main force, if other means failed. In pursuance of which treacherous project, he easily stirred up some of the rigid Mohammedans to <sup>c</sup> raise up loud complaints against his ill treatment of them, and the contempt he shewed to them upon all occasions, whilst he promoted none but Armenian Christians into some of the most considerable places in the Dowan, or Diwan, and army, and other posts of state; insomuch that, as they pretended, many Moslems were induced by it to turn Christians to get into them. The discontent grew to such a height, as to cause a tumult in that metropolis, where a great body of them came armed with lances, which had copies of the Koran affixed to the very gates of the palace.

Bahram retires into Egypt.

HERE Babram, who had the whole army at his command, might easily have crushed the revolt at once; but fearful lest the shedding of so much Mohammedan blood, in that capital, should increase the discontent, chose rather to remove the scene of war farther off, and <sup>d</sup> retire with his choicest Armenian troops into Upper Egypt, or Alsaid, where his brother Yasal was at that time governor of the city and province of Kuz, and leave his rival to pursue his ambitious views, since he found himself incapable of opposing him any longer. But here the traitor had been before-hand with him, and by his artful stratagems had so far incensed the Mohammedans of that canton, that they had cut his brother in pieces, and, after many indignities done to his body, had buried it in a dunghill, and shut the gates against him; upon which the rest of Yasal's troops dispersed themselves. Babram, finding his affairs become in some measure desperate, retreated into a monastery, and soon after took the monkish habit; whilst Redwan, who by that time had forced himself into the Vazirat, was marching <sup>e</sup> towards him, at the head of his army, with all speed, and soon after took him prisoner; but, upon his finding him entered into the monastic life, released and spared him<sup>2</sup>.

Redwan forces himself into the Vazirat.

Cruel treatment of the Christians at Mefr.

Supreme arrogance.

THIS did not, however, hinder him from wreaking his rancour upon the Christians, especially those of Al Kayro, against which he led his army, destroyed the best part of that city, and gave up the houses, churches, and monasteries, to be plundered by his troops. He treated the Armenian monastery of that city with greater inhumanity, which he ordered to be reduced into ashes; and all the monks of it, not excepting the venerable patriarch of it, to be all butchered without mercy. He extended his resentment still farther against them on his return from these expeditions, by which time he was grown too powerful to be controuled in any thing, and by his own arbitrary will excluded them from all considerable posts in the Diwan, army, and state, obliged them to wear a particular garb about them, as a mark of distinction <sup>f</sup> or reproach, and loaded both them and the Jews with exorbitant taxes; which he divided into distinct classes, for the more effectual exacting and payment of the same. He, in a word, acted with such a despotic power, that the Khalif, his master, whether out of base adulation, or ironical reflection, bestowed on him the title of Al Melek Mefr, or The King of Egypt<sup>3</sup>, a thing till then unheard of; but which he made no scruple to assume from thenceforward.

Deposed and confined to the Khalif's palace.

1141.

ALL this while, the Mohammedans triumphed under his protection, and failed not to retaliate, with interest, the pretended injuries and affronts they had suffered from the Christians, under the Vazirat of Babram; nor did he fail to countenance and support them in it. By which means they grew up to such a degree of insolence, that the Christians, unable to bear it any longer, formed, by degrees, so powerful a party against him in Egypt,

<sup>1</sup> AL MAKIN, & al. sup. citat. vid. & AL MAKRIZI & D'HERBELOT Biblioth. Orient. p. 108. sub voc. Amer, & p. 634, sub voc. Mostarshaf.

<sup>2</sup> ABU'LFAR. ABU'LFED. AL MAKIN, & al. ubi sup.

<sup>3</sup> FAR. AL MAKIN, & al. sup. citat. vid. & vol. i. p. 705.

<sup>4</sup> EBN SHOHNAH, & al. ubi sup.

- a that he was forced to fly into Syria; where, having gathered up a good strong body of Arabs and other nations, he marched back with them, and, on the first engagement the had with his opposers, got the better of them; but, being totally defeated on the next, was constrained to shelter himself from their fury, by taking sanctuary in the Khalif's palace, who readily took him into his protection. But to avoid all future resentments from that quarter, on account of those churches he ordered to be destroyed, and the bishops and monks whom he caused to be massacred, that prince thought it highly convenient to strip the tyrannical minister of all his dignities and authority, and to confine him to his own palace for safety, but without suffering him to meddle any more with the affairs of government. He, moreover, restored to the Coptic church all its ancient liberties, revenues, and privileges (B). The Coptic Christians restored to their churches, &c.
- b Not long after, Hafedh was likely to have been over-reached by the Rajashi, or Emir of Abissinia; from whom he received a grand embassy, requesting him to order the Alexandrian patriarch to send him an additional number of bishops into his dominions, under pretence that it would be a means of promoting religion, and the interest of the patriarchal see of Alexandria; but, in reality, that he might shake off his dependance on it, and chuse one of his own, without being obliged to have them any longer from Egypt, as they had been hitherto obliged to do. The Khalif, who suspected nothing of the design, was easily persuaded to grant the request, and signified his desire to Gabriel, the then patriarch, that he would comply with it; but, being better informed by him of the great injury it would prove to the Egyptian patriarchate, he absolutely refused it.<sup>p</sup>
- c In the mean time, the seditious Redwan, being quite tired with his confinement and inactivity, though treated with singular kindness by the Khalif, was contriving the means of riding himself of it; and having broke a hole in the wall of his apartment, and conveyed himself to Mesr, where he was again joined by multitudes of his blacks and other revolvers, and had begun to resume his former ravages; when, some discord or discontent arising, some of them fell upon and assassinated him, which saved Hafedh the trouble of sending fresh forces thither to suppress him. From this time, the Khalif took the reins of government into his own hands, and, as we are told, without the assistance of a Vazir.<sup>q</sup> Redwan breaks out of his confinement and flies to Mesr. Is murdered by his blacks. 1148.
- d ONE of his first cares was to repeal the several edicts which Redwan had issued out against the Christians, and to restore those who had been turned out of their places in the Diwan, army, and state; and particularly Ebn Yunez, whose merit and interest soon drew in all the rest. Yet was that prince so easily imposed upon by the calumnies and accusations which some Samaritans raised against him, that he condemned both him and his brother to death in less than a year. He was, however, no less severe to their malicious accusers, when he came to be better informed, which happened before another year was expired, whom he caused to be put to a shameful death. He also confirmed the election which the Alexandrian church had made of Michael to succeed the deceased Gabriel in that patriarchate; and of John, the son of Abulfatali, about nine months afterwards, whom they had likewise chosen; the same John, who had been poisoned by his monks, and lingered with a gradual decay full six months before he died.<sup>r</sup> 1154: & seq.
- e WE meet with nothing farther remarkable concerning this Khalif's reign, during the two last years of it, excepting that he died in the year of the Hejra 544, and of his age 77; of which he reigned twenty years and five months.<sup>s</sup> His death. 1159.
- f HE was succeeded by his son Abu Mansur Ismael; who, immediately upon his inauguration, took the surname of Al Dhafer Beamri'llah. One of the first considerable promotions he made, was that of one of his father's greatest favourites, named Nojmo'ddin Ebn Mesal, to the Vazirat; which proved so displeasing to the Emir or governor of Alexandria, named Ali Ebn Selar, that he drew, with all speed, a body of troops out of the western provinces, and marched directly at their head to Al Kayro; and, having driven Nojmo'ddin out of it, obliged the young Khalif, not then above 17 years old, to confirm him in the dignity of Vazir in his stead. Nojmo'ddin, on his side, having put himself at the head of a large body of blacks, with a design to wrest the Vazirat from him, a fight ensued; in which he was slain, and his head cut off, and carried on the point of a lance through the streets of that metropolis, leaving his rival in quiet possession of his dignity. He did one public act soon

<sup>p</sup> See vol. i. p. 107. RENAUD. Hist. Patriarch. p. 510, & seq.

<sup>q</sup> IBID. p. 560, & seq.

<sup>r</sup> RENAUD.

(B) We are farther told by some Arabic writers, that Hafedh did condescend to send a pressing invitation to his late worthy Vazir to leave his monastery of Zacheri, and return to court, and resume his former post and government; and that he so far complied with it, as to abandon that convent, and spend the remainder of his days at court, where he could be ready at hand to assist him with his counsels (which could not but be an 'acceptable thing to the Christians); but absolutely refused the Vazirat, and every other post that was offered to him. He lived accordingly in the palace, highly caressed by the court; and, at his death, was splendidly conveyed and interred by the Khalif in the metropolitan church of the Armenians (3).

(3) De his, vid. Al Makrizi, & sup. vol. i. p. 706.

The Vazir murdered by Nasr.

The Khalif's shameful love of Nasr.

Murdered by him and his father.

Abbas's cruelty to his two brothers, &c.

The ladies sue for his punishment.

The general of the army stirred up against him.

Abbas flies into Syria.

Is intercepted and slain.

after his advancement in favour of the Christians, which, in all likelihood, procured him the a surname of Al Adel, or the just; how justly the reader will see by the sequel; which was to abolish all the marks of distinction and reproach, which they were obliged to wear by a former decree against them, whilst his real view was to draw a considerable sum of money from them, by way of acknowledgement for so signal a favour: but finding neither returns nor promises, or probability of any, he was not ashamed to revive the old edict against them.
He had not enjoyed the Vazirat long, before he was deposed and murdered by Nasr, the son of Al Abbas, the then governor of Balbeis and its precinct; but who, by his son's interest with the Khalif, soon obtained the Vazirat. These seem to have been the only disturbances that happened during his short reign, excepting that the Crusaders took the city of Ascalon, in Syria, from him. Abbas Ebn Temim, or, as others call him, Abbas Al Sanhaji, who got b the Vazirat from Ali Ebn Selar, as was lately hinted, proved a monster of ingratitude, and, as is affirmed by most writers, assassinated the young Khalif, on account of some indecent familiarities which he had observed him to take with his son Nasr; which he justly feared would give an unhappy turn to the young gentleman's mind. Some of them say, that it was Nasr himself that gave him the deadly blow, in revenge of his unnatural attempt upon him. However that be, it was the common opinion, that the beautiful youth had so engrossed the Khalif's affection, that he could not bear him one moment out of his sight; the scandal of which his father took as such an indignity, that he resolved both to put a stop to it and the Khalif's life; and it is not improbable, that he persuaded his son to perpetrate the deed, or, at least, to join with him in it (C).

To effect their purpose with greater ease and secrecy, they invited the young Khalif, and two of his intimate favourites, to an entertainment at their house; where, at a proper time, they dispatched them all three and flung their bodies into a well. On the morrow, Al Abbas went, as usual, to the palace, which he found in some confusion on account of the young Khalif's being missing; and, after several pretended enquiries after him, condemned two of his brothers, and a first cousin, to be put to death, as his murderers, and others of his friends and favourites, as their accomplices. After this, he caused Al Dhafer's son, not full five years old, to be brought out of the seraglio of women, and to be proclaimed Khalif in his father's stead, under the title of Al Favez, or, according to other manuscripts, Al Kayen Benafri'llab, and obliged all the nobles and grandees to swear allegiance to him. This mock pageantry d of loyalty, however, could not prevent the young prince, now on the throne, from being struck with such horror and dread, at the sight of the bodies of his two uncles and other relations, whom the Vazir had caused to be unjustly butchered, that he became, from that moment, a poor senseless idiot; beyond all possibility of being restored to the use of his reason in any degree, notwithstanding all the various means and attempts for his recovery.

ALL this while, however, the Vazir governed with such an absolute sway, that he quickly became odious to, and suspected by, the whole court and army, of being the murderer of the late Khalif; the very ladies of the seraglio and court interesting themselves, with an uncommon zeal, to have him and his son brought to trial, and condign punishment (D).

THE clamour, at length, grew so loud and general, not only in that capital, but over the e kingdom, that the Armenian general, who had the command of all the forces, was obliged, by the universal solicitation of the grandees and officers of his army, to collect his forces towards the capital, in order to apprehend them; but, before that could be done, they had taken care to convey themselves, and all their wealth, into Syria, attended with a sufficient escorte.
We lately hinted, that the Crusaders had there taken the city of Ascalon: to these the late Khalif's sister applied, by vast presents and promises, to cause those parricides to be apprehended; who immediately dispatched some strong detachments to intercept them in their way; one of which had the good fortune to surprise them. A bloody engagement ensued, in which * Iid. ubi sup.

(C) Some add, tho' perhaps to palliate the fact, that the Khalif, to bind him the more closely to him, had endeavoured to persuade him to make away with his father, promising to raise him to the Vazirat in his room; and that, upon his acquainting him with that horrid circumstance, Abbas Al Sanhaji thought it high time to take him off, as well for his own safety, as to prevent the ruin of his son.

(D) We are told, that they even cut off locks of their own hair, and sent them hanging upon spears, in token of grief, to Talay Ebn Zarik, the head general of the army, intreating him, in the most pathetic terms, to see the death of the late Khalif revenged on his assassins (4); which shews, that he must have been either shamefully tardy in complying with the universal request, or afraid to engage two such powerful enemies, who could resist such general and repeated solicitations:

and the event proved it beyond all doubt, seeing his backwardness to act gave them time to reach as far as Syria with all their valuables; and, for aught that appears to the contrary, unpursued.

(4) See before, vol. i. p. 713.

the

a the two assassins and their guard made a most desperate defence, till the Vazir himself was slain, and his son taken prisoner: upon which their rich spoil fell into the hands of the Franks, His son made prisoner. and Nafr was conducted, under a strong guard, to Al Kayro, and delivered up to the Khalif's sister and the other ladies of the seraglio, to be punished at their discretion; that is, to be made to undergo the greatest torture that their rage and resentment could inspire. Dreadful execution.

ACCORDINGLY, we are told, that the princess caused his right hand to be crushed in the most terrible manner, whilst the other ladies tore the flesh off his bones with hot pincers, and, as some add, eat it before his face, till they had almost excarnified him. After which, they ordered him to be fixed to a high gibbet, and exposed in that condition till he was dead, and after that to be burned to ashes <sup>u</sup>.

b As soon as this execution was over, Talay, the Armenian general, above-mentioned, was raised to the Vazirat by the new Khalif Al Fayer; who made it one of his first cares to enquire after the body of the deceased Khalif; of which he easily gained a sufficient intelligence, Talay raised to the Vazir. by means of one of the late Al Abbas's servants and confederates, who directed them to the well into which it had been thrown, with those of his other two favourites. This discovery was followed by the interment of that unhappy prince; which was performed with the utmost pomp and grandeur: after which, we are told, the new Vazir assumed the surname of

Al Malek Al Seleh, that is, the King and Lord <sup>w</sup>. He did but too truly make good that title, by the exactions and other cruelties he committed under the young Khalif, and soon became odious, not only to the Christians, but much more to the Mohammedans, over whom

c he domineered, in a manner they could by no means brook from an Armenian. Although his being such did not hinder him from exercising the greatest severities against the Christians and Jews; whether it were to extort the greater sums from them, or to palliate his haughty treatment of the Moslems: for he not only revived all the old edicts against the two former, of wearing on their turbans, and upper garments, sundry marks of distinction and infamy, but caused them to be observed with greater severity, and had always his ears open to any accusation brought against them; for which, whether true or false, he seldom failed of punishing them, either by fines or corporal punishment. So that we meet with little else, during this interregnum, as it may well be stiled, seeing the young Khalif was not only a minor, but continued still bereaved of his reason to his death; which happened in the 555th year of d the Hejra, the 6th of his Khalifat, and 11th of his age. Al Sayez dies.

He was succeeded by Abd'allah, Ebn Yusuf Ebn Hafedh, who took upon him the title of

Al Aded Ledini'llah; to which he added the prenomens of Abu Mohammed <sup>x</sup>. Al Aded Ledini'llah, 10th Khalif of Egypt.

AL ADED, the 10th and last Khalif, had not sat long on the throne, before the Vazir Al

Zaley Ebn Zari was, for his many extortions and cruelties, assassinated at Al Kayro, as he was entering the Khalif's palace, by a set of ruffians, supposed to be hired by Al Aded's aunt. The Vazir assassinated. He did not, however, die upon the spot, but was conveyed, weakened by his wounds, to his own house; whence he dispatched a messenger to Al Aded, to upbraid him with being the author of his death. The Khalif, who, in all probability, was innocent of the fact, not only exculpated himself by the most solemn oaths and protestations, but ordered his aunt to be delivered up to him; who, by this time, had been discovered to be the contriver and director of his assassination, and whom, in the height of his resentment, he immediately caused to be beheaded before him. After which, he lived but just long enough to obtain the reversion of the Vazirat for his son, and expired presently upon it <sup>y</sup>. His death revenged. He is, by the Arabic writers, His character.

allowed to have been a man extremely well versed, not only in the military art, but, by some of them, to have been likewise an excellent poet, and the author of several curious performances in that kind, some of which are still extant <sup>z</sup>. But his pride, avarice, and other cruel exactions, so tarnished his good qualities, that he was universally hated, and died unpitied and un-regretted, in spite of the pompous title he had assumed, of Malek Adel, or just king <sup>a</sup>.

His son, named Zarik, or Razic, and, by Ebn Shohnah Arzik, upon his accession to the f throne, assumed in imitation of his father, and with as little right to it as he, the title of Al

Malek Al Adel, or just king; but presently after gave such an instance of his injustice and partiality, as was like to have caused great disturbance in the kingdom, but, in the end, proved only fatal to himself. An eunuch and officer of some consequence, named Shawer, who had been promoted by the late Vazir his father, having received some ill treatment from a son of his sister, named Hazan, met with no other redress than a repulse; upon which, Hazan, the more to mortify him, sent him a present of a fine new box, in which was inclosed one of those leathern scourges with which the slaves are usually punished; giving him to understand, that his persisting in his complaint would only draw greater injuries upon him. Shawer, finding he had every thing to fear from a rash and haughty youth, upheld by such a Vazir, soon

<sup>u</sup> AL MAKIN, ABU'LFED. ABU'LFAR. RENAUD. & al. sup. citat.

<sup>x</sup> AL MAKIN, ABU'LFED. ABU'LFAR, & al. sup. citat.

SHOHNAH, ubi sup.

<sup>a</sup> Ibid. Ibid.

<sup>w</sup> EBN SHOHNAH. sub an. 549.

<sup>y</sup> AL MAKIN, & al. sup. citat.

<sup>z</sup> EBN

Severe revenge.

withdrew from Al Kayro, highly dissatisfied, and retired with his friends and adherents to the a deserts of Lovakal and Alcoab, and from thence to the lake or pool of Alexandria; by which time he had gathered up such a number of forces, as to be able to bid defiance to the Vazir;
and accordingly maintained his post and station in spite of those which that minister sent against him. As he advanced farther to Belkinah, Mabalet, and other neighbouring villages, he was joined by vast numbers of Arabs and soldiers, who flocked to him from all the western parts of Egypt, and especially from the several deserts adjacent; insomuch that he quickly saw himself at the head of a powerful army of 10,000 horse, all expert plunderers. With these he marched directly into the lands and territories of the Vazir, where he committed the most dreadful ravages, without opposition; and, advancing still farther towards Al Kayro, threatened that city and court with fire and sword.

Vazir's shameful flight, 1162.

Shawer raised to the Vazirat.

Arzik robbed, and sent prisoner to Al
Kayro.

Friendly treated by the new Vazir.

His ingratitude and death.

ALL this while the alarmed Vazir had been so far from taking any proper measures for suppressing him, that he thought on nothing but of saving himself and family, and how to convey all his vast wealth safely into some place of security. The new Khalif and his court, no less alarmed at the progress and fatal success of the one, than at the cowardly flight of the other (E), were in the utmost consternation; and, to prevent any farther consequences from the discontented Shawer, had recourse to a happy expedient, which effectually pacified him, by raising him to the Vazirat in the room of the fugitive Arzik, who, by this time, was unluckily fallen into the hands of one of Shawer's flying detachments of Arabs, who stripped him of all his immense treasure, and sent him naked and in irons to the new Vazir; or, as others relate it, left him naked in a desert, where he must unavoidably have perished with hunger and cold, c had he not been timely discovered by one of the Arabian Cheyks, who ordered him to be conveyed under a strong guard to Al Kayro †.

HERE, to his great surprise, as well as confusion, he found a friendly asylum where he had least reason to expect it, even from the much injured Shawer, who received him with all the marks of generous pity and concern, and appointed him an apartment in his palace, where he ordered him to be treated in the kindest manner. Yet did not all this undeserved kindness and generosity prevent that ungrateful guest from plotting daily the blackest treason against his benefactor, and privately attempting to excite the Egyptian Emirs to some new revolt; whilst his noble host, unsuspecting of such black treason, treated him more like an intimate friend than a guilty prisoner; often invited him to his table, and scrupled not to d consult him about the most important matters of state. An attempt, at length, which that ingrate made to escape, of which Tay, the Vazir's son, was quickly apprized, gave the first rise to his jealousy; who, upon farther enquiry, unravelled such a black series of treasonable practices, that, in the height of his fury and resentment, he went directly to his apartment, unknown to his father, and struck off his head at one blow with his scymitar, and then laid open all his guilt and ingratitude to the whole court. His father expressed a singular regret at his death, and dissatisfaction at his son's perpetrating such a deed without his knowledge; but whether real or not, we will not pretend to dive into. This is the light in which most of our authors set that remarkable revolution b.

Dargan opposes the Vazir.

Defeats and drives him away.

Seizes on the Vazirat.

THE Vazir had not been long rid of that private enemy, before a fresh and open one started e up against him, who, in the end, proved a fatal one, not only to him, but to the whole kingdom, and Fatemite dynasty. This was one of the chief officers of the army, named Al Dargan, who, in order to wrest the Vazirat from him, raised an army against him; and, after a bloody engagement, in which he gave him a total defeat, and slew his son Tay, forced him to leave Al Kayro, and refuge himself in Syria, under the protection of Nuro'ddin, the Atabek Emir of Damascus; promising him the third part of the annual revenue of Egypt, if he would assist him with his whole force to recover the Vazirat from his competitor; who, by that time, had seized upon it by main force. Nuro'ddin, who was a sworn enemy to the Christians, easily listened to his proposals, and granted him all the assistance he could spare;
but Dargan was by that time become too powerful to be easily dispossessed of his dignity. f
He had, moreover, raised his two brothers to the most considerable posts under him, and † ABU'LFED. ABU'LFAR. RENAUD. & al. ubi sup.

EBN SHOHNAH, RENAUD. Hist. Patriar. p. 522, & seq.

b AL MAKIN, ABU'LFED. ABU'LFAR. AL MAKRISI, vid. & vol. i. p. 720, & seq. & auct. ibi citat.

(E) His flight, we are told, was no less private than shameful; for, having converted all his treasure and valuables into jewels, he put them into two purses or small bags, and threw them across his horse, under his saddle, and rode away with them in an ordinary disguise, and with the utmost precipitation, into the desert, without daring to trust a single person to attend him, or to make any one privy to his flight (4).

We are moreover told, that the wealth, which he thus carried off, amounted to an equivalent to the annual revenue of Egypt; of which we have elsewhere given a near estimate (5).

(4) Al Makin, Abu'lfed. Abu'lfar. Makrisi, & al. sup. citat. vid. & sup. vol. i. p. 720, & seq. (5) See before.

a given to the one the title of Al Molhem Al Adel, and to the other that of Al Nafr Mostemim, whilst he himself assumed that of Al Malek Al Afdal. Many others of his own friends and creatures he likewise promoted to high posts, to strengthen his interest; whilst to lessen, or rather ruin, that of his competitor, he had caused a very great number of brave officers in his interest, to which Ebn Shobnah adds many other considerable Egyptian Emirs, to be put to death. All which did so weaken that kingdom, and the strength of that government, that it occasioned his loss of it, as well as the decline of the Fatemite power in it, by the encouragement it gave the Christians to attempt the conquest of that opulent country.

THESE last had actually by this time, that is, by the beginning of the year 559 of the Hejra, made some considerable progress in it<sup>c</sup>; which proved a most powerful motive to Nuro'ddin to assist his refuged Vazir in good earnest, whom he had hitherto only amused with fair promises, in the recovery of the Vazirat; and accordingly furnished him with a powerful body of his troops, under the command of Asado'ddin, surnamed Shairacub<sup>d</sup>, to drive them and his competitor Dargan out of that kingdom. With this reinforcement Shawer quickly reached the Egyptian frontiers, and penetrated into that country, without opposition from any but Dargan, whom he engaged and defeated near the sepulchre of St. Nipbisa; by which he got once more into the possession of his Vazirat. He was, however, so far from performing his engagements to Nuro'ddin, and reimbursing him all the expences he had been at in this expedition, that, after sundry illusory delays, he positively refused to pay any thing towards them. A behaviour no less impolitic than ungrateful and unjust, as the sequel proved it; and which the now elated Asado'ddin so highly resented, that he immediately turned his arms against him, and seized on Sharkiah, Pelufium, and other districts, by way of reprisal. Shawer, who, on the other hand, was in no condition to obstruct his progress, whilst the Franks were all the while making new conquests in other parts of Egypt, fell upon the most effectual expedient to ruin his own affairs and that kingdom; which was by entering into a treaty with the latter, upon some conditions, by which they furnished him with a reinforcement sufficient to inclose Asado'ddin on every side; so that he must of course have been obliged to surrender, or to perish with his whole army, through famine, had not Nuro'ddin timely relieved him.

THIS prince, who had lately gained some great advantages over the Franks in Syria, as well as over the revolted Dargan and his brother, whom he had defeated and put to the sword, of which we have elsewhere spoken<sup>e</sup>, was no sooner apprised of his general's distress, and of Shawer's treachery and ingratitude, than he entered into a treaty with them; by which he obliged them to withdraw the forces they had lent him, whereby Asado'ddin gained a free egress out of that province, in which he had been kept confined near three months, and retired into Syria without opposition<sup>f</sup>.

SHAWER had still one competitor to drive from the Vazirat, who was then in possession of it; namely, Al Malek Al Adel, the son of Saleb Al Talay Ebn Zaric. This last, who had likewise seized on that dignity during these contests<sup>g</sup>, had conceived such high notions of Shawer, and placed such confidence in him, that he had intrusted him with the government of Al Said, or Upper Egypt, a post of the highest power and interest next to that of the Vazir; and had, moreover, at his death, strictly charged his son Al Malek Al Adel never to remove him from that post, as the surest means to preserve his own unmolested by him. Notwithstanding which, the rash youth, disregarding his father's counsel and injunction, was no sooner in possession of the Vazirat, than he sent him express orders to retire out of Al Said; which was, in plain terms, declaring him deposed from his government. Shawer was forced to comply, and accordingly retired, but with a full resolution to wrest the Vazirat out of his hands; and to that end assembled all the forces he had in that government, and marched directly to Al Kayro, whence he soon drove his competitor, and got possession of his dignity, immense treasure, and not long after of his person, and put him to death, as hath been more fully related in the volume above quoted; where the reader will likewise find a detail of the sad disasters which ensued his entering into that metropolis<sup>h</sup>.

By this time Shawer was so well rid of all his competitors, and become so rich and powerful by the spoil of the house of Talay Ebn Zaric, that he enjoyed the Vazirat without opposition or controul from within (F). He had, however, just cause to dread the resentment of the

<sup>b</sup> Ibid. ibid. al. sup. citat.

<sup>d</sup> De hoc, vid. vol. i. p. 721, (B).
<sup>g</sup> De his, vid. vol. i. p. 722.

<sup>e</sup> Vol. i. p. 722, & seq. & al. pass.
<sup>h</sup> P. 721, & seq. note (C).

<sup>f</sup> ABU'LFED. &

(F) All this while we read nothing of the Khalif Al Aded, who, under all the wars and contests which we have mentioned since the beginning of his reign, appears to have stood neuter, and altogether inactive; from which we may conclude, that Egyptian Vazirs were by this time become so powerful and despotic, that they had, in a great measure, stripped the Khalifs of their civil power, and left them only the shadow of a spiritual dignity, the great and powerful Nuro'ddin, who, by this time, had subdued the greatest part of Syria <sup>a</sup> and Mesopotamia, and who being, moreover, a prince endowed with all the virtues that can fall to a Mohammedan's share, could not but be highly exasperated at his ingratitude and perfidy, in refusing to perform his engagements to him, as well as for the indignity he had offered his general Afado'ddin, and joining forces with the Franks against him. Accordingly we are told, that he had dispatched him back into Egypt, at the head of a sufficient force, to oblige him to pay him the arrears of the annual revenue, and the expences of his late expedition; which he effectually did soon after: for Shawer being apprised of his approach, had taken care to prevent his committing any hostilities there, by timely complying with his demands; and so sent him back into Syria fully satisfied <sup>1</sup>.

Allies with the Franks.

Egypt invaded by Nu-ro'ddin, 1166.

Shawer is totally defeated.

Concludes a treaty with Afado'ddin, who returns to Syria.

HE had not left Egypt long, before Shawer gave Nuro'ddin fresh occasion to send him back <sup>b</sup> thither against him. That martial prince had driven the Franks out of all his Syrian conquests, and had left now but few places of any strength in that kingdom; however, that did not prevent his being extremely anxious at their progress in Egypt, and much more so when he was informed of the treaty which that Vazir had lately concluded with them, and which, as he rightly apprehended, might pave the way to their conquering that whole kingdom; as it soon after did, to the ruin of the Vazir's affairs in Egypt, and of his allies, as the sequel will soon shew. This unlucky treaty, which was made between them in the 562d year of the Hejra, seems to have been contrived by that ambitious Vazir, for no other end than to enable him to disengage himself from paying to Nuro'ddin the thirds of the yearly Egyptian revenue, which he had bound himself to pay to him, by the former contract we lately mentioned, and <sup>c</sup> was of course another motive, equally cogent, to punish his complicated treachery by a fresh invasion. Accordingly, Afado'ddin, or, as he is commonly called, Shairacub <sup>k</sup>, and, by Renaudot, Chiracoua, was speedily dispatched thither, at the head of a sufficient force (though our authors mention only, the one 1000, and the other 2000 horse, without taking notice of any foot <sup>l</sup>), accompanied by his nephew Salaba'ddin Ebn Ayub, though against his will, and entered Egypt without opposition; and soon made himself master of the canton of Al Yizza, with little or no loss; which plainly shews, that his army must have exceeded the account of these authors; and what still more demonstrates it is, that Shawer, who cannot be supposed to have been wholly unprepared at such a juncture, was immediately obliged to have recourse to the Franks for a fresh reinforcement; and, upon receipt of it, engaged the enemy with the <sup>d</sup> greatest fury and bravery, and was totally defeated with his confederates.

THIS proved a deadly blow to the Vazir and his allies, as it opened a way to the reduction of the important port of Alexandria, which he went and laid close siege to presently after; and, without great difficulty or loss, made himself master of it <sup>n</sup>. From thence he led his forces towards Upper Egypt, leaving the command of the place to his nephew Salaba'ddin, with a strong garrison; but was soon forced back again to its relief, the Franks having invested it again after his departure, and keeping Salaba'ddin closely besieged during the space of three months. The news of it made him come back with all possible diligence, in order to oblige the confederates to raise the siege; but instead of that he was prevailed upon, by what pretended motive we are not told, to accept of a treaty with them, by which he again resigned all his conquests to them, and to with- <sup>e</sup> draw his forces out of Egypt, in consideration of a stipulated sum, over and above the defraying the

<sup>1</sup> RENAUD. ubi sup. & al. sup. citat.
sub. ann. KONDEMIR, & al.

<sup>k</sup> See vol. i. p. 721 (B).

<sup>l</sup> Conf. EBN SHOHNAH & ABU'LFED.
<sup>n</sup> ABU'LFED. & al. sup. citat. EBN SHED. in vit. Salad. vid. & vol. i. p. 724.

nity, as the Omrahs had long before done those of Baghdad (6).

A pregnant instance of which we meet with in this very reign, if not in this very year, if Mr. Renaudot's chronology may be depended upon, and which was on the following occasion.

An embassy arrived at Al Kayro from the emperor of Abissinia, sent chiefly to engage the Khalif and his Vazir to oblige the Alexandrian patriarch Mark to send him a new Abuna instead of the old one, whom he deemed unworthy to continue longer in that dignity; and which that patriarch had refused to comply with. This subject occasioned a warm dispute between the Khalif and his minister; the former insisting that it was unjust to force a metropolitan to act against the canons of his church; and the Vazir alleging, that such trifling niceties ought to be overlooked, where the obliging of so great a monarch was concerned, and that the patriarch ought to be obliged to comply with his request; and gave him orders accordingly to obey. But Mark still persisted in his refusal; alleging, that it was contrary to the canons of his church to ordain a new Abuna whilst the old one was still alive; especially as he was so far from deserving to be deposed, that his merit and truly laudable zeal were the only crimes that rendered him obnoxious to the emperor (Zaga); who, being an usurper, could not brook the opposition and remonstrances of that legal prelate. The conclusion of the contest plainly shews how little authority the Khalifs then had left, even in spiritualibus; for this was of that nature, that neither his interposition, nor the motives above alleged, could screen that prelate from the Vazir's resentment; who, upon his refusal, ordered him immediately to be imprisoned in his own palace, where he made him undergo a close and cruel confinement; from which he was not freed till after that minister's death (7).

(6) See Advertisement to the Reader, vol. ii. p. 113.

(7) Renaud. ubi sup. p. 525, & seq.

<sup>a</sup> expences of the expedition : to which Shawer readily yielded ; and Shairacub evacuated the place, and returned with his rich booty into Syria ; but with his army so weakened by fatigues and sickness, that we may probably conjecture that to be the chief reason which induced him to return so soon to Damascus.

THE Syrians were no sooner retired out of Egypt, than the treacherous Vazir entered into a fresh treaty with the Franks against Nuro'ddin, which was to invade him in his own dominions, as he was at that time engaged in quelling some revolters, which would effectually prevent his sending any more forces into Egypt. This treaty, which was signed in the year of the Hejra 563, and the success of it, we have spoken of in the volume last quoted<sup>o</sup> ; and shall only add, that it so alarmed and exasperated the Syrian Emir, that it made him resolve to suspend <sup>b</sup> for a time his conquests, and to bend his whole might and strength in the reduction of that kingdom, and the punishment of its Vazir ; and accordingly, by the very next year, he sent a very powerful army thither, under the command of Fakbro'ddin Mas'ud, to lay siege to the famed castle of Ya'bar ; a fortress of such strength, that he spent a considerable time against it without making any great progress, though he had since received a large reinforcement from Syria ; so that he was at length forced to exchange it with Shahabo'ddin Malek for the city of Saraf and its dependencies, and some other places, together with a round sum of 20,000 dinars<sup>p</sup>. <sup>c</sup>

NURO'DDIN having got that important place into his hands, bent his whole force against the Franks, who had by that time reduced that of Balbeis, or Pelusium, and made a considerable progress both in that kingdom and elsewhere, through the divisions which then reigned among the Mohammedan princes<sup>q</sup> ; so that not only at Pelusium, but every other place they became masters of, they put almost all to the sword, citizens as well as soldiers, Christians as well as Mohammedans ; selling for slaves such as they made prisoners, and giving up every place they took to be plundered by their soldiery. <sup>d</sup>

FROM Balbeis they had taken their march directly to Al Kayro, which was then in no condition of defence, and in the utmost confusion, through the disturbances and divisions that raged in it ; wherefore Shawer, as soon as he heard of their approach, caused the ancient city of Mesr to be set on fire, and the inhabitants of it to retire to Al Kayro, to prevent the enemy seizing on that ancient quarter. He had, moreover, prevailed on the Khalif to apply to Nuro'ddin, in the most pressing terms, and to let him know the imminent danger he and his kingdom were in of falling into the hands of the Christians, if not timely assisted by a powerful reinforcement of his Syrian troops. This was, it may be supposed, a most pleasing as well as seasonable request to that prince, as it gave him the fairest opportunity he could wish of completing his twofold design, the conquest of Egypt, and the driving the Franks out of it ; and for which he had already raised an army of 60,000 horse, under the command of his general Asado'ddin. <sup>e</sup>

HE therefore gladly sent him orders to move, with all possible speed, towards that kingdom, and to attack the Franks where-ever he found them. These had, by this time, reached the metropolis of Al Kayro, and had so closely besieged it, that it doth not appear that either the Khalif or his Vazir knew any thing of the Moslem army being hastening to the relief of the place : so that the Vazir, finding it impossible to hold out long against the besiegers, had recourse to his old subterfuge of treaties and high promises ; and, by means of 100,000 dinars, which he sent to them, and an engagement of 900,000 more as soon as they had raised the siege, which was impossible for him to raise till then, easily gained his end, and prevailed upon them to retire : though it is much more probable, as Kbondemir assures us, that the approach of Asado'ddin, and not the money or promises<sup>r</sup>, was the true motive which made them so readily abandon the place, and retire with such speed homewards with their booty, without staying for the performance of the other part of the engagement<sup>s</sup>. <sup>f</sup>

HOWEVER that be, Asado'ddin, at the head of his Moslem army, advanced by large strides towards that capital, and was received every-where by the Mohammedans as a saviour and deliverer ; and, at his arrival before that city, was invited by the Khalif Al Adel to the royal palace, with the greatest marks of honour and gratitude ; who, upon their first conference, amongst other rich acknowledgements for his timely relief, presented that general with a sumptuous royal kaftan, or vest. He was no less munificent to his nephew Salaba'ddin, who had also accompanied him in this expedition, and to all the other chief officers of his army. The faithless Vazir likewise, conscious of his breach of all his former engagements, was no less diligent in his daily attendance on him ; and in endeavouring to excuse his non-performance, failed not to express the highest regard and esteem not only for him and his nephew, but likewise for all the other commanders ; telling him how highly he should think himself honoured, could

<sup>o</sup> Vol. i. p. 724, & seq.
auct. ib. citat.

<sup>p</sup> Ibid. p. 725.

<sup>r</sup> ABU'LFED. sub ann.

<sup>s</sup> Vid. & al. sup. citat.

<sup>q</sup> De his, vid. RENAUDOT, ubi sup. p. 532, & seq. &

he be but permitted to invite him and them to an entertainment he had taken the liberty to a prepare for him and them at his own palace, and gratify him likewise with some marks of his high esteem for them. All this while the traitor had formed an hellish design against them, and intended them no better entertainment than that of seizing upon their persons, as soon as he had them in his power. His plot, however, was not conducted with such secrecy, but that the Syrian general had some hint given him of it: upon which, he ordered his nephew Salaha'ddin, and another of his chief officers, to seize upon him; which they accordingly did, under pretence of conducting him to his uncle, then upon a visit to the tomb of some Moslem saint out of the city: at the sight of which, Shawer's retinue betook themselves to flight, and left him to be conducted to Shairacub, who ordered him to be closely confined under a proper guard. No sooner was the Khalif informed of his Vazir's confinement and treachery, than he dispatched one of his ministers to the Syrian general, not only to disculpate himself from the suspicion of being privy to his treasons, but to demand of him the traitor's head; which was immediately cut off, and sent to him on the point of a lance, through the streets of the city, attended by a suitable escort; in return for which the general was forthwith invested by that pontif with the robe of honour, and other insignia of the Vazirat, and saluted with the title of Al Malec Al Mansur, or, The King and Conqueror. He moreover ordered an instrument to be drawn up in form, whereby he constituted him his Vazir, and dictated himself the contents of it, which are still extant, as preserved by Abu'lfeda, and by which he was put in possession of the late Shawer's palace. b

With this investiture and insignia the new Vazir Shairacub made his grand entry into that metropolis, with a suitable retinue and guard; but neither these, nor the insignia of his dignity, could prevent him from being attacked with great vehemence and fury, both by the soldiery and populace, as he rode through the streets of the city, in his way to the late Vazir's palace; insomuch, that he found no better way to prevent their insults, than by crying out to them, The Khalif hath granted to you all the immense wealth and treasure which Shawer had been hoarding up during his Vazirat. Upon which they all left him, and ran with all possible haste to the palace, and quickly stripped it of every thing they found in it. After this stratagem he found no farther obstruction; but, on the contrary, the greatest acclamations of joy, at his being so justly advanced to that important post, which were soon followed by congratulations in prose and verse; in which some of the brightest geniuses, especially those of the poetic kind, strove who should bestow the noblest encomiums upon him. His government proved, however, but short; he dying, as some say, of a debauch, two months and five days after his installation, towards the close of the year we are upon. c

*Salaha'ddin's extract and
character.*

WE have already given an account of this Moslem hero, his extract, and conquests in Egypt, and other parts of his character, to which we refer our readers<sup>1</sup>, as foreign to the affairs of this kingdom. There they will find the same full account of his nephew Salaha'ddin, who succeeded him in the Vazirat, and soon after ascended the Egyptian throne; on which he so signalized himself by his virtues, victories, and conquests, as became the founder of a new dynasty, and the abolisher of the Fatemite Khalifat, that he is justly celebrated as one of the greatest heroes of that age, as we have had occasion to shew in former part of this work, relating to his wars and successful victories against the famed Christian crusade<sup>2</sup>, and which, for that reason, we shall no further recapitulate here than is necessary to connect all the parts of his glorious reign, which are intermixed with other transactions; referring our readers, upon every such occasion, to those places where these facts are fully related; and where, if they chance to find any material difference, between the account we have given of that holy war in the ancient part of this work, and that which we have now given in this modern one, we beg it may be considered, that the former were chiefly compiled out of the Christian authors, both Greek and Latin, of that and the subsequent century; whereas in the latter a suitable regard hath likewise been had to the Arabic and Mohammedan historians; whose sentiments and prejudices, arising from difference of religion and interests from the former, must of necessity have occasioned a difference in their respective relations of both, which are very difficult to reconcile to each other; though, where that could be done, we have not been wanting in it; yet, we thought, could not, without incurring the censure of partiality, be omitted in an Oriental history, in which we have drawn most of our materials from Oriental writers. Thus much we thought proper to premise here, with respect to what hath been related in the places above-mentioned, and what we shall have occasion further to subjoin, with respect to that war in general, or to the particular transactions of that new Moslem warrior's Vazirat and reign. f

<sup>1</sup> Mod. Hist. vol. i. p. 727, & seq.
seq. vol. ii. p. 177, & seq.

<sup>2</sup> Anc. Hist. vol. vi. p. 613, & seq. Mod. Hist. vol. i. p. 727, &

- a SALAHA'DDIN, commonly called by the Greek and Latin writers Saladin, and originally Yusef Ebn Ayub, or, The son of Ayub, the brother of the late Asado'ddin, or Shairacub<sup>w</sup>, was the youngest of all the Emirs, or grandees, who aspired to the Vazirat, but who had already given some signal proofs of his valour and conduct, at the siege of Alexandria, which he sustained, during three months, against the united forces of the Franks, as hath been lately hinted. What determined the Khalif to give him the preference to all his other competitors, whether a regard to his merit and bravery, or the fear of his resentment, or whatever his motives were, it is certain that some of them were highly dissatisfied with his nomination, and made no scruple to declare publicly, that they would neither receive nor obey his orders. However, as these were but few in number, in comparison of those whom his address and generosity had already gained, by the timely distribution of a great part of his uncle's vast treasures in presents amongst them, those malecontents soon found cause to be ashamed of their opposition, whilst he became daily more the darling of the court and army; and the Khalif himself honoured him with the title of Al Malec Al Naser, or, The King and Defender *.
- b His address and generosity.

- ALL this while the young Vazir governed the realm without controul; and had, soon after his installation, given a total defeat to the negroes who guarded the royal palace, and cut off the greatest part of them, together with their leader, who had opposed his election, as hath been formerly hinted; by which means, and a strong garrison he had placed in the castle of Al Kayro, he was arrived to the summit of power; yet, as he had left Nosomo'ddin Ayub, his father, and the rest of his family, at Damascus, he was no less careful to avoid giving Nuro'ddin the least grounds of jealousy; and in every thing behaved as his general rather than as Vazir of Egypt, till he had obtained his permission to have them brought to Al Kayro, where they might be nearer to him, and partake of his grandeur and happiness. His request was easily foreseen the dangerous effects of a denial, and consequently made no difficulty to consent to their departure, though upon condition that they should submit no farther to Salaha'ddin than as to the general of his forces in Egypt. And the same precaution did that wise prince take in all dispatches to him, which usually ran in the plural number, and in terms to this effect: Nuro'ddin, &c. to the Emirs Al Esfahelar, Salaha'ddin, and other Emirs in Egypt, our will and command to you is, &c. Thus far was the harmony between those two great persons preserved. Salaha'ddin received his father and all the Ayuban family with great joy, and with all the magnificence of an Egyptian Vazir, and promoted them to some of the highest posts<sup>v</sup>.
- c His prudent conduct towards Nuro'ddin. Sends for his father and family.

- THE same good understanding reigned on the next year, which was the 365th of the Hejra, between the two cours of Damascus and Al Kayro, when the Franks made a fresh attempt on the sea-port of Damieta<sup>z</sup>, and kept it closely besieged during the space of fifty-two days; of which Nuro'ddin was no sooner informed, than he caused a powerful diversion to be made in their Syrian territories, and obliged them, without any farther trouble, to raise the siege, and go to the relief of their own conquests. There this mutual harmony did not a little contribute to increase Salaha'ddin's credit and authority in Egypt, whilst that of the Khalif gradually lessened in that kingdom. There happened, however, nothing considerable in it, either to the one or the other, except some slight advantages which the former gained over the Franks, in an irruption he made against them into Syria; whence being returned, at the end of the campaign, he caused two public edifices to be converted into schools at Al Kayro, for the encouragement and promulgation of the Sonnite doctrine, in opposition to that of the Schiites; of both which sects we have formerly given an account<sup>a</sup>: and appointed a set number of doctors for that end. It is not improbable that this was done in compliment, if not in obedience to Nuro'ddin, who was a zealous Abbaside, and looked on the Schiites as heretics, and as such bore a mortal hatred to the Fatemites; inasmuch that he sent, not long after, an express prohibition to the Vazir to suffer Al Aded to be any longer prayed for in any of the Egyptian mosks, and to substitute in his room that of the Khalifs of Baghdad. A dangerous attempt this was! and such, as Salaha'ddin had strongly remonstrated to him, as could hardly fail of causing a general revolt among the Fatemite Moslems, in case any of their Mollabs could be found that would venture to comply with it, or even be forced to do so by any motive: notwithstanding all which powerful pleas, he received such express orders from that prince, on the next year, as he dared not, or cared not, to disobey; and the Khalifs of Baghdad were accordingly prayed for in the mosks of Al Kayro, for the first time, on the second Friday of the moon Al Mobarran, as we have shewn in a former volume<sup>b</sup>.
- d 1169.

<sup>w</sup> De hoc, vid. sup. vol. i. p. 727.<sup>z</sup> ABU'LFED. ABU'LFAR. & al. ubi sup. RENAUD. ubi sup. p. 534, & seq. vol. i. p. 727, & seq. <sup>a</sup> De hoc, vid. sup. p. 17. <sup>b</sup> Before, vol. i. p. 37. 250, & 277, & seq. <sup>c</sup> Vol. i. p. 731.

Al Aded, the last Fatemite Khalif, dies.

His vast riches seized on by Salaha'ddin.

End of the Fatemite dynasty.

THIS year, which was the 366th of the Hejra, proved pregnant of several considerable events; particularly those of the deaths of Al Mostanjed, Khalif of Baghdad, and the Khalif of Egypt, which last was followed by the total extinction of the Fatemite Khalifat, or dynasty of those new pontifs in Africa. Al Aded was then sick, and on his death-bed, when Nuro'ddin's orders were put in force, and the new Khalif of Baghdad was substituted for his own in the usual prayers; but whether he knew any thing of that change, we are not told, but only that he expired some few days after; neither can we conclude, with any tolerable certainty, concerning the cause and circumstances of his death, from the various relations given us of it by the Moslem and Arabic writers, some affirming that he was dispatched by a dose of quick poison given him by Salaha'ddin; others affirming, that he died a natural death, but differ about the distemper and manner of it; for the further detail of which, we must refer our reader to the volume last quoted, where he will likewise find an inventory of his vast treasure, sumptuous furniture, variety of jewels, of the largest size and highest value, his noble library, and other particulars, which need not be here repeated<sup>c</sup>. It will suffice for our present history, to acquaint him, that the Vazir, whether present at his death, as some affirm, or otherwise, was no sooner assured of it, than he took possession of the whole palace, and all the immense riches that he found in it; and, having seized on the deceased Khalif's whole family, ordered them to be conducted to the most private and retired part of the palace, and to be kept under a strong guard: all his slaves, likewise, he disposed of; some for his own use, others he either gave away, manumitted, or sold. Thus ended the Fatemite dynasty in Egypt, after it had continued in Africa 271 years; that is, 70 in Kairwand, and 200 or 201 in Kabirab. We have elsewhere taken notice, that their founders pretended to be descended from Ali, by Fatima, the daughter of Mohammed; but were all the while disclaimed as such by the Abbasside Khalifs, and by them excommunicated as transitors, usurpers, tyrants, and impostors, together with all their adherents, as heretics, and rebels to their lawful sovereign.

SALAHAD'DIN, though now arrived at the zenith of wealth, power, and grandeur, was, however, obliged to act with great caution, both with respect to the jealous Nuro'ddin, and to the Egyptian Moslems; who, as Fatemites, being mostly of the Shiite sect, and irreconcilable enemies to the Sonnites, could not be supposed to come easily to so sudden a change of submission; and though they had not yet made any opposition, for want of opportunity, might in time, if they were not then deliberating about some revolt against him. And as for Nuro'ddin, who was, by this time, become exceeding powerful, and still treated him as his subject and slave, and would not suffer him to delay, much less to dispute, the least of his commands, he had all possible reason to apprehend the most strenuous opposition and marks of his resentment, if he did not take the utmost precaution to conceal his ambitious designs from him, especially as he had just cause to fear, lest the far greater part of the haughty Emirs and grandees of Egypt would immediately go over to his standard, as soon as they perceived the least likelihood of a rupture between them.

Salaha'ddin's
supports.

SALAHAD'DIN had, however, two very considerable supports; namely, the chief officers of the army, whom he had taken care to secure to his own interest, by distributing amongst them a large portion of the riches of the late Khalif, and the other a faithful and excellent private council, consisting chiefly of his own family and friends, whom he had invited out of Syria into Al Kayro, with his own father the old Emir Ayub, a consummate politician, at their head; by whose advice he steered in every thing he did. Pursuant to which, and in order to take off the attention of so many eyes, and to stop the mouths of the Shiite preachers, one of the first steps he took was to publish a Gazie, or religious war, against the Franks, and to declare his design of driving them out of Egypt, and of assisting Nuro'ddin to do the same in Syria; in all which he still proceeded with the deepest seeming regard to that prince, and with the greatest expressions of submission and loyalty. Yet could not all his extreme precaution prevent the very first expedition he took against the Franks, then garrisoned in the fortrefs of Al Shawbeck, on the frontiers of Syria, from alarming that jealous prince to the highest degree, and assuming all such menacing airs of absolute sovereignty over him, as made him fear, in his turn, the effects of his resentment.

How they both behaved upon this occasion, we have shewn elsewhere<sup>d</sup>, and Ayub was too experienced a warrior and statesman to be easily diverted from the promising and delightful prospect of seeing his son in possession of the Egyptian throne, or to be deterred from it by the menaces of the one against the power and interest of the other. He therefore encouraged his son to pursue his resolutions at all adventures; and, whilst he amused Nuro'ddin with the most feigned submission and acts of generosity, to take all proper means and measures to secure so valuable a crown to himself and his descendants. To all these wise precautions

<sup>c</sup> Vol. i. p. 731, & seq. Vid. & RENAUDOT, ubi sup. p. 536, & seq. & auct. sup. citat.
vol. i. p. 733, & seq.

<sup>d</sup> See before,

- a and preparations, the elated Salaha'ddin took care to add one more; namely, to gain the Egyptians to his interest and administration, by all the popular acts of generosity and mildness; in which he succeeded so well, that he was become their darling and idol, and, thinking that he had as effectually guarded against the effects of Nuro'ddin's jealousy, ventured a second attempt on the fortress of Sbawbeck, and on that of Cairac; but received such a threatening message from him, as quickly obliged him to raise the siege of both, and to endeavour to pacify him by apologies and fresh expressions of submission, and especially by some magnificent presents. Nuro'ddin, who was no less a master of the art of dissimulation, appeared outwardly satisfied with his proceedings, but was all that while raising a powerful armament, with full resolution to invade Egypt by the next year; however, happily for Salaha'ddin, who was in the utmost consternation and fear at these preparations, news was brought to him, that that prince died of a squinancy at the castle of Damascus, just as he was going to enter upon that expedition, in the year of the Hejra 569<sup>c</sup>, to the great joy, not only of Salaha'ddin and his whole family, but of the Egyptians, who dreaded his approach no less than they admired the magnificence and lenity of his generals. 1172. prepares to invade him.
- b Salaha'ddin, though now freed from the apprehensions of so powerful an enemy, dared not venture to take off the mask, and assume the sovereign power and title, while he saw his successor at the head of a powerful army, and no less desirous than able to dispossess him. For which reason, his first care was to secure to himself a sure asylum, in case he should be obliged by a superior force to abandon Egypt. He quickly set his eye on the kingdom of Nubia, as the most conveniently situated for such a retreat, and resolved upon the reduction of it. He accordingly dispatched his brother Malek Turanshab thither, at the head of a sufficient force; but who, being astonished at the sterility and inhospitality of the country, returned quickly after, without effecting any thing, and easily dissuaded him from that enterprise. His next was upon the country of Al Yaman, or Arabia Felix, described in a former part of this work<sup>f</sup>; the reduction of which he easily completed, by the total defeat of the Emir Abd'alnabi, who had made himself master of it, and whom he brought prisoner with him in chains. We shall refer our readers, for the further particulars of that expedition, to the account that hath been formerly given of it<sup>g</sup>, together with other successful exploits of that general; who, according to some authors, was accompanied in it by Al Ayub Shah, and brought thence spoil of immense value; an account of all which they will find in the place last quoted<sup>h</sup>. We shall only observe, upon the whole, that, after this great accession of wealth and dominion, Salaha'ddin made no longer demur to assume the title of Soltan, or sovereign of Egypt, and was acknowledged such by the far greater part of the states of that kingdom, by the end of that year, without opposition. We say the far greater; for though the rest did not dare to oppose him openly, yet many lords of very considerable rank, especially among the Schittes, were still very numerous, and retained an irreconcilable hatred against the Abbaside Khalif, and had engaged in a conspiracy against him, in favour of the Fatemite family, and with a design of restoring the Khalifat. This plot, though deeply laid, could not, however, go long undiscovered, considering the many spies that were set over them, not only by the jealous Soltan, for so we must stile him henceforth, but likewise by the Abbaside Khalifs, and elated Sonnites that were intermixed amongst them (G). It was accordingly brought to light this year, which was the 569th of the Hejra, and followed by the most severe executions of the chief persons concerned in it; many of whom were crucified, others burned alive<sup>i</sup>. These did not so far extinguish the Egyptians zeal for the Fatemite descendants, but a new revolt broke out the next year against the new Soltan, which was headed by Al Kanz, al. Al Kanazo'ddoula, then governor of Affwan, or Affevan, in Upper Egypt; where he had assembled a vast number of blacks, or rather swarthy natives, and marched directly into the Lower, and was there met by vast shoals of Egyptians, who flocked to him from all parts. Against them Salaha'ddin dispatched his brother Al Malek Al Turan, with a suitable number of forces, who quickly engaged him with his usual fierceness; and, after a

<sup>c</sup> ABU'LFED. ABU'LFAR. & al. sup. citat. RENAUDOT, ubi sup. p. 517, & seq. Vid. & vol. i. p. 735, & seq.
<sup>f</sup> See Anc. Hist. vol. i. p. 164, & vol. vii. p. 232, & seq. <sup>g</sup> See vol. i. p. 737, & seq. <sup>h</sup> De his, vid. note (M). <sup>i</sup> De his, vid. sup. vol. i. p. 73, & seq. & auct. ib. citat.

(G) We are told, that when the express order of Nuro'ddin was first published at Al Kayro, for praying for the Khalifs of Baghdad, instead of those of the Fatemite line, by name, there were the greatest rejoicings made in both these capitals by the Sonnite sect; but especially those of Egypt, who had been till then so long kept under the severest subjection by the Cheyks, that many of them had been, for the sake of peace, constrained to retract and dissemble: so that it was no wonder that they should now, in revenge, become the most diligent spies upon, and the most inveterate witnesses against them, on this occasion; insomuch that it was deemed a crime with them, to have written, either in prose or verse, in defence of the Fatemite faction, as they then exultingly termed it (8).

Signal defeat before Alexandria.

desperate engagement, in which he cut in pieces vast numbers of his forces, and amongst them their general and chief of their revolt, he easily defeated and dispersed the rest, and returned victorious to Al Kayro<sup>k</sup>. About the same time, Salaha'ddin gained also a most considerable advantage over the Franks, then closely besieging the city of Alexandria with a numerous fleet and army, under the command of William II. king of Sicily; against whom he marched at the head of a powerful force, and with such surprising speed, that his unexpected approach injected an universal panic through his whole camp, and obliged him to abandon it with the utmost precipitation and confusion, leaving all his military engines, stores, and baggage, behind; and, as some add, with the loss of a great number of his forces; and some of his ships<sup>l</sup>.

Salaha'ddin returns into Egypt.

Mesr and Al
Kayro surrounded by a wall.

THIS success was followed, on the next year, by a much greater, in Syria; where he reduced the strong capital of Damascus, and made himself master of several other considerable fortresses and towns in that country; which, being out of our Egyptian boundaries, we shall refer our reader for a full account of that expedition, which took him up near two years, to the volume above-quoted<sup>m</sup>. We come down to the 572d year of the Hejra, which was that of his return into Egypt, after he had regulated his affairs (H), and made his brother Al Malek Al Tûran governor of Damascus, and his other Syrian conquests, and made his triumphal entry into his capital. Here, having rested himself and his troops for a while, he began, towards the close of it, to build that famous wall, which was to inclose the cities of Mesr and Al Kayro, and was, we are told, to have extended itself 29,000, or 29,300 cubits in compass<sup>n</sup>; but which he did not live to see finished; tho' he did some other public structures, which he caused to be erected; particularly the college, or public school, in the city of Mesr and the hospital at Al Kayro, with others of less note, which were begun in the same year. About the same time, we are likewise told, broke out a kind of new revolt in Upper Egypt, consisting of a number of rebellious black natives of that country, under the command of one Abd'astkuab, who gave himself out to be Dawd, or David, the son of the late Fatemite Khalif Al Aded, and had his rendezvous near the ancient city of Cast, or Koptos, in that province<sup>o</sup>; where, being timely surprised by the Soltan's forces, before they had time to do any great damage, they were easily routed, and either destroyed or taken prisoners. Amongst the former of whom was their general, who fell one of the first; and, by his death, threw the rest into an universal panic and confusion: among the latter above 3000 were publicly hanged; insomuch that of 100,000, of which their corps is said to have consisted, no less than 80,000 are reckoned to have perished in that fatal revolt.

Salaha'ddin
put to flight
by the Franks.

1177.

Wholly defeated in Palestine.

THE year following, which was the 573d of the Hejra, proved more unfortunate to him; when, having led a very numerous army again into Palestine against the Franks, and sending his detachments about to ravage their territories, he met with such a terrible repulse from them, that he was forced to abandon his camp, and to betake himself to a precipitate flight; whilst his Moslems, having no fortrefs to retire to between that and Egypt, were forced to traverse all the vast deserts between that and Palestine, and never stopped till they arrived at Al Kayro; where his entrance into his capital proved as disgraceful as the last had been glorious, having lost the greatest part of his army, and beasts of burthen, which perished in these deserts for want of water. As for those of his troops which were left in Palestine, and which he so injudiciously detached to ravage the country, by which he had so greatly weakened his army, and gave the Franks that signal advantage over him, they were all either cut in pieces or taken prisoners; and he himself owns to his brother Al Tûran, in the doleful account he gives him of this fatal overthrow, that he had narrowly escaped more than once or twice the same fate; and acknowledges, that nothing but a Divine Providence, which had reserved him for some grand design, could have brought him safe into Egypt<sup>p</sup>. He seems, indeed, to have been designed as a scourge to the Christians, during the remainder of his reign; but as the chief of his exploits against them, performed in Palestine, Syria, and other parts out of his Egyptian dominions, our readers will find a full account of them, in chronological order, in the volume above-quoted<sup>q</sup>, whilst we confine ourselves to those few particulars of it, which more properly relate to the Egyptian history.

<sup>k</sup> ABU'LFED. ABU'LFAR. AL MAKIN, POHADDOWLA, & al. sup. citat. RENAUDOT, ubi sup. p. 541. <sup>l</sup> De hoc, vid. plur. in vol. i. p. 738. <sup>m</sup> Ibid. & seq. <sup>n</sup> EBN SHOHNAH, ad an. <sup>o</sup> De hoc, vid. Anc. Hist. vol. i. p. 171. <sup>p</sup> De his, vid. sup. vol. i. p. 742. & auct. ib. citat. <sup>q</sup> P. 742, & seq. vid. & vol. ii. p. 177, & seq.

(H) We are told, that, among some public acts which he did before he left Syria, he suppressed the caphar exacted from the pilgrims going to Mecca, by the Emir of that metropolis, and assigned him, in lieu of it, a yearly pension of 2000 dinars out of his own treasury, besides a large quantity of corn which was sent to him yearly out of Egypt (9).

(9) Abu'lfed. Ebn Shohnah, Al Makrizi, & al. sup. cit. Vid. & Renaudot, ubi sup. p. 542.

a AND here we meet with nothing considerable till the year of the Hejra 476, in which Naser Ledin'illah, having been raised to the Khalifat of Baghdad, honoured him with the patent of his investiture as Soltan of Egypt, together with the Kaftan, and other insignia of royalty, and several magnificent presents; to which he added the title of Emir Al Omra, in consideration of his great services both to the Khalifat, and to the Mohammedan religion. In return to which, as well as to gratify his own martial inclination, and zeal against the Christians, he set about raising a most powerful army, in order to make a fresh, and, as he hoped, a more successful expedition into Syria; for by this time that small remains, which he brought from Palestine, had been so reduced, both by their traversing such dry and barren deserts, and by a dreadful pestilence which had raged amongst them after their return, that it was not till the b 578th year of the Hejra that he set out for it from his metropolis. HE set out accordingly at the head of a formidable force, attended by a most splendid retinue of his chief officers, and amidst the acclamations and good wishes of this court and city, though not without some presentment of ill success, occasioned by a bard, who squeezing himself through the croud of other poetic congratulators, presented him with a sprig of camomile and a distich; which that prince took for an ill omen, and threw a visible damp upon all his joy. However, he marched on at the head of his army; but was repulsed with disgrace before Aleppo and Al Mawfel, after having spent much time and labour in besieging these two important places, and sustaining some mortifying affronts from the besieged at the latter.

Receives anew title and honour from the Khalif of Baghdad.
1180.

His next and last expedition into Syria.

Ill success.

c WHILEST he sped thus ill in Syria, his Egyptian dominions were not a little alarmed at the appearance of a most powerful fleet and armada of the Franks on the Red Sea, and which seemed to threaten the cities of Mecca and Medina, such as had never before appeared on that coast. The news of which no sooner reached Al Kayro, than Al Malek Abu Becr, Salaha'ddin's brother, who was left viceroy of Egypt during his absence, caused another to be equipped with all speed, the command of which he gave to his governor of the marine, named Lulu, a brave experienced officer, who lost no time to go in quest of and engage them; and quickly came up with them on the coast of Al Kayro; upon which a most dreadful fight ensued, wherein both sides behaved with the utmost obstinacy and bravery, but concluded, at length, in favour of the Moslems, who made a most horrid slaughter of the Christians, took and sunk a great many of their ships, slaughtered an incredible number of their men, and took most of the rest prisoners, who were all likewise butchered to a man. This proved so fatal a blow to the Franks, that they never more ventured the like attempt; and both the Egyptian viceroy and admiral gained immortal praise amongst all the Moslems, not only for that timely expedition, but even for their inhuman treatment of the Christian prisoners, whom their writers accuse of having slaughtered a great number of pilgrims going to Mecca before that defeat, and to have, moreover, threatened the destruction of that city and temple; as for other outrages charged upon them, and their loss of ships, men, &c. they differ so much in their accounts, that we can say nothing certain about them.

Franks armada on the Red Sea.
1182.

Defeated by the Egyptian admiral.

Their immense loss.

d SALAHA'DDIN still pursued the war in Syria, and had the pleasure to find the next campaign more successful than the former, as the reader may see in the account we have elsewhere given of it. This obliged him to send frequently to his brother, the viceroy of Egypt, for fresh reinforcements, and, at length, to order him to resign the government of Egypt to his nephew Takio'ddin Al Modhaffer, and to come to him into Syria with a fresh supply of forces; and, upon his arrival there, promoted him to the government of Halep, or Aleppo, in the room of another brother of his, lately dead of the wounds which he received at one of the sieges; whose loss so deeply affected that conqueror, that he was forced to send for Al Malek Al Adel out of Egypt, to be near and assist him in his councils. With his assistance he went on with furious progress and success against the Franks, during the next and following years, spreading dread, horror, and desolation, where-ever he came, putting all to fire and sword where-ever he conquered, and every-where displaying the most invincible hatred against the Franks and Christians; of all which, and his various sieges and conquests in Syria, Palestine, Mesopotamia, and other eastern parts, so full and ample an account hath been given in the volume above-quoted, that we have nothing left to add to it here: but, upon the whole, must conclude that great and successful conqueror to have been (in spite of all that his panegyrists have said to the contrary) a prince no less cruel and vindictive than ambitious. Instances of which, even to his near relations, abound through this latter part, if not through his whole reign; notwithstanding the many instances of munificence he is so much cried up for towards the cities he conquered, after the fury and heat of his anger and martial resentment were subsided; such as the building and endowing stately mosques, schools, hospitals, caravanseras, and other such public structures, and repairing the walls of towns, castles, and other fortresses, which he had destroyed; all which, though plain instances of his generosity, prudence, and policy, will go but little way towards

Salaha'ddin's conquests in Syria.
1183.

Takio'ddin made viceroy of Egypt.

<sup>r</sup> De hoc, vid. sup. vol. ii. p. 177.

<sup>s</sup> ABU'LFED. & al. sup. citat.

<sup>t</sup> See vol. ii. p. 3. & seq.

<sup>u</sup> Vol. ii. p. 6, & seq.

<sup>v</sup> ABU'LFED. & al. sup. citat.

<sup>w</sup> Ibid. p. 9, & seq. ad 48.

clearing his character from the just imputation of cruelty, ingratitude, and unmeasurable ambition<sup>x</sup>.

DURING his long absence out of Egypt, which was from the year of the Hejra 578 to that of his death in 589, the heads and pens of the writers of his reign seem to have been so wholly engrossed by his vast conquests, that they have not taken notice of any thing memorable in that kingdom, excepting therecalling his nephew Takio'ddin, whom he had appointed viceroy of it, from that government, upon some suspicion, whether well or ill grounded, of his designing to secure that crown for himself, in case any disaster happened to him whilst he was pursuing his war against the Franks; where, we are told, that Takio'ddin, being afraid of obeying his orders, and returning to Damascus, went and refuged himself with Kurkush, one of his Mamluks, who had made himself master of Barka, and some of the neighbouring provinces, and was become very powerful in those parts, to the no small resentment of Salaha'ddin; who at that time, however, reduced his nephew to his duty and interest by fair means; and, advancing him to the government of some other provinces, restored his own brother Al Malek Al Adel to his former government in that kingdom.

The Franks
plunder the Egyptian caravan.

1186.

THE other, and indeed more material occurrence which happened in it, is that of the plundering of the Egyptian caravan in its way to Mecca, putting a vast number of the holy pilgrims belonging to it to the sword, and threatening death to the Moslems, and destruction to their two holy cities of Mecca and Medina. What greatly aggravated this piece of hostility was, that Arnold, count of Castilia, who was also Saleh, or lord, of Al Carak, was their commander, and had but lately concluded a treaty with Salaha'ddin, who so resented his treachery, that he swore he would strike off his perfidious head, if ever he got him into his hands; as he accordingly soon after did, upon his taking him prisoner, and offering him his life in vain to turn Mohammedan<sup>y</sup>.

Salaha'ddin's
death,

1193.

and character.

WE come now to the year of the Hejra 589 (or, according to Renaudot, 588), in which that great Moslem conqueror died at Damascus, in the 57th lunar year of his age, and 24th of his reign in the kingdom of Egypt, to the inexpressible grief of all the Mohammedans, who every-where expressed it by the deepest and most universal mourning, and the no less real joy of all the Christians, to whom he had ever been a most irreconcilable enemy, and dreadful scourge. But we shall have the less need to dwell upon that subject, having already given elsewhere so full and ample an account of his last sickness, death, and other particulars relating to the manner and circumstances of them, as well as his funeral obsequies, issue, the partition of his conquests and dominions between his sons and brothers, his character, and instances of his generosity and singular contempt of riches; which last had so far exhausted his treasury, that, if we may believe the author of the Lebtarikh, who was an eye-witness of it, as he himself assures us, there were found in it, at his death, but one single Syrian dinar, and forty-seven dirhems, or drachms<sup>z</sup>.

Exhausted
treasury.

Succeeded by Al Malek Al
Adel.

No sooner was Al Malek Al Adel, Salaha'ddin's eldest son, proclaimed his successor, and received the homage of his brethren, uncles, and other grandees, than he notified it, by an express, to his brother Al Aziz Othman, then viceroy of Egypt, and to all his other brethren, in their respective principalities and governments, with the usual injunctions that they should all take the oaths of allegiance to him. The misfortune was, that this new Soltan, a prince of the most opposite character to his father, had not one single virtue which could inspire them either with love or fear; and, to complete his misfortunes, made choice of a new Vazir, who easily persuaded him to exchange all his father's old faithful ministers for a set of new ones, who, by encouraging him in his lewdness and other vices, rendered him still more contemptible, and quickly occasioned that general defection, which, as we have elsewhere hinted, broke out at the very beginning of his reign<sup>a</sup>, in so many parts of his dominions, and particularly in this kingdom of Egypt; where the ambitious Al Aziz, a prince no less debauched and vicious, was no sooner returned from assisting at his father's funeral, than he was surrounded by the chiefs of his court; who, being no strangers to his towering views, exhorted him, with one voice, to assert his right to the crown by open force, and cast off all farther allegiance to that of Syria, and even to invade that kingdom, and other of his brother's dominions, upon the first favourable opportunity that offered itself to him; to whose advice, if he was not really the first mover of that address, he readily agreed. The necessary preparations for this expedition, took him up near two years; during which he entered into a firm alliance with his uncle Al Melek Al Adel Abu Bekr, then Saleh, or prince, of Al Carac, to join their forces, to drive him out of his Syrian dominions; whilst infatuated Al Malek Al Adel, unmindful of every thing but his own pleasures, indulged himself in all kinds of lewdness, gaming, drinking, and other debaucheries, gave them all the time and oppor-

His brother
Al Aziz revolts against him in Egypt.

<sup>x</sup> De his, vid. vol. ii. p. 46, & note (D).
ii. p. 45, & seq. & auct. ib. citat.

<sup>y</sup> Vol. ii. p. 15, & seq.
<sup>a</sup> Ibid. p. 48, & seq.

<sup>z</sup> De his, vid. sup. vol.

a tunity they could wish for to invade his dominions, and surprize him in his capital of Damascus, altogether unprepared.

THEY accordingly entered Syria with their joint forces, in the year of the Hejra 592, and, Invades Syria, without any considerable opposition, besieged that city; and whether it surrendered to them, 1195, or was reduced by force (about which our authors are not agreed), they made themselves masters of it, and obliged Al Adel to yield to them, as we have elsewhere shewn <sup>b</sup>.

AL AZIZ by this time was become so powerful in this new conquered kingdom, that he governed it without controul, was prayed for by name in all the mosks, coined money, and, in all other respects, exercised a supreme authority, leaving only to his brother Al Adel the bare shew and shadow of royalty. However, he soon rendered himself contemptible, by his debaucheries, to the Emirs or grandees of both kingdoms, even in a greater degree than his brother; for Al Adel, in spite of his vicious nature, had gained the affections of many of them by his generosity, while Aziz lost them by his want of it. Al Aziz reigned, however, Al Aziz dies, till the 595th year of the Hejra, when he was suddenly carried off by death; leaving, as most 1198, authors agree, a son behind him, named Al Mansur, not then above nine years of age; to whom, however, the Emirs, both Salabian and Asadian <sup>c</sup>, took the oaths of allegiance; Al Mansur, but insisted that his uncle Al Afdal should be invited to take the reins of government during his minority. Al Afdal was then in Syria, when the news of his brother's death, and of his Al Afdal being invited to the regency of Egypt, were brought to him; who accordingly set out with chosen regent, all speed for Al Kayro, and at his arrival was received and acknowledged regent by them all, and with the acclamations of the people <sup>d</sup>.

THE first thing which he did, after his installation, was to revive the war and invasion of Syria; and this, in all probability, in complaisance to the Egyptian Emirs, who had invited him to the regency, and had been the first promoters of it in the last reign. And to this end he entered into an alliance with another of his brothers, named Dbaber, who was Saleh, or Soltan, of Aleppo, and at that time very powerful. They began, with their joint forces, with the siege of Damascus, which Al Adel had recovered since the death of Al Aziz, and was then laying siege to another fortress, but abandoned it to come to the defence of this. Damascus was accordingly besieged by those two princes with great vigour, and as bravely defended by the Syrian Emirs, whom Al Adel had gained to his interest by new marks of munificence; when, in the heat of the siege, a sudden quarrel happened between the two brothers Al Dbaber and Al Afdal, upon a beastly occasion, scarcely fit to be mentioned here again <sup>e</sup>, which terminated in a total rupture; and the former having expressed his resentment against the latter in the most violent and reproachful terms, withdrew his forces from the siege, and retired to Antioch, leaving him to carry on or abandon the siege, as he should think fit. Upon which Al Afdal, having neither interest enough within, nor force enough before the place, to hope to reduce it, made the same speed to retire from the place, and led his army back into Egypt. And thus ended this fruitless expedition, just at the time when the place was ready to surrender; and Al Afdal, being returned to Al Kayro, resumed the reins of government, as regent, during his nephew's minority; though not without a view of depriving him of his crown. Forced to retire into Egypt.

WHILST he was projecting this unnatural treason against that young prince, a more dangerous one was hatching in Syria, from another quarter, which neither he nor the regent had the least suspicion of; namely, by his great-uncle Al Malek Al Adel Abu Becr, the late Sala'addin's brother, to whom that Soltan had bequeathed a good number of provinces and governments, in Syria, Mesopotamia, and elsewhere, which had rendered him very considerable and powerful in those parts <sup>f</sup>. This ambitious and ungrateful prince had beheld, with no small inward pleasure, his two contending nephews, Al Adel and Al Aziz, weakening and debilitating each other by their mutual wars; and though, under the specious pretence of tenderness and affection for them, and a desire of reconciling them to a mutual peace and amity, he assisted each of them in their wars and invasions of each other's dominions, yet it was with a sole view of finding a proper time for seizing and securing them to himself and children. He had accordingly done so in Syria, and got possession of Damascus, as we have elsewhere shewn; and was now making all proper preparation for invading of Egypt, with no less speed than probability of success; whilst the infatuated Al Afdal, wholly taken up with his own designs, and no less ignorant of, than unprepared to oppose, those of his uncle, gave him all the time and opportunity he could wish, to come and surprize him in his very capital. With this fair prospect before him, he led his army into Egypt, without opposition, Reduces Al in the year of the Hejra 596, and appeared before the walls of Al Kayro, with the same ease Kayro, 1195, and speed, and found it so defenceless and unprepared against a siege, that he forced it to surrender in less than eight days after his encamping before it. The next thing he did was to a oblige the regent to sign a treaty, in young Al Mansur's name, by which he ceded to him the kingdom of Egypt, and obliged himself to retire out of it, into some other provinces granted unto him in consideration of the treaty, and in exchange for his regency <sup>s</sup>.

<sup>b</sup> Vol. ii. p. 52. & seq. RENAUD. ubi sup. p. 556, & seq. & al. sup. citat. <sup>c</sup> De hoc, vid. sup. vol. ii. p. 54. ubi sup. p. 559, & seq. & sup. vol. ii. p. 55, & seq.

<sup>e</sup> De his, vid. vol. ii. p. 54 (P). <sup>d</sup> ABU'LFAR. <sup>f</sup> ABU'LFAR. & al. sup. citat. vid. & RENAUDOT,

Takes the sovereign power and title. AL ADEL, being now in full possession of the kingdom, thought proper for a while to govern it in the name of young Al Mansur, and as regent in his minority, to prevent any insurrection or opposition from the Egyptian Emirs, who had taken the oaths of allegiance to him immediately after his father's death. But his generosity, and their gratitude, soon rid him of such fears, from that quarter at least, and gave him a moral certainty that he might safely assume the sovereignty, and reign in his own right. However, to give such a step a b shew of lawfulness, as well as expediency, and such as might carry the appearance of religious right in the eyes of the people, it was thought proper that he should convene some of the chief Moslem doctors, who, by artful questions on the subject, as well as by private gifts, might be induced to give a public sanction to his title of Soltan of Egypt; after which he made no difficulty to assume that title, nor the Emirs to acknowledge him as such. He accordingly reigned, without opposition, in his new conquered kingdom, from this time to the year of the Hejra 515; and was possessed of the most considerable dominions, both in Syria, Palestine, and Mesopotamia, which his brother had, with so much labour and bloodshed, subdued <sup>h</sup>.

Receives an embassy from the Abissinians. IN his reign, though we cannot fix which year of it, came ambassadors from the emperor and clergy of Abissinia to Alexandria, to desire the patriarch to favour them with a new metropolitan, in the room of the old one deceased; upon which John, who si- gned at that time, appointed a proper person to go through all the monasteries in that city and neighbourhood, to enquire for a person fit to be ordained to that dignity; who spent three months in search, without being able to find out one to that prelate's mind. The ambassadors, tired at his delay, were directed at length to have recourse to the Soltan, and to beg of him to interpose his authority in their behalf; who, upon receiving the Ethiopian monarch's letters and presents, together with the information, that none of the Egyptian monasteries afforded a person fit for that high office and dignity, immediately made choice of one Kylos, then bishop of Fuab, to be consecrated for that end; and he was accordingly constituted and consecrated to it in form by the patriarch, though contrary to the canons and rubric of the Coptic church, this d being only a translation or promotion from one see to a higher, or from a bishopric to a metropolitan dignity; which promotions, though frequent among the Syrian Jacobites, Nestorians, and even Melchites, or orthodox, all of whom had particular forms of prayers and ceremonies suited to such purposes, in their respective rituals, were yet utterly unknown among the more rigid Copts, where such a translation from a lower to a higher, or from a bishop's to a metropolitan see, had never been heard of; it is not improbable that the good patriarch might, by mistake, suppose such a new consecration necessary in this singular and unusual case.

Kylos's reception in that empire. HOWEVER that be, he was accordingly consecrated, and received in Ethiopia, both by the king and court, as well as all the people, with the greatest marks of respect and submission, and exercised his function to the much greater satisfaction of that church and clergy, c than many of his remote predecessors had done (I); yet, in less than five years, the patriarch had the mortification to see him come back from Ethiopia, and, at his arrival at Al Kayro, to give this melancholy excuse to him, for having abandoned the church and flock committed to his care; viz. "That having been in a great measure forced, by the continual importunities and solicitations of the empress, to ordain and consecrate her brother bishop of Axuma, the metropolis of Abissinia, ever since that time this young prelate had assumed all the authority of a metropolitan, and treated him with the utmost contempt, as did also all the rest of the clergy; and had, moreover, carried his resentment, for daring to oppose his measures, so far as to send some of his servants to assassinate him, in the dead of the

Outwitted by the empress.

<sup>s</sup> ABU'LFAR. & al. vid. & vol. ii. p. 55, & seq.

<sup>h</sup> Ibid. p. 55, & seq.

(I) We are farther told, that this excellent prelate, whom the Soltan seems to have made choice of on account of his singular piety, upon his arrival in that kingdom, found it labouring under an excessive drought of two or three years continuance, and which seemed to threaten it with a general famine: and that by his prayers he obtained abundance of rain, which was attended with a plentiful harvest; on which account, both emperor and court, and indeed the whole Abissinian nation, held him in the greatest esteem; especially that monarch, who not only went with a grand retinue to meet him, some days journey from his metropolis, but continued his frequent visits to and veneration for him. If therefore, any other motive, besides that of shaking off their dependence on Egypt, could induce the court and clergy to alter their behaviour to him to such a degree, and in so short a time, as the sequel shews, what can we suppose it to have been, but the zeal which he displayed against the general depravity and corruption which were crept into both, and rendered him odious to them; of which our readers will find many other signal instances in the Abissinian history, which we shall give in this volume.

- a "night, in his own house; so that it was with the greatest difficulty and danger that he had made his escape out of that kingdom, and got safe into Egypt <sup>1</sup>." This politic step of the Abissinian court had been often attempted, as we have seen in the course of this chapter, in order to free themselves from the necessity of receiving their abuna, or metropolitan, from the patriarchs of Alexandria; but had been as often frustrated by the strenuous opposition of those prelates, especially in the reigns of the Fatemite Khalifs, who made it a matter of conscience, as well as policy, not to intermeddle with matters of that nature <sup>k</sup>, or oblige them to act contrary to the canons and constitutions of their church: whereas the new Soltan of Egypt, less scrupulous, as well as less acquainted with the danger of interposing his authority, gave occasion, by that one irregular step, to the great feuds and dissensions which ensued, not only in Egypt but in Abissinia; of which we shall not here enter into a detail, as we are not writing an ecclesiastical history, but shall refer our readers to the author last quoted; and have only touched here as an interesting event, which had its foundation in the above-mentioned impolitic step of that prince, and of which he became so sensible, that he took all proper means, for the future, to remedy, by a contrary behaviour, as we shall see in the sequel, by the part he took in those religious feuds.

- AL ADEL's dominions were, by the additional conquest of Egypt, become so extensive, that he found much more difficulty in preserving than he had done in conquering them. He had, on the one hand, the Franks in Syria and Palestine, who did not let a year elapse without making some conquest or irruption either there or in Egypt; and on the other, some new revolt to quell among his more distant provinces; so that he could not be long absent from the one, but he heard of some fresh attempt made upon it by those irreconcilable enemies to him and his religion. It was upon such an occasion as this that they took the advantage of his being taken up with suppressing an insurrection in Mesopotamia, and made a dreadful irruption upon the coasts of Dimiyat, or Damieta <sup>m</sup>, which seemed to threaten the whole kingdom. We are not told who was the chief commander in this expedition; but only that, on their arrival thither, they found the country so destitute of forces, and in such a defenceless state, that they immediately laid siege to that rich sea-port, both by land and sea, whilst another corps of theirs penetrated into the country, without opposition, almost as far as Al Kayro, putting all to fire and sword, committing the most dreadful outrages, and carrying off the richest plunder; whilst Al Kamel, one of the Soltan's sons, who was left governor of the kingdom, during his father's absence, was forced to retire, and fortify himself in that capital, and leave Damieta to make the best defence it could against the besiegers. The Franks, however, finding Al Kayro so well fortified and guarded, thought fit to retire from it, without doing any farther damage than the plundering a monastery belonging to the Melchites, in the neighbourhood of that capital, and rejoin their other forces at Damieta; where, after some fresh attempts on the place, they were forced to abandon it; and, having put all their rich plunder on board, set sail again for Palestine <sup>n</sup>.

- Soon after this, and whilst the Soltan continued in his Mesopotamian expedition, arrived a fresh embassy at Al Kayro, from the emperor of Abissinia, to him, and to the Alexandrian patriarch, requesting them, in the strongest and most pressing terms, to send thither a new metropolitan, in lieu of the late Kylos; and alleging, moreover, that their country had hardly been free from an excessive drought and famine, and attributing that grievous judgment to the want of an abuna; though, from what we have observed a little higher, they might more justly have ascribed it to their ill treatment of the late worthy one. However, the more effectually to palliate that unfavourable circumstance, they thought fit to impute his hasty flight from them to an inhuman act of severity which he had been guilty of, in causing a reverend monk, and chief of a convent, to be whipped to death, on suspicion of his having stolen or made away with a golden verge or rod belonging to the metropolitan church; for which the relations of the deceased prosecuted him with such resentment, as forced him to abandon the country with the utmost privacy and speed. To give the greater weight to this charge, and their request, Moses, who was at the head of the embassy, was ordered to back it with rich presents, both to the Soltan and to the patriarch; and amongst those designed for the latter, was a crown of gold, of such value and beauty, that Al Kamel, who presided during his father's absence, could not forbear admiring it, as well as the richness of the other presents <sup>o</sup>. Upon which Moses failed not of taking that opportunity to extol the magnificence, power, and vast dominions, of his master; and, amongst other things, to tell the young prince, that the emperor would have enriched that crown with jewels, to the amount of the yearly revenue of Egypt, had he not foreseen that the patriarch's extreme modesty would have prevented his wearing of it. However, upon the whole, the presents had

Forced to return to Egypt.

The Franks irruption into Egypt, 1209.

Dreadful ravages.

Repulsed before Damieta.

<sup>1</sup> RENAUDOT, ubi sup. p. 560, & seq. hoc, vid. sup. p. 17.<sup>k</sup> See before, p. 55.<sup>l</sup> Vol. ii. p. 60, & seq.<sup>m</sup> De<sup>n</sup> ABU'LFAR. & al. sup. citat. RENAUD. ubi sup. p. 564. Vol. ii. p. 61.<sup>o</sup> De their due weight, both with Al Kamel and the patriarch John, whatever his pompous words might want of it, and procured a ready compliance. A new metropolitan was consecrated accordingly; a monk, named Isaac, and dispatched, with all possible speed, into Abissinia; where he could not well fail of a kind reception, whatever his character might be in other respects, if what the ambassador alleged was true, that the heavens had been shut up so long against their country, and were not likely to be opened again till the arrival of the new abuna. As for Kylos, the late one there, he not only lost his dignity of metropolitan, but his old bishopric, though we do not find any farther enquiry or complaint against him, on account of his pretended unchristian severity. Shortly after which a fresh reinforcement, sent to him by his father, made the severe military execution which we have elsewhere related.

Al Kamel's justice and equity to the Christians,
1211.

WE meet with nothing remarkable in this kingdom, during some of the following years, except some malicious calumnies invented by some wretched apostate Christians; who, to curry favour with the Mohammedans, had accused the Alexandrian patriarch of heaping vast sums of money out of his ecclesiastical revenues, as likewise against some monasteries, for concealing vast quantities of rich plate belonging to the church; but none of these accusations are worth mentioning, except it be in justice to the Soltan, and his son Al Kamel; the latter of whom, especially, behaved with surprizing candour and equity towards the accused, and took all proper means not only to discountenance, but to suppress, such vile practices<sup>p</sup>: on which account we could not forbear saying thus much, in commendation of that young Mohammedan prince, though, in other respects, the facts are scarce worth notice.

Al Adel marries his daughter to Al Dhaher.

ON the next or subsequent year was celebrated with great magnificence, accompanied with a dowry of 300,000 dinars, the marriage of Soltan Al Adel's daughter with his nephew Al Dhaher, the late Salaba'ddin's son, now Saleh, or king, of Aleppo; to which she was conducted with a suitable retinue, and there received by him and his court with great splendor.

Great tumults among the Christians about the choice of a patriarch, 1216.

THE rest of Al Adel's reign seems to have been very peaceable and happy, excepting that, in the year of the Hejra 613, there were very grievous disturbances and shameful hostilities between the Christians, about the choice of a new patriarch, instead of John, who died in this year. The zeal and fury of the contending parties ran to such an excess, that neither their churches, nor times and places of the most solemn worship were free from such outrageous tumults as were a scandal and disgrace to Christianity. In all which the Soltan, and his worthy son Al Kamel, bore no other part than in suppressing the most seditious and lawless, without interposing any other way that might interfere with their free choice; which was, on that account, protracted to an unusual length: but, as this is a subject foreign to our purpose, we shall refer our readers, for a further account, to the author quoted in the margin<sup>q</sup>.

Soltan Al Adel's death,
1218.

WE are now come to the year of the Soltan's death, which happened in that of the Hejra 615, and of his age 73, or, according to Ebn Shohnah, 74, and of his reign in Egypt 19, after having reigned 23 years in Damascus, as we have formerly shewn<sup>r</sup>. He had been very successful in his conquests, as well as in suppressing the frequent revolts which happened in his extensive dominions; and had added to them, but two years before, the kingdom of Al Yaman, or Arabia Felix; which his grandson Al Malek Al Mâsud Yusuf, the son of Al Kamel, had reduced, and took the king of it, named Soliman Ebn Shabishah, prisoner, and sent him in irons to Al Kayro<sup>s</sup>. Al Adel was then preparing for some other expedition, when a new and formidable armada of the Franks appeared again on the coasts of Dimiyat, or Damieta, and besieged it both by land and sea, and spread an universal terror through the kingdom; the news of which so affected the good old king, who was then at Damascus, and by that time so nearly worn out with fatigue and the infirmities of age, as well as the mortification to see his Egyptian dominions exposed to the furious ravages of the Christians, against whom he had till then been so successful, that it threw him into a lingering distemper, which carried him off in less than three months<sup>t</sup>.

Succeeded by his son Al Kamel.

WE have already given an account of his death, age, years of his reign, and number of children he left behind, in our former account of his Syrian dominions<sup>u</sup>; and have only to add here, that he was succeeded by his worthy son Al Kamel, whom he had so often made choice of to govern this kingdom in his absence. He came to the crown, however, in an unhappy crisis; on the one hand, his father dying in Syria, without having any of his sons about or near him, and his brother Al Moadhem, who first heard the news, coming into Damascus, and concealing his father's death till he had seized on all the treasure and valuables in the palace, and obliged the chiefs of that city and kingdom to swear allegiance to him; whilst

Great difficulties attending the beginning of his reign.

<sup>p</sup> Vol. ii. p. 63. ABU'LFAR. sub an. 608. EBN SHOHNAH, ibid. RENAUDOT, ubi sup. p. 564, & seq.
<sup>q</sup> RENAUDOT, ubi sup. p. 537, & seq. <sup>r</sup> Vol. ii. p. 68. <sup>s</sup> EBN SHOHNAH in an. Hej 613. ABU'LFAR.
& al. sup. citat. <sup>t</sup> ABU'LFAR. EBN SHOHNAH, & al. sup. citat. <sup>u</sup> Vol. ii. p. 67, & seq.

a his own treasury in Egypt had been in a great measure exhausted to supply that of Syria, where the bulk of his army and scene of war mostly lay.

ON the other, the Franks not only kept Damieta closely besieged, but made thence frequent and dreadful inroads into the country, and threatened its capital with fire and sword; Damieta besieged by the Franks. insomuch that the inhabitants seemed to place their chief refuge in flight, and were preparing to retire farther towards Upper Egypt, with all their most valuable effects. Within he had the Melchites to fear, who were numerous, and hated by the Moslems, on account of their friendship to the Franks, and their readiness to take all opportunities of joining forces with them; on which account they were more oppressed with taxes, and other hardships, than the Jacobites, who bore an equal hatred to the Franks and Mohammedans. What was still worse, b at this dangerous juncture, was, that a body of about 12,000 enthusiastic Moslems had made a furious irruption into the camp of the Franks before Damieta, and made a great slaughter, and did other mischief amongst them, and, in their way thither, amongst the Christians, before they could be suppressed; which so exasperated the vindictive besiegers, that they not only cut them all in pieces, but carried on their ravages and hostilities with greater fury and cruelty.

THIS was the sad state of the kingdom when Al Kamel came to the crown; the treasury exhausted of money, and the country of a sufficient force to make head against such powerful enemies, both within and without. All these dreadful prospects were aggravated, moreover, by the resentment and loud outcries of his Moslem subjects against the Christians settled amongst them, as the cause and promoters of these frequent and cruel incursions from Europe and Palestine. These were the real difficulties which that prince laboured under from the very beginning of his reign, and which forced him upon severe measures, which neither his courage nor extreme sagacity could help him to avoid. To this end, therefore, and to quash c at once the loud complaints of the Mohammedans against the Christians, he issued out an edict, by which he obliged all the latter, the clergy not excepted, to contribute to the carrying on of the war, either by entering into the service among the Moslems, or by procuring an exemption from it by dint of money. These exactions fell still heavier on the Melchites, for the reasons already mentioned, and obliged them to pledge their most valuable church utensils, to satisfy the large sums imposed upon them. Neither were their monasteries exempt from d paying such large quotas as reduced them to the lowest degree of misery. The Jacobites, though less obnoxious and suspected, were however obliged likewise to furnish vast sums of money; neither could that save their stately cathedral of St. Mark, in the suburbs of Alexandria, from being levelled to the ground; not so much, indeed, out of dislike to them, as e St. Mark's cathedral demolished. use of it as a fortress, to batter down and reduce that opulent city. It was, therefore, merely with a view of saving so considerable a place, that Al Kamel was obliged, much against his will, to order the demolition of that magnificent structure, to the great mortification and regret of all the Christians, especially the Jacobites, who beheld, with no small grief, the zeal and eagerness with which the Moslems executed the Soltan's orders, till the very last stone of it was removed from the ground on which it stood *. To stop likewise their further progress into the country, f the Soltan ordered the city of Al Mansurah, then running to ruins, to be rebuilt and well fortified, as it stood on the spot where the Nile divided itself into the two principal branches which form the Deltah. All these expences obliged him to raise the taxes on the Christians and Jews to a still more exorbitant height; and such vast sums were extorted from them, as forced great numbers of them to abandon the country, especially as the war had caused such an universal scarcity of corn and other provisions, that many of the poorer sort were famished to death; others, thro' A great scarcity thro' Egypt. despair, put an end to their misery; and great numbers among the rich renounced their religion, and apostatized from Judaism and Christianity, to free themselves from those heavy imposts. All this while the soldiery made no scruple to break into the granaries, warehouses, and habitations, of the merchants and other inhabitants, and carrying off all the corn and provisions they found in them with impunity; there being no possibility to suppress those disorders whilst the war with the Franks and the extreme scarcity attending it lasted, which was above two whole years; that is, till a truce was concluded between the Soltan and the Franks, which followed the surrender of Damieta to him †, as we shall see in the sequel.

IN the mean time we cannot forbear taking notice here of the strange and blind party zeal which reigned at this time among the Jacobite Christians, and which neither the heavy taxes with which they were beyond measure oppressed, nor the other calamities attending the war, could abate, in relation to the choice of a patriarch, in the room of the late John, whose see, by this time, had been vacant full ten years, but raged still as fiercely as ever; Strange disputes between the Jacobite Christians, 1226.

* ABU'LFED. ABU'LFARAJ, EEN SHOHNAH, & al. sup. citat. RENAUD. ubi sup. p. 572, & seq. Vol. ii. p. 70, & seq. † ABU'LFARAJ, & al. sup. citat. in an.

The Soltan's equity towards them.

Instance of his generosity to the monks, 1227.

To those of St. Macarius.

Damieta surrenders to the Franks.

Al Kamel forms an alliance with the Syrian princes.

Damieta retaken.

1220.

Deadly Contests among the Christians.

infomuch that, in spite of all their pretended pleas of poverty and heavy taxes, each party a was imprudent enough not only to apply to the Soltan, but to offer him very considerable sums, to induce him to interpose his authority in favour of, or opposition to, the priest Dawd, or David, the candidate in dispute: yet such was the exemplary equity of that prince, as to decline the offers and requests of either, without intermeddling farther in their differences, than by an exprefs prohibition to both to pursue any further such indirect and unjustifiable measures <sup>z</sup>.

ON the next year that monarch gave a fresh instance of his singular bounty and generosity to the monks of the great convent of the vale of Habib. In his return from Alexandria those fathers had given him and his retinue the best reception they were able in their present condition. In return for which he was pleased to order them some hundreds of sacks of wheat, flour, barley, beans, pease, &c. to be sent to them out of his own granaries, and exempted them from the heavy tax that had been laid on their monastery, as well as from other duties and forfeitures they were obliged to pay to the crown. He gave likewise leave to the monks of St. Macarius, who, for want of a patriarch, were without a superior, and on that account (and of the great impost they were obliged to pay to the crown at all such elections, when they were in no condition to pay) were dwindled to a very small number, full leave to chuse one from among themselves, and a full exemption from any future tax <sup>a</sup>. By this time the Franks had carried on the siege of Damieta with such vigour, in spite of all the strong fortifications which the Khalif of Baghdad, Al Motawakkel, had caused to be added to it, in order to render it an impregnable bulwark against the frequent incursions of the Greeks <sup>b</sup>, that it had been constrained to yield to their superior force, and to surrender at discretion, the Soltan being in no condition to succour it; the consequence of which was, the Egyptians were every-where so disheartened, and the enemy so elevated, that the total reduction of the kingdom was expected by both sides soon to follow that of Damieta. The Franks had been no less successful in Syria; so that the two Salehs, or kings, of Damascus and Aleppo, began now to fear their power more than ever, and to think, that if they were once masters of the one, the others would not be long able to stand out against them.

UNDER these distresses the Soltan had often applied to these two princes, in vain, for some succours from thence, and endeavoured to persuade them, from the motives of their mutual danger, to join forces with him against the common enemy; but had hitherto found them <sup>d</sup> too attentive to their own safety to be so far solicitous for his. He was at length obliged to take a journey thither, and try how far his presence would prevail upon them: and there it was that a strong alliance was formed between those three princes, for the recovery of Damieta, and the driving of the Franks out of Egypt. These accordingly marched directly to that city, and so closely besieged the Franks within, that, whether through want of provisions, or, as others will have it, through the misunderstanding of the chief commanders, they were forced to surrender much sooner than they hoped for, and the Franks to sign a treaty, by which they were obliged to restore that important place, with all its districts and appurtenances, to Soltan Al Kamel, and to agree to a mutual exchange of prisoners. This treaty was concluded in the 617th year of the Hejra; upon which Al Kamel took possession of it <sup>e</sup> two years after it had been wrested from him <sup>c</sup>, and the Franks evacuated the kingdom. This treaty, and the recovery of that important fortress, quickly restored peace and order every-where, and by degrees a plentiful supply of all kinds of provisions; while the Franks, through want of conduct and unanimity, lost the fairest opportunity they could have wished of making themselves masters of all Egypt <sup>d</sup>.

AL KAMEL being now happily rid of his imminent danger, and seeing his enemy at a convenient distance, was taken up in repairing the fortifications of Damieta, Al Kayro, and other places of his dominions, and in moderating, with his usual candour and equity, the feuds that still raged as much as ever between the partisans and opposers of the election of David to the patriarchate. These, it must be owned, were grown to such a height, as to give him no small uneasiness, whilst the Franks were so near him, and had such a powerful navy and army threatening him, and, what was still worse, the Melchite Christians, both numerous and ready not only to join with them, as being of the same principles, and using the same rites with them, but might easily prevail upon the malecontents of the Jacobite party to unite with them in the same interest. But now all those apprehensions from that quarter being happily blown over by the late treaty, and the most dangerous enemy so far removed from his coasts, he left those two factions at full liberty to wrangle amongst themselves about their election, whilst he applied his whole care in settling the most important affairs of his kingdom upon such a foot, as to be out of all further danger of a foreign invasion: and in this

<sup>z</sup> RENAUD. ubi sup. p. 574.

ABU'LFED. & al. sup. citat. Vol. ii. p. 71.

<sup>a</sup> Ibid. ibid.

<sup>b</sup> De hac, vid. supra, vol. i. p. 470, & seq.

<sup>d</sup> Ibidem Ibid.

<sup>c</sup> ABU'LFAR.

- a he succeeded so well, that whilst the Alexandrian church was torn in sunder by party rage<sup>c</sup>, his other subjects enjoyed a profound peace under his mild government, and himself all the advantageous opportunities his martial genius could wish for of extending his conquests abroad, especially in Syria and Palestine: in the carrying on of which he made frequent alliances with some one or other of his uncles or brothers, which seldom failed of turning to his advantage. But as these are out of our Egyptian limits, we shall refer our readers, for a fuller account of them, to the authors often quoted in the margin<sup>f</sup>, and to what hath been occasionally said of them in a former volume<sup>g</sup>. The misfortune was, that his successes, and the care of securing his conquests, did so engross his thoughts and time, that his Egyptian forces were gradually drained to supply those in Syria and Palestine; insomuch that in the space of five or six years, during which he had been pursuing them, his own dominions were become in some measure defenceless, when most in danger to be invaded anew. For the Franks, ever attentive to all his motions, were alarmed at every advantage either gained or lost in that war, and had been no less alarmed at his progress in the one, than inspired by his neglect of keeping up the strength of the other part of his dominions. But what most exasperated them against him, and spurred them on to make a fresh and powerful attempt upon Egypt, was his having seized on the city of Jerusalem, immediately after his brother Al Malek Moâdbdhem (who had been made Saleh of it), and caused it to be dismantled, in one of his expeditions into Palestine; since which time they had not ceased soliciting for fresh supplies of men and money from Europe, in order to make another attempt for the recovery of it out of his hands. As soon, therefore, as that desired reinforcement
- b was come over to them, which proved a very considerable one, they set about making all necessary preparations for a descent against him either in Syria or Egypt, as they found it most likely to answer their end. Al Kamel was soon informed of it; and, conscious of the weak condition to which his Egyptian dominions were by that time reduced, and how little able he was to make head against such a powerful armament, let it fall on which of the two kingdoms it would, saw himself obliged to enter into a fresh treaty with them; and which, after a short negotiation, was concluded between them.
- c The Franks attempt a new invasion against him.

- By this treaty, which, according to Ebn Shohnah, was signed in the year of the Hejra 624, Al Kamel was forced to yield to them not only the city of Jerusalem, but sundry other considerable places in Syria and Palestine, to preserve his Egyptian dominions from the threatened invasion: but upon this condition however, that that city should remain in its dismantled condition; that the Moslems should have their mosks, and other places of public resort and business, both there and in the other places ceded by the treaty, together with some other privileges<sup>h</sup>; which, if not exaggerated by our author above-named in favour of his Moslem hero, plainly shew that his affairs, even at that time, were far either from being desperate, or the Franks so formidable as they have been represented. Neither is it altogether improbable, considering the greater concern which that prince shewed at this juncture for his Egyptian dominions, that his frequent absence from, and excursions out of, that kingdom, were chiefly occasioned by the continual uneasiness and disturbances which the two turbulent factions of the Jacobites gave him by their applications and appeals, both before and after the election of their patriarch, and merely to keep out of the way of their troublesome complaints and solicitations on that account (K), as it had been the constant maxim of all his Moslem predecessors, both
- d The probable cause of his frequent absence.
- e Khalifs

<sup>c</sup> RENAUD. ubi sup. p. 576, & seq.

<sup>g</sup> Vol. ii. p. 68, & seq.

<sup>f</sup> ABU'LFARAJ, ABU'LFEDA, EBN SHOHNAH, & al. sup. citat.

<sup>h</sup> EBN SHOHNAH, in an. Hej. 625.

(K) It will not, we hope, be deemed an impertinent excursion out of our civil boundaries, if we give our readers a few instances of the extravagant height of zeal and fury to which those contests had been carried by both sides at this time. We have already seen how both factions had in vain attempted, by vast sums, to bribe that excellent prince to decide their contest in their favour by his own regal authority, and this at a time when they were greatly oppressed by the heaviest taxes, and made the loudest complaints of the poverty and misery to which they were reduced by them. Since that time they had held several chapters, not only without being able to agree in their choice, but every such convention had rather added new strength to the opposition, and fuel to their rage.

At length, after much wrangling and caballing, not only about the choice of a proper person, but about the manner of chusing him, whether by lot, voting, or balloting, which the reader may see more fully displayed in the author under-quoted (1), the turbulent and ambitious David, whom we have heretofore so often mentioned, and who had caused the most grievous disturbances in the Alexandrian church above twenty years, gained the prize more by dint of faction and bribery than by merit, to the no small mortification of his opposite party; who did not, however, let him long enjoy the patriarchal chair before they broke out into open war against him; branding him with the blackest vices of simony, avarice, bribery, &c. He was, however, confirmed by the Soltan, who was heartily glad, at any rate, to see an end put to a contest which had caused him so much inquietness, and his subjects so much disturbance; and was accordingly consecrated patriarch in the year of the Hejra 633, and of Christ 1235.

These two last steps, which his friends hoped would have at once quashed the fury of the opposite party, made it only break out with greater vehemence. They immediately began with exhibiting a great number of articles of impeachment against him and his electors; wherein, besides the above-mentioned crimes of simony,

(1) Renaudot, ubi sup. p. 577, & seq. Vid. & sup. vol. ii. p. 85, & seq.

His great successes.

Death and character.

1237.

Khalifs and Soltans, not to interpose their authority in any of their religious contests and con- a troverfies. But while he was thus taken up with affairs more agreeable to his martial genius, as well as more suitable to his rank, in which he had by this time spent above six whole years, during which those Christian contests had raged, and had subdued many considerable cities, and even whole provinces, in Syria, Palestine, Mesopotamia, &c. leaving all that time the government of his Egyptian dominions to his second son Al Ader, or Al Adar, whom he had appointed viceroy of that kingdom, in the height and full enjoyment of all his successes, scarcely ever interrupted by any but the Franks, he saw his Syrian dominions threatened by a formidable army of Tartars and Seljuks, against whom whilst he was making and directing all the proper preparations, he was suddenly overtaken with death, at his own Syrian capital Damascus, in the 20th year of his reign, and 70th of his age, and of the Hejra 635<sup>1</sup>, to the great surprise and grief of all his subjects, and more especially of his army, and of all b the learned men in his dominions, with whom he took a singular delight in conversing, and consulting them upon all proper occasions, not without eminent tokens of his esteem and munificence, and that not only with a special regard to such as excelled in the liberal sciences, but with a general beneficence to the whole body of them; for whom he erected and endowed public academies for most branches of learning, to say nothing of other public works of his both in Egypt and Syria, where, as we have already shewn, his candour and generosity extended themselves even to the Christians, tho' the feuds and contests of one set of them had caused him to moderate on the one hand, and the Melchites, by their friendship and conformity of religion with the Franks, his most irreconcilable enemies, had given so frequent occasion to their invading and ravaging both his Syrian and Egyptian dominions on the other<sup>m</sup>. c

BUT notwithstanding all these excellent qualities, he met with great opposition from his brethren and relations, and was obliged to engage in frequent wars and contests with them:
in which, however, by prudence and singular courage, he was able to defeat all their hostile designs, as well as the many revolts which were raised against him by his Emirs, both in Syria and in other parts of his conquered dominions<sup>n</sup>. So that, in spite of all these intestine oppositions from within, and the united forces of the invading Franks, who infested and disturbed the greatest part of his reign, it may be truly said to have been as glorious and successful a one as that of any one of his predecessors.

Al Adel chofin Soltan of Egypt by the Emirs.

AL MALEK AL KAMEL left at his death, among other issue, two sons who succeeded him, the eldest in the kingdom of Syria and his other conquests, and the other in that of Egypt: d this last, not by any assignment or partition of the late king, who appears to have died intestate, but by the free and universal choice of the Emirs and grandees of that kingdom. We have already observed, that this young prince, whose name was Al Malek Al Adel Abu Bekr, which last name he had assumed from one of his ancestors, had been for some years before appointed viceroy of Egypt, and where by this time he had by his address, and many public-spirited acts, so far gained the affections of the Egyptian Emirs, that they made no difficulty to elect him Soltan, tho' in wrong of his elder brother Nojmo'ddin, his father's successor:
so that the news of Al Kamel's death no sooner reached Egypt, but he was proclaimed Soltan by all the grandees, and inaugurated accordingly in his capital of Al Kayro, where they one and all took the oaths of allegiance to him<sup>o</sup>. The news of their proceedings soon reached e the ears of his elder brother, who was then taken up at Damascus in settling the affairs of his Syrian dominions; which he had no sooner done, than he hastened to Egypt, at the head of a numerous army, in order to wrest that kingdom out of his treacherous brother's hands. During his absence his capital of Damascus having being seized on by the united forces of the Sa-

<sup>1</sup> Idem ibid. RENAUDOT, ubi sup. p. 578, & seq.

<sup>n</sup> ABU'LFAR, & al. sup. citat. RENAUDOT, ubi sup.

<sup>m</sup> Idem ibid. Vid. & sup. vol. ii. p. 84, & seq.

<sup>o</sup> Idem ibid. Vid. & vol. ii. p. 85, & seq.

avarice, ambition, &c. they further accused him of having multiplied the number of priests to a monstrous degree; to have extended his authority beyond its due limits, by arrogating an illicit power, not only over the monasteries within his own patriarchate, but even beyond them, so far as even to consecrate a metropolitan for the city and diocese of Jerusalem, a thing till then unheard of. For all which, and many others of the like kind, they insisted upon having a synod called, to try and judge him; each party all this while strenuously applying to the Soltan for redress, in an indecent, and some of them even in a kind of tumultuous manner. To give the greater weight to their articles with the Soltan and divan, they likewise accused him of having embezzled large sums out of that money which was ordered to be levied on the ordination of every priest and monk, got him closely imprisoned, and forced him to submit to such new regulations and restrictions as they thought fit to impose upon him, as well as to relax or give up all his former illicit pretensions and incroachments: all which was done by the authority of a synod, convened and authorized to try and judge him; and who, by their prudent regulations and wholesome severities, and particularly by some new and more explicit canons in favour of their doctrine of Monothelism, restored for a short interval the peace of the Alexandrian church; tho' the Soltan did not live to have the pleasure of seeing it, as the sequel will shew.

Is it therefore to be wondered at, that, beset and tired with the continual sollicitations of two such contending parties, he should prefer the pursuit of his military conquests at a sufficient distance from them, to the fruitless efforts of quelling their wranglings and animosities by his presence and interposition?

- a heb of Abek and the Saheb of Emessa, as we have formerly seen<sup>p</sup>, he was obliged to submit to a treaty of partition with them; by which he had the kingdom of Egypt assigned to him, and entered it accordingly at the head of his forces, and that with universal acclamations of joy by all the Egyptians, even by those who had been most forward in electing and swearing allegiance to his brother; who, as he was informed on his march thither, had been seized, or, as the other writers have it, had been murdered, by his own servants<sup>q</sup>. He soon after possessed himself of the strong castle of Mount Gibel, which opened an easy passage into the heart of the kingdom, and thence proceeded to his capital of Al Kayro. He was no sooner settled on the throne, but reflecting on the fickleness of the Egyptian grandees, he set himself about the choice of such ministers as he might more safely rely on; and among them the famed Altashib Azzo'ddin Abdalazziz, whom he raised to the dignity of high chancellor of the kingdom. He also made an advantageous peace with the Franks for his greater security. We have already given an account of the main articles of it in a former volume<sup>r</sup>; and shall only add, that some of them proved a great mortification to the factious Jacobites, and their worthless patriarch, who had hitherto been so turbulent and troublesome to his predecessors, as we have already shewn in the history of the two former reigns. This obliged him to follow their maxim, and to turn their constant discords to his own advantage, by loading the former with the heaviest taxes, and dooming the latter to the severest fines for his simoniacal extortions; which brought a constant income into his coffers, at the same time that it so impoverished both sides, especially the patriarchs, that they dared not undertake any thing in favour of the Franks, their friends and allies, as being of the same communion, and of course his most inveterate enemies.

An. Hej. 637.
of Christ 1239.
Driven out by his elder brother;

who makes a peace with the Franks.

- THE better to strengthen himself in his Egyptian dominions, he not only followed the maxim of his predecessors in keeping up a numerous body of Mamluks, or Circassian slaves, of whom we shall have occasion to speak more copiously in the sequel; but most injudiciously increased them to such an exorbitant number, and raised them to such a height of power, that they soon after overturned the whole Egyptian constitution, seized the government, enlarged their conquests, and raised that kingdom to a greater degree of wealth and splendor than it ever had enjoyed since the reigns of the Ptolemys. We have already observed, that Salaba'ddin Ebn Ayub, the founder of this dynasty, had abolished the schismatical khalifat of Egypt, and obliged that nation to acknowledge that of the Abbasides of Baghdad. The better therefore to suppress the faction of the former, which was still very powerful, he was the first who undertook to form a powerful corps of militia from among the bravest and stoutest of his new upstart race of slaves, brought thither by myriads from the Turkish dominions by the plundering Arabs, and to have them carefully trained up in all the branches of martial discipline. His successors followed his example, and by the sole aid of that militia maintained themselves on the throne against all the opposition of the Fatemites. But Al Malek Nojmo'ddin, not satisfied with such a security, was the first who ventured not only to augment their numbers to an excessive height, but to introduce a corps of them into the portico of his palace at Al Kayro, whom he appointed for his life-guard, and to disperse a much larger number of them thro' other cities and fortresses of his kingdom; by whom he was informed of every thing that was done in his Egyptian dominions, and his subjects kept under a kind of tyrannic slavery: by which means these new upstarts became in a short time so powerful and insolent, as to occasion one of the greatest revolutions that ever had happened in that kingdom, and thereby put a final end to the Ayubite dynasty, as we shall more fully see in the sequel of this history.

Fatal fondness for his Mam-luks.

Mamluks who and whence.

- IN the mean time, while he was taking all these imprudent precautions for the securing of his Egyptian dominions, he was no less impatient to recover his Syrian ones out of his invading competitor's hands, well remembering how treacherously they were wrested from his own, and was only waiting a favourable opportunity to invade them at the head of a powerful army, which he was then raising with all possible speed both in Egypt and among his friends and allies. So intent and eager was he on this enterprize, that he hired a large body of Khowarazmians from the other side of the Euphrates to invade Syria, where they committed the most horrid carnages and barbarities, which we have given an account of in a former volume<sup>s</sup>, putting all to fire and sword, sparing neither age, sex, nor condition, burning and plundering all the towns, and even churches, where-ever they came; infomuch that he found himself obliged to send them express orders not to approach nearer his Egyptian territories.

Nojmo'ddin
prepares to recover his Syrian dominions.

Hires the Khovarazmians to invade Syria.
An. Hej. 642.

ALL this while Al Malek Ismael, the now Saleh of Damascus, was no less watchful over all his motions, and diligent in making the best preparations to oppose him; and to that end had, on the succeeding year, concluded a peace with the Franks, and, to attach them more

The Syrian Sa-lah prepares to oppose him.

<sup>p</sup> Vol. ii. p. 86, & seq.
p. 92, & seq.

<sup>q</sup> EBN SHOHNAH, in an. 638.

<sup>r</sup> Vol. ii. p. 88.

<sup>s</sup> Vol. ii.

Hej 641.
A. D. 1243.
Cyril the patriarch dies.

His rich effects confiscated by the Sol-tan.

Nojmo'ddin
invades Syria.

Defeats the allied Syrians and Franks.
Hej. 642.
A. D. 1244.

Retakes his capital of Damascus, and his other Syrian dominions.

Constrains Ishmael to accept a new treaty.

Enters Damascus in triumph.

Other conquests in Syria.

firmly to his interest, had yielded to them the cities of Tiberias, Jerusalem, Ascalon, and other a considerable places in Palestine, and on the Syrian coast <sup>1</sup>. This extraordinary cession did how- ever greatly offend his Mohammedan subjects: for which he made no other apology, than that he granted it to them for fear his Egyptian competitor should wrest them out of his hands; tho' hitherto there had no hostilities been begun between them, but only preparations both offensive and defensive; especially if we may credit Abu'lfeda and other Arabic writers, who date this cession three years earlier than Ebn Shohnah <sup>2</sup>: neither do we read of any invasion from either side, till some years after this we are upon <sup>3</sup>. However that be, nothing happened consider- able in this kingdom till the year of the Hejra 641, answering to that of Christ 1243, and that was the death of the patriarch of the Jacobites, after he had sieged some months above seven years in the Alexandrian church, and reduced his flock to the greatest poverty by his b excessive avarice and horrid exactions on them, under pretence of levying the heavy tribute which the Soltans had laid upon them; the care of which had by those politic monarchs been committed to him: so that he not only died unpitied and unlamented, but detested, and repre- sented as a monster of avarice and brutality by all the Christian as well as Mohammedan writers, and as such was prosecuted even after his decease, and accused of having embezzled vast sums of the Soltan's tribute to his own use, and heaped up an immense treasure, as well as vast quantities of the richest furniture, and other valuable commodities. Upon which the Soltan ordered his palace to be sealed up, his effects to be seized, and a severe inquiry to be made into his accounts, and, upon conviction, ordered all his ill-gotten wealth to be sold by auction, and the money, which amounted to an excessive sum <sup>4</sup>, to be confiscated into his own treasury. c He did not even spare the church plate, utensils, and other ornaments of value belonging to the churches under that patriarchate, but seized on them in the same manner; by which he heaped up an immense treasure into his coffers, whilst he left the deceased pontif hardly enough to defray the expence of a decent burial. On the following year, being that of the Hejra 642, and of Christ 1244, Al Malek Nojmo'ddin having advanced at the head of his Egyptian forces into Syria, and joined his hired Khowarazmians, he attacked the combined army of his com- petitor Al Malek Ishmael and that of the Franks, assisted by a numerous body of knights tem- plars, and gained a complete victory over them, in which the knights, fighting with their usual intrepidity, maintained their post till the last, according to the institutes of their order, and the oath taken at their admission into it, and either died sword in hand <sup>5</sup>, or were obliged d by a superior force to surrender themselves prisoners.

THIS action, in which the Syrians and their allies lost so great a number of their best forces, and had their camp and military chest plundered, proved so decisive in favour of the Egyptian Soltan, that it gave a new turn to his affairs in that kingdom, and was soon after fol- lowed by the reduction of its capital, against which that monarch sent his generalissimo, the warlike Maimo'ddin, at the head of a numerous army, and with the character of viceroy of his Syrian dominions. The siege was accordingly laid, and carried on with such furious vigour, that the garrison was forced quickly to capitulate, and to surrender it into his hands, on con- dition that they, and such of the inhabitants as were willing to retire, should be permitted so to do with all their effects. After which that general entered the city, but suffered not the plun- dering Khowarazmians to follow him into it, but assigned them some maritime places for their e garrisons, where they might be always ready at hand against all emergencies.

By this time Al Malek Ishmael, the Saleh of Balbek, and lately of Damascus, his competitor, was reduced so low by his many losses, and the defection of some of his allies, whom his strange behaviour, or perhaps more likely his late defeat, had alienated from his interest, that he was glad to submit to a fresh partition treaty, and not only to cede, but to renounce all future claim both to Damascus and other places, which Al Malek Nojmo'ddin had been possessed of in that kingdom, and to accept such other places as he should think fit to assign to him in lieu of them. We have already given an account of this treaty in the Syrian history <sup>6</sup>. After which Al Malek Nojmo'ddin once more entered that metropolis in triumph, and was received f with all the demonstrations of joy by his faithful Damascenes. As for Al Malek Ishmael, he retired as fast as he could to his old dominions of Balbek, to the great regret of the victorious Nojmo'ddin, who highly blamed his general for suffering him to escape, and sent his Vazir loaded with irons prisoner into Egypt.

NOJMO'DDIN afterwards pursued his conquests with uncommon success, and, if we may believe some of our authors, dispossessed the two Salehs of Balbek and Hemz or Emessa, and some of their allies, of their territories; tho' Al Makin, who lived about this time, mentions nothing of this last particular <sup>7</sup>. However, as those transactions do not so immediately respect

<sup>1</sup> ABUL'FED. & al sup. citat.
ABU'LFAR. RENAUD. & al. sup. citat.
subseq. hist. Malth. vol. vii.

<sup>2</sup> Confer ABU'LFED. & al cum EBN SHOHNAH in an.
<sup>3</sup> De his vid. vol. ii. p. 92, & auet. ibi citat.
<sup>4</sup> See before vol. ii. 93, et seq.

<sup>5</sup> ABU'LFED.
<sup>6</sup> De his vid.
<sup>7</sup> Conf. ABU'LFED. ABU'LFARAJ, EBN SHOHNAH. & AL MAKIN, in an.

a the kingdom of Egypt, we shall refer our readers to the account we have given of them in a former volume <sup>b</sup>.

By this time the Franks, who had sustained so considerable a loss by their late defeat, and were no less alarmed at the vast successes of the Egyptian Soltan, had made frequent and pressing instances with the European powers for fresh succours from thence; which were at length obtained from several courts, especially from that of France, which safely landed at Acca on the Syrian coast, in the year 647, under the conduct and command of their famed Lewis the IXth, since surnamed the Saint, and soon after were put into action by that prince both in Syria and Egypt. His first expedition accordingly, in the latter of these kingdoms, was against the city and sea-port of Dimyat, now vulgarly called Dimieta <sup>c</sup>, the fortifications and garri- son of which were at this time in no condition to make any considerable defence, and which surrendered to him almost as soon as his forces landed before it, the cowardly garrison abandon- ing the place at his first approach, as if seized with a panic, and fled by several ways out of it in the utmost disorder and confusion. The surrender of it proved, as was rightly deemed, a most effectual and speedy means to oblige Al Malek Al Saleh to withdraw his victorious forces out of Syria to defend his Egyptian dominions. He was then laying close siege to the city of Emessa, or Hemz, whose Emir was in alliance with that of Balbek and the Franks against him: but no sooner had the news of the loss of Damietta reached him, than he ordered the siege to be raised, and marched with all the speed he could into Egypt, to oppose the French monarch, and to drive him out of that kingdom. Unfortunately for him, he was seized in his march thither with a tumour in his thigh, which turning into a gangrene, put a speedy end to his life and reign, tho' not before he had made a severe example of his cowardly Damietan soldiers, whom he ordered to be hanged in their military accoutrements, as we have seen in a former volume <sup>d</sup>, where we have also given an account of his offspring and singular character, as well as some other circumstances of his disease and death, which need not be repeated here. He died in the 40th year of his age, and ninth of his reign, and was succeeded by his third son, the other two being dead before their father. He was surnamed Al Malek Al Saleh Moadbdebem Turan-Shah, the founder of the city of Salehiyah, for the conveniency of hunting. He was then at Hishn Caifa when his father died; but was proclaimed and acknowledged Soltan without any opposition, by the means and policy of a favourite slave of the deceased monarch, a woman not only of exquisite beauty, but of admirable sense, wit, and resolution, who artfully concealed his death till she had convened all the Egyptian Emirs and grandees, as well as the principal officers of the army, to take the oaths of allegiance to him, under pretence that it was done by his father's express order: all which was therefore readily and punctually complied with by them all, and she appointed to govern the kingdom till the arrival of the new king. What chiefly influenced those grandees to so unanimous and speedy a resolution, was not only the singular influence which that favourite female was known to have over the deceased Soltan, but more probably the great progress which Lewis was making in Lower Egypt, after the reduction of Damietta, who was making the speediest marches, at the head of his Franks, towards the capital of Egypt <sup>e</sup>.

e No sooner therefore had Al Moadbdebem received the news of his succession to the throne, than he hastened to the court, where he received the compliments and congratulations of the nobles, and the female favourite resigned to him the reins of government: immediately after which he put himself at the head of a powerful army, consisting chiefly of Mamluks, and of his hired Khwarazmians, and marched with all possible speed to oppose the invading Franks, and to endeavour to drive them quite out of his Egyptian dominions; a strong body of whom were by this time got as far as Al Mansurah, being detached from the main army, in order to go and surprise that place, which they had actually done, and entered it sword in hand, killed a great many of the garrison, particularly the Othman general Ebn Shah, as he was washing in a bath, and committed several other plunders and ravages, till overpowered by the volleys of stones, and other missile nuisances, with which the citizens overwhelmed them from the tops of their houses, they were obliged to abandon the town, as we have before seen <sup>f</sup>; the streets of it being so narrow, and the gates so strait, that their cavalry could neither defend themselves in the one, nor hardly escape thro' the other. At their return however to the Christian army, they gave their monarch such a promising account of what they had done, and of what they had observed of the strength and disposition of that of the Egyptians, that he immediately resolved to go and attack them at all adventures. The number and appearance of his own was such, as made the Soltan for some time hesitate whether they had best stand their ground against them, or retire. King Lewis, on the other hand, thinking himself sure of a victory, if he could but attack them in a plain, inadvertently ventured to lead his forces across the branch

<sup>b</sup> Vol. ii. p. 93, & seq.

<sup>c</sup> De hac vid. sup. p. 17, & seq.

<sup>d</sup> Vol. ii. p. 95.

<sup>e</sup> Vid. Ant.

<sup>f</sup> Vol. ii. p. 96.

of the Nile called Albimen, which divided the two opposite armies, without thinking of a King Lewis and his army soon filled the enemy with fresh courage: upon which they fell upon the Franks with such defeated; and made a much greater number of them prisoners, among whom was Lewis their king and he taken prisoner. commander, who having secured no place of retreat, was obliged to surrender himself to the superior force of the enemy.

How the elated Soltan treated his royal captive, as well as the particulars of this interesting action and victory, are variously recorded by the Christian and Moslem historians; for a more succinct detail of which we shall refer our readers to what hath been hinted of them in our Antient History, and in a former volume of this Modern part<sup>e</sup>: but they all agree to his being taken prisoner, and forced to redeem himself from his close confinement by an exorbitant ransom: to which the Moslem writers add, concerning the motives of his enlargement, that during this interval (if it might not be more properly stiled an interregnum, in which Shajr Al
Dor, supported by the head general, and those other Emirs of the Mamluks who were in her interest, governed the kingdom with an absolute sway), the young Soltan, vexed beyond measure to see himself stripped of all but the bare name and shadow of authority, was no less attentive to the more flattering, tho' fatal as they proved in the end, counsels and solicitations of a set of young Mamluks he had about his person, and of much about the same age, who were ever whispering in his ear, that the only effectual means he had left to extricate himself out of his present bondage, and to establish his own authority upon a sure foundation, against the overgrown power of the Mamluk Emirs and their female protectress, was not only to listen to the captive monarch's advantageous offers for his enlargement, but to clap up a transitory peace and alliance with him, and such other Christian powers as were most likely to assist him in the asserting of his own, and suppressing that overgrown and unnatural height of it, which his Emirs had usurped over him.

The Soltan suspected by his Mamluks; who revolt against, and assassinate him.

AN advice of this soothing and important nature was greedily applauded by the young Soltan: but as it was at the same time no less dreaded by the Emirs, who on that account had placed a sufficient number of spies about his person, could not be communicated, much less resolved on, with such secrecy, but they had timely notice given them of it before any step had been taken towards executing any part of it; a general alarm had spread itself over the whole body of them at Al Kayro, and as obstinate an insurrection made against the Soltan, as if he had already been guilty of some desperate attempt towards their total destruction. One of the most desperate of them, Rokno'ddin Abu'l-fatab, afterwards raised to the throne, having given him a most dangerous wound upon his first appearing to quell them, this unexpected indignity, joined to their loud clamours and scurrilous complaints, soon convinced the young sanguine prince that his presence would but exasperate them the more, and expose him to greater dangers:
 to avoid which he saw himself constrained to take refuge in an adjacent wooden tower, on the border of the Nile. Hither they pursued him with renewed fury, and fully resolved either to make him perish in the flames, or to overwhelm him with volleys from their fire-arms or other missile weapons, set fire to the tower, which was soon in a blaze on every side, and obliged him to throw himself in the river, where, endeavouring to save himself by swimming, they discharged such a dreadful shower of arrows, as put a fearful end to his life and reign<sup>b</sup>.

Hej. 644. A. D. 1250.

THUS perished the unhappy Al Malek Al Saleh Moadhdhem Turan-Shah, the last Soltan of the Ayubite dynasty, through the jealousy and overgrown power of the Mamluks, who had been the chief supporters of it during several glorious reigns against the Fatemite faction, and had been on that account so highly esteemed and favoured by all the Soltans of it, from Salaba'ddin, the first founder of the militia, to the unhappy reign of the unfortunate Al Malek
Turan-Shah (L).

SOON

<sup>e</sup> Vol. ii. p. 96, & seq. <sup>b</sup> ABU'LFED:

(L) We must not here pass by one circumstance mentioned by Ebn Shohnab, though omitted by the other Moslem writers, which will in some measure account for the jealousy which the Mamluks had conceived against their young prince, so near the beginning of his reign, and in the height of so many promising successes.

He tells us (1), that after the glorious victory obtained over the Franks which we have lately related, Turan-Shah removed from Al Mansurah to Fares Cur, where (whether elated with his success, or exasperated at some of their insolent behaviour, we are not told) he took upon him to rebuke and threaten them in such severe terms as raised the insurrection we lately mentioned, and ended in that atrocious catastrophe we have there related.

It was indeed hardly to be expected that such an upstart race of slaves, and who had been looked upon and treated as the chief support of the Ayubite dynasty, and so signally distinguished and intrusted by Al Malek Al
Saleh, the father of Turan-Shah, should bear to hear themselves reproved and threatened by that young elated

(1) Ebn Shohnab, in an.

prince;

- a Soon after this sad catastrophe the Mamluk Emirs assembled, and invested Shajr Al Dor, Shajr Al Dor the late Soltan's favourite, with supreme authority, and caused her to be proclaimed, crowned, <sup>proclaimed</sup> and prayed for, as Soltaneſs of Egypt, with the additional title of Omm Khaled, or Queen-Mother, as she had had a ſon by the Soltan Al Malek Al Saleh, named Khaled, who died in his tender years. She had not however enjoyed that dignity long before thoſe very Emirs, who had raiſed her to it, whether aſhamed to ſee the Egyptian kingdom governed by a female and a ſlave, or becauſe they obſerved her election to have diſgusted the Egyptian grandees, <sup>Depoſed and</sup> ſhewed as much readineſs to have her depoſed from it, and choſe in her ſtead one of their prin- <sup>Al Moez</sup> cipal Emirs named Al Moez Azzo'ddin Aybek Al Turkoman, toward the end of the former <sup>choſen in her</sup> Rabi, on this ſame year. His reign however proved but ſhort; for the Emirs, whether out <sup>room;</sup>
- b of diſlike to his government, or perhaps aſhamed that they had not rather choſen one of the Ayubite family to that dignity (M), of whom there appeared ſo many equally fit for, and more juſtly intitled to it. Upon which they made no ſcruple to depoſe him, and conferred <sup>who is alſo</sup> the ſovereignty of Egypt once again upon the Ayubite race. The perſon they made choice of <sup>depoſed, and</sup> was Al Malek Al Aſbraf Muſa Ebn Al Naſer Yuſef Ebn Maz'ud Ebn Al Malek Al Kamel, <sup>Al Moez</sup> one of the deſcendants of the late famed Soltan Al Kamel, a child but ſix years old, and <sup>Aſbraf choſen</sup> crowned him Soltan on the 5th day of the former Yomada. His election and ſupreme authority were ſoon after confirmed by the Khalif of Baghdad, Moſta'ſem, then on the throne; who, on account of his minority, appointed Azzo'ddin Aybek his governor, or guardian of the realm. This laſt, tho' veſted with ſuch an authority, did not forget to ſtrengthen himſelf
- c by proper alliances; and one of the firſt public acts which he did was the concluding and ratifying of a treaty, which had been ſet on foot between Al Malek Turan-Shah and the Franks, upon condition that the latter ſhould reſtore to the new Soltan the town and caſtle of Damietta; which was accordingly complied with, together with the other conditions agreed on between them, and mentioned in a former part of this work <sup>1</sup>, and the place put into the hands of the Egyptians on the 8th of Saſar of the ſame year. Soon after which king Lewis left the kingdom, and returned into Syria; and a while after ſet ſail for his own dominions.

- ANOTHER public act of his, which was no leſs acceptable to the Ayubite family, was to
- d cauſe the interruption, which had been made in their ſucceſſion to the Soltanat by the election of the chief Emir Al Malek al Moez, to be expunged, by inrolling the date of his pupil's reign from the unfortunate murder of his predeceſſor. We meet with nothing after worth notice, either concerning his government or his young pupil's reign, except ſome hot conteſts they had with Al Malek al Naſer, the Saleh of Damaſcus, till the year of the Hejra <sup>The end of the</sup> 652; in which happened that new revolution, which put a final end to the Ayubite dynasty, <sup>Ayubite dy-</sup> and totally deprived all the princes of that family from having any further power or intereſt in <sup>naſty.</sup> this kingdom.

- THIS remarkable event was brought on by no leſs a perſon than the late Mamluk depoſed
- e Soltan Al Moez Azzo'ddin, who, by the aſſiſtance of his wife Al Shajr Al Dor, whom he had married after his election, as well as by his own intereſt with the Mamluk Emirs, was become powerful enough to get the young Al Malek depoſed from the Soltanat, and himſelf to be reſtated into that dignity; by which he became the founder of a new dynasty. But this new race of Mamluk Soltans, ſo famed for their power, opulence, and conqueſts, we ſhall refer to our Supplement, where we will endeavour to recite their hiſtory, and give a more explicit and ſatiſfactory account of their origin, extract, riſe, and diſcipline, than has ever yet appeared.

<sup>1</sup> See before, vol. ii. p. 97, & ſeq. See alſo ABU'LFEDA, & al. ſupra citat.

prince; and eſpecially if pre-acquainted with his deſign of entering into an alliance with the Franks, which, in ſuch a criſis, might be ſuppoſed to have been aggravated with all the alarming circumſtances that could excite them to a revolt; without expreſſing the moſt lively tokens of anger and reſentment at his ſuppoſed ingratitude; till the conteſt being blown up, as may be reaſonably ſuppoſed, by mutual reproaches on both ſides, hurried them to that horrid parricide which we have ſeen.

(M) Ebn Shonab doth indeed ſeem to intimate the ſame, who tells us (2), that he met with his tragical end about five years after having cauſed Shamſo'ddin Lulu and Dhia'ddin Al Kaymari to be put to death before his face, for having cut off Al Malek Jebonael with his own hand, and for ſome other acts of the like tyrannic nature; which have been mentioned in a former part of this work (3).

(2) Ebn Shonab, in an. Hejra 655.

(3) Vide ſup. vol. ii. p. 98.

S E C T. III.

The history of the African islands.

HAVING given a full account of the history and present state of Egypt, we are obliged, by unavoidable reasons, to deviate somewhat from our original plan, which proposed that the African islands should be separately described.

THIS, we have observed, would render many parts of the history of Africa obscure, by references to those islands, of which we now enter upon a description; reserving Malta only to fill up the space appropriated in our proposals to the African islands.

WE shall begin with the islands situated at the mouth of the Red Sea, and trace them along the continent, first from north to south, then round the Cape of Good Hope to the gulph of Benin, and from thence along the Slave, Gold, Ivory, and Grain Coasts, to the Cape de Verdes; concluding with Madeira, and those islands situated the nearest to the Streights of Gibraltar and the mouth of the Mediterranean.

Bab-el-Mandel.

In this order, the first island that occurs is Bab-el-Mandel, or the Port of Affliction, formerly called the Island of Diodorus, situated towards the entrance into the Red Sea, joining one side of the Streights of Bab-el-Mandel, and lying under the 13th degree of north latitude (A). Standing in the very middle of the Streights, about four miles from the Arabian coast, and the same distance of Abissinia, directly opposite to Cape Zeila, it divides the entrance into two canals, both which it fully commands; insomuch that the ancient kings of Egypt used to fortify them by a boom or chain laid across from the island to the continent on each side. Pigafet, however, affirms that the western canal is five German leagues over, and navigable by the barges and shipping; whereas the other is much narrower, and blocked up with shoals and sand banks; an assertion which is denied by the most authentic writers (B). It is about five miles in circumference; and important on no other account than its situation, as it produces neither fruits, roots, grain, or herbage. Formerly, however, it occasioned bloody wars between the Abissinians and the Arabs of the kingdom of Adel, falling into their hands alternately, till the Portuguese took it, and demolished its fortifications. The Turks being now masters of both coasts, it is sunk into its natural nothingness, and is in a manner deserted, having only a few poor mean inhabitants, for whom it scarce provides a moderate sustenance<sup>a</sup>.

Suachem.

NOT far from hence lies the island of Suachem, or Suachin, according to Marmol, having the Red Sea on the west. It is about five or six leagues in circumference; though Rosario speaks of it as a very small contemptible island.

Barbora.

OPPOSITE to the kingdom of Adel is situated the island called Barbora, after a town of the same name upon the neighbouring continent. The inhabitants are negroes, clothed in the fashion of the natives of Adel, industrious in trade, and great breeders of cattle, for which the soil affords excellent pasturage. In general, all the inhabitants of the islands and coasts of the Red Sea drive a considerable commerce with the natives of the opposite coast of Arabia; however, the rich trade carried on by the Moors of Ziden in drugs, precious stones, ambergrise, and musk, in which the islanders partook, is greatly diminished since the Dutch established so powerful a commercial empire in the East Indies<sup>b</sup>.

Socotora.

THE next island is that of Socotora, or Sicutthera, discovered about two centuries since by Ferdinand Pereira, a Portuguese, and by some moderns believed to be the Dioscorides of Ptolemy and Pliny. It stands to the north-east of Cape Gardafui, or Gardafoy, called in some maps Rafulgat, and placed about 75 miles from this promontory, in the latitude of 12

<sup>a</sup> LA CROIX, tom. iv. p. 3. sect. 12.

<sup>b</sup> MARMOL, tom. i. p. 32. LA CROIX, tom. iv. p. 157.

(A) La Croix places it under twelve degrees fifty minutes north latitude; and this geography corresponds pretty nearly with all the best modern maps.

(B) Gottrard de St. Bernardin observes, in his voyage to India, that the Streights of Bab-el-Mandel are situated under 12 degrees 40 minutes, between two capes; that on the African side being called Rosbeb, and the other on the Arabian coast, Ara. Immediately between these points is the island of Mium, between which and the Asiatic side runs a canal a league over, and about six fathoms in depth. The other canal that divides it from Africa is 12 fathoms deep; but the coast equally inhospitable and dangerous to shipping, affording not a single harbour where the anchorage is tolerable, or the vessels sheltered from the storms that frequently blow here. In a word, it requires the greatest dexterity in piloting, the utmost caution, and the most accurate knowledge of the middle channel, to pass this gut with safety (1).

(1) Bernard. apud La Croix.

<sup>a</sup> degrees 10 minutes north, according to De Lisle, or 12 degrees 50 minutes, if we follow La Croix, and a number of other writers. Mandesloe, undoubtedly by an error of the press, places it in 21 degrees 40 minutes, having Melinda to the north-east, and to the south the continent of Arabia, from which it is about 16 leagues distant <sup>c</sup>. Most authors agree in its being of considerable extent, no less than 25 leagues in length, 19 in breadth, and about 50 in circuit. All the surrounding shore is bold, every-where filled with safe anchorage and good ports; and it has in particular two fine bays and secure harbours, where the shipping ride safely against every wind that blows. These are called the harbours of Benin and Cora.

It is amazing that a place so often touched at by Europeans, by lying so near Egypt, so much frequented by all the trading nations, should be so variously and contradictorily described by different authors; some affirming that it has only one town, called Tamart, or Tamary; <sup>b</sup> others that it has three, the former being the chief; and others, that there is neither a town, village, or house, on the whole island, the natives living in dens, caves, and burrows, dug under ground, the more effectually to shelter them against the scorching beams of the sun. Mandesloe, indeed, asserts that Tamary is a place very considerable for its extent, buildings, strength, and populousness, having a fort mounted with cannon, that commands the sea-port, and a fine palace, the residence of the viceroy. Whether this be so or not, it is agreed upon all hands, that the island is populous and fruitful, under the government of a prince (Soltan), who was tributary to the Cheriffs of Arabia, and now probably to the Porte.

Most of the inhabitants are Mohammedans, stiling themselves Arabs; and indeed their <sup>c</sup> manners and language bear a strong resemblance, if they be not altogether the same. The whole country abounds in cattle and fruit, with which, and some other commodities, they trade to Goa, where they are better received than the native Arabs, who are not permitted to enter that town without passports. The produce of the island consists chiefly in aloes, frankincense, ambergrise, dragon's blood, rice, dates, and coral (C), which are transported from Goa over many parts of the Indies, and to all the kingdoms in Europe; whence arise great profit to the traders, and advantages to the inhabitants, who are luxuriously supplied with all the necessities of life, in exchange for their commodities. Formerly they had a more immediate intercourse with Europe, by means of the East India shipping, which frequently stopt here, when disappointed of their passage, either by being too early or too late for the monsoons; <sup>d</sup> but now the stated period of those winds are so well ascertained, that this port is intirely neglected.

THE climate, says Dapper, is exceeding hot; to which he ascribes the short continuance of rain, which seldom exceeds two or three weeks in the season. This defect, however, is happily remedied by heavy dews, occasioned by the lofty mountains, whose tops are always covered with snow, so high as to stop the clouds, condense them, and afterwards dissolve them in a kind of heavy mist or fog, which thoroughly waters the earth. There are besides some rivers rising from springs, which are never affected by the driest seasons; and on the coast are some wells dug by the Arabs, tho' other parts are totally destitute of water.

ALL the inhabitants are either natives of Socotora, or Arabs; these calling the former by the <sup>c</sup> name of Beduins, or stupid brutes. They are distinguished into two sorts; the inhabitants of the coast, who intermarry with the Arabs, and are called Half Beduins, and those of the interior parts, who rigidly adhere to their own customs, and reckon it a heinous crime to mingle blood with foreigners. These last alone are the true Beduins, more fair than the Indians, and so beautiful in their shapes, that they might, says Dapper, pass for handsome Europeans; yet are they deceitful, lazy, and cowardly, suffering themselves to be in a manner enslaved by a handful of Arabs, and attending nothing besides husbandry and pasture; both which are chiefly carried on by the women. Their food consists of milk, butter, rice, dates, and the flesh of their cattle; and their cloathing is greatly inferior to that of the rest of the inhabitants, who seem to make use of all the benefits of their situation and commerce, at the same time that <sup>f</sup> they want the personal advantages of the former; for they are of a mean stature, dusky complexion, lean habit, hideous in their features, but hardy, healthy, and strong, to an extreme <sup>d</sup>. With this account La Croix perfectly agrees, except where he asserts that, in general, they exceed the common stature, and have short black frizzled hair. They feed upon fish, flesh, milk, butter, and vegetables; the common dish being a composition of all these boiled together, with which they eat bread, rice, or, when these are wanting, dates, which they form

<sup>c</sup> MANDESLOE, apud Harris, tom. i. p. 754.

<sup>d</sup> DAPPER, ibid. THEVET, l. iv. c. 11.

(C) The aloes brought from thence, called Socotorina angustifolia spinosa, flore purpureo, is easily distinguished by its glossy surface and transparency from every other kind of this plant. It is sent to Europe in lumps wrapt in skins, of a yellowish red colour before it is broke;

but, when reduced to powder, of a bright gold colour. Its taste is bitter, accompanied with an aromatic flavour, but too weak to prevent its being disagreeable. After all, it is by much the most tolerable of the whole species, and most in use in the shops.

into a kind of paste. The above composition they chiefly use in sickness, esteeming it a kind of panacea, capable of removing all manner of diseases; an opinion to which they are so rivetted as to be blind to repeated experience.

As to their dress, the fashion differs in the several parts of the island; and some writers assert, that the native Beduins go intirely naked, except a small bit of cloth tied round the loins, and suspended in form of an apron. Others again say, that they wrap up the privities in a kind of pouch, this being all their cloathing; whilst Thevet affirms, that the body is covered with a long robe, and the head with a cap made of goat-skins. The women go bare-headed, and wear only the cloak and gown of Camboline, or a shift made of goats hair. In general, this is the dress of the island, and hangs down in a train behind, not unbecoming, tho' extremely incommodious, on account of the heat of the climate; for their method is to tie it round the body like a girdle, when they are at work.

THEY salute by kissing the shoulder; are intirely ignorant of arts, insomuch that, but for the commerce of the Arabs, they would be destitute of every conveniency of life. Reading and writing, and the more liberal arts, they are, if possible, still more ignorant of, and deem it learning enough that they are able to reckon their cattle by nitches made on a piece of wood; yet they are extremely ingenious in the Camboline manufacture, which is a beautiful stuff, formed out of such coarse materials as goats hair.

OSSORIUS asserts, that the natives are prohibited polygamy, confining themselves to one woman during her life; but all modern geographers deny this to be true; affirming that their fortunes and inclinations are the only restrictions: and that they divorce them at pleasure, either for a time or for ever. They may even be the fathers of children, without being obliged to maintain either the women or children, after they are delivered, provided only that, during her pregnancy, she declare to whom she will give the child, when it sees the light. For this purpose, the father kindles a fire before the door of his hut or cave, and then makes proclamation that he will give away the infant, of which his wife is on the point of being delivered. After this, he fixes upon some particular person for its adoptive father, to whom the infant is carried immediately after its birth. Here it meets with all that tenderness, kindness, and those careffes which are denied it by the unnatural father, is given to a nurse, and ordered to be fed with goats milk. These children are called the sons or daughters of smoke; and it frequently happens that a good-natured man, who is himself incapable of getting one, shall have the honour of rearing a dozen children, upon whom he bestows all the affection of a real parent. This is perhaps one of the most extraordinary and unnatural customs that history can instance, as it seems to be founded upon no principle of religion, policy, or inclination, but upon mere caprice only; for it is common with a father, who exposes his own, to adopt the children of others, and requite, by his kindnesses to the latter, the good offices done to the former.

THE Socotorans are no less singular in another custom, which equally reflects upon their humanity; for they commonly bury their sick before they have breathed their last, making no distinction between a dying and a dead person. Indeed their prognostics are infallible; and how should it be otherwise, when they never permit nature to make those vigorous efforts, which it frequently does towards a crisis, and in the last extremity. They esteem it a duty to put the patient as soon as possible out of pain; and make this their request to their friends, when they are on the sick bed, which, in all acute disorders, may be called the death-bed. When the father of a family finds himself thus circumstanced, and apprehends that his dissolution is near, he assembles his children around him, whether natural or adopted, his parents, wives, servants, and all his connections, whom he strenuously exhorts to a compliance with the following articles of his last will: never to admit any alteration in the doctrine or customs of their ancestors; never to intermarry with foreigners; never to permit an affront done to them or their predecessors, or a beast stole from either of them, to go unpunished; and, lastly, never to suffer a friend to lie in pain, when they can relieve him by death. Such are the extraordinary requests of the dying man: after which he makes the signal to have the last of them performed upon himself, and expires. Frequently this last duty is performed by means of a white liquor, of a strong poisonous quality, which exsudes from a tree peculiar to this island, of which no writer either gives the name or description. Hence it is, that legal murders are more common here than in any country in the world; for, besides the inhuman custom last-mentioned, the other requests of dying men produce numberless quarrels, and entail family feuds and bloodshed upon their posterity for generations, by taking revenge of the injuries done to their ancestors.

THEIR chief magistrates, next in rank to the Soltan, are the Cacis, or Hodamos, who judge and determine in all causes political and ecclesiastical, civil, or criminal. Those Hodamos hold their employment for a year; but the shortness of its duration is compensated by the extraordinary power and dignity annexed to the office; it being the loss of an arm to touch a bit of stick, or a cross, the badges of their authority, with which they never part while

- a while they are in employment. There is no appeal from this tribunal, nor can the successor reverse any decrees passed before his coming into office. If a man pinched with hunger, and ready to perish with famine, relieves his necessities by stealing a sheep or goat, he immediately takes sanctuary in a temple; but if he be overtaken by the lawful owner, before he has met with any person in the asylum, then he loses his right hand; for, in that case, say they, he entered the temple contrary to the will of heaven, as was apparent by no one's being ready to receive him there *.

- b It has been supposed by some authors, that the Beduins were Christians of St. Thomas, or Jacobites; that St. Francis Xavier converted many of them to the true faith; and that the custom prevalent among them, of assuming the name of some saint, is an evident proof of their religion. But Dapper justly observes, that the calendar of saints affords no such names as Lacaa, Sumaa, Xambe, Taramo, and such-like, the only appellatives known in Socotora. The mistake, he believes, arises from their giving the name of Maria to women; but Maria, he affirms, is only a generical term in their language; and in this he is followed by La Croix. It is true, they practise the rite of circumcision, and are so scrupulous in this superstition, that they cut off the fingers of those whose parents have neglected to perform the operation upon them, or have themselves refused it; but this is a custom, as we have already observed, common among all primitive and barbarous nations; witness the negroes on the coasts of Africa, of America, and the inhabitants of the islands of the Terra Australis, or southern continent. It is likewise true that they observe Lent, or at least fasts equivalent to it, which they begin to observe at the new moon of March, abstaining for the space of 60 days from milk, butter, flesh, fish, and living wholly upon dates, rice, honey, and vegetables; procuring the honey from Arabia, in exchange for aloes and frankincense. They have altars and crosses; but as they are intirely ignorant of every tenet of the Christian church, nothing certain, we think, can be deduced from ceremonies and usages handed down by tradition, of which they can give no manner of account, or for which they cannot produce a single reason. Nay, so far from being followers of Christ, they are, if we may credit the most authentic vouchers, gross idolaters, and worshippers of the moon, which they esteem as the creative principle of all things; a notion extremely inconsistent with Theism, much more with Christianity, and the doctrines of redemption. In great droughts they assemble in a solemn manner, and offer up their petitions to this luminary. They make a public sacrifice to her towards the beginning of Lent, and offer up whole hecatombs of goats in honour of her; they enter into their temples whenever the moon rises or sets, and practise several other religious ceremonies, - which prove them to be the zealous votaries of this inconstant deity, and totally ignorant of the principles of the true faith. La Croix relates, that, at the rising and setting of the moon, or more probably at the new and full moon, they make a solemn procession three times round their temples, or moquamos, and thrice round their burying places, striking against each other two pieces of odoriferous wood, about a yard long, which each man holds in his hands. This ceremony they perform three times in the day, and as often at night; after which, putting a large cauldron, suspended by three chains, over a great fire, they dip into it splinters of wood, with which they light their altars, and the porch of the temple. They then put up their prayers to the moon, that she will enlighten them with her divine countenance, shed upon them her benign influence, and never permit foreigners to intermix with them. There is also an annual procession made round the temples, preceded by a cross, the whole ending upon the priest's clapping his hands together, as a signal that the moon is tired with their worship. Others say, that the signal consists in cutting off the fingers of the person who holds the cross; in recompence for which he has given him a stick, with certain marks, prohibiting all persons of whatever degree or condition to molest or hurt him ever after; nay, to aid and assist him with all their power, in whatever manner he may require their help, and to respect and honour him as a martyr to religion, under the penalty of corporal punishment, and the loss of an arm †.
- f THIS account of La Croix is perfectly consistent with what Sir Thomas Roe relates, in his journal, of the religion and manners of the natives of Socotora. From the last-mentioned writer we shall further observe, that he found the inhabitants of this island to consist of four different sorts of men; viz. of Arabs, whom the king of Caxem had sent to keep the island in subjection to him; of slaves to the prince, who are employed in preparing aloes, expressing it, and putting it into bladders; of Beduins, the primitive inhabitants of the island, who were banished to the mountains till they submitted to the yoke, and agreed to breed up their children in the Mohammedan religion; and, lastly, of savages, with long hair, who live naked in the woods, and refuse all society; perhaps the forcerers and magicians mentioned by Marco Paulo in his travels ‡.

* DAVITY, t. v. fol. 6;7. MAFF. l. iii. OSSOR. l. v. † LA CROIX, ibid. TENSEL. in vit. Xav. l. i. c. 8. ‡ MARCO PAULO, apud HARRIS, t. i. p. 622. LA CROIX, t. iv. p. 150. BAUDRAND, sub hac voce. BOWER'S geog. t. ii. p. 507. DAPPER, ubi sup. LA MARTINIERE, p. 87. 3. 2.

To the above account of the Socotorans, it may not be improper to add the general character of them given by Mandefloe, who was an accurate observer and describer of manners. They live, says this writer, chiefly upon fish, roots, and fruit. They use their women, who are chiefly Arabians, with great tenderness; but are so jealous that they never permit them to be seen by a stranger. As they are crafty and deceitful themselves, so they are suspicious of the same insincerity in others; they adulterate their commodities, and expect that those they deal with have done the same. The island affords some indifferent oranges, tobacco, citrons, and cocoa-nuts; but they seldom come to maturity, on account of the stony, dry, and sandy soil. Their chief commodity is aloes; and they have also dragons blood, and keep great numbers of civet-cats; so that this commodity may be purchased at Socotora for three or four crowns per ounce, which shews how plentiful it is; but, unhappily, there is no method of being secured from fraud; for they find methods of adulterating even the civet.

THE Socotorans have no wild fowl, and great scarcity of tame; yet are not destitute of cows, camels, asses, and sheep, with goats, whose hair upon the thighs is curled in the manner in which satyrs are painted. Their arms are swords with large hilts, without a guard, poniards with long blades, which they constantly wear stuck in their girdle, and fire-arms, which they manage with some dexterity, but cannot keep in order, or free from rust; so that in a few weeks they are rendered useless. They are remarkably expert in the use of small bucklers, which they wield in such a manner as to protect every part of the body, and are wounded only when their shoulders are pierced or cut down by blows. Though they live in an island, and trade with the continent, they are ignorant of navigation, and have no other vessels than flat-bottomed fishing-boats, with which, however, they weather great storms. The torrents that tumble down from the mountains like rivers, either in rainy weather, or when the snow on the tops of the mountains is melted by the sun, sufficiently supplies all foreign shipping with water. Though they are Mohammedans, yet they worship the sun and moon; Christians or infidels, their religion is a strange mixture of truth and infidelity (E). But one would imagine that idolatry and paganism prevail, from the solemn processions and sacrifices made to those luminaries.

BETWEEN Socotora and Cape Gardafui stands another island, called Abdal Kurin, possessed chiefly by Arabs, whose manners have nothing particular. Of this island we find no mention made in voyages, or by geographers.

THE next islands with which we meet, according to Jean de Castro, an accurate Portuguese voyager, are a cluster of small islands, called the Seven Sisters, or, as others imagine, the Two Sisters, between Socotora and the island of Abdal Kurin; besides Sarbo, Shama, Dallaka, and Massua, on the Abissinian coast; all of them inhabited, well watered with wells and rivulets, stocked with cattle, and covered with grain, grass, and fruit-trees*.

St. Mary Island.

WE next come to the islands situate round Madagascar; and first to the island of Saint Mary, called by the islanders, and the inhabitants of Madagascar, Nossi Ibrahim, or the Isle of Abraham, lying betwixt 16 and 17 degrees of north latitude, opposite to the mouth of the river Manangbara, and about two leagues from the shore. The length from north to south is about eighteen leagues, and its breadth near three from east to west. To the south of it there stands a small island, separated by a narrow canal, not above three fathom over, so fertile, rich, and abundant in grass, fruits, &c. that the inhabitants of Saint Mary send their cattle thither to fatten, and lay out large plantations of rice, corn, roots, and fruits; notwithstanding which they have not thought proper to plant any colony in it. This is probably the same island which Flacourt places in the bottom of the bay of Antongil, which he highly praises for its beauty and fertility, as well as for the safety of its harbour, once much frequented by the Dutch, in their early voyages to the East Indies†. As to the island of Saint Mary, it is surrounded by rocks, over which the canoes pass when the sea is high; but at low ebb they are scarcely covered with a foot of water, which renders the coast dangerous, and, but in certain places, inaccessible to shipping. On every part of the coast, large quantities of white coral,

* PREVOST, t. i. p. 192.

† FLACOURT'S Hist. of Madagascar, c. xviii.

(E) In that curious discourse of Abu Zeid Al Hassan, in Purchas, we find the following account of their Christianity:—When Alexander subdued Persia, his preceptor Aristotle, with whom he corresponded, wrote to him to look out carefully for the island of Socotora, that produced aloes, a famous drug, without which the medicinal biera could not be made up. He advised him to remove the inhabitants, and to plant the island with Greeks, that they might send aloes into Greece, Syria, and Egypt. Accordingly Alexander gave the necessary orders to dispose them, and to settle a new colony. Then he commanded the governors, whom he had appointed over the dominions of the conquered Darius, to protect this infant settlement, which remained in paganism till the time of Jesus Christ. After this, and as the gospel was propagated in Greece, the Socotorans embraced the faith, after the example of the other Greeks, their countrymen, which they, as well as the inhabitants of the other islands, have preserved to this day (3).

(3) Etiam apud Harris, vol. i. p. 540.

- a and great variety of shells, of the most beautiful shapes and colours, are found, which the natives used to carry to the French factory at Madagascar, and now sell to such of the European shipping as happen to touch there. The whole island is divided by rivers, brooks, and running springs, that give fertility to the soil, and beauty to the scene, enriched on every side by plantations of rice, millet, yams, fruit, and all kinds of vegetables; of which two crops are produced yearly. Fine large sugar-canes grow spontaneously; and this island is capable of being improved into a very valuable sugar colony. They have also the tobacco plant in greater perfection than on the island of Madagascar; and indeed equal to that of America. The air is extremely moist, there being hardly a day in the year in which it does not rain within the compass of twenty-four hours, and frequently a week without any intermission.
- b Their cattle are fat and good, are never confined within folds or fences, but permitted to wander about at full liberty, in every part of the island; their own sagacity preventing their damaging the plantations. A considerable quantity of ambergris is found upon the eastern shore, which the inhabitants gather to make offerings of incense to their Ammonougues, or the tombs of their ancestors. There are also several kinds of gum produced here, which they use in perfumes, particularly Tacamabaca, of a fragrant delightful odour, approaching to that of lavender and ambergris (F). Though the virtues of this resin are reckoned very inconsiderable in Europe, the negroes of St. Mary island judge far otherwise; and experience, we are told, has confirmed their opinion; for they apply it with great advantage externally, for discussing and maturating humours, and abating pains and aches of the limbs; and indeed the fragrance of the finer sort would seem to indicate other intentions and virtues, and its being applicable to higher purposes (G).

SINCE the French were settled on St. Mary's, it is become much more populous than before; nor dares the chief of Antongil now set foot on the island, though formerly he used to carry fire and sword amongst the poor natives, and was a scourge which they dreaded more than famine and pestilence. There are at present ten or twelve villages, and at least 700 natives, of Zafe Ibrahim's, or sons of Abraham. Their sovereign or chief, called Raignasse, the son of Rafiminon, that is, chief of the race of Abraham, is also acknowledged the head of this sect all over the island of Madagascar.

- d THE islanders employ themselves in cultivating rice, yams, peas, beans, and all kinds of pulse, on which they chiefly live. They are particularly fond of catching, by nets or hooks, a kind of fish they call Hourills, which they carry for sale to Madagascar; every fiftieth being paid as a duty to the sovereign. They will, on no consideration, ally themselves to Christians, though they live upon good terms with them; probably from some faint remains of their antient Judaism.

- e WE shall next describe the island of Mascareique, Mascarenbas, St. Apollonion, or Bourbon. Island of Bourbon. The two former names were given it by the Portuguese, who were the first discoverers; the third it had from all the Europeans till the year 1654, when the Sieur Flacourt, governor of Fort Dauphin and all the French settlements in Madagascar, taking possession of this, called it Bourbon; by which name it is now generally known. It stands east of Madagascar, under 21 degrees 30 minutes south latitude, about 370 miles distant from the coast of that island. Its form is oval, thirteen leagues in length from east to west, and ten in breadth from south to north; in all about forty-six miles in circuit. Although Flacourt took possession of Bourbon in the king's name, yet no colony was established here till the French had abandoned Madagascar; on which occasion a considerable settlement was fixed here in 1672. There are many good roads for shipping round Bourbon, particularly on the north and south sides; but hardly a single harbour where the ships can ride secure against those hurricanes which blow during the monsoons. Indeed the coast is so surrounded with blind rocks, sunk a few feet below the water, that entrance into the harbours, at least coasting along the shore, is at all times dangerous.

- f ON the southern extremity there is a volcano which continually spews out flames, smoke, and sulphur, with a hideous roaring noise, terrible in the night to mariners; no less so, says La Croix, than the island del Fuego of the Cape de Verdes, mount Hecla of Iceland, and we may add mounts Ætna or Vesuvius. There is an island, of which we know not the name, standing about twenty leagues from this volcano, that would seem to be wholly formed of the ashes and liquid minerals thrown out by it. In crossing over the island from south to

(F) This gum, or, more properly, resin, is sent over in round shells, and bears a high price in the shops, though, in general, the American Tacamabaca is substituted in its room, and the most used.

(G) The natives tell us of a tree of the growth of this island, the fruit of which takes root in the ground immediately after its dropping off the branch. This tree they call Thiout, and the French, Vouthiout (4).

(4) La Croix, t. iv. p. 561.

north, you meet with a fine plain, six miles in circumference, with a lake in the middle, and a river flowing from each side of it, that divides the island into two parts.

THE climate, though intensely hot, is healthy, being refreshed by cooling gales that blow morning and evening from the sea or land. Sometimes, however, terrible hurricanes shake the whole island almost off its foundation, and affright the inhabitants, but generally without any other bad consequence. No country can be more happily watered than Bourbon; every side of which is refreshed by rivulets, springs, and murmuring brooks, which tumble in delightful cascades down the crevices and chinks of the mountains into the sea. To most of these the French have given names, calling them all rivers, as the great river of Golet, St. John's river, the Eastern river, and the rivers of St. Giles and St. Stephen.

THE island abounds in fruit, grass, and cattle; though before the French settled upon it, the latter were hardly known, and the country was almost a desert. It produces excellent tobacco, which the French have planted there; aloes, white pepper, ebony, palm, and other kinds of wood and fruit-trees spontaneously. It even yields wood fit for ship-building, and a great variety of trees that yield odoriferous gums and resins; among the rest, benzoin of an excellent kind, and in great abundance. Notwithstanding the quantity of white pepper shrubs, they never could discover either the plant that bears the black pepper, or cubebs, though this last has been frequently found with the inhabitants. The rivers are well stocked with fish, the coasts with land and sea tortoises, every part of the country with horned cattle, as well as hogs and goats; the former imported from Europe, and since exceedingly multiplied. The pork here is reckoned delicious, and attributed to a very extraordinary cause; namely, the hogs living upon turtle, which connoisseurs in eating affirm gives a flavour, delicacy, and richness, to the flesh, beyond what they have ever tasted in other countries (H). Like Ireland, this island is remarkable for harbouring no noxious or poisonous animal; and possibly both accounts may deserve equal credit. Certain, however, it is, that before the French settled there no man ever saw a mouse, rat, ant, gnat, serpent, toad, or any other animal offensive or troublesome to men. Ambergrise, coral, and the most beautiful shells, are gathered upon the shore. The woods are filled with game, such as turtle-doves, paroquets, pigeons, and a great variety of other birds, equally beautiful to the eye, and pleasant to the palate.

IN the year 1654, one Anthony Jameau, a Frenchman, with seven more of his countrymen, and six negroes, went from Madagascar, with leave from the French director, to settle on the island of Bourbon. With them they carried some cows, calves, and bulls, which they coupled with some other cows and bulls that had been sent thither five years before, and had multiplied from a very few to the number of thirty in that space of time. On their arrival, Jameau and his companions built huts for themselves, laid out plantations of tobacco, melons, and all kinds of fruits and vegetables; but all their labour was rendered useless for that season by a terrible hurricane, that destroyed every thing, overturned their huts, rooted up their tobacco, and laid the whole fields waste. After this, waiting till the next sowing season arrived, which was not before the month of November, or three months after the hurricane, Jameau and his companions had leisure to make the circuit of the island, and discover its true situation and produce. In this tour they found nothing of the smallest use in trade, except aloes, ambergrise, and coral; though they had the pleasure of discovering that the country, in beauty, exceeded their utmost wishes, and promised equal fertility. They renewed their labours; and it was amazing to see with what vigour every thing they planted sprung up, as if all the exotic seeds they had carried with them had been indigenous to the soil. Here they remained in the midst of plenty, and all the felicity of our first parents in paradise, for two years and eight months, before one ship touched upon the island, or the smallest bark from Madagascar; when, beginning to weary of every pleasure, without the enjoyment of a more numerous society, they resolved to put themselves on board an English ship that touched there about that time, and carried them to Maderespatan, then an English factory on the Comandiel coast, together with a considerable cargo of tobacco, benzoin, ambergrise, and coral, that they had cultivated and collected during their stay (!).

ABOUT

(H) This relation, La Croix says, he had from three Frenchmen banished hither from Madagascar, before a settlement was formed. They lived here three years in exile, by order of the governor, feeding all that while upon hogs flesh, without bread of any kind, rice, yams, or any other sort of food. All this while, though half the time naked, they enjoyed perfect health; a circumstance which they wholly attributed, though falsely, to the wholesomeness of the pork. Indeed La Croix seems to look upon the air and pork of Bourbon as an infallible remedy for the worst diseases.

(I) This English vessel was probably captain Castleton, who gave it the name of the English Forest; though, by a mistake of the date, this voyage is quoted by many authors as if it happened thirty years before this event. He made strong remonstrances to the company about establishing a factory in it; but the same reasons which have since deterred the French from settling in it, prevented

- a ABOUT forty leagues east of Bourbon stands Maurice Island, by some thought to be the true Apollonia, and believed by Flacourt to be altogether fictitious; though later discoveries have certainly ascertained its existence. The Dutch, who first touched here in 1598, gave it the name of Maurice, in honour of the prince of Orange; though the island generally goes by the name of Mauritius. Some writers believe it to be the isle of Cerne, which Pliny mentions; and is placed by the antient geographers in 18 degrees 30 minues south latitude: an opinion that overthrows itself, as Maurice Island stands in 21 degrees of the same latitude. It is of an oval form, about 150 leagues in circumference, with a fine harbour, says Mandesloe, capable of holding fifty large ships, secure against any wind that blows, and an hundred fathoms deep at the entrance *. This harbour is called after the name of Jacob Cornelius Van Neck, who was admiral of the second Dutch Squadron sent to the East Indies †; or rather, we believe, that touched at this island.

THE climate here is extremely healthy and pleasant: the island is filled with mountains, covered with the best ebony in the world, and various other woods of value; and watered with pleasant rivers, well stocked with fish. When the Hollanders first arrived, they found it quite uninhabited, and consequently uncultivated; nor did it produce any kind of cattle, besides deer and goats; though now every field lows with cows and oxen, and bleats with sheep. Some of the mountains are so high, that their tops are covered with snow, and so hid in thick clouds, that frequently it is impossible almost to breathe, or to see where to step even at mid-day. Every part of the island is now applied, after the manner of the Dutch, to some particular use, not a spot being left uncultivated; and though the soil be not the best, yet have they raised all the fruits of Asia, Africa, and Europe, together with tobacco, rice, and whatever else is wanted for the conveniency or use of life. Was the earth less stony, and in any degree comparable to that of Bourbon, those industrious republicans would long before now have made the island of Mauritius the paradise of the world; but, besides this, it is so filled with the roots of trees, that it is an inconceivable labour and expence to clear a plantation.

- BESIDES the ebony of Maurice Island, it produces two other kinds of wood, greatly resembling it in quality; one red, the other yellow as wax. The woods abound with such quantities of birds, and so tame, that they may be taken by one's hands. On the coast is an extraordinary species of swan, which we will not venture to describe after La Croix, as it seems to be a creature of his own imagination; at least so extraordinary a bird would require the best authority to attest its existence, before we can believe that it is found only in this one island, and this single author.

THE Dutch have a fort, well mounted with cannon, and garrisoned with fifty men; besides which there are, or at least there have been, upwards of eighty families on the island, who keep a great number of slaves employed in the plantations. Here they touch in their passage from the Cape of Good Hope to Batavia; and as neither of these colonies are well stocked with timber, it is probable they are supplied from Mauritius. It is said they have a great number of saw-mills on the coast; which corroborates the conjecture that a quantity of timber is shipped off from hence; but the reason the Dutch first possessed themselves of the Mauritius was, that they might have a place of refreshment between Europe and India; having at that time no other, the colony at the Cape not being established. So long a voyage required that the seamen should rest and recover themselves from the fatigue and sickness which generally attend long confinement, and the putrid habit contracted by eating salt provisions in a hot climate. For this purpose, next to the Cape, they could not have fixed upon a better place than the island of which we are now speaking; whose temperature, fresh water, fruits, timber, and secure harbour, give it every advantage over any other beyond the Cape.

- UNDER the latitude of 19 degrees 50 minutes south stands the island of Diego Roderiguez, about 22 leagues east of Madagascar, says La Croix; though Roberts, De Lisle, and other geographers, place it at least that distance east of Mauritius. That it is inhabited, is all that voyagers relate of it. In the 16th degree of south latitude, directly opposite to the coast of Sofala, are placed, by late geographers, the islands called by the Portuguese, Ilhas Primieras; and other islands, called Angoxas, in number four, opposite to Mozambique (K).

* MANDESLOE, ubi supra, p. 756.

† LA CROIX, t. iv. p. 572.

vented the company from attending to Castleton; namely, the danger of the coast, and the badness of the harbours. The French, however, claim the property of the island of Bourbon; but for what reasons we know not.

(K) We cannot help taking notice of the ignorance or carelessness of most of the modern compilers, both French and English; an instance of which now occurs: some of them placing these islands west, and others east, of Madagascar. Certain it is, that all the best maps place Roderiguez east of the Mauritius.

HERE are also several small islands, called Utiques, placed by La Croix opposite to Cape St. Sebastian on the coast of Sofala, and under the latitude of 24 degrees, nine miles from the continent; yet these we have reason to believe to be the little cluster of islands which stand off St. Sebastian, on the north-west end of Madagascar, east of the Comorro islands. They produce rice, millet, and great abundance of cattle; there is also ambergrise found on the sea-coast, which the Moors collect and export to different parts of the continent. But the most valuable commodity of these islands is a pearl-fishery, which might turn to good account, if the natives understood their virtue, and did not spoil their colour and transparency, by boiling the oysters in which they are found. In this kind of merchandize do the inhabitants, who are all Mohammedans, traffick with the neighbouring islands, with Madagascar, and the continent.

Madagascar Island.
Different names, and discovery of it.

THIS great island, the largest in the world, called generally by geographers Madagascar, and, in the language of the country, Madecase, or, according to Thevet, Albargra, and, by the Persians and Arabians, Sarandib, was discovered by Laurence Almeida, who first anchored in this island, A. D. 1506.

HE commanded a fleet of eight ships, and was son of Francis Almeida, the first viceroy sent to the East Indies by the king of Portugal *. The Portuguese denominate Madagascar Ilha de San Leoranzo, or island of St. Laurence; notwithstanding the island was sufficiently known, and the former name established amongst the Europeans. Whether it obtained the name of St. Laurence from Laurence Almeida, the discoverer, or from the day of the discovery, is uncertain; the more probable opinion is the latter, from a prevailing custom amongst the Portuguese and Spaniards, of calling all their new acquisitions by the name of the saint on whose festival they were made.

GASPAR DE SAN BERNARDINO, in his travels by land to India, following Damiano de Goez, pretends that the sea-coasts were discovered A. D. 1508; that, shortly afterwards, Rui Pereira de Coutinho travelled through the interior parts; and that Tristran de Cunha sailed afterwards round the island, by command of Alfonso D'Albuquerque. Many have been of opinion that this island was known to the ancients; that Pliny called it Lerne, and Ptolemy, Mennuthias; but it is certain, that the ancients had no knowledge of any southern country beyond Sierra Leona.

Situation.

THE island extends in length from north north-east to south south-west beyond the line, and begins, says Flacourt, from the north point in 11 degrees; by the account of Francis Cauche, in 12, and some minutes; or, according to Pyrard, in 14, and ends in the south point in 26; which is from Cape St. Sebastian to Cape St. Mary. The distance, according to Linschoten, from Cape Corienthas, on the continent in Africa, is 126 leagues, from the coast of Sofala 110, and 44 from Mozambique.

Extent of the coast.

THE length from south to north is 200 German leagues; and, according to Linschoten, 220, breadth 70, and circumference 600 (L). The sea rolls with great rapidity, and is exceeding rough at the flowings and ebbings of the tide, between the island and the continent of the Cape of Good Hope, forming a chanel or passage, which, at the western entry, is 85 leagues broad; in the middle, where narrowest, and opposite the island Mozambique, 44; but farther on eastward is extremely wide, and contains many islands. All European ships, in their voyages to and from India, unless forced by storms into other courses, generally sail through this chanel.

Figure.

THE eastern coast of this island extends directly from the north north-east to south south-west, from Cape Itapore, or Fitorah, situated in 25 degrees 6 minutes of south latitude, to the bay or gulph of Antongil, and from thence directly north to the end of the island. From Cape Itapore to the country of Caremboule the coast extends westward, and forms in a manner the figure of a quarter of a circle. From Caremboule to the mouth of the river Sacabiti, the coast extends north-west; and from Sacailte to the 17th degree of south latitude, almost north, inclining a little eastward; and from thence to 14 degrees, directly north, the extremity of the island.

THE whole coast is divided by rivers, which have their springs in the inland countries, and discharge themselves in the sea. There are many bays and gulphs, abounding in good roads and harbours; the greatest part of the south coast, from Cape Itapore to Caremboule, was inhabited by Europeans, chiefly French, who abandoned the island, through the mismanagement and bad conduct of the directors of their East India company.

* Soric, Hist. of Portugal, p. i. p. 248. LINSCHOT. DAPPER, LA CROIX, & mult. al.

(L) Francis Cauche makes the circumference amount to 800, length to 260, and breadth in one place, 100 French leagues.

a IN this part is the bay or gulph of Dauphin, thus named from Fort Dauphin, erected near French first in this place; in the language of the country, Tholongare, situated between two points; one is possession, Cape Itapore, in 25 deg. 30 min. of south latitude; the other called the point of the bay Tholongare, or Dauphin, in 25 deg. 10 min. of the same latitude. The bay of Caremboule is thirty leagues from Fort Dauphin, and is known to Europeans by the name of the Dutch Burying-ground: a body of Dutch, who had escaped being shipwrecked, repaired there <sup>b</sup>, and were most of them massacred by the natives of Caremboule. There is another bay in the south point of Madagascar, in the route to East India, called the bay of the Sun.

THE French claim the honour of first discovering the maritime countries between the bay of Antongil and the bay of St. Augustin; although the Portuguese, in all their voyages to East b India, have constantly, since the year 1506, anchored in this island, and improved their discoveries. The Dutch have followed their example; yet neither have ever penetrated so far into the country as the French <sup>c</sup>.

GREAT quantities of iron and steel are found throughout this island, which their artificers Iron and steel forge and purify with less difficulty and labour than Europeans. They reduce the ore, as mines, brought from the mines, into powder, upon burning coals, place it between four stones, which are clayed round for the purpose, and, by continual blowing underneath with bellows, made in the shape of gun-barrels or water-pumps, the ore runs in less than an hour; the metal is afterwards extracted, and, by great heat, is formed into bars of three or four pounds weight. The provinces of Mabafalle, Anachimouffi, Ivoronbeoc, Icondre, and Manamboule, c abound in mines of fine steel; and, in all parts of Amboule, Anossi, Matatana, and Manghabei, the iron is of such excellency as to differ very little from steel.

THERE are no silver, copper, lead, or tin mines; though Offorio, upon what authority Silver we cannot say, affirms that there are several of the former: but it La Croix, and his author, may be depended upon, what silver there is in the island was chiefly cast upon the coast by a Dutch East India wreck. Mr. Drury confirms Offorio's account, and speaks of silver in the mountainous and inland parts of the country, and of a white metal, much like to British tin <sup>d</sup>.

THERE are three sorts of gold; the country gold, called Malacassa, is of a different nature Gold from the gold made use of in Europe, pale, and as easy to be cast as lead: an ounce is d worth no more than twenty florins. The gold from Meqûa, called Voulameneraaca, was brought by the Rhoandrians, and is good and fine; the third sort is that imported by the Christians, called Voulamen-Voutrouva. The Malacassa gold is that which was formerly found in the country, of which there are mines in the province of Anossi, and in every quarter of the island, if credit may be given to the negroes. This gold is of three kinds; one sort exceedingly fine, called Liteharonga; another coarser, called Voulamenesoutchi; and a third, a middling sort between the preceding two, called Abetlavau.

THE rivers and brooks are rich in various kinds of precious stones, in chrystal, topazes, Precious stones, granates, amethysts, eagle-stones, emeralds, sapphires, hyacinths, jaspers, and blood-stones, called by the natives Rhabamanga, and by physicians by the Greek word Hematites, cornelians, c and touchstones.

THE waters in several provinces are extremely particular, running under ground, and afterwards appearing impregnated with the juices they draw with them; and in this manner receiving the different tastes and qualities inherent in the metals and places through which they flow. In the valley of Amboule is a fountain of hot water, esteemed a sovereign remedy against all disorders proceeding from cold in the nervous parts; and the same water, taken inwardly, cures asthma, and all disorders of the lungs, removes obstructions in the loins and spleen, and expels the gravel. Qualities of the waters.

THERE are in several places mineral springs: a brook runs in the province of Anossi, near Fort Dauphin, whose water the French and negroes call iron-water. Near the valley of f Amboule springs of salt water are found upon a high mountain, sixty miles distant from the sea; and the natives make salt of those waters. There is a spring likewise upon a mountain near Manghafia, whose water produces pitch. Eastward of mount Hiela are streams of white water, with the taste and smell of brimstone; and in the provinces of Houlouwe and Ivoronbeoc, the ditches are full of saltpetre. These are convincing proofs that almost every mineral species lie concealed in the bowels of this island.

MADAGASCAR is divided into 28 provinces; Anossi, or Carcaussi; Manatengha, or Manam-pani; the valley of Amboule, the country of Vobitsbang; Itomampo, Icondre, Vatmanabon, Anachimouffi, Eringdrane, Vobits-Anghombe, Manacarongha, Matatan, Antavaree, Ghallem-boulou, Tametavi, Sabaveh, Voulovilou, Andovouche, Manghabei, Adcimou, Mandrerei, Ampatre, Caremboule, Mabafalle, Houlouwe, Siveh, Ivoronbeoc, and Machicore. Division of the island into 28 provinces.

<sup>b</sup> RENNEFORT, LA CROIX, &c. Madagascar, p. 393.

<sup>c</sup> Id. ibid.

<sup>d</sup> History of Portugal, p. i. p. 284. History of Ma-

Rivers.

THE chief rivers in this island are those of the Franchere, Acondre, Imanbal, Manambatou, Mangbafia, Harangazavac, Fautac, and Sauma, in the province of Anossi; Manampani, in the province of Manatengba. In the province of Vohitsbang the rivers Manatengba, Aviboul, Andraghinta, Sandravinangba, Manambondrou, Massianach, and Manangbare. In the provinces of Itomampo, Icondre, Vatemanabon, Manamboule, and Anachimoussi, the rivers Itomampo, Jongbainou, Maropie, and Mangbarac. In the provinces of Manacharongba and Matatana, the river Manangbare. In the provinces of Antavare, Anachimoussi, and Ambohitsina, the rivers Avibabe and Sacavil. On the coast of Tametavi to the bay of Antongil, the rivers Manangbourou, Manansatra, Morimbo, Simiame, and Manangbare. In the provinces of Ampatre, Manangbare, and Caremboule, the river Mandrerei. In the provinces of Mahafalle, Houlouwe, Siveb, and Ivoronheoc, the river Jongbelabe. In the province of Mabicore, the rivers Ongbalabe, Ranoumene, Rancumaintbi, Sabavianba, Soumaudo, Manatangb, and Manfiatre.

The province of Anossi.

THE province of Anossi, or Carcaussi, or Androbeizaba, is situated in 23 deg. 18 min. of latitude, and extends from the province of Manatengba to the river Mandrerei in 26 deg. Most of the several rivers above-mentioned, which water this province, run into the Franchere, Ramevate, or Immour, whose spring is in the mountain Mangbage, and discharges itself in the sea in 25 deg. 18 min. of south latitude, two small leagues from Fort Dauphin, having received the rivulets Acondre, Imanbal, Manambatou, Andravoule, and several others, which run down the different mountains in this province, and are enlarged by the mixture of their waters. The mouth is often stopped, and the course to the sea interrupted, unless kept open by the overflowings of great rain and high tides. The water runs salt one league above the mouth, and particularly in a free communication with the sea. A lake is formed at the mouth, called Ambouc, half a league wide, and with depth sufficient for any ship, if the mouth was constantly open; which might be easily effected.

Cape St. Romain.

CROCODILES breed in this and every river in the island. The French call the cape, half a league distant from the mouth of the Franchere, and which, from the north-west along the coast, runs six or seven leagues into the sea, St. Romain, and the negroes Cape Ramevate, or Heboale. When the cape is passed, the coast forms a great bay, in the shape of a cross, which extends to the point of the river Dian Panrouge, or Pitorab. The land runs out in the middle of this bay, and almost forms a peninsula, called Tholangare. Fort Dauphin lies to the north of this peninsula, and Port Dauphin over-against it. The French call this bay or gulph, from Tholangare to the river Dian Panrouge, Dauphin Bay, and the country lying between the coast of Tholangare and Cape St. Romain, the bay of Sivoure, from a lake of that name, which overflows in great rains, and forms itself by six or seven rivulets running into it. The other point of Dauphin Bay is called Cape Itapore; and near it is another great bay, called the Bay of Loucar and Itapore, from the name of a river, which, running from the spring in the adjacent mountains, discharges itself in this place in the sea, in 25 deg. of latitude. This bay is convenient for shipping and boats, which may ride there with great safety, though the entrance is rocky and dangerous. A small island, called by the French St. Clair, lies near; and behind that a harbour. The river Mangbafia is next, and runs cross a bay of the same name into the sea; and large ships may anchor there: the river is in 24 degrees 30 minutes, is navigable, and its spring is in mount Siliva. About half a league farther to the north-west is another small river, called Harangazavac. Manambatou, remarkable only for the rocks at the entrance, is a league and a half from the river Mangbafia. The two following small rivers, Fautac and Sama, have no mouth; but, when swelled with heavy rains, run into the sea. This province includes several islands and peninsulas along the coast. The country is beautiful, and fertile in pastures for cattle, and abounds in fruit-trees; and, if carefully cultivated, would produce every necessary for life; surrounded by high mountains, and diversified by numerous hillocks and fruitful plains.

Fertility and pasturage.

Towns on the river Franchere.

THERE are several towns on the river Franchere, and other rivers that flow into it, which belong to the chief of the country: the most remarkable are, Franchere, Imanbal, Cocombes, Andravoule, Ambonnetanba, Maromamou, Imours, Marofoutouts, and Fananghaa; besides numerous villages and hamlets throughout the country. Hatore is seven leagues from Fort Dauphin, and is under the government of the dian of Mandonbouc. The Portuguese formerly had a fort near this place, on the top of a steep rock, and several buildings below, with inclosures, that furnished all sorts of provision for their subsistence; but were massacred by the neighbouring people.

THE mountains in the province of Anossi are covered with wood and shrubs; and, about four leagues distant from Fort Dauphin, the adjacent hills are quite destitute of leaves. The French often dug in this neighbourhood, expecting to meet with silver and gold mines; and were extremely fond of a particular place at no great distance, where springs of running water flow near each other, and empty themselves afterwards in one river. They found in this river several stones and heaps intermixed with yellow clay, and a great quantity of black and white spangles shining like silver, which they carefully pounded and washed; but the separated matter a matter proved too light. About sixty yards above these springs, to the top of the mountains, the grass, and every sort of vegetable, appears half-dried and yellow, from a metalline sulphur which gives that colour; but the top is covered in every part with a verdure both fresh and delightful. It is reported, that the Portuguese, who dug at the foot of this mountain, on the north side, found gold; and that the place where they dug, after they had been drove out by the chiefs of the country, has been since filled up. Gold mines discovered by the Portuguese.

WHITES and negroes inhabit this province: the whites are distinguished, and form three estates or different degrees, by the names of Robandrians, Anacandrians, and Ondzatfi: the negroes are also subdivided into four classes; viz. Voadziri, Lobavobits, Ontsoa, and Ondezes. The whites, who came and settled in this island about two hundred years ago, are distinguished by the name of Zaferamini, or Rabimini, from Imina, the mother of Mohammed, or, according to others, Zaferamini, or race of Ramini, from whom they say they descend; or from Ramnania, the wife of Rabourod, the father of Raba i, and of Racouvatsi. The Robandrians are distinguished from the others. Whites, or Zaferamini, are the first in dignity and credit above all the people of this province; and when they proceed to the election of a king, whom they stile Ompiandrian, or Dian Babouache, the sovereign is chosen from the Robandrian race; next to him the others hold the rank of princes, and are honoured as such by all the subjects. The Anacandrians are descendents of the chiefs, but who have degenerated, as the bastards of princes, or sprung from a Robandrian, Anacandrian, or Ondzatfi black woman. These are likewise known by the name of Ontampassemaca, or people from the sandy parts of Mecca, from whence they report they came with the Robandrians. The hair of the Anacandrians is long, and hangs down in curls like the Robandrians, with red skins. Both enjoy the privilege of killing beasts. The Ondzatfi, the lowest of these people, are descended from the bastards of the Anacandrians, and the offspring of those sailors who brought the Zaferamini to this country, or their predecessor Dian Racoube, or Racouvatsi. The skins of the Ondzatfi are red, and their hair like that of the Robandrians and Anacandrians: they are permitted to kill no animal, except a chicken, and are all fishermen. Three different sorts of white inhabitants.

THE negroes, in the language of the country called Onton Mainthi and Marinh, are distinguished into four classes, as above-mentioned. The Voadziri are the most powerful and richest of the negroes, are masters of several villages, and descended from the original lords of the country, reduced under the dominion of the Zaferamini, who came and settled there: they enjoy the privilege of killing beasts, their own, or subjects or slaves property, when at a distance from the whites, or Zaferamini, and no Robandrian or Anacandrian in the village. The Lobavobits are also chiefs among the negroes, and descendants from the Voadziri; with this difference, that one commands a whole district, and the jurisdiction of the others extends over their own village and family. They are also permitted to kill those beasts they intend to eat, when at a distance from the whites. There are many, notwithstanding, who affirm, that they have no power to kill either ox or cow, though their own property, and obliged to send for a Robandrian or Anacandrian for that purpose, rich as they are, having stocks of eight hundred head of cattle. The Ontsoa are near relations, and next to the Lobavobits. The Ondezes, the lowest of all in the sense of the name, Ondeze signifying a lost man, are originally slaves by father and mother, bought, or made prisoners in war. The Anacandrians and Ondzatfi, or Voadziri and Ontsoa, in the hour of death, have the greatest difficulty to resign themselves; they cannot support the separation from their children, and part in the greatest concern and anguish of mind; being certain that the chiefs, to whom they are subject, never fail, according to custom, to rob them of their cattle, and every thing they possess, leaving a bare and naked field for them to cultivate with rice, and to plant all other necessaries for their support. The Voadziri, Lobavobits, and Ontsoa, enjoy the liberty of submitting themselves, upon the death of their lord or king, to any chief they please; and the new lord, in consideration and return for such homage, makes them a present; by virtue of which he becomes heir again to all their possessions, upon their demise. The Ondezes have no such liberty; but, in dearth and times of famine, the chiefs are obliged to support and subsist them; which, if refused, they have the privilege of giving themselves to new masters. Four different sorts of negroes.

ALL these people have neither religion nor temple; they keep up a custom of immolating beasts on particular occasions, in sickness, on planting yams or rice, on assemblies, and circumcision of children, on declarations of war, first entry into new-built houses, and on the funerals of their parents. They offer the first-born beast to the devil and to God, naming the devil first, in this manner, Dianbilis Aminban-babare, or, Lord Devil and God. They inherit this superstition from their Mohammedan ancestors, and their doctors, called Ombiaffes, who are the greatest impostors. Offerings to God and the devil.

THE country of Anossi was under the dominion of the French, and chiefs that resided near the coast; and, before the French took possession, had been governed by the Zaferamini, under a prince, whom they not only honoured as a king, but as God: his name was Andian Ramach; and when he died, Andian Maroarive, who was a Christian, had been baptized at Antient government.

Goa, brought up by the Jesuits, and subsisted by the viceroy there, was sent into his own country, and delivered to his father Andian Thianban. He had been instructed in the Christian religion, could read and write in the European manner, and give an account of his faith; but, being with his father, returned to his former paganism, and was killed by a musket-ball, when the French attacked the town of Franchere, the place of his residence.

Captain Rivault privileged to sail thither.

In the year 1642, captain Rivault obtained leave and privilege from cardinal Richlieu, for two years, exclusive of all others, even the partners, to send ships and forces to Madagascar, and the neighbouring islands, in order to establish a colony, plantation, and commerce, who erected a society for this purpose, under the name of a French East India company; and the grant was drawn out with an addition of ten years more privilege, to the year 1661.

Takes possession in the king's name.

The company, in March 1642, sent the first ship under the command of captain Coquet, who was going to load ebony at Madagascar on his own and some private merchants account, with two governors, whose names were Pronis and Fouquenberg, and twelve Frenchmen, to remain there, and wait the arrival of a ship, which was to sail from France in November. Coquet arrived there in September, having in his way anchored at the islands of Mascarenha and Diego des Rois, and took possession of them in the king's name, and sailed further on towards St. Mary's Island and the bay of Antongil, where he did the same. Fouquenberg and Pronis stopt at length in the port of St. Lucia, or Manghafia. The ship St. Laurence, sent by the company under the command of captain Giles Resimont, arrived on the first of April following at Madagascar, at the time that Coquet was gone to load in the provinces of Anossi and Matatane. Resimont brought seventy fresh men for Pronis, who lay sick near a month at Manghafia, by the bad air and situation of the place, where a third part of his men died (C).

French opposed at their first landing.

The negroes, encouraged by the whites, meditated an opposition on the first arrival of the French; but the design was stifled in its birth by the diligence and presents which Pronis made to Dian Ramach, lord of the country. Upon this success, Pronis sent twelve Frenchmen to settle and erect buildings in the province of Matatane. Upon their arrival, a party advanced about eighteen leagues into that province, towards Mannzari, to buy rice and other provisions, and to discover the country; but six were killed in crossing a river by the chiefs of those places, who had assembled in great numbers, under Zaze Rabimina, a near relation to Dian Ramach, and to the chiefs of the province of Anossi. Resimont's son, and six sailors, employed in loading of ebony, were also destroyed in the province of Vohitsbang. This opposition was owing to the intrigues of the chiefs of Anossi, who, not daring to undertake any thing openly in their own provinces, for fear of making the French their enemies, had secretly encouraged the neighbouring chiefs. Resimont loaded as much ebony afterwards as was possible, and sent six more Frenchmen into Anossi, where Pronis was at that time, who had never changed his residence during the absence of Resimont; but having withdrawn from Port St. Lucia, or Manghafia, went with all his forces to the bay of Tholangare, in the province of Anossi (D), where, about the year 1644, they began to fortify themselves; and, having reduced almost the whole province by force of arms, built a fort in 25 deg. 6 min. of south latitude, and named it Fort Dauphin; most advantageously situated, on account of the harbour, which is sheltered on every side from dangerous winds, and whose entrance is convenient for all sorts of shipping. Fort Dauphin, so called by Pronis (E), who was the first Frenchman that resided in that country with the dignity of governor, stood contiguous to one point of the bay or gulph of Tholangare, situate in 25 deg. 6 min. of south latitude, opposite Cape Itapere, 20 min. further. Many buildings were erected behind the fort, adjoining to the governor's house, with great inclosures, that produced every sort of fruit and kitchen-herb. In the year 1656, the fort took fire by an unforeseen accident, and was destroyed; but soon after re-established. The French kept a strong garison, under the direction of a governor, who resided there by the king's appointment, and carried on a troublesome war with the neighbouring people, and particularly the Lobavobits. They over-ran the moun-

Fort Dauphin erected.

(C) No sooner had the natives observed their intention, but they used their utmost art to prevent their fortifying themselves *.

(D) The French landed two hundred men, well armed and provided with store of ammunition, and other necessaries for building, and immediately began a fort. This created a war, in which the French were victors, and suppressed the natives; who in time became better reconciled to them, tho' secretly disgusted at the deaths of their king and his brother, and likewise at the indignity shewn to the prince whom they sent into France, when their ships sailed from the island †.

(E) The French, by their artful and cunning deportment, gained such friendship that they married, and lived up and down in several towns at some distance from each other, not above five or six in a place, in great tranquillity, for some years; but at last, their families growing numerous, the natives became jealous, resolved to free themselves from a foreign yoke, and formed a conspiracy to cut off all the white men in one day; which they effected soon after, not leaving a white man alive ‡.

* Drury, p. 103.

† Idem, ibid.

‡ Idem, ibid.

a tains, ransacked the houses and villages, and carried away their cattle. In the year 1651, The French Flacourt, the French governor in this island, ravaged the country of Franchere, with eighty Frenchmen, and some negroes, armed with shields and darts, who destroyed, by his order, the houses and huts of those barbarians, and carried off numbers of cows and oxen. The best and first property belonging to the Robandrians, consisting chiefly of houses and provisions, was by these means destroyed. Many of the natives conceived an extraordinary aversion to the French, from a sale of slaves of both sexes, which Pronis made to the Dutch governor of the island of Mauritius, who came there to purchase; but what provoked and enraged them most, and raised the strongest hatred to the French, was their selling sixteen ladies of the Lobavobit race among the slaves; the greatest part of whom died in the passage, and the remaining few, upon being landed, fled immediately, and lived wild in the woods.

The French commit hostilities.

Become hateful for their cruelty.

b THE province of Manatengba, or Manampani, so called from a river of the same name which waters it, is situated in 23 degrees of south latitude, and is a fertile and agreeable country. The valley of Amboule is something more northward, at the mouth of this river.

Province of Manatengba described.

THE river Manampani, whose mouth is situated in 23 degrees 30 min. of south latitude, or under the tropic of Capricorn, has its source in the valley of Amboule, receiving several springs from the mountains of Encalida, Hieia, and Mangbaze, waters the whole valley, and runs its course directly east.

river.

c In this valley stands the large town of Amboule. The country produces plants and fruits in plenty, chiefly white yams, and the herb Sesame, from whose squeezed seeds is drawn the oil Menachil. The oxen and cows are extremely fat, and their flesh is excellent. Iron-mines are also found here. Near the town of Amboule is a fountain of hot water, within twenty feet of a small river, whose sand is almost burning. The water of the fountain is said to boil an egg hard in two hours; and the inhabitants affirm the water to be a sovereign remedy against the cold gout.

Fertility.

THE people of this part are employed in different preparations of iron and steel, which they have from their own mines, and forge darts and various other instruments in a workman-like manner.

Employment of the natives.

d THEY are governed by a Voadziri, whom they honour with the title of Great Lord, or Governor. Rabertau, who, in cattle and other provisions, is the most considerable and richest of the chiefs in this country. Rabertau exercises sovereign authority and absolute power; but is frequently, in times of distress, surprised by his subjects, who assemble in great numbers, seize his person, and threaten him with death, unless relieved. To extricate himself from this dilemma, the chief is instantly obliged to issue orders for distributing provisions amongst them; but is usually repaid with interest, a quadruple return being made in a plentiful harvest. The people of the valley of Amboule live in great licentiousness with their superiors, and their country is the retreat for the roguish and lazy.

Government.

e IZAME, a small province, is situated to the west of this valley. The inhabitants work neatly in all sorts of iron instruments; and Menachil, or oil from the seeds of Sesame, is made in great plenty. The natives of this part, who are reckoned to be about 800 in number, are the most enterprising and best soldiers of the island, and are governed by a Voadziri, a near relation to Rabertau.

Province of Izame.

THIS province extends from the river Manatengba, situated in 23 deg. 30 min. to the river Manangbare, and stretches up the country as far as the river Itomampo, bordering upon Anradjaboc, near the source of the river Mandrerei, and the country of Fanghaterra, and includes the province of Manacarongba, near the river Manambondrou.

Province of Vohitbang.

f THE rivers that water the province of Vohitbang, are the Manatengba, which runs into the sea with four mouths, Vinangadimo, Manamazza, Sagandacan, and Vinangavarats. The river Aviboule, which the French call St. Giles, distant four leagues from Manatengba, is navigable, and runs strait to the sea. The river Andraghinta is two leagues higher up. The Sandravinangba, that has no mouth, and runs from the mountains of Viboule, is one league beyond. Manambondrou, without any mouth also, is three or four leagues further. The river Massianach is fifteen leagues from the river Aviboule, with a bay convenient for boats, called by the French L'Anse des Borgnes, from a one-eyed chief of the country, called Ontan-nalera. The country adjoining to this river is called Manacarongba. Four leagues northward is the river Manangbare, with seven mouths, almost all choaked up with rocks, which rises in the country of Itomampo, towards the east, and is made by three other rivers, the Jonghainou, Itomampo, and Mangarac; and these three uniting their waters lose their names, by forming the river Manangbare.

Rivers.

g THE sea-coast from the river Mangbafia to Sandravinangba is hid with the high mountains of Viboule, or Vohitbang, which are covered with thickets, and the vallies below abound in honey. It is believed that a great quantity of gold might be found here. The whole country

Fertility.

try

try of Vobitsbang is mountainous ; which may be discovered at a great distance upon the sea ; and abounds in honey, oxen, sugar-canes, yams, rice, and other necessaries of life, with many iron-mines.

Character of the natives.

THE inhabitants of this part are black, with thick, long, curled hair, extremely quarrelsome, and at continual variance with each other, on old disputes, never forgot, but revived on the slightest occasions, and transmitted from father to son. They are great robbers, and frequently steal the children and slaves of their nearest relations, even for sale and transportation to distant places. They keep up an implacable hatred to the Zaferamini, or whites of the province of Matatane ; possessed with the imagination of an extraordinary power in them, by means of certain letters and characters, to bewitch and send distempers and death among them. Ompizées, or poor fishermen, dwell at the mouth of the river Manatangha.

Dress.

THEIR garments are made of the bark of a tree, called Fautastranou ; those brought from Matatane are made of another bark, called Avo. They travel into the provinces of Carcassfi, or Ampatre, to buy cotton apparel ; and their arms are a wooden shield, covered with the skin of an ox, and a heavy dart.

Religion.

THIS country is governed by several chiefs ; and the people have no religion, divine service, or worship, established ; but, by an ancient custom, refrain from hogs flesh, and are circumcised.

Province of Itomampo.

THE province of Itomampo is about three leagues long, situated in a valley, and surrounded by high mountains ; and the best steel in the island is prepared here.

Icondre.

THE province of Icondre is very small and mountainous, situated in 22 deg. 30 min. south latitude. Its boundaries on the east, a little northward, are high mountains, which divide it from the country of Itomampo ; on the south the countries of Vatemanabon and Machicore ; on the north-west, the country of Manamboule ; and on the north, the mountains situated between Jongbainou and Itomampo.

Vatemanabon.

THE province of Vatemanabon adjoins on the east, a little northward, to Icondre, and the springs of the rivers Itomampo and Mandrerei ; whence likewise rises the river Maropia ; on the west and south to the country of Machicore ; and is uninhabited, being destroyed by the wars.

Manamboule.

THE east is bounded by the province of Manamboule, and the river Itomampo ; the country of Anachimouffi on the north ; on the west that of Alfissach, and on the south, the great mountains, in which is the spring of the river Ongelabe, which runs westward into the sea of Mozambique.

Anachimouffi.

THE province of Anachimouffi, about four days journey long, hath, on the east, the river Jongbainou, which runs through it ; the country of Manamboule on the south ; on the west, great mountains ; and, on the north, the river Mangharac, and the country of Eringdrane.

Rivers.

VARIOUS rivers water those provinces ; the Itomampo, Jongbainou, Maropia, and Mangharac. Itomampo waters the province of that name, and flows from the mountains of Viboule, wherein is its source, and that of the river Sandravingha, which runs cross into a part called Houdre, above Ivourbon, situated along the rivers Manangbare and Jongbainou, or middle river, running between Itomampo and Mangharac, flows from the mountains of Icondre, through the provinces of Manamboule and Anachimouffi ; afterwards takes its course directly north ; and having flowed in this manner for the space of four days journey, and winding in a place at a small distance from Itomampo, runs a short course directly west to the river Mangharac, situated about a league lower, where, mixing their waters in the river Itomampo, they make the river Manangbare, which gliding directly east and south-east, for the space of eight days journey, runs into the sea by seven mouths. The river Maropia is an arm only of the river Itomampo, which glides into the Mandrerei. The river Mangharac waters the north part of Anachimouffi.

Nature of the country.

THE country of Itomampo is extremely fertile ; rice, yams, sugar-canes, and pulse, grow in abundance ; and there are great numbers of cattle. Manamboule, tho' hilly, is equally plentiful in the same produce ; and has some iron-mines. Manamboule, and the following countries, are situated and disposed in such manner, that wood is scarce, and to be had only from the high mountains. Anachimouffi produces great quantities of rice and yams, with plenty of cattle, and other necessaries of life ; and is extremely populous.

Voadziri.

THE Voadziri of Manamboule is called Dian Panobabe ; and his power became great by the assistance of the French in the war he carried on against the neighbouring chiefs.

Eringdrane.

THE province of Eringdrane is bounded on the east by high mountains, on the west by three great rivers, Manatangh, Zoumando, and Sabanangh, which run from these mountains thro' the whole country into a great bay, situated in twenty degrees of south latitude, on the side of Mozambique. It is a flat country, and of great extent, and divided into the greater and lesser ; the lesser, where the river Mangharac takes its source, is the south, and the greater is the north part, and ends where separated by the river Manfiatre from Vobitsbangombe. The

Mangharac

- a Mangharac comes from mountains situated to the east of Eringdrane; its source is about 20 degrees 30 minutes; runs directly east for the space of three days journey, afterwards winds in a half-circle, and runs east and E. S. E. for the space of four days journey, into the Jongbainou, in the country of Icondre.

THE province of Vobitsanghombe is divided from Eringdrane by the river Manfiatre; is bounded on the north by the country of Ancianaſte, on the east, by that of Sabavez, situated in 19 degrees 30 minutes of south latitude, and the high mountains of Ambobitsmene extend westward to the Mozambique sea, and end on the south side in the province of Eringdrane. The river Manfiatre has its source in Eringdrane, in 19 degrees latitude, and runs between the country of Eringdrane and Vobitsanghombe, into a bay situated in 20 degrees.

- b THE province of Eringdrane is very populous, can raise an army of thirty thousand men, and has great plenty of cattle upon the mountains on the east side. Vobitsanghombe is not inferior in numbers, and can bring into the field an hundred thousand men. The towns and houses in this part are well built, and surpass in beauty those of any other quarter. Plenty of rice grows here, and the country is rich in cattle, iron, and steel. Cloaths are made here of the rind of a tree called Bananas, of equal fineness with those of silk, which they also make; and both are cheap. The inhabitants are great enemies to the people of Eringdrane.

THE provinces of Manacarongha and Matatane are situated on the sea-coast between the rivers of Manangbare and Mananzari, and are bounded on the west by the mountains which separate the country of Anachimouſſi from Eringdrane. The two little countries of Ivourbon and Saca are comprised within the circumference of these limits.

- c THE river Manangbare is made by three different rivers, the Itomampo, Jongbainou, and Mangharac, besides many small rivulets, which run down from the mountains. The three rivers joined together lose their own, and take the name of Manangbare, which runs into the sea with seven mouths, about four leagues distant from each other, but not navigable, on account of rocks; nor is the river, tho' sufficiently wide.

THE country adjacent to these mouths and river is called Manacarongha.

- d THE province of Matatane is situated near the river of that name, which has its spring in the mountains of the province of Vatſſei, and runs into the sea by two mouths, seven leagues distant from each other, which form a large and delightful island, the residence of the people of Ramin. This country is flat, abounding with sugar-canes, honey, yams, and cattle, and is watered by many rivers abounding in fish. Sugar-canes grow in such plenty, that many ships might be loaded yearly, could the natives be brought to make sugar, and were they furnished with necessary implements. The chiefs of this country enjoy a plurality of wives, having fifteen or twenty, who live retired in separate apartments, in an inclosed place, surrounded with palisadoes, like a large town; and whoever presumes to enter it, is punished with death.

- THESE people have neither church nor mosque, are much addicted to superstition and witchcraft, give great credit to billets wrote in Arabic characters, called Hiridzi, Mazarabou, and Taliffimou, believe some preservatives against thunderbolts, rains, winds, wounds in time of war, and even against death; others as sureties against all sorts of venoms and poisons, and preserving and freeing towns and houses against plunder and fire, and as powerful and infallible preservatives against all sorts of disasters. These billets are set up by the Ombiaſſes, or priests, physicians, conjurors, and astrologers, who afterwards retail them to the unhappy negroes; though the greatest sale is amongst the whites, who wear them hung about their necks, sewed up in pieces of leather, silk, and stuffs. The same characters are engraved also upon gold, silver, and small pieces of flat cane, for the same purposes. The people of Ivourbon and Saca keep up, as neighbours, the same customs, and are equally addicted to witchcraft and superstition with the last-mentioned people, who lull them in their errors by selling them billets for their use in the same manner.

- f THE inhabitants of this province are of two orders, the Zafecafimambous, who are the chief, and the Zaferahiminas; both which, but especially the first, are excessively ugly, and are all Ombiaſſes, or doctors. The Zaferahiminas have been greatly depressed by the latter, having nothing but slavery in their present option. Upon their attempting, about a hundred years ago, to appear as masters, they were all put to the sword, except the women and children, to whom they allotted, for their residence, an island and particular quarter, which they plant and breed cattle upon, and are called Ontampassemaci, or people from the sandy shores of Arabia, from which country they originally came. They arrived in this island in great canoes, sent according to their own account, about two hundred years ago, by the Khalif of Mecca, to instruct the islanders in the Mohammedan law. The chief and most distinguished amongst them married a black, on condition that the issue of that marriage should be all called Zafecafimambous, the name of their father, contrary to the custom of the south quarter of that island, where the children bear the mother's name; which custom takes place also in the province

Erect schools for the education of youth.

vince of Machicore. The Zafecafimambous, increasing greatly, erected schools in every village for the education of youth, where they continue teaching to read and write in the Arabic language. They have an authority over other whites, or Ontampassemaci, and enjoy an exclusive privilege of killing cattle; and must be employed in that office. The Ontampassemaci are expert, and support themselves by fishing.

Rivers.

THERE are several rivers northward besides the Matatane, in this province; viz.
the Manghafiouts, Manangcare, Mananbare, Itin, Itapouloubai, Itapoulofirire, Itapaulo- mainthiranou, Faraon, Lomaboric, or Morembai, and Mantaraven. The river Man- ghafiouts, or Manghafies, is small, and about three leagues from the river Matatane. The French settled a plantation on the shore; but rocks and sand-banks render the navigation dangerous. The river Manangcare is also small, and about four leagues farther. Mananbare,
i. e. plenty of provision, abounds with fish. Itin, a small pond only, is half a league from Mananbare. Itapouloubai, Itapoulofirire, and Itapaulomainthiranou, are three small rivers, two leagues distant one from another, whose springs are in the neighbouring mountains. Faraon, two leagues distant from Itapaulomainthiranou, is navigable for boats. The Manoufi whites dwelt along this river, which flows from the western mountains between Eringdrane and Matatane. Lomaboric, or Morambei, is a large river, three leagues from Faraon, which runs six or seven leagues more westward. Mantaraven is a small river, about six leagues distant from Morambei.

Antavare.

THE province of Antavare is situated to the north of Matatane, in 21 deg. 30 min. of south latitude, and bounded by the province and cape of Manoufi; the greatest part of it is watered by the river Mananzari, whose source is in the mountains of Ambobitsmene, or red mountains, situated about twelve leagues farther north-west, and runs south-east and east.
About a league more to the north is another small river, that runs into the sea.

Manoufi.

The province of Manoufi extends from Cape Manoufi and Mananzari to the river Manan- ghourou, situated fifteen leagues farther north, which flows from the high mountains of Am- bobitsmene, as well as the river Mananzari. Three more rivers run between Cape Manoufi and the Mananghourou; viz. Andrasadi, Tentamamou, and Tentemami. The river Mananghourou is the next.

ANTAVARE is extremely fertile in rice, yams, bananas, sugar-canes, and honey, of which wine is made, and abounds in cattle and goats, and all sorts of fowls and provisions. The French discovered in this province gold-dust by the means of negroes, who offered it to sale.

Ambobits-mene.

THE province of Ambobitsmene is situated north and west of Antavare, and takes its name from the red mountains of that name, situated in 20 deg. of south latitude. These high mountains are seen at a great distance on the sea, and resemble the Tafelberg of the Cape of Good Hope. This country joins to, or is rather the same as, Vobits-anghombe; and the sea is on one side of this long ridge of mountains, which extends fifteen leagues into the country, and a flat country on the other, abounding in ponds and marshes. Here is also a lake fifteen leagues in length, and the same in breadth, containing several small islands.

Inhabitants.

THE Zaferabongs live upon those mountains in the country of Famentara, are rich in gold, iron, cattle, rice, sugar-canes, yams, silk garments, and many other necessities of life.

Avibahe river.

ABOUT twelve leagues distance from the river Mananghourou runs another, called Avibahe, navigable for boats, the mouth always open and free; and is believed to run from the great lake, which, in its course, discharges itself into the sea. The river Sacavile flows between this and the Mananghourou; and, three leagues further, the river Tsatfac runs into a bay or gulph, called by the inhabitants Tametavi. About three leagues distance the Tametavi, and a league and a half further the Ivorhon, fall into this bay, which is navigable for ships. The French call it Port-aux-Prunes, or plum-harbour.

ON the coast of Tametavi, as far as the bay of Antongil, are included the provinces of Vouloulou, Longue-Point, Andouvouche, and the bay of Manghabei, or Antongil.

THESE countries begin at the bay or harbour of Tametavi, situated in 18 deg. 30 min.
and extend along the sea-coast as far as the bay of Antongil, or Manghabei, in 15 deg.
of south latitude, and border on the land-side on the mountains and provinces of Vobits- anghombe and Antsianach, next to Tametavi. Along the coast run three small rivers, Fantac, Faba, Fabo, and Marobarats, at a short league's distance from each other. The Anachinquets, farther on, runs into a bay named Sabavez, which is of great depth; the bottom is good and sandy, but the bay is exposed to east, south-east, and east north-east winds.

Vouloulou.

ABOUT three leagues further north is the Cape, which the French, from the form and length, call Longue-Point. The adjacent country is called Vouloulou, and is watered by the river of the same name. There is a fine harbour, situated under 18 deg. behind the rocks, which runs a quarter of a league into the sea; and, five leagues further, runs a great river, named Ambato, but not to the sea; and is remarkable only for rocks and sands.

THE bay of Galemboulou is two leagues further north, in 17 deg. 30 min. very extensive, with a good road for boats behind the rocks, but extremely dangerous, on account of them and the violence of the sea. The village of Ratsimalone lies upon the coast of Galemboulou, and is known to the Europeans by the name of St. Matthew. The river Mananghourou, navigable for boats, runs into the sea about three leagues from Galemboulou, at the end of the bay.

A SMALL island, called Amboutnossi, is reported to be in this part; and that a river runs from one of the mountains in the country of Anisianach, of the same name, directly west, into a great bay, frequented by the islanders of Comorro.

THE river Mananghourou, which flows towards the sea from west to east, is divided into four arms near the mouth; one of which preserves the name from the source to the mouth; the next is called Manansatran, and situated three leagues from the preceding. Marinbou, the third, is three leagues from Manansatran, has no mouth, and is directly opposite the island of Nossi-Ibrahim, or St. Mary. Simiane, the fourth, three leagues distant from Marinbou, is a great river, which continues its source to the sea, within seven or eight feet depth of water round the mouth, and is navigable for boats six or seven leagues towards the source. The river Mananghare is directly opposite the north point of the island St. Mary, and to the south point of the bay of Antongil, and continues its source to the sea; and is navigable for boats at the entrance.

ALONG the west coast lies the country of Andouvouche, or bay or gulph, so called from Andouvouche many great and contiguous bays; among which is the bay of Antongil, formerly called Manghabei by the inhabitants of the country, situated in 15 deg. of south latitude, which extends lengthways to the north, and is about six leagues wide. At the end of the bay stands an island, extremely high above water, has no plain at the bottom but the shore, two leagues round, intirely covered with the most delightful verdure, and abounding in all sorts of plants and fruit, good water, plenty of fowls, honey, and bananas; and is to sailors the most convenient and agreeable place of refreshment. There are some rocks, and three or four small islands, in the middle of the bay, from the entrance on the north-east side. Some of the islands are sown with rice, and the others are covered with wood.

THERE are three populous villages situated upon the mouths of rivers, about half-way down the bay, on the north side, and many others along the shore, as far as a river that runs to the north; and many rivers flow into the bay. Beyond these, a great river divides itself into two arms; the course of one is northwards, and the other to the westward, which forms, by the division, an island between the arms. On the north side of the bay stands a large town, encompassed with a strong palisado, and called by the Portuguese St. Angelo. Upon advancing deep in the bay, on the left hand, stands another, called Spakenburgh, built by the Dutch in 1595, in their first voyage to the East Indies, containing in the inclosure about two hundred houses. There is another situated upon a river that runs west south-west, with respect to the before-mentioned island.

THE coast of Galemboule is intirely covered, for about two leagues in width, with forests of high trees, and the interior part of the country is full of bamboos, or a kind of thick cane, called Bambu Voulu.

THE soil is good and fat, and, from frequent rains in the country, not subject to be parched up. The meadows produce abundant pasture; though the inhabitants are never rich in cattle, the greatest stock of the most wealthy amounting to no more than twenty or twenty-four. The mountains are peculiarly fruitful, and the towns in this part are built with more regularity and solidity, in great taste of situation, either on tops of mountains or eminences, or on the banks of rivers, palisadoed round with two gates or entries, one for the usual and ordinary goings in and out, another towards the woods, to facilitate retreats to those places of refuge and safety, when surprised by enemies, or when too weak to resist.

THE people from Port-aux-Prunes, to the bay of Antongil, practise the same customs, and are, in general, called Zafe Ibrahims, or race or offspring of Abraham, or from the name of the contiguous island Nossi-Ibrahim, of which they call themselves natives. The Zafe Ibrahims observe the sabbath-day, and disagree with their neighbours in other customs. On this account, Flacourt believed them descended from a race of Jews or Arabs, who formerly had taken shelter in this island. The men, women, and children, are much fairer than the whites of Matatane and Androbeizaba; their hair is long, and hanging down; they are free, liberal, hospitable to strangers, and not addicted to murder or theft; have a different manner in songs and dances from the people of Androbeizaba, and an observation of cadence and time, particularly in dances of two and two, and are remarkable in their stops, renewals, and motion of the arms. Love is the only subject of their songs, and the company, by clapping hands, beat time to the lascivious gestures of the body, always practised in singing, which is called Mangharac, or keeping of time. The men and women, in sickness, or in disorders of the eyes or

or head, variously rub their faces with white, black, red, or yellow colours. Many, chiefly old women, use colours to appear more gay and youthful. The women and young maidens are less difficult than on the coast of Androbeizaba and Matatane; access to them being extremely difficult, from their parents care and inspection of their conduct.

Employment.

THE men and women in general are industrious, being employed in the rice-fields from sun-rise to sun-set. The men cut canes in the woods, burn them, and use them, when dried, to manure the land. The Indians call those canes Bambu, and the inhabitants of Madagascar, Voulou; where they are generally large. All other work is done by the women; the young plant rice in the ashes of canes, wetted by the rain for some time, in a manner equally new and entertaining, grain by grain, singing, dancing, and keeping time; then they make a hole in the earth with the point of a stick, fling in two grains, and close the hole by covering it with earth, and pressing it with the foot, continually singing and dancing, and shaking and stretching out the head with uncommon vivacity. They weed the rice, and in harvest-time, when ripe, carry it themselves into the barns. Whilst the women are employed in this work, the men renew the cutting and burning of canes in another place: for as soon as the rice shoots in one field, another is immediately planted. In this manner they are constantly employed, having, throughout the year, rice green, in flower, and in beard. The Bambu canes are remarkable for making an extraordinary loud noise in the burning.

Use they make of European commodities.

THE inhabitants of Galemboule make no ornamental use of European commodities, but esteem and preserve them with great care, to exchange afterwards for cattle from the mountains of Ambobitsmene, or of the country of Antsianafta. They have very little gold, and immediately buy cattle when possessed of any. They prefer silver to gold, a reddish kind, and that which is fine.

Religion.

THE natives of Galemboule, and all the Zafe Ibrabims, keep and refrain from work on the sabbath-day, believing that they should be wounded, or that sickness would be an inevitable consequence. They don't acknowledge Mohammed; but call his followers, and all who do not scrupulously conform to the manners and customs of their country, Caffres. They acknowledge Noah, Abraham, Moses, and David; have no knowledge of Jesus Christ, or any other prophet, and practise circumcision; have neither fasts, law, nor religion; and are totally ignorant of the true attributes of God, honouring him by offerings and victims of oxen, cows, and he-goats. They have no temples, but Amounouques, or certain places wherein are placed the tombs of their ancestors, to whose memory they pay great honour; an universal practice among the inhabitants of this island. Some few remains of Judaism seem apparent through the darkness of this surprising ignorance. They are extremely superstitious, and would sooner die than eat part of a quadruped animal, or bird, killed by a Christian or any inhabitant of the south coast (A). None but the Filoubeis, lords or chiefs of the country, enjoy the privilege of killing any beast or bird whatever; and this is executed with a confused utterance of particular words, when the knife is applied, and by lifting up the eyes towards heaven, in a manner seemingly of making an offering of it. All children born on Tuesdays, Thursdays, and Fridays, are exposed, as accursed, in the woods, to die of cold or hunger, or be destroyed by wild beasts. Some few have been released by women moved with compassion, who have generously hazarded their own lives to preserve theirs, and afterwards brought them up with the parents consent.

Barbarous custom of exposing children.

Government.

EACH town, being a distinct and independent republic, is governed by a master, or lord, called Filoubei, a name common to all the chiefs in this part (B), who distribute justice in their respective towns. One of the most antient is usually chosen from among this race, to decide all disputes that may arise, and is raised in dignity above the rest. They assist one another mutually in time of war against those of another race; and, in case of quarrels between the Filoubeis, and a declaration of war is likely to ensue, the others interfere as mediators, and use all endeavours for an accommodation; which, if refused, they separate, leaving them at full liberty to act as they please. The slaves are looked upon in a better light among those people than among those of the provinces of Androbeizaba or Carcanossi, and are not kept in that rank, their masters calling them children, and they reciprocally calling their masters fathers, eat at table with them, and frequently marry their daughters. The Dutch formerly frequented this bay, and traded in rice and slaves. A few years ago twelve were in the bay, and eight of them died through the unwholesomeness of the country, and the remaining four were barbarously killed by a chief of the country, called Rabecon. They placed their con-

Slaves treated in a kind manner.

(A) If the daughter of a king be married to any one that is not of a royal family, their children are not admitted to the honour of killing bees, notwithstanding the father be a freeman, and a chief among his neighbours*.

(B) All the great families have a general name of distinction, which they value themselves upon†.

* Dury's Hist. p. 173.

† Idem, p. 370.

- a fidence in him ; but he unexpectedly betrayed them, after they had freed him from another chief, his inveterate enemy, who was killed in battle by a musket-ball.

THE Europeans have, in these days, but little knowledge of the country beyond the bay Employment. of Antongil to the north point, excepting one province, named in their sea-charts Vohemaro, where rice is cultivated in the same manner, and grows as easily, as in Galemboule. A goldsmith, an inhabitant of Anossi, and whose predecessors came from Vohemaro, declared, according to some accounts, that great quantities of gold were found in that province ; and, what is extraordinary, that all the goldsmiths of Anossi are of that country. The east coast of this province forms a bay, which bears the name of Vohemaro or Boamaro, situated in 13 deg. of south latitude. The coast extends directly north of Antongil, as far as the north-east part of the island, called Cape Natal. The following account is of the coast and neighbouring country, from the mouth of the river Franchere, westward and northward, the coast winding round in that manner as far as the river and bay of Jongbelake, so called by the inhabitants of the country, and, by Europeans, the river of St. Augustin, as far as the river Man-siatra.

FROM the mouth of the river Franchere to Cape Moncale, the coast extends in a chain of Coast from sands, four leagues wide, and from Cape Moncale to the bay of Ranoufoutchi, or bay of Ga- Carcanossi to lions, about two leagues. Some wood grows along this sandy coast, between two bays called Ambourve. Aloes, called Teteck, is plentiful in this wood, growing in the parts adjoining to the country. Mozambique lies between Cape Moncale and Ranoufoutchi bay. The chief town of Ranoufoutchi is named Italy. Here large ships and boats may enter this bay, which lies open to the south and south-east winds, the most troublesome in the country, and always attended with violent thunder. Mandrerei.

ABOUT five leagues beyond this bay, the Mandrerei runs between the river and bay of Salt easily Ponds, called Anghongs, where great quantities of salt are made, with little care and trouble. made. This part is too sandy for rice ; but cotton grows in great plenty, and a large quantity of oil is drawn from the plant Ricinus, useful in many disorders, and proper for anointing the hair and head. About two hundred years ago, the Portuguese had a settlement upon the bay of Ranoufoutchi, and a governor, whom the natives called Macinorbei, a name made by joining the words Mio Signor, which they heard the Portuguese pronounce, to the word Bei, signifying chief in their language.

THE river Mandrerei, on the east of the province of Ampatre, divides it from Carcanossi. Ampatre. This province, along the coast, is about twenty leagues in length, and twelve broad, from the sea to Machicore (C). There is great scarcity of water, which is had only from a few marshes Scarcity of here and there, no river running through the province ; yet it is full of forests, in which the water. natives erect their villages, with strong hedges round them, made of stakes and thorns intermixed, and accessible only through the gates. The coast is not broke into by any bay, and extends in a straight line as far as Caremboule.

THE inhabitants are much given to rob their neighbours of their effects and wives, which is Manners. the cause of that irreconcilable hatred which subsists among the people in these parts, ready, upon the most trivial occasions, to break into wars, equally bloody and destructive. Their whole forces amount to three thousand men ; each village has a chief, and one is raised to a superior authority and credit.

THE river Mandrerei, which divides the provinces of Carcanossi and Ampatre, runs like a River Man- torrent with great rapidity, without any discharge, for the greatest part, into the sea ; the drerei. source rises from the same mountain with that of Itomampo, and runs a great way to the south-west, receiving in its course the waters of the rivers Maropie, Manamboule, and Mananghare, into the south ocean. Maropie is near the river Icondre ; Manamboule rises upon Mount Hiela, runs northward cross the country of Machicore into the river Mandrerei ; and Mananghare runs from the south-west side of the same mountain into the same river.

THE province of Mananghare, situated near the river of that name, is fertile and delight- Mananghare. ful, but uninhabited, and a retreat only for wild bears and buffaloes, which abound there. Every neighbouring chief pretending to the sovereignty and property, hinders any settlements taking place, through an apprehension and fear of continual war and plunder.

HIELA is an extreme high mountain, from whence flows the river Manampani, which Mount Hiela. waters the valley of Amboule, is very populous, and divides the valley from the provinces of Machicore and Carcanossi. There is a province to the west of Carcanossi, called Encalida ; between this and the village of Amboule lies the country of Caracarac.

(C) Probably this is the country where Drury mentions the great scarcity of water, and wherein the inhabitants and cattle are supplied by dew water, who, in the morning, collect in the fields eight or ten gallons of it, which is a good while fresh, but turns sour in a day's time, and becomes disagreeable to the taste *.

* Drury, p. 72.

Caremboule. THE province of Caremboule is but a small quarter, about six leagues in length, and three or four in breadth, and is bounded on the south by the sea, begins on the west at the bay or gulph of Caremboule, and ends on the east side at the river Manambouve, which divides it from the country of Ampatre. a

Rivers. THE river Manambouve is very deep, and about thirty leagues distant from the river Mandrerei; its source is in Machicore, and it continues its course fifteen leagues towards Caremboule. The Manamba is a small river, which rises also in Machicore, and, running to the south, falls into the sea 20 leagues to the west of Manambouve. Menerandre is another small river, two leagues from Manamba, which rises also in Machicore, and runs to the south south-west. There are two more small rivers, four leagues from Menerandre, and half a league distant from each other, whose springs are in the adjacent mountains. b

THE coast of Caremboule, the southernmost part of the island of Madagascar, extends from east to west, begins about the westernmost part from Manamba river to the Menerandre, and from thence winds north-west to the rivers of Manamba and Machicore. The country of Caremboule is dry and barren, with good pasture-lands notwithstanding, and plenty of cattle; it abounds, like Ampatre, with cotton and some silk, which is made into apparel by the inhabitants. Numbers of buffaloes are met with along the banks of the Manambouve, formerly domestic animals, but become wild, as the natives report, by running in the forests for fifty years, during the continual wars amongst the inhabitants of this part.

Mahafalle. THE province of Mahafalle, situated more to the north-west on the sea-side, extends as far as the salt river, called by the Portuguese Sacalite, and fifteen leagues distant from the rivers Manamba and Machicore. The river Sacalite, situated in 25 deg. of south latitude, flows from the country of Houlouve, and runs into a gulph, an accustomed anchoring-place to the Portuguese, and never frequented by the French. c

Houlouve river. HOULOUBE begins at the mouth of the river Sacalite, and extends above two days journey up the country. Siveb extends four leagues along the coast, in a strait line. Iveronbeoc, or country of the bay of St. Augustin, is the next, and situated near the river Jonghelabe.

Jonghelahe river. THE river Jonghelabe, besides many rivulets, receives the waters of three rivers, Randumainthi, Ongbelamassey, and Sacamare, and flows westward, inclining something south, from the source in the mountains of Manambouve, and falls into the sea at an extremely fine bay, which the Portuguese have for many years called the bay of St. Augustin, but retains to these times the name of Jonghelabe amongst the inhabitants; it is situated under 23 deg. of south latitude, and sheltered from the most dangerous winds, is navigable for great ships from the south to north-west, but hath rocks on both sides, which render the entrance dangerous, tho' there are six or eight feet depth of water in every other part of the bay. On the south side of this gulph stands a fort, built formerly by the French, quadrangular, with four small bastions, surrounded by pallisadoes, and a ditch full of water, eighteen feet wide, and two feet deep, not walled round, or built upon an eminence, but upon a level with the adjoining country, with a way fifteen feet wide crosses the ditch, to enter the fort. The English generally cast anchor in this bay, to take in refreshments, and land the sick men, in order for their recovery. d

Machicore. THE province of Machicore is of great extent, and of equal length with the river Jonghelabe, is seventy leagues over from east north-east to west south-west, the same from east to west, and about fifty from north to south, from the river Jonghelabe to the provinces of Ampatre and Mahafalle. e

THIS country was laid waste and ruined by wars; the inhabitants living concealed in woods, through fear of their enemies, upon roots only and the flesh of wild cattle. Machicore, Concha, Manamboule, Alfissach, and Mahafalle, were governed by one lord, called Dian Baluoalen, or lord of an hundred thousand parks. In the life-time of this prince, these countries enjoyed a profound peace, and flourished in excess of riches and pleasure; but, upon his death, a war broke out between his sons, which was carried on with so much fury and animosity, that it ended in their intire ruin and destruction. f

Rivers. DIRECTLY north of the river Jonghelabe lie two large rivers, one called Ranomaintbi, which falls into the Jonghelabe twelve leagues below the source, which flows from the country of Alfissach. Ranoumene is the name of the other, which rises in, and runs from Anachimoussi into the sea, in a bay situated in 22 deg. of south latitude. Another river of the same name, whose course is west south-west, runs into a bay under 20 deg. of the same latitude. The Portuguese call the adjacent country Terra del Gada, or land of cattle, from their great plenty. Three more rivers, called Sabavianb, Soumaudo, and Manatangb, flowing from the countries of Eringdrane, Sinaipati, and Sinaivalales, run westward into a great bay, in 19 deg. to the west of an island. g

THE French have scarce any knowlege of the north part of this island; and the Portuguese discovered of late years only some maritime places, as the country and bay of Pracel, the country

- a country of St. Andrew, the Cape of Donna Nostra Cunba, St. Andrew's river, river of Diego Soares; and the Cape of St. Sebastian is the north-west point of this island.

THEY have six sorts of honey, called, in the language of the country, Tentele; bees <sup>Six sorts of honey.</sup> honey, called Voatentele, honey from certain green flies, called Sib, and two sorts of honey from ants; one sort is from winged ants, and is gathered from the hollow trees; the other sort from ants of a larger size, without wings, who make their honey in Vontatames, or great heaps of earth, pointed at the top, and pierced round with holes, full of these ants; all which sorts of honey are exceeding sweet. There is still another sort of honey, or rather sugar, being harder and sweeter, called Tentele Sacondre; honey-flies, called Sacondre, lay this on the leaves of particular shrubs, and are transformed afterwards into small yellow, green, or red lumps. Many, with great reason, have held this honey, or sugar, to be the Arabian Tabaxir, not the Sacar-Mambu, or sugar of Bamboo canes, whose juice is no better than insipid starch. There is yet another sort of honey, esteemed poisonous, being made by bees which suck the flowers of a particular tree that produces a sharp poison. This tree is found in one part of the province of Anossi, or Carcanossi, and is called Caracàrac.

THE inhabitants make three sorts of wine; the first and most common is that which is <sup>Three sorts of wine.</sup> made of honey; the second of sugar, called Touach, or Touapare, which signifies sugar-wine; it tastes bitterish, like strong-beer, or apricot-kernel. A great quantity of it is made in the provinces of Manamboule, Matatane, and Manghabei, in the following manner: the sugar-canes are boiled in water to two-thirds, afterwards put into large gourds, and, in three days, the wine is so strong and penetrating, as, in a night's time, to eat through an egg-shell. The third sort is made with the fruit of Banana, boiled four or five hours, which makes a sourish wine, like cyder.

OILS are of different sorts, and made use of by men and women to rub the head and body: <sup>Oils.</sup> the most common and known are those of Menachtanbetanbe, Menach signifying oil, Menachkil, Menachouivau, Menachmafoutra, Menach-vourave, Menach-apocapouc, Menach-vintang, and Menach-arame. Menach-tanbetanbe is an oil drawn from a particular plant, called, in the language of the country, Tanbetanbe, and known in Europe by the name of Palma Christi, or Ricinus. Menachkil is an oil from the seed of Sesame, which they call Voancaze; a great quantity whereof is made in the valley of Amboule. Menachouivau is drawn from a fruit of the size of an almond, and is extremely good in liquors or meats. Manachmafoutra is drawn from nuts, the fruit of the tree which produces dragon's blood. Menach-vourave is drawn from a fruit named Fonté. Menach-apocapouc is squeezed from the fruit Apocapouc, extremely poisonous. Menach-vintang is an oil from large acorns, or mast. Menach-arame is drawn from nuts, the fruit of the tree from which the gum Tacamabaca is produced. The soil is various; there is a red earth, the same, or of equal goodness, with that called by apothecaries Bole Armenian, and that called Terra Sigillata, brought from the isle of Lemnos; but Placourt equally esteems that of Madagascar. The red earth is called by the inhabitants Tamene, and the Terra Sigillata, Tavelisse; an earth as white as chalk, fat and clayey, and may be used instead of soap, to wash and whiten linen.

SEVERAL sorts of gum grow in this island, which they call Lite; and some are fragrant <sup>Gums.</sup> and odoriferous, such as the Litementa, or benjoin; Literame, or gum Tacamabaca; Lite Fimpi, an odoriferous gum of the tree Fimpi; Lite Enfouraba, a green gum, of a balsamic odour, from the Fouraba; Quizomainthi, a black gum, made use of in fixing the darts in their handles; Hingue is likewise a black gum of great fragrancy; Litiminthé, another black gum, viscous, and becomes dry; it comes from a tree in the province of Manghabei, and is like Acacia. The women make use of this gum in painting their faces, and it heals wounds and ulcers. Litin Bitsic, a species of gum made by ants in the province of Ampatre, is white, and hangs by the branches of trees; its inside is intermixed with small ants; and is also made use of to fix darts in handles. Fanalouc is nothing but a musk which comes from an animal of the size of a cat. Varabanga is a gum which yields an odour like that of incense. Liturba is dragon's blood. Litin Barencoco is another species of dragon's blood. Litinpane is a gum, or yellow resin, extremely fragrant, from a tree called Fane. Vabonlitintang is the juice of the plant or tree Vintang, or aloe. Litinbaronga is a yellow gum, which comes from a tree whose flowers yield the bees the sweetest matter for honey.

THIS island produces in great plenty various sorts of plants, eatable and medicinal. <sup>Plants and other vegetables.</sup> Rice, which they call Varemanghe and Vatomandre; there are four sorts of the first, two white and bearded, the other reddish, without beards, and of a rose colour when boiled. The rice named Vatomandre grows only in winter, is smaller, and of a bitter taste. There is another species called Varebondre, only nominally different from Varemanghe, which is sown in the summer for a winter harvest, of no great account, and never sown but in failure of the other. There are several kinds of yams, which they call in general Ouvi, as Ouvihare, of Soabei, Cambares, Ouvifoutchi, Ofeque, Mavondre, Maleve, Randre, and Dambarn. The Ouvifoutchi are are the best and dearest ; the Soabeis are the next, and white ; the Cambares are of a violet a colour, and the rest of a light grey. The Ouvifoutchis grow to a great size in a fat soil, and generally as large as the leg ; one hundred and fifty of these roots are the worth of an ox. The Soabeis are but half as big. The Cambares and Ouvibares are of equal size ; one hundred and fifty of these are given for one hundred Ouvifoutchis. Sometimes one plant of Ouvifoutchi will produce two, though they commonly shoot but one ; but three or four roots spring from one plant of the Cambares or Ouvibare. The Ouvibares are the least and cheapest, but are good ; they take root easier than the others, and are the common food for slaves : they cut them into four, five, ten, or twelve pieces, and plant them by handfuls to take root, and in eight months time they are quite ripe. The Ofeque root is a species of yam, or Ouvi, but bitter ; the islanders steep and boil the bitterness for traffick, and the negroes make b their nicest meats of it ; and several, when the bitterness is gone, dry them hard in the sun, and preserve them two or three years without being spoiled. The Marondre root is a kind of rice, of the most agreeable taste ; one plant often shoots ten or twelve roots, but never larger than hens eggs : they have the chesnut taste in a superior excellence, and are lighter upon the stomach ; their outside skin is thin and bitter, and they are planted whole. The Ouvi, called Maleve, differs little from the Soabei and Ouvibare. There are various sorts of Ouvi that spring up of themselves, which are Ouvi-in-lasso, Ouvi-randre, Ouvi-dambou, Fangbitz, Vabala, Fandre, Hompouc, with several others, which they eat and seek for in the fields and woods. Ouvienpasso have roots of the length and thickness of the arm, equal in taste with the ripe Cambares, and grow in woods by the sea-side. Ouvi-dambous are like vine roots, c produce black berries with the taste of musk ; their shoots die every year ; the leaves, like vine leaves, are unpleasant, insipid, and hard to digest, and are never eat but in times of scarcity and extreme necessity. Vabala grows under ground as large as great bowls, the rind grey, are eaten both dressed and raw, and are plentiful in several provinces. The Ompilampes, a people who neglect agriculture, live only on those roots. Fangbitz are roots of an extraordinary largeness, covered with a reddish rind, are sometimes found of the size of a man, extremely sweet, yet more disagreeable, from their moisture, than the Vabalas ; and they satisfy hunger and thirst together, are of easy digestion, and diuretic, and grow under low hedges. The Hompouc and Fandre roots are well-tasted. The aforementioned Ompilampes and Ompizeis, who neither plant nor sow, take no other nourishment. The Sonzes are cab- d bages, whose leaves are round, and of exceeding magnitude ; the leaves have the taste of cabbage, and the roots that of artichoke bottoms. Houmins, or Voamitsa, are small roots like turnips, about the size of the thumb, one plant producing a hundred roots in a year. There are three sorts of Nenufar, with white, yellow, and violet flowers ; all are deemed food, and, like chesnuts, are eat boiled or roasted ; that with the violet flower is greedily eat by both sexes as a provocative ; the white and the yellow have a contrary effect.

Grain, fruit,
&c.

GREAT quantities of barley, which they call Apembe, grow in this country exceeding high, is ripe in the month of June, but of hard digestion. The Voangbembes are small beans, agreeable to the taste whether ripe or otherwise, but are heavy on the stomach ; are sown in June, and ripen in three months. The Voandsourous are small peas, of the size of lentils, e grow easily, and are sown at the same time with the Voangbembes beans. Antac is a kind of French bean. Voandrou is a kind of bean produced with great ease ; the fruit lies under ground with one bean in each pod : this, with great probability, is the Arachidna of Theophrastus : the leaves, like trefoil, are three and three, without branches or stalks, excepting those of the leaves. The Varvates resembles the caper-tree, blossoms in the same manner, each pod containing one small pea of the size of a lentil, not inferior to the Voandsourou : this plant is very fruitful, and grows to the height of a cherry-tree. Silk-worms are fed with the leaves of this tree in the province of Alfissach. Bananas grow in several places, but chiefly in the provinces of Manamboule and Icondre ; the inhabitants mix them in all their dishes ; some are as long and thick as the arm, called Oufi ; others bear fruit about half that bigness, f some no larger than the thumb, and others still less, which are called Acondres, of a green colour, whether young or old, with an hundred in a bunch. These roots are the constant food of the inhabitants, are good eating, very nourishing, and, when ripe, roast like apples. Some are plucked green, and hung up to ripen. In the province of Eringdrane the bark of this tree is spun for cloathing. The Ananas, called Manassi by the inhabitants of St. Mary's island, and of the bay of Antongil, grow in great plenty ; but those of that island exceed what are found in the neighbourhood of Fort Dauphin. The water-melons are of two kinds, one with black, the other with red seeds, and yield great relief in the hot season. They have such melons as in Europe, and pumpkins, whose first seeds were imported from France. The gourds are of two kinds, long and round ; the long are dressed before they are ripe, and eat g with milk, and, when dried, are made use of for bottles. They have great plenty of sugar-canes, principally in the provinces of Matatane, Manamboule, Antavare, Galemboule, and the island

Bananas.

Ananas.

Sugar-canes.

- a island of St. Mary. The inhabitants reap only the small advantage of bad wine, from their want of knowlege to make sugar ; but the wine is so penetrating as to exceed the strongest juice of lemon, and will cut through a stone cup in a night's time. Voanato is the fruit of a large tree that grows by the sea-side ; its meat, though clammy and viscous, is nourishing ; the natives eat it with milk or salt : the wood is very solid, proper for building, extremely clean and smooth, and not subject to rot or be worm-eaten. Vontaca is a fruit of the bigness of a quince, its coat as hard as a gourd, full of flat seeds ; the juice and soft meat, when ripe, is of an excellent flavour and taste, and casts the most fragrant smell ; but is prejudicial and hurtful to the stomach, if not perfectly ripe. Garcias calls these fruits Bengal quinces, and Durant, Marmemelos de Bengala. Its wine has the taste of beer, is laxative, and gives pains ; the ripe fruit fattens the hogs. They
- b have great plenty of the white pepper ; the woods near Manghabei are loaded on all sides with this pepper ; turtle-doves and wood-pigeons feed on it, and it ripens in the months of August, September, and October. The great Cardamum, or Langouze, otherwise Malagnet, or grain of paradise, grows in great abundance near the province of Galemboule ; the fruit is red as scarlet, the meat white, of an agreeable and tart taste, with black seed. There is likewise true ginger, though not plentiful, by Flacourt's account ; but Francis Cauche affirms that it grows throughout the island ; and that the islanders plant it round their houses, to receive the rain which falls on the leaves, and round the bee-hives, as food for the bees. On the mountains another kind grows, called Sacaviro of Ambou, which signifies hog-ginger. Flacourt affirms it to be only the Zedoaria. Coco-nuts are scarce, and, by the report of the inhabitants, were formerly unknown. About a hundred years since, the fruits were fortunately drove on the coast by the waves of the sea, which produced the first trees of this kind. This account seems probable, as in these days those nuts were seen floating near the shore, which, without doubt, came from some adjacent country, whose coast abounded with that sort of tree. The Indian saffron, which by the famous Linschoten is called Curcuma and Cunbet, grows likewise in this island. Saracine resembles ginger in taste and its yellow colour, is not so tart, and is used to colour and relish the meat. Voatzarte grows upon small trees with broad leaves ; the fruit is gathered like onions, of the size of an egg, full of juice within, like the coco-nut ; the peel dried has an aromatic taste, and is eatable ; the natives make ropes, mats, and baskets, of the leaves. Achith is a kind of plant, that creeps on the ground like a vine ; the leaves are round, pointed at the end, and dented like ivy, and always green ; the fruit, of the size of an unripe grape, ripens in the months of December, January, and February. The true vine abounds in the country of Alfissack, and the grapes are ripe in January. Amboutou is a small plant like flax, of a bitter styptic taste ; the natives chew this plant to blacken the teeth, lips, and gums ; it is corroborative, and, in times of famine, is eat to support and preserve strength. Lengou is the fruit of a creeping plant, of the size of a nut, thick-shelled, and tastes like the large green plum ; the skin pounded colours black, and is made use of for that purpose by the natives. Zanale is a fetid creeping herb, in great request and esteem among the natives for the same purpose, as also for the cure of ulcered gums ; the breath becomes strong, which renders their persons insupportable. There grows a plant also, which the Indians call Betel, or Betbre, the Arabians Tamboul, and the islanders Tamboure, which they constantly chew with thyme and Voadourou fruit, after the East Indian manner. In the province of Matatane the fruit Fourenfourou, or Indian Areca, prevails. Banghets, called by the Indians Anger, is the plant of which indico is made, in the following manner : a great quantity of the plant, when it first blossoms, is steeped in water, together with the stalks and leaves, which, being well stirred, putrify in three or four days ; the water becomes by the infusion of a violet colour, is cleared of the stalks and leaves, and then mixed and incorporated with a proportionable quantity of olive-oil, is afterwards run off by a hole in the bottom, through a sieve, into a tub underneath, and the dye in the settling sinks like dregs to the bottom : the water is drawn off by pipes, or dipping of rags, which are squeezed till nothing but the dreg remains ; and this dried in the shade is the true indico. Fanshaa is a great and high tree, which yields a reddish liquor, a considerable time after it is cut down ; the leaves are like fern, the wood veiny and hard, but soft in the middle. Rauver is a tree whose leaves, like aloe, are half an ell long, but thinner, and made use of to cover huts and cottages, and called Fandre.
- c
- d
- e
- f

- g LATACANGHOMELAHE, or bull-stone, from the resemblance in the fruit, is a creeping plant, of a white blossom, with the smell of, but larger than, jessamin. Singefau is a large leaf, three palms long, and four fingers broad, of a plant which cleaves to trunks of trees ; this leaf, bruised and applied to the eye, is said to clear the eye-sight. Rhomba is an herb that shoots great leaves, grows two cubits high, has the smell of cloves and cinnamon, and is a species of balsam. A great quantity of the eastern Cyperus is found on the sides of the rivers and marshes, which the natives call Mouyta, and use it in disorders of the head. Longue, like the European soap-wort, bears a flower resembling jessamin ; the root is bitter, and is

- good against the heart-burn and all sorts of poison : there are two sorts, one shoots white, the other purple flowers ; that with the white has the most virtue. Anramatico is a great plant two cubits high, with shoots at the end of the leaves a palm long, an hollow flower, with a particular and most curious fruit, in the form of a vase and cover, of two kinds, red and yellow : the natives, who believe that rain would immediately follow the gathering this fruit, refrain from it upon their journies ; but Europeans have found by experience these relations to be romantic, and without foundation. The flowers are full of water, and hold a gallon.
- Voame*. Voame are diminutive peas, or red beans, produced by a small creeping plant. The goldsmiths of this country, who have no notion of borax, solder gold by dipping it in Voame pounded and mixed with lemon-juice, called by the Indians Conduri, and by the inhabitants of Java Saga, who use it for weights. Fionouts, or Voulibobits, is an herb bearing yellow flowers and very thick leaves ; when burnt green, it has the smell of melilot, and the ashes make lye. Fimpi is a tree of the size of the olive ; the bark ash-grey, with the smell of musk, and its taste more biting than that of pepper. Flacourt deems it to be the Indian Costus. The bark is dried in the sun like cinnamon, and, whether burnt or not, has a most agreeable smell : the wood is white and hard, with a strong scent ; the leaves have the smell of the bark and leaves of the aloe ; it is called in the country Tetech, by the antient Greek physicians Agallochum and Xyloaloe, or aloe-wood, and by the Portuguese Paoda Quilla ; the leaves are something larger than those of the myrtle, dented, with near the same smell, and occasion sneezing. Madrise is a tree whose wood is marbled, of a violet colour in the middle, and the leaves small. Hazon Maintbi, or black wood, or ebony-tree ; the ebony is the heart of the trunk ; the tree is large, loaded with small leaves like myrtle, of a dark green, with a blackish bark, and of three or four kinds. Anacots bears a fruit larger than the finger, of an ash-grey, with leaves resembling those of the pear-tree : the fruit contains a sweet and white juice, made use of to turn milk. Tendrocosses bears pulse. Tarantale is a kind of box. Sanzenelabe, or Sanzene Vaue, is of two sorts ; the wood has the smell of cumminseed, but much stronger ; the bark, resembling elder, is the strongest : the natives grind it with water upon a stone, and use it in fevers, and in curing every kind of wound ; the latter is reckoned the best. Encafatrabe is a wood whose heart is green, and full of veins, with the smell of a rose, like Lignum Rhodium, and, when ground and applied to the stomach, is good against heart-burnings and faintings. Mera is a tree with leaves like those of the olive, the wood yellow in the middle, without smell, and hard as box. Vintang is a tree whose wood is never worm-eaten, and used by the natives for canoes ; it produces a gum or resin particularly good in healing wounds. The wood of the tree Azonorouts is extremely good and proper for combs. Tamboubitfi is a tree whose wood is of an orange-colour in the middle, but of no use in dyeing. Fatra is the tree which produces benjamin. Sandraba is a straight and tall tree : the wood is blacker than ebony, without knots or fibres, and may be smoothed and polished as horn : it grows near and in the environs of Ranoufoutchi ; the greatest pieces are seven inches thick. Cocambe is another black wood, like the latter, more crooked, grows in stony and thorny places, has few leaves and flowers ; the wood, when burnt, yieldeth a most agreeable smell. Some of these trees have trunks and branches exceeding large. Envilasse is another species of ebony, resembling the Sandraba wood, with few knots. Zaga is the wood of which are made handles for darts. Tamboure-ciffa is a tree bearing apples, which, in ripening, open into four parts : the inside pulp is full of kernels, and covered with a thin orange-coloured skin, which yield a tincture like the American Rocou. Anaco, like the cypress-tree, grows by the water-side. Affonpasséhis bears a fruit of exquisite taste, of the size of a date. Vabats is a small shrub, the bark of the roots of which is useful in dyeing, and is easily separated from the fresh roots by water, which, when dry, must be pared : the bark, for use, is boiled with silk or woollen on a slow fire, in a lye made of the same bark ; and the stuff, in this manner, is impregnated with red of the colour of fire, and, by adding a little lemon-juice, will take a fine yellow. Tamarinds likewise grow in great plenty. The tree called Anghive is of two sorts, the great and lesser ; the latter bears a fruit of the size of a walnut ; the first, common in the province of Galemboule, as large as hen-eggs, of a scarlet colour and exquisite taste ; a decoction of the roots cures the heat of urine and the gravel. Andian Bouloha is a small shrub that grows on the sea-shore, whose leaves resemble those of the herb called Dog's Tongue. Varaucoco is a plant that twines about great trees, and bears a violet-coloured fruit as large as peaches, of an admirable taste, extremely sweet, but viscous, with four great kernels in the middle ; and the wood, though worm-eaten in a year, is made use of for hoops : a red gum like blood oozes through the bark, thick and resinous, which dissolves by a candle like Gum Laëis, and has near the same smell. Rhaa, called in the country the dragon-tree, from the figure of that animal, as is related, distinctly imprinted on the fruit when the skin is off, grows as large as a walnut-tree, and, by making an aperture or incision in the bark of the trunk or branches, a gum springs out

- a out red as blood ; on which account the natives call the tree Rbaa, or blood, and apothecaries the gum Dragon's blood ; the wood is white, and soon worm-eaten ; the leaves longer, but like those of the pear-tree : the fruit, called in the language of the country Mafoutra, and by Dodonæus, and others, Dragonæ, has the form and size of a small pear, the end thicker, with five points or extremities, which contain a kernel covered by one membrane, of the form, colour, and almost the taste, of a nutmeg. Monardes and others have affirmed, that the figure of a dragon was imprinted on this fruit under the skin that covered it ; but Flacourt, who opened many, discovered the falsity of this account. There are three kinds of this tree, bearing different fruits, and a fat and thick oil is drawn from these kernels, which is a sovereign remedy against inflammations, burnings, erysipelas, itch, and extraordinary swellings ; a decoction of the bark is good for the bloody-flux. Lalanda is a jessamin which grows to the height of a small shrub ; the leaves are like those of the European jessamin, and the flowers are extremely odoriferous, which are used by the women to scent the oil of Sesame, called in the country Menachil. Honnits Ancason is a small shrub bearing a flower of the smell of jessamin, but larger and whiter ; the stock, which supports it, is white, and six inches long. Voale is a small shrub that shoots a flower like the liriconfancy, called by apothecaries Lilium convallium. Langhare is a small shrub that usually grows under bushes and hedges, and shoots long leaves notched like a saw, like the chestnut-tree, but closer and more pointed at the ends : the stock is straight, and the flowers, which grow without any seeming fastening or support through the bark all over the trunk, are blood-coloured, of a biting taste, laxative, and raises a salivation, if chewed. It is affirmed, that the wood pounded and drank with water, or hung by the neck, immediately cures the hiccups. Mimboube is a tree bearing odoriferous leaves, made use of to gladden and warm the heart. Horame is a large tree, which produces a particular gum, known among the apothecaries by the American name of Tacamabaca, and is properly a resin, generally of the poplar magnitude, covered with long and narrow leaves, with fruit of the size of a nut or plum, thick and like resin, and the wood fit for ship-building. A particular fig-tree grows here, called Nonnuc, and by Linschooten, in the Portuguese language, Arvor de Rais, or root-tree, from its aptness to take root at the end of the boughs, which incline to and touch the ground, and become new trunks, continue shooting fresh branches, inclining to the earth like thickets, and, becoming fresh stocks, multiply without discontinuance, into forty or fifty, as is frequently seen, each growing equal in height to the first or mother-stock, and the whole occupying so large a circumference, that an hundred persons may shelter themselves from the heat or rain under one of these trees. Flacourt relates, that he had seen several in the neighbourhood of Fort Dauphin, which had produced four new stocks, twelve feet each in circumference ; and that from each stock others had sprung, inclining to and ready to take root in the earth, at forty-eight feet distance one from the other. The fruit called the Voanounouc, or Nounouc fruit, or Indian fig-tree, has the taste and shape of European figs ; a milky juice springs from any aperture or incision in this tree, and the bark is fit for cordage. Veva is a small shrub, whose leaves resemble those of the almond-tree, of a dark green above, and white and hairy underneath, with an attractive quality. Himavale is a tree with six leaves on each little branch, placed opposite each other, odoriferous, and esteemed a good cordial. Endrachendrach is a great tree, the wood yellow, odoriferous, heavy, and hard like iron, and, as marble, suffers no alteration under ground ; wherefore it is properly called by that name, which signifies lasting without end. Tsimandam is a tree with few leaves, and is useful in cardialgias, the plague, and other contagious distempers. Ferocoffe is a slender shrub, which produces small round cabbages, which are excellent eating. Mandouavate is a tree guarded by a green bark, hard, and very prickly, and produces a fruit resembling filberds ; the wood is very fit for dart-handles. Sira Manghits, or odoriferous, from the agreeable smell of the leaves, is a slender tree, useful to cheer the heart ; the leaves have the smell of white and yellow Sanders, the bark that of cloves, and produces a sweet-smelling rosin. Aboulaza is a tree whose wood is also cordial. Laberic is a tree whose stock is upright and hollow, and the leaves are fixed round in a spiral line, like a screw. Fooraba is a tree which produces a green odoriferous balsam, and is a sovereign remedy for every sort of wound and bruise, and, mixed with oil, is used by women as an ointment for the hair, and bears a large fruit. Mihohats is a tree of a cordial virtue. Arindranto is a tree whose rotten wood, when burnt, yields a wonderful fragrance, and is exceeding proper for perfumes. Ouvilassa is a creeping plant, whose root resembles that of jallap, and yields a gum or resin like scammony, and purges with such violence, when eat, as to draw blood. Saldits is a fine woody plant, which produces red flowers resembling feathers ; the seed is vomiting, and the root of the same plant stops it. Pendre is a tree that shoots leaves higher than an aloe, and bears ten or twelve white flowers of an excellent odour ; the women infuse it in the sun in Menachil or Sesame oils. Apocapouc is a tree whose leaves and flowers are like those of spurge-laurel ; the fruit is of the size of an almond or nut, and strong poison ; an oil is drawn, nevertheless, from the kernels, useful for anointing the hair. Ouviau

- is a tree bearing a kind of almond, from which is drawn exquisite oil for the hair, and sauces. <sup>a</sup>
- Voulou. Voulou is a kind of Indian cane; Linschoten and Acosta name the tree Mambu, and, in imitation of the Indians, Bamboo; the pith is moist, and something like milk; the Arabian physicians call it Tabaxir, and the Indians Sacar Mambu, or Bamboo, and is in great esteem throughout the east. Their plenty in the province of Galemboule gives the name to the country; Bamboos and rice being almost the only produce, which the natives cut down and burn, and use the ashes as manure for rice; many are as large and thick as the thigh, tall, black, and round, and the chief beauty of the country: every three years the tree bears a fruit no larger than a small bean; flour, equal in goodness with that from European wheat, might be made of this fruit. This tree is as useful to these islanders as the coco-tree to the Indians, supplies materials for kitchen and household furniture of all sorts, and for all uses, <sup>b</sup> small wherries for the rivers, roofs, floors, planks, and stays for building, sedans, or palankins, and are made use of throughout the East Indies for the same purposes. Ampoufoutchi is a light white wood, easy to be worked; the ashes are proper to make powder, and the bark is fit for cordage. Anaze is a large tree, and grows like a pyramid; the fruit full of white pith, with the taste of tartar, and of hard kernels, like the pine-apple. Tavevoule is a tree whose leaves are narrow and long, without stalks, grow round, and appear to be glued to the branches. Ouvave is a kind of reed, knotty like the Indian cane, the roots fit to eat, and the wood, of a violet colour, serves to dye red. Besides these plants, mostly peculiar to the island of Madagascar, there are many which resemble or are the same with European plants. True grapes grow in the desert of Alfissach; but the inhabitants, ignorant of their <sup>c</sup> quality, are afraid to eat them. The land every-where produces good tobacco (L), and several kinds of jessamin. Hemp grows in great plenty; and Flacourt relates that the stalk, leaves, and seed, are the same as the European; that the natives take particular care in the management of this plant, who suck the dry leaves in lieu of tobacco, which produces a similar effect, stupifies and causes sleep: old women, the Ombiaffes, or priests and doctors, make use of it to banish chagrin and melancholy; and a like plant, called Bangue, is used in the East Indies for the same purpose. The stalk of the Madagascar hemp is looked upon as fit for cordage or linen, and never used as in Europe. Leeks, purslane, lettings, carrots, cabbage, turnips, anise, mustard, and hawthorns, are here in great plenty. Voarots is the fruit of a large tree, with leaves resembling those of the olive, which, added to the height <sup>d</sup> and extent of the boughs and branches, exhibit a most agreeable sight, and is extremely ornamental; the fruit, of the size of a cherry, with a thick shell like a nut, is exceeding bitter, and is of three sorts, white, red, and black. Voaverone is a fruit of a violet colour, not larger than a red currant, sweet and agreeable to the mouth, and dyes black and violet. Mulberries. White mulberries are found in this country, extremely sour and sharp; the leaves are different, with a bare resemblance of the European fruit. Azonvalala is a small red agreeable fruit, without juice, and grows upon small shrubs amongst the bushes. Voatsourte is a small solid fruit, like nutmegs, with the walnut taste, either boiled or roasted. Tocanhoba is the fruit of a tree resembling the small pear-tree; it kills dogs; the tree grows extremely high; the wood, of musk colour, is the heaviest and hardest in the country, and bears a fine polish. <sup>e</sup>
- Voanane. Voanane is a fruit half a foot long, consisting of four parts, with the taste of a stony pear, and is a sovereign remedy in laxative disorders. Entfacale is the fruit of a large tree, which grows in a straight line, extremely high; the leaves are few, and resemble those of the nut-tree; the fruit long, and divided into different little cells, thinner than the skin that covers them, in and outside yellow, full of seed, and some juice of an agreeable taste, and grow upon the trunk from the bottom to the top, and only fastened by a thin stalk, which is uncommon and curious. There are three kinds; that already mentioned, the second with the outside black, and the third of an ash-grey; and all with veins and fibres lying in the bark.
- Fonti. Fonti, or Dourou, is a plant that grows like a plume of feathers, with leaves six feet long and two broad, and there are many ten feet long, exclusive of the stalk, which is sometimes <sup>f</sup> two feet long; the fruit is called Voatfonsi, or Voadourou, and is inclosed in a hard rind or bark.
- Quadrupeds, &c. THE island of Madagascar abounds in different kinds of quadruped animals, insects, birds, and fish. There are three sorts of cattle; one kind horned, another with round heads, without horns, called Boury, and a third kind, whose horns are loose and hanging down, and fastened only to the skin of the head; all of them having large quantities of fat (M), contained in great bunches or swellings, which the natives melt and use for butter, the taste

(L) Here is also tobacco which they smoke in reeds or shells, as they do the Jarmaughla *.

(M) They have an excrescence between their shoulders, somewhat like that of camels, all fat and fleshy; some of which will weigh three or fourscore pounds (4).

* Drury, p. 283.

(4) Drury's Hist. p. 80.

- a being equally agreeable. Buffaloes likewise run in herds in the province of Machicore; the natives believe that they were originally domestic animals, and became wild by the long continuance of civil wars. There are great numbers of goats and kids; the female kids commonly three times a year, and brings four at each time. The mutton is extremely fine tasted; and there is a kind of sheep, whose large and flat tails weigh twenty or twenty-five pounds. The woods are inhabited by great numbers of wild boars, with two horns near the nose, like great prickles, and with hard skins, who greatly damage and destroy the rice. The lard of tame hogs is good and wholesome; their food being chiefly land-tortoises, and their eggs (N). There is a kind of porcupine in great plenty, whose flesh, though insipid and flabby, is nevertheless esteemed by the natives. These animals sleep six months under ground, cast and
- b have new darts at this time. Vosse is an animal like the Tesson, or badger, and the flesh is agreeable. Vareffe is a beast of prey, of the bigness of a fox, with a large and long tail, and hair like a wolf. The dogs are small, with long snouts, short ears, and hair like foxes. Various kinds of monkeys and baboons are found in the different provinces of this island. Some are large and white, with black spots on the ribs and heads, with long snouts, and, like tygers, of a fierce nature, and never fully tamed. Others have grey hair and flat noses, and are easily tamed. Those called Varis are the most common; are grey, have long snouts, and large bushy tails, like foxes. There is another white sort, called Sifac, with good teeth, white tails, and two spots like teeth on the ribs, of a middling size, between the Varis and Varicofi, which stand upright and strong upon their hind legs. In the provinces of Ampatre and Matafalle is another white kind, with tails chequered white and black, that run in troops of forty or fifty together through the woods; and also another grey kind, with eyes sparkling like fire, and short hair, who die when taken, owing to the wildness of their nature. Tsitfibi are grey squirrels, which keep in the holes of trees, and never become tame. Voudsira is a small animal like a weasel, of a dark red colour, which feeds on honey, and smells like musk. Civet-cats are likewise very plentiful, and are esteemed dainty morsels by many of the natives. Tretretrete, or Tratratratra, is an animal of the size of a heifer two years old, with a round head, human countenance, with the fore and hind part like a baboon, and breeds in a desert near the lake of Lipomani. The natives are frightened at the sight of it, and fly from it; and it likewise flies on the least appearance of a man. Antamba is an animal as big as a dog, resembling, according to the negroes account, a leopard, which preys on mankind and beasts, but keeps to the mountains, and is seldom seen. Mangarzahoc is a great animal that brays like an ass, and is believed by some to be the wild ass. The mountain Mangarzahoc takes its name from this animal, which is never seen in any other part. Brehis is an animal with one horn in the middle of the forehead, as large as a goat, and extremely wild, and breeds in the province of Ansiandea. There is no brood of elephants, tygers, lions, and horses, in this island.
- c
- d

VARIOUS kinds of insects are found in this country. Famocantraton, or breast-leaper, is an extraordinary but dangerous insect, of the size of a small lizard, which fixes itself, as if glued, to the barks of trees, with its mouth open for catching spiders, flies, and other insects; and leap on the breast of those who approach the tree where they are, and cannot be got rid of but by cutting away the flesh on which they are fixed. There are numbers of cameleons, rats, mice, and water-rats (O). Mandouts is a kind of serpent, as large as the arm or leg of a man, not venomous, though deemed so by the natives, which feeds on bats and small birds. Anacandef is a sort of little serpent, no bigger than a quill, that slips into the body at particular times, gnaws the intestines, and occasions the most insupportable pain, and even death in a short time, if not extracted, which is seldom or ever performed. There are many other serpents, such as Menore, Save, Mare, Tfondibale, Renautic, &c.

(N) This animal is a kind of porcupine, called by Drury a Ground Hog, and Tondruck, in the language of the country; is of the size of a cat, with snout, eyes, and ears, like an English hog; has bristles on the back, but no tail; the feet are like those of rabbits, and it feeds upon beetles and young snails; is very prolific, bringing about twenty in a litter, and suckling them all. It hides itself in the ground in a surprising manner; digs first two feet directly down, then two or three feet obliquely, afterwards works upwards afloat till within half a foot of the surface, where it makes a proportionate lodging for the body, and lies five or six months without any sustenance; at the expiration of which term it is as fat as when it first went in. It is an excellent food, and no pains are spared to take them (5).

(O) Here is a creature of the form of a serpent, one of which Mr. Drury says he killed with his own hands; it was no-ways venomous. Several have been bit by them, and no worse hurt accrued than is customary from the bite of any beast (6).

(5) Drury's Hist. p. 70.

(6) Id. m. ibid.

Scorpions, &amp;c.

SCORPIONS (P) are called Hal. The Tsingalaba Huravou, or water-scorpion, resides constantly in marshes and dead waters, destroys cattle, attacks dogs, and sucks their blood when killed. The scorpion Vancobo, or spider, has a large, round, and black belly, and is extremely dangerous. Its bite occasions an instantaneous swooning, which sometimes lasts two days, attended with a coldness like ice. The usual method of cure is giving the remedies for poison, and placing the person by the fire. Anacalife is a creeping animal, that breeds between the barks of rotten and worm-eaten trees, as long as the palm of the hand, having many legs, like a caterpillar, flat and thin, with a hard skin; its bite is exceeding venomous, and causes the same disorder as the bite of a scorpion, and death, if the same remedies are not administered. There are moth-worms, earwigs, bugs, and many insects troublesome to mankind. Acolalan is a little insect, not so offensive in smell, but like a bug, and increases in a short time to the size of a man's thumb, when it becomes winged, and flies away; the young ones remaining in the houses, huts, and furniture, and gnawing every thing, particularly apparel. Vombare is a butterfly, variegated with different colours, intermixed with that of gold and silver. Others are known by the name of Sacondre, which proceed from beetles, and keep to the bark of a particular small shrub, appearing like white flowers, and afterwards changed into various colours, chequered with green and red, and make the sweetest honey on the leaves of the Tentele Sacondre. There are many sorts of snails particularly denominated, but are in general called Caracora. Herechereche is a sparkling beetle that gives light, and shines in the woods, and on the houses, in the night, with a surprising flame. Caterpillars also abound here, of several kinds, called Tsingoulou Voulou. Ants, or Vitfic, and worms of various kinds, are found in this island. Silk-worms are quadruped; some called Landeve produce one prickly cod; others, called Landeferaba, make small cods, inclosed in a large one, frequently containing five hundred young; the third kind, Landeanacau, make the silk on the tree Anacau, that, like cypress, grows by the sea-side; the cods hang in strings, separated from each other, and the silk is the finest, strongest, and best; the fourth sort, Landevontagua, make their silk on the tree Vontonquier, which is also very fine. There is an ant amongst the rice, that gnaws and eats it, called Sicouroucourou. The land-tortoises are of two kinds, called Hilinfoca and Fanou.

River-birds, &amp;c.

THE island produces in like manner several kinds of river and other birds, known by the general name of Vourou in the language of the country; but of a less size than those of Europe. Hens eggs are no larger than those of pigeons. There are ordinary pheasants, and a kind with violet feathers and red beak; small black paroquets, and some of a dark red, but scarce; small green finches, that whistle and imitate the songs of other birds; wild turkeys; black, white, and grey eagles, with fine plumage; wild storks with crests on their heads; common teal, and a particular kind with red legs and claws, called Halives; pelicans, and black and white herons, water-wag-tails, &c. Samba is a bird whose feathers are as red as fire. Vourouchontsi are white birds, that follow the cattle, and feed upon the flies and beetles found on them; and are generally lean. Voula is a river-bird, like the great pelican, with a long and white beak. Tabia is a bird whose wings, feet, and beak, are black; and its note is always Tabia. Taliva is a river-bird of the size of a hen, with violet plumage, and red beak and feet. Haretac is a bird with a red crest on the head, with black feathers and feet like a teal.

Character of the inhabitants.

THE inhabitants of most provinces are whites or negroes: the whites are the Robandrians, Anacandrians, or Ondzatsi; the negroes are the Voadziri, Lobavobits, Ontsoa, and Ondeves, as before-mentioned in the account of the province of Anossi, like the natives of Mozambique, and resembling the whites in long hanging hown hair.

IN many places (Q) are found real wild men, with their wives and children, called by the natives Ompizees, who let their hair and beards grow, go naked, excepting the noble parts, which are covered with leaves, inhabit thick and unfrequented woods, avoid meeting their fellow-natives, and live upon fish, wild beasts, fruit, roots, honey, and locusts. The island of Ontsayfatrouba, situated between Anachimoussi and the river Ranoumene, was formerly inhabited by a people without communication, and in continual war with their neighbours, who fought with bows and arrows, eat their enemies and all travellers, reserving the hands always

(P) There is an insect of the scorpion kind, which is the only venomous creature seen in the island, says Drury *.

(Q) There are some people in the remote parts of this country, whose inhabitants are in secret recesses in the woods; they live easy, indolent lives, never come near a town, nor concern themselves with any affairs, with peace or war, foreign or domestic; they keep no cattle, lest the losing of their herds or flocks might possibly betray them, and induce evil-minded men to disturb their peace, by plundering them of their treasure; but content themselves with small plantations, and the product of nature; never concerning themselves who is lord of any particular place, or sovereign of the whole dominions †.

* Dury, p. 460.† Idem, p. 189.

a for the king's table. They fed great numbers of cows for their milk only ; never killed bulls, goats, rams, or cocks, which they buried when dead : they devour their dogs with great appetite and greediness, when unfit for hunting ; but cultivate their lands in the same manner as the inhabitants of Madagascar (R). These deformed and ugly people, small-eyed, with broad foreheads, painted teeth, flat-nosed, thick-lipped, with short curled hair, reddish skin, without beards, large bellies, and thin legs, nimble and good runners, preyed upon and consumed each other, till reduced to a small number, who were intirely destroyed by their neighbouring enemies, and neither man nor woman remained.

THESE islanders are esteemed the most deceitful, dissembling, flattering, and false people in the world (S), particularly the inhabitants along the coast of Mangbabei to the end of the island southward. The Mangbabeians are less cruel and treacherous, speak little, are better observers of promises, follow other laws and customs, and glory in being descended from Abraham : the rest are treacherous and false ; fulfil no engagements, unless compelled ; must be governed with rigour, the chiefs as well as inferiors, and treated, when faulty, with great severity : those who are freed and set at liberty by those whom they had injured, are extremely ungrateful, and attribute every success to their Auli, or fortune, becoming more mischievous than before ; revenge and treachery being held as capital virtues, and forgiving and compassionate men looked upon as cowards. They never delay, if in their power, the cruel executions on prisoners of war ; and their greatest pleasure is to cut and mince the children taken alive, to rip open the women's bellies, and then leave them in the pangs of death.

c They have no pleasure in exercise or walking, either for health or diversion, except in singing and dancing, of which they are fond, believing the least fatigue, even walking, to give more trouble than pleasure : on this account they ridicule European exercises of diversion, and pronounce them fools for fatiguing themselves without occasion.

THE inhabitants generally apply themselves with great diligence to agriculture, have scarce any knowledge of commerce, and no improvement in invention of arts and trades, like Europeans, or in discovering the natural produce, that might invite strangers to their country ; they even neglect making silk, and preserving the worms they have such plenty of. Their labour extends only to the necessities of living, provisions, apparel, and habitations ; for they condemn superfluities. Their chief employment is in buildings, gold and iron works, and in polishing, making earthen ware, spinning, weaving, cordage, fishing, hunting, and chiefly in agriculture. Some make all sorts of iron and steel implements, hatchets, hammers, shovels, razors, nippers, gridirons, forks, javelins, darts, and butchers knives.

THE goldsmiths, mostly natives of Voamaro, make ear-rings, bracelets, necklaces, and other gold ornaments, from their own mines. Potters make great and small plates and pots (T) from a clay and thorn boughs, which, being rubbed with a kind of black earth, shine like looking-glasses. They have carpenters and turners, who make wooden plates and chests, called Voa, wooden and horn spoons, and other household goods. The Zaferamini, Rohandrians, and Anacandrians, are remarkable for the wood-work of houses ; their tools are a plane, wedge, and rule, with some other implements.

c THEY fish with draw-nets, well-baskets, hooks, and harpoons, in the same manner at sea as in the lakes and rivers, and exchange the fish in adjacent countries for rice, yams, roots, cotton, and other necessities of life, or dry them for keeping, and fish in canoes at a great distance from the shore.

THE rope-makers make cordage of all sizes and lengths, to 130 fathoms long ; the small ropes for netting and baskets are made from the bark of different trees, and the best at Aviau and Fautastranou. Women are only employed in spinning, who make various sorts of stuffs from flax and threads from the barks of trees.

AGRICULTURE is practised in a different manner, and with less trouble, than in Europe. No plough or oxen are employed in the tillage of land : an ax for felling great trees, a bill for lopping off the branches, and an implement, called Faugali, for grubbing the roots and weeds, are their sole instruments. The arms and branches of trees, when dry, are burnt to ashes, which are used in planting yams, rice, &c. when properly wetted by rain. Near and round about the province of Mangbabei rice is planted grain after grain, and the ears

(R) These people are almost of a different species from the others ; their heads are of a peculiar shape, and their hair is neither so long nor woolly ; their religion is different, they paying an awful regard to the new moon, and several animals *.

(S) They are very treacherous, persuaded that the Europeans have cruel designs upon them ; and are therefore on their guard, dreading their audacity and superior skill in war ; and, if credit may be given to half they say, the conduct of the French sailors, who were once masters, and our countrymen the pirates, hath been barbarous to the last degree †.

(T) They make very curious earthen ware, such as pots, dishes, and jugs, glazing them both within and without, and are very ingenious artificers in many other particulars ‡.

* Drury, p. 406.† Idem, p. 278.‡ Idem, p. 407.

are cut off in the same manner ; but in the province, and adjoining parts, of Anossi, after another method: the ground is prepared for grubbing by being trampled upon and turned up by oxen ; and when the weeds are rotten the rice is sowed, which grows with great ease, and in a short time becomes extremely fine. The fields for rice are marshes, or marshy lands, called Horracs. Every Horrac, or field of rice, is the property of a particular chief, which occasions great differences, from their pretensions of right to the best and most fertile soils. The poor negroes cultivate and plant yams on the sides of mountains, and are obliged to continual hunting of boars, and other wild animals, to preserve their plants from destruction ; an exercise that is much practised on this account by the Ontsoa, or slaves, who are the only hunters, the chiefs thinking it below their dignity.

Dancing and singing.

THE islanders are greatly addicted to singing and dancing ; the women chiefly to singing ; and are very ready in composition, upon the slightest occasion. Their songs are generally reprehensive of both sexes, or encomiums on the remarkable actions of their ancestors. Dancing and singing accompany each other. They make use of three musical instruments ; the Valiban, strung with some chords, the Voule, made of bamboos, and the Herraovou, played upon with a bow. The performers on this last instrument are the most esteemed, and receive the greatest applause in public assemblies.

Houses.

THEIR houses have no upper chambers or garrets, nor cellars underneath ; they consist of one floor only called Varerarai ; the tops are shelving, and covered with leaves of rates and bamboos ; the walls are made of two inch planks ; the hearth upon the ground, about four feet square, raised upon sand, with three stones to place the pot on, and without chimnies, which makes them scarce habitable, on account of the continual smoke, their fires being kept up in the hottest weather. Their rice-barns are at a distance from their houses, raised upon wooden pillars, to preserve it from rats.

Furniture.

THE furniture chiefly consists in red and yellow rush mats, well made and convenient ; those of Manghabei are soft and strong. The floors on which they lie are covered with these mats, without bed, bolster, pillowbier, or any sort of covering, with a piece of wood under the head (excepting the Robandrians, who make use of pillowbiers stuffed with cotton-seed), being from their infancy accustomed to lie hard. Their cloaths, girdles, or Saravobits, cotton, effects, and all ornaments, are kept in baskets ; and oils for the body and hair in earthen pitchers. Their kitchen-furniture consists of earthen pots, called Villangues, Louvies, Hafes, Monhonges, and Sines, wooden dishes and spoons, dried gourds for water, knives, grid-irons, and forks, mortars to pound rice, troughs, and winnowing fans, with large vessels for honey-wine. The leaves of rates, twelve feet long and four broad, serve for table-napkins and plates, and are laid upon mats, spread upon the floor, without table or chairs.

Negroes go naked.

THE negroes go naked, excepting the pudenda, which are covered with a linen called Lamba, and Saravobits, or drawers, by the women, with an Acazan, or long robe, without sleeves, hanging down to the ancles, and a piece of linen before, sewed at both ends like an apron.

Different dresses of the whites.

THE white men and women go bare-headed and bare-footed, excepting those of Manghabei, where the men wear a square cap, and the women a hood, pointed at top, and hanging down upon the shoulders. The dresses are of different colours and names ; some of red silk, called Soatfinifili ; others of cotton, called Varo. These are of reddish and other colours, interwoven with fine cotton in white stripes. Others are made from the barks of trees, either from that of the Fautastranou, Try, Mouffia, Avo, Courava, or threads of Banana. The cotton cloths made by the whites, or Zaseramini, in the province of Anossi, are the finest and best, much sought after by the inhabitants of Vobitsbang, and others, who buy up great quantities ; but the most esteemed are the cottons, with silk borders about a foot deep, the ground white, with black stripes, and black and red silk lace. The chiefs only, and Robandrians, wear this upon great formalities, and are preserved for the funerals of the chiefs, whose bodies are wrapped up therein. The garments for slaves are made of the bark of trees ; which is first beat to a hemp, then boiled twice in strong lye, afterwards washed, and twisted upon spindles in different sizes, and worked up for apparel : the cloth resembles European linen, is strong, and more lasting than cotton. Those made of the bark of Try are extremely fine and soft, but not durable ; as are those of Atfouche, in the province of Mata-tane, from the bark of the tree Avo ; of which also paper is made in the provinces of Galem-boule, Manghabei, and round the bay of Antongil ; the bark or thin skin of small leaves shooting from the middle of the tree Mouffia, which, in other places, produces only large leaves, twelve or fifteen feet in length, supplies them with wearing apparel. The fruit of this tree is like a pine-apple. The stuffs made from Banana, chiefly in the province of Eringdrana, are fine, light, and equal in beauty to the silken manufacture, and are woven in the same manner. Their ornaments, called Firauach, are different kinds of chains, worn round the neck, arms, and legs, ear-rings, bracelets, rings, and other toys, with necklaces

of

a of different names, Salantes, Saraves, and Endachs, consisting of three or four, and even twelve, rows of pearls, corals, beads of gold, glass of all colours, rock-chrystal, agats, cornelian and sardonian stones. These ornaments of gold are only wore by the Zaferamini, who are the chiefs of the island, and the Voadziri and Lobavobits amongst the negroes.

POLYGAMY is practised throughout the island, every man enjoying a plurality of wives, Polygamy allowed. in proportion to his fortune; and the women, equally incontinent, are never destitute of friends to soften and alleviate their cares, in the gratification of their prevailing passions, and whom they never fail of having recourse to, upon any discovery or ill-treatment from their husbands, in return to their perfidious love. Unmarried women give themselves up in the same manner to several pleasures, are ready to every purchaser, but extremely venal in the surrender of their persons, their gallants, in failure of payment, being constantly abused and stripped, to make satisfaction. This is one of the most abominable crimes amongst the indigent negroes, who even satiate, with impunity, their brutal passions by the most shocking pollutions in presence of their parents, who, ashamed to be interrogated with regard to the number and beauty of their wives, yet, through amazing blindness, have the greatest satisfaction in seeking inviting objects, and glory in the licentious manners of their children. Sodomy, notwithstanding, has never crept into this island.

FREEDOM between unmarried persons is not esteemed sinful in respect to God, or scandalous amongst mankind; the women chusing only to marry those with whom they have cohabited; nor is any dishonour fixed by the married upon adultery; but theft or injustice is commonly punished with retaliation.

THEIR marriage ceremonies are called Miracheibei: the negroes practise none; and the whites, or Zaferamini, observe them only on the wedding-day of their chief wife. Marriage ceremonies.

AT funerals, the nearest relations wash the body of the deceased, which they adorn with bracelets, rings, and chains of gold, set with coral and other ornaments, and wrap in several exceeding fine cloths, and carry in a mat to the tomb. The hair and beards of the chiefs are shaved, and a cap is placed on the heads of women. Antecedent to this, the parents, friends, and slaves, assemble round the corpse, at whose feet a light is burned day and night, and bemoan the deceased with great lamentations; women, at the same time, attend, alternately bewailing and dancing, whilst men perform exercises of arms; the mourners within doors extol the praises, and proclaim the public loss of the deceased, speak to him as if living, and, having the power of life and death, ask the reason of his dying; whether he had not gold, silver, iron, cattle, slaves, or riches, sufficient? The day is spent in this burlesque interchange of grief and mirth, and the whole company is entertained at night. Next morning the corpse is carried to the Amounouque, or burial-place, in a coffin made of hollow trunks closed together, and deposited six feet deep, under a strong house, with rice, tobacco, earthen and perfume plates, a gown, and sack; the house is afterwards shut up, and a stone ten or twelve feet high placed before it. Beasts are sacrificed, and the parts are left for the deceased, the devil, and God; and, in fifteen days, the relations send provisions and greetings, as if yet alive, and fix upon poles round the monument the heads of the immolated victims. The children likewise make frequent sacrifices of oxen, and beg the assistance of the deceased, crying aloud, Thou, who art now in heaven, give us advice in our troubles. Funeral ceremonies.

THE nearest relations of sick and mad persons, as is related, immediately send for the Ombiaffe, or priest, in order to fetch understanding from the Amounouque. The Ombiaffe repairs in the night to the tomb, opens the monument, and, placing a cap on the aperture, invokes the soul of the father to the person disordered, and demands understanding for his helpless child. The aperture is instantly closed by the Ombiaffe, who returns immediately, declares his success, and places the cap on the head of the sick persons, who are believed to be silly and weak enough to ascribe the recovery of their senses to these impostors, and to order forthwith presents to the Ombiaffes. Custom in regard to sick and mad people.

UPON the demise of persons of rank, at a distance from this country, the heads are cut off, and brought home; the remainder is buried upon the spot; and, in the same manner, the bodies of those slain in war, which are dug up in time of peace, and translated to the tombs of their ancestors, whose memory is held in such veneration and esteem, that their greatest and most solemn oath is to swear by the souls of their predecessors. Custom at the death of persons of rank.

THE custom of exposing their children to a certain, though indeterminate, manner of death, appears to be the most dreadful of all the barbarous and execrable superstitions practised by the natives of Madagascar; and is the true reason why this island, the largest and most fertile in the world, is so thin of inhabitants. Barbarous custom of exposing children.

THEY are under an obligation of exposing new-born children, according to the fatal observation of the Ombiaffes, who, for private emolument, contemplate the aspects of the planets at the time of their birth, and arbitrarily pronounce them inauspicious and unfortunate. Life or death depend on these sentences, and an interested decree executes, in a manner before birth, Arbitrary sentences of the priests.

birth, and deprives them of the light, created in the beginning, and designed from eternity, a for their use and enjoyment.

Unfortunate days, &c.

THE unfortunate months are April, or Safard, March, or Ramahara. The eighth day and last week of every month are equally inauspicious; the first is called Affarontor, the last Alacossi. Wednesday and Friday in each week are unhappy days; and hours even are influenced by a bad Vitang, or aspect of an unlucky planet. Half the year, by these ominous predictions, becomes really such to the unfortunate offspring of this inhuman race.

Sacrifices offered for the lives of young children.

YET powerful nature breaks the chains with which she is fettered by pagan education, and exhibits the compassionate and tender impressions of her own potent Creator, in the frequent opposition given to these sanguinary precepts, by preventing the cruel destruction of innocent babes, in the preservation of the life which their parents had been instruments of giving, b and in reversing the sentences of the cruel and avaricious Ombiaffes. Slaves are often employed to suckle and bring up the children born in unfortunate times. Sacrifices, denominated Falis, of beasts and cocks have been immolated, whilst they were confined in places pointed out by pagan superstition, to take off the malignity of the predominant star, which would certainly take effect, were these customary and superstitious practices neglected.

Diet.

THEIR ordinary food is rice, beans, or peas, various sorts of yams, Sonzes, or cabbages, and Tarvates, beef, mutton, goat, poultry, capons, turkies, ducks, and porcupines. Hogs flesh is only eaten by hunters and their families. Different sorts of river and sea fish, Sesame and Ouiveau oils, variety of fruits, as Vontacas, Alamoutous, Voarots, Voanotes, Lotfes, Sacols, Sacra, Co, and Banana sugar-canes; and ginger, green leaves, garlick, and white pepper, c compose their sauces.

Drink.

HOT water, or broth, is the common drink; honey-wine and sugar-wine, sometimes intermixed, are reserved for the Missavatsi, or religious ceremonies.

Language.

THE same language is spoke throughout the island, but differently pronounced in different provinces, long and short, of great affinity with the oriental, chiefly Arabic, and agreeable to the Greek in the manner of speaking, in the order and conjunction of the nouns and verbs active, and extremely copious. The characters in use among the Ombiaffes are the Arabic, in number twenty-four, written from the right to the left, though the pronunciation of some differs from the Arabic. These characters were introduced about two hundred and fifty years since by the Arabs sent by the Khalif of Mecca, who landed at Matatana, and intermarried d with the women of the country, and taught the Arabic language, with the Koran, to those who embraced the doctrine; in which they continue to this day.

Manner of
making paper.

MADAGASCAR paper is made with fewer instruments and engines than the European. The bark of the tree Avo is boiled two days in good lye, made of the ashes of the same tree, till it becomes soft and supple, then washed in clear water, beat to a proper consistency, and poured afterwards on mats made of exquisitely fine reeds, twisted and regularly joined together, in order to be drained and become paper; then placed on a leaf of Balifier, oiled with Menachil, to dry in the sun: each dried leaf is dipped afterwards in a thick decoction of rice, to hinder the sinking, and dried over again; and in this manner the paper becomes smooth and even. e

Ink how made.

THEIR ink is made of a decoction of the wood Arandranto, made use of by the chiefs in the construction of houses, and from which the Karabe is drawn, is dried to a proper consistency and thickness, and becomes as black as European ink, by an addition of verdigrise. Their writing-pens are made of pieces of Bamboo, of the size of European quills, and are cut and rendered transparent in the same manner.

Manner of accounting.

THESE islanders have the same method of notation with the Arabians and Europeans, and reckon from one to ten, and, after ten, add the number one as far as twenty, and proceed accordingly; Issa, or Iraiche, implies one; Rou, two; Telou, three; Efats, four; Juvi, five; Enem, six; Fitou, seven; Valou, eight; Sivi, nine; Foulo, ten; Irac foulo ambi, or Iraiche amanifoulo, eleven; Rou foulo pambi, twelve; Roupoulo, twenty; Telou ambi, thirty; Efats poulo, forty; Zatou, one hundred; Armou, one thousand; Alen, one hundred thousand. Many have affirmed, without foundation, these islanders were ignorant of numbers; but these accounts are only true with respect to the negroes of Machicore, and the inhabitants of the mountains. f

Weights.

THEY make use of the same weights as high as a drachm; ounces, half-pounds, and pounds, are useless, except for gold and silver: other merchandize not being bartered by weight. A drachm is denominated Sompi; half a drachm, Vari; a grain, Sacare; half a grain, Nanqui; six grains, Nangue.

Measures.

TROUBAHOVACHE, or king's measure, is for rice; Moucha, or Monca, is a measure of six pounds of cleansed rice; Voule is a measure of half a pound; Zatou, implying one hundred, is a measure of one hundred Voules of rice, and is made use of to measure uncleansed rice. Stuffs of all sorts, and cordage, are measured by Refe, or a measure six feet long. The marshes, g

- a marshes, or rice fields, called Horracs, are valued by the quantity of rice that may be sowed, not by roods, acres, or half-acres.

THE inhabitants of this great island have but little knowledge of commerce; they exchange amongst themselves goods for goods; gold and silver coins imported by Europeans are immediately melted down for bracelets, ear-rings, and other ornaments, and no currency of coin is established: those in want of cotton carry rice and cattle into the cotton countries; and others, in want of rice and cattle, bring cotton into the plentiful provinces: their traffick chiefly consists in the exchange of the produce of one province for that of another; and sometimes they exchange gold and silver for copper and iron. Commerce.

- b CORAL of any size or colour, pierced through for stringing, sells well amongst these islanders: yellow wires and small wares of all sorts are sold to great advantage, and may be exchanged for sapphires, rubies, emeralds, cornelians, and other stones found in that country. Coral.

FLACOURT esteemed this island of great importance for advancing and establishing commerce towards Ethiopia, the Red Sea, gulph of Arabia, and other Indian countries; that great advantage might be made from the conveniency of wood for building ships, which might be carried on and exchanged for other commodities in the preceding countries; and from iron, steel, rice, the different kinds of dyes and gums; and might serve as a security to the East India trade and navigation.

- c THEIR riches consist in these wares, and also in bills, knives, hatchets, iron and steel spades, apparel, cattle, plantations of yams, in marshes for cultivating rice, and in the number of subjects and slaves. The Zaferamini are the richest in gold, which they conceal with great care from the Europeans; and it is remarkable that every person of distinction preserves some remains of their ancestors gold, which they hold in great esteem and veneration. In the province of Manghabei the gold is deposited in the tombs of their predecessors, from whence the natives dare not take it, superstitiously believing themselves unworthy. Merchandize.

- d THEIR manner of war is by surprise and ambuscade: when an advantageous opportunity presents, they assemble privately, and, having rested the army in the night, endeavour, at break of day, to attack the enemy on a sudden; and sometimes the word is given eight days before for meeting on the day appointed, by different and unknown roads, to attack and storm the towns of their enemies, which they surround and advance to with most dreadful shouts, and, if with success, massacre all they meet, not sparing the children at their mothers breasts, whom, like wild beasts, they cut into pieces. When the heat of fury is over, they make slaves of all they take; but put to death the children of the chiefs, in order to extirpate the race of their enemies; fearing, in case they survive, they will one time or other revenge the injury, and make reprisals. Manner of going to war.

- e IN war-time, spies are sent out to observe the condition and countenance of the enemy, and to discover the situation of the largest towns, and number of cattle, change their own residence, and drive their cattle to the mountains and places the most inaccessible; and parties of twenty, thirty, and forty men, are dispatched to plunder the lesser villages, and bring away the inhabitants and cattle: these parties are called Souvove. The villages are generally reduced to ashes, and sometimes spared, through fear of the neighbouring inhabitants being exasperated at the sight of the flames and smoke of these fires, and, falling immediately on, pursue and cut off their retreat. These expeditions are named Tafichamanthi, or black or secret war. These marauders are generally provided with Aulis and Mossanes, or witchcraft, and billets writ in Arabic characters, and march into the enemies country, in full confidence that these billets will draw on them the greatest misfortunes, take away their strength and courage to defend themselves, occasion mortal distempers, and prove in the end the principal cause of their loss and defeat; and that, on the contrary, they are favourable to themselves, by inspiring courage, and procuring a happy issue to their wars. These people who make use of, and those against whom they are used; are equally strong in the belief of these enchantments; and in case sickness or other misfortunes take place ten years afterwards, they attribute all to the witchcraft of their enemies. Policy in war.

- f THEIR arms are different in every province: the people of Androbeizaba make use of a great dart with an iron point, long and thick, and carry fifteen lesser darts, called Fitorach, besides the great Renelefo, or mother-dart. The inhabitants of Mangbafia, and of the countries as far as Manghabei, make use of a shield and great dart, called Coubahi. The people of Ampatre, Mahafalle, Machicore, and Androbeizaba, use the same arms, with a buckler, long and large dart, and five or six of a lesser size. Those northward of Mangbafia to the end of the island, cover themselves with shields, and enter with one dart into close engagement with their enemies, and wait their arrival without stirring, are much feared by those who throw their darts at a distance; and, having discharged their darts, avoid closer engagement, and immediately take to flight. The people of Manamboule are esteemed the most resolute and stoutest soldiers; many of them marching with five or six large darts, which they carry in their shields. Arms.

Fighting without order. No rank or order of battle is observed ; they engage only by hundreds, each endeavouring to do his best by jumps and contorsions of face and body, and vexing their enemies with injurious language and threatnings, in order to strike a panic. When an enemy falls, they cut his throat, and make the most hideous noise ; and the most sneaking and pitiful slaves never fail of piercing with darts through and through the inanimate corpse extended on the ground.

Employment of women. THE women, in time of war, keep up continual dancing by day and night, never sleep or eat in their town-houses ; and, however addicted to incontinency, upon no account whatever suffer the company of another man, whilst their husbands are exposed to danger ; persuaded that they would be killed or wounded by infidelity in their absence ; and believe them to be animated by their continual dancing, and their strength and courage increased ; wherefore they keep up their dancings during the war by the most superstitious observation of the custom.

Method of suing for peace. WHEN the chiefs find themselves too weak, or chuse not to protract the war, envoys are dispatched with presents, to induce the enemy to peace, and to agree upon a day of conference, in order to an accommodation ; and the enemy likewise returns presents by other envoys, who are to give information of his condition and disposition. They repair, on the day appointed, with their whole army, as if going to battle, to the banks of a river. Each kills a bull, and presents each other with part of the liver, which they eat in the presence of the respective envoys, with authentic protestations and solemn oaths, attended with imprecations, that the liver which they eat may burst them, that God would withdraw his hand from amongst them, that they may be destroyed by their enemies, and their race finish in themselves, if they think of carrying on the war, or carrying off their respective cattle, or killing each others subjects, or have any design of sending witchcraft or poisons into the enemy's country. If any chief sues for peace from a disability of supporting himself, he must humble himself before the enemy ; and, having procured from another chief a protection for the security of his person, must go himself. In this case, the conqueror presents the liver to the subdued, who, by eating it, engages to be faithful to him. Wars are concluded, and peace is restored, in this manner ; though these oaths are generally taken, in order to surprize one another with more facility and conveniency, and is the reason why, notwithstanding their oaths, they are always on their guard.

Astronomy. THESE islanders have some knowlege of the motion of the heavens, of the course of the stars, and the zodiac, which, like Europeans, they divide into twelve signs ; and are denominated by the Ombiaffes, or priests, *Vintang*s, in the following manner :

	In the spring,
Alimiza,	} or {	Libra,
Alicarobo,		Scorpio,
Alacossi,		Sagittarius.
	In summer,
Alizadi,	} or {	Capricorn,
Adalou,		Aquarius,
Alobotfi,		Pisces.
	In autumn,
Alabemali,	} or {	Aries,
Azorou,		Taurus,
Alizozo,		Gemini.
	In winter,
Asarata,	} or {	Cancer,
Alaafade,		Leo,
Asamboulo,		Virgo.
The year is likewise divided into twelve months,
Vatrevate,	} or {	March,
Safard,		April,
Atsifi, or à Soutri,		May,
Valascira,		June,
Fossa,		July,
Maca,		August,
Hiabia,		September,
Sacamasseh,		October,
Sacave,		November,
Voulambitou,		December,
Asarmangbits,		January,
Asarahe,		February.

- a The first day of the year begins with the new moon in March: they have no certain and regular account of time and seasons, but compute the years by the days of the weeks, beginning the year of circumcision on Friday.

THE whole religion of those islanders, who observe circumcision, consists, amongst the whites Religion. and blacks, of a gross and idolatrous superstition, without churches and prayers.

THEY believe there is a God, who created heaven and earth, all creatures, and an innumerable host of angels, in seven days; but they neither honour nor serve, but live fearless of him, according to the law of nature, at the same time acknowledging and confessing their sins, and every action of life; especially the most advanced in age, and on the brink of eternity.

- b THEY likewise believe there is a demon, whom they fear exceedingly, and call Taivadey, with many adherents, whom he torments in the most cruel manner, and particularly mankind: they hold God to be the author of all good, never of evil; that he gives existence and life to every thing, and recalls them at pleasure; that the devil is the author of all kind of evil and misfortune; that he sends into the world all wickedness, distempers, and misfortunes, occasions all quarrels, robberies, and death, and is the source of every evil; therefore they appease him with offerings, adore and name him before God in their invocations: they likewise invoke a third power by the name of Dian Manang, or lord or god of riches, which they acknowledge to be gold; when they see or have it in possession, it is lifted above their heads, and kissed with the most profound veneration. Many believe even a remission of sins is to be obtained by drinking water in which ear-rings or bracelets of gold have been dipped. They believe the angels and servants of God to be infinite in number; that they move the heavens, the fixed and wandering stars, and are governors of rain, air, wind, water, and earth, the protectors also of the dwellings and life of mankind, whom they screen from all troublesome accidents in their enterprizes.
- c

- THEY hold seven kinds of good and evil spirits; the angels already mentioned to be the first order, and called Malaingha, always doing good: they denominate and know them by particular appellations; viz. Ramichail, Ragi-bourail, Ranail, Rafil, &c. or Michael, Gabriel, &c. the spirits of the second order, called Coucoulanpou, are inferior to angels, and, though corporeal, are invisible to mankind, inhabit the most solitary places, and become visible to those they intend to favour; are of both sexes, marry, beget children, die after a long life, and, like mankind, expect, according to their good and bad actions, after death, an eternal felicity or condemnation; they eat, without distinction, all kinds of animals and insects, without fear of being injured in body or corporal essence; are subject to no distempers, being protected almost from every accident; yet die, their life being limited to a certain number of years; those whose parents appear after death, immediately dispatch persons to destroy and bury them again. It is remarkable that children even are ashamed and give no credit to these apparitions of parents; which is an unanswerable argument and proof of the superiority of reason over the senseless and narrow dictates of religious superstition. The spirits of the fifth order are called Angats, or skeletons: this kind is more imaginary than real, and seems to have some conformity with European spectres and phantoms. Those of the sixth order are denominated Sacara, and are demons, or evil spirits, that torment, attack, and possess, men, women, and children; they see them coming like fiery dragons, and perceive themselves seized and possessed sometimes for fifteen days. A dart is put into the hands of these unfortunate people, who dance and sing without intermission, exhibiting surprising postures both of their bodies and countenances. Men and women attend on these occasions, imitating their gestures and grimaces, to tire out, as they relate, their patience. Cattle, sheep, and cocks, are immolated, to appease Sacara by the number of victims. The spirits of the seventh order are called Bilis; their number is affirmed to be infinite, all subject to a commanding spirit, who, with his adherents, is the author of all evil, and is Lucifer with his imps.
- d
- e
- f

- THEY believe that God, having created heaven, earth, and all creatures, placed Adam, whom he had formed out of the earth, in paradise, which they fix in the sun or moon; who, having no necessity, was prohibited eating and drinking: they add, that paradise was watered by four rivers, one of milk, another of wine, the third of honey, and the fourth of oil, and with great plenty of all sorts of fruit. Their account of his fall is extraordinary, and points out the extravagancy of corrupted nature, destitute of the lights intended to preserve mankind in the knowledge of truth from falsehood. The devil, by cunning and craft, finding Adam in paradise, asked the reason why he eat not of those fine fruits and oil, and why he drank not of that fine wine and milk? Adam answered, he had been prohibited by God, and had no necessity of nourishment to support life. The devil retired with this answer, and remained two hours; when he returned, and acquainted Adam, that he came from God to give him leave to eat what he pleased: that Adam, thus courted, eat, and, upon digestion, was guilty of an indecency in paradise; that the devil complained to God of his insolence
- g

and filthiness, who immediately drove him out of paradise, and sent him into a country, a where an imposthume grew in the calf of his leg, which burst in six months, and produced a girl; that, being perplexed on this account, he sent the angel Gabriel to God, to know what he should do; that God answered by the same angel, that he should bring her up, and marry her, when come to a certain age; which he did, and called her Rahouna, or Eve, who was delivered afterwards of two sons, Cain and Abel, who, when grown up, destroyed each other by an artifice of the devil. They add, that Adam had many children, who increased greatly, became wicked, and refused to acknowledge God; that God sent a deluge upon the earth, after he had commanded Noah to build a ship, and retire to it with his wife and children, relations, and domestics, with male and female of every species; that they had no sooner entered than the earth, with the remaining animals, was buried under the waters of the deluge, b excepting the four following mountains, Zabalicaf in the north, Zabalicatoure in the south, Zabaliraf in the west, and Zabalibazani in the east; but that no persons could save themselves from death; that, after the deluge, Noah went out of the ship to live at Jerusalem, and from thence to Mecca; that he received from God four sorts of writings, which contained his law; the first, Alifurcan, or Al Koran, was for Noah; the second, or Soratfi, for Moses; the third, Zonboura, in favour of David; and the fourth, Alindzi, for Christ, whom they name Rabiffa. They say likewise, that Jesus Christ came into the world, and was sent by God; that he was begotten by no man, but born of the virgin Mary, who was delivered without pain, and remained a virgin; that Christ was God and man, and a great prophet; c that he was crucified by the Jews, but that God would not permit him to die, and was pleased to substitute the body of a malefactor in its place. They observe Saturday with the Jews, not Friday with the Mohammedans; and keep fast-days with great ceremony, though not on fixed and established days, but according to the disposition and quality of the year.

Circumcision.

CIRCUMCISION, or Valascira, is celebrated with great solemnity, and generally in the month of May: the parents and relations repair to the village where the ceremony is to be performed, and present an ox or bull for each child; but less is taken from the poor: the men perform exercises with their darts, and the women make rings, and dance round the performers: when these exercises are over, the master of the village, who is the circumciser, makes an entertainment, and those who have drank the most are thought to have done the greatest honour to the feast: two hundred head are frequently killed and eat, together with d their hides, on these occasions. The next morning, being the festival, all observe silence, and every person is in his duty: the parents are taken up in preparing their children; the mothers sleep with them the night before the circumcision in the Lapa, or church, built a month before by the fathers and uncles of the children which are to be circumcised; and that night the men never approach their wives, or other women, neither of them being permitted to be present at that ceremony after communication with each other, persuaded, from superstitious prejudices, that the blood would not stop when the prepuce is cut off; and that the child must die on that account. The circumciser also pronounces the following words in a high voice: Salama, Zahanbare, Zabomissabots, Anaubanau, Nambovatfi tangbo, amini Tombouc, Zabomitoulou bouzonhaminau, &c. or, I respect thee, my God; I unite myself to you by prayer; I ask e you pardon for my sins; thou hast created feet and hands; I prostrate myself before thee; I this day circumcise this infant, &c. They go afterwards to the Lapa, or church, where the children are brought, and dressed by their mothers with baubles of coral, precious stones, and other ornaments, round their necks, and have every thing in readiness by ten o'clock; the ceremony is to be performed fasting, and they are governed by the shadow of a man, who stands upright before the sun, to observe the critical minute for the execution of this mystery. On these occasions they measure by feet, called Liba, or Pas; and the precise time for circumcision is when the shadow is nine feet long; then the drums begin beating, and the circumciser puts on his richest garment, and hangs a large skain of white cotton round his arm, to wipe the knife which he carries in his hand. The fathers walk in procession cross the Lapa, f with their children under their arms, entering at the west, and going out at the east door; and then walk twice round the cattle which are to be sacrificed, make the children lie a little on their backs, and touch with their left hand the right horn of each ox or bull, which lie on the ground, with their feet tied ready for immolation. The people are afterwards commanded to withdraw and make room, when the circumciser appears with the knife in his hand to cut off the prepuce of every infant; and when done, gives it to the uncle of the boy, who puts it into the yolk and white of an egg, which he holds in his hand for that purpose, and at the same time the attendant Robandrian or Anacandrian, for butchering the victims, kills a cock for each boy, and drops the blood on the wound, whilst another squeezes the juice of the plant Hota, a kind of clover, upon it. If the boy is a slave, and hath no uncle, the prepuce is g flung away. No noise is made; and on this day, which is esteemed holy and sacred by every individual, all refrain from drinking. The Robandrians observe the same ceremonies, but with greater preparations, expence, pomp, and magnificence.

- a THE priests, or Ombiaffes, are of two orders; the Ombiaffes Ompanorats and Ombiaffes Omptisiquili; the Ompanorats are writers, and generally masters and teachers of the Arabic language, practise physic, and compose the Ziridfi, or Massafferrebes, or small billets, written in Arabic characters, which relate to those who are educated in the public schools at Matatane. These sly impostors make great profit, and live at their own ease; the people deeming them conjurors and wizards, and living in the greatest fear and dread of them imaginable. The Omptisiquili are commonly blacks, of the Anacandrian race, who study geomancy, or the art of divination; and although rarely, and then fortuitously, successful in prediction, yet are approved and live in esteem with these islanders. There is another set of Ombiaffes amongst the negroes, who likewise visit the sick, but can neither read nor write, and make geomantic figures only, with chrystal, topazes, eagle-stones, and amethysts; and others, called by the common name of Filaba, who persuade the people that God sends them in thunder. In making the figures, one of these is placed at the corner of the table, which, they say, exercises the virtue and efficacy of their figures.

- b VINCENTIUS ALBUS and Gaspar de San Bernardino have wrote, that this island was divided into six kingdoms; and that the kings were in continual war; and Marco Paulo, the Venetian, relates, that in his time it was governed by four sovereigns; yet, by later accounts, it is certain that every province has a particular lord, called Dian, who appoints a Filoubei, or governor, over every village of his dominions; and that the opinion, that any one might appropriate to himself and family what lands he pleased and thought proper, is an erroneous and groundless opinion; not a foot of land to be found in the island, but what belongs to, and is cultivated by, the respective owners.

- c THE subjects are not governed by laws or edicts, nor is there a written law to be found throughout the island; natural law is the sole rule of their deportment. Massindili, or law of the prince, is one; Massinpoh, or law of private men, is the second; and Massintane, the law or custom of the country, is the third. Massindili, or law of the prince, is a word compounded of Massin, law or custom, and of Hadili, or command, is the prince's will founded upon reason, and consists in administering justice to every individual, adjusting differences, and of punishing delinquents in their property or persons. A thief, by this law, must return the quadruple value of the theft, if able, or has a friend to pay the forfeiture: if deficient in these, his life is at stake, and particularly in an affair of importance, or he must become the slave of the party he robbed. Massinpoh is the behaviour in life of private persons, in their employment, trade, conversation, support of their families, and manner of living and undertakings. Massintane is the general and particular custom of the country, the solid foundation and standard of their conduct on all occasions, as their manner of planting and sowing, building villages, making war, or public rejoicings, dancing, and exercise of arms. The prince's law is founded on this ancient custom, which admits of no alteration. Should a chief command any thing contrary to the received custom, the subjects would immediately oppose the custom of their ancestors, which princes have not the power of setting aside; nor would they obey the order, as having no right to impose it: and they are so tenacious of whatever descends from their ancestors, that nothing in the world could induce a change; which is the reason why the primitive method of agriculture and apparel is esteemed amongst them.

AN injured person, who has suffered considerably, may execute justice without sending the criminal to, or waiting the sentence of, the lord of the country; and a thief, caught in the act, is killed with as little ceremony as a serpent. Adultery is punished with severe penalties; and many send away and kill their wives on this account: and if a married woman, separated from her husband, should have children by another man, the children are the property of the husband, till the woman is married again with his consent; but which is never obtained till the Tacq, or fortune, is returned, which is, according to the custom of the country, paid to the woman's father upon their marriage.

S E C T. IV.

- f BETWEEN the north end of Madagascar and the coast of Zanguebar lie the islands of Gormoro, Comorro, or Comaro, from ten to fifteen degrees south latitude. Authors differ greatly with respect to their number. Linschoten speaks only of one, Pyrard and Vincent de Vil mention five, Sanutus three, and Sir Thomas Roe a no less than eight, though he only specifies four by name; viz. Malalia, Angazya, Johanna, or Juanny, and Majoke; the three last standing under the same parallel, and almost in a line from east to west, only that Angazya projects a little towards the north. Malalia lies directly under the eleventh a degree and twentieth minute of south latitude, from which the last-mentioned island is distant about five leagues to the north-west, under eleven degrees and five minutes. Johanna is the most easterly of the whole, and has good roads for shipping, but no harbours on any side. All these islands, and especially Malalia, abound in horned cattle, sheep, hogs, and fowls of different kinds, as well as sweet and sour oranges, great and small citrons, coco-nuts, bananas, honey, betel, sugar-canes, rice, which turns to a violet colour when boiled, and ginger, if we may rely on the authority of Sanutus <sup>b</sup>.

* PURCHAS, t. v. l. vii. c. 12. OSSOR, l. iv. DE BRUE, p. iii. MAFFÆI Hist. l. iii. c. 37. RAMUS. fol. 116. p. i. & 222, p. ii.

ANGAZYA is inhabited by Moors, who trade with divers parts of the continent, and all the islands to the eastward, in cattle, fruits, and other commodities of the island, exchanging them for calicoes, and other cotton cloths, for their own wear. The bread mostly used in b all these islands is made of the kernel of the coco-nut, boiled or broiled, and spread over with honey: their drink is palm-wine, a juice extracted from the sugar-cane, and suffered to ferment, or the milk of the coco-nut. They never presume to let their women be seen by strangers, without permission from the sultan, or an order to see them, which the stranger brings with him. Many of them write and read Arabic with great facility, and some there are who understand the Portuguese, which they learn by means of their intercourse with Mozambique, whither they trade in vessels of forty tons burden. The houses are built of stone and lime, made of calcined oyster-shells, with which the walls and roof are plaistered in a very elegant manner, and the roofs and windows covered with palm-leaves, which serve equally as a defence against the rain and the sun-beams. c

THE island of Angazya is under the government of ten lords, the constitution being a pure aristocracy; while Johanna and Malalia acknowledge but one sovereign. Only the children of the sultan of Malalia participate in his authority, whether male or female, who govern in quality of viceroys in different provinces of the island: all, however, bear the title of sultans, though they are in some respects subordinate to the authority of the father: each has his guards, his crown, sceptre, and all the ensigns and pageantry of majesty, together with a brilliant crown and numerous household. The sultan never stirs abroad but he is attended by twenty of the principal persons in the kingdom; upon which occasion his dress is a long robe hanging down to the heels, of striped calico, with a turban on his head. The people in general wear loose calico banians, and are continually chewing Areka, or betel, in the d manner of the East Indians, to whom, in their customs, they have a near affinity <sup>e</sup>.

Johanna.

THE island of Johanna is the most frequented, and best known to Europeans, of all the Comorro islands; for here they touch for refreshments in their passage to Bombay and the Malabar coasts of India. This island lies in 11 degrees 50 minutes, according to some writers; but is placed in most of the modern maps in 12 degrees 20 minutes south latitude. It is thirty miles long and fifteen broad. The natives are negroes, who profess Mohammedism, live hospitably, and express a particular friendship for the English. Their government is a pure monarchy, and their females are not excluded from the throne. The island is fertile in rice, potatoes, yams, bananas, tamarinds, oranges, lemons, pine-apples, coco-nuts, honey, and wax, as well as in black cattle and goats. Their women, as is usual in most negro c countries, are employed in husbandry, and other laborious occupations; whilst the men indulge in ease, sloth, and luxury, smoking their pipes, or chewing betel, or Areka. They are, in general, a plain, simple, well-meaning, inoffensive people, hospitable beyond their wealth, void of ambition, and totally ignorant of the art of war and arms, the instruments of ambition and destruction. Their kings, though the fountains of justice, assume no state or dignity, which sets them at great distance from their subjects, but converse familiarly both with them and foreigners, gaining the affections of both by their affability, without diminishing their authority, or taking off from the respect of their inferiors. They have but two towns, to one of which voyagers have given the appellation of King's Town, from its being the residence of their princes. Another they have called Queen's Town, some of their princesses f having chose to hold their court there, and make it the seat of their government. These towns are built with timber and stone; but the rest of their houses, and the habitations of the peasants, are mean huts, dispersed over the face of the island. The ordinary fare of the people is boiled rice, roots, flesh, milk, and fruits, particularly the coco-nut, the milky part of which is a common drink amongst them, and the shells are generally used for cups. They hate and dread the devil so much, that they burn him commonly in effigy; intimating by that their detestation of this enemy to the human species. They also have a strong abhorrence of that spot where any one happens to die, looking upon the ground either to be unlucky, or dreading departed spirits, the universal foible of the vulgar; or at least, as others suggest, believing this place to be polluted by the dead carcase; which wears off in time, g a and they return to the house, and live in the chambers, where their friends breathed their last, with the same unconcern as other people. In general, the religion and manners of all the Comorro islands have a strong affinity; they vary in particular modes, but the fundamentals of both are nearly the same in all <sup>d</sup>.

<sup>b</sup> Vide apud PURCHAS, t. v. ibid.

<sup>c</sup> LA CROIX, t. iv. p. 580. Vide etiam Auct. supra citat. ibid.

EAST of Madagascar, and from the fifth to the fortieth degree of latitude, we find a Desert islands. number of islands, laid down in most modern maps, but no-where described. These are the islands called the Settos Hermannos, Tres Hermannos, near the line. The island of Diego Garcia lies under the latitude of eight, and longitude ninety east. Near two degrees south of this stand three small islands, called in De Lisle's maps Brandons; and directly south of them, about three degrees, stands the island Rodrique, or Roderigo, placed erroneously, as b we have observed, between the continent and Madagascar, not very far distant from the Comorro islands. Under the 29th degree of south latitude stands the island of Ramareiros, about nine degrees east and south-east of Mauritius. Then appears the island of John of Lisbon, in the same longitude with the isle of Bourbon, and in latitude of 26 degrees south. In latitude 32, and longitude 76, lies an island discovered by the Dutch, to which they have given no name; and south of it, under latitude 37, 38, stand the islands of Amsterdam and St. Paul; but of neither of these can we any where find a tolerable description, or indeed any thing that merits the attention of the reader. North of the Cape of Good Hope there are, besides, three small desert islands, called in the Dutch, Roben Eiland, Dassen Eiland, and Frans Eiland. The first of these is likewise called Rabbit Island, from the prodigious number c of those animals which burrow about the shore; and the second has its name from the deer it is found to produce, or rather harbour; for it is believed they have been carried thither by some European ships; some think by Spitzbergen, in the year 1611. It is incredible how they have since multiplied, or in what manner they procure pasture on so small an island, the whole of which is covered over with deer. The English and Dutch have also planted some sheep here, which have grown to an amazing bulk, but did not multiply in proportion to the deer; their tails have measured twenty-nine inches in diameter, and weighed thirty-four pounds; nor did the fat taken from the loins weigh much less. What could induce Spitzbergen to plant deer and sheep here, we cannot conjecture, as the island, which is sandy, producing nothing besides flowers and briars, had a most unpromising appearance for the d breeding or fattening cattle, though the event has answered his expectations. What still increases our astonishment is, that it wants fresh water; which circumstance alone, we should imagine, would destroy his whole project. Rabbit Island is about two leagues only in circumference; and Deer Island still less. As to the Isle of France, it stands north of these, and is much the same in extent and qualities of soil and climate, though we are not informed of the nature of the produce, if any it has.

TURNING the Cape of Good Hope, and steering north north-west, we fall in with the island of St. Helena, lying in the 16th degree of south latitude; which we have already described in our account of the settlements belonging to the English East India company <sup>e</sup>. Next comes Ascension island, so called by the Portuguese, who discovered it upon that day, in the Ascension latitude of eight degrees south, and two hundred leagues and upwards north of the island of St. Helena; but neither they nor any other nation have hitherto thought it worthy of a colony. Mr. Ovington tells us, that Tristan de Cunha, the Portuguese admiral, first fell in with it on his return from the East Indies, anno 1508. It is about eight leagues in circumference; some of it high land, or rather mountainous, but all of it barren, without a drop of water, a blade of grass, or shrub, to refresh and restore the languid spirits of the fatigued mariner, loaded with the most nauseous of all disorders, the sea-scurvy. On the contrary, it is, says La Croix, sandy, dry, barren, and burnt up by the heat of the sun to a cinder; though some are of opinion there had been formerly a volcano here, now exhausted. In some places, however, Mr. Ovington says, it is fit for tillage; but it is chiefly valuable to the homeward-bound shipping, on account of its excellent harbour, and the vast quantities of sea-fowl, fish, and turtle, which are found in it, as well as some goats, whose flesh is not inferior to mutton in sweetness and delicacy (A). In the crevice of a rock there is a place called by the sailors the Post-office,
 f where

<sup>d</sup> SANUT. l. xii. PYRARD, t. i. c. 4. DAVITY, t. v. fol. 651. LA CROIX, t. iv. p. 580. <sup>e</sup> Vol. iv.

(A) Linschoten makes mention of a cluster of small islands north and north-east of Ascension, which he calls the islands of Martin Vaaz and of Tristan da Cunha. The same writer observes, that Spitzbergen discovered an island in the year 1601, opposite the bay of St. Helena, on the north coast of the Cape of Good Hope, which he called, and the Dutch still call, Elizabeth Isle. It lies under 30 deg. 30 min. south longitude, is fenny and marshy on the west end, but fertile in the east, and indeed in every other part. The situation is exceeding low, almost upon a level with the ocean, which, in tempestuous seasons, threatens to overwhelm it; the surface all covered over with herbs, plants, and flowers, of an odoriferous flavour; but without those two great conveniences of life, wood and water. It is chiefly inhabited by an animal of the size of a hare, whose parts of generation and claws denote it a bear, but the head is smaller and more pointed, the tusks different, and it generally where ships leave letters for each other, shut up in a well-corked bottle, which the next that comes breaks open, and leaves another in its stead <sup>f</sup>.
 MOD. HIST. VOL. VI.

 H h

St. Matthew
island.

ST. MATTHEW island had its name given by the Portuguese, the first discoverers, because on that saint's day they first fell in with it. According to La Croix, it lies in one degree fifty minutes south latitude, about an hundred leagues north-east of Ascension island. It is about eight leagues in circumference, desert, but finely watered by a rivulet of clear fresh water, that branches out into a number of lesser streams; yet would it seem to have been once cultivated, as the Portuguese kept possession of it for some time <sup>g</sup>. La Martiniere observes, that Garcias de Louisa, a gentleman of Biscay, who commanded the fleet which the emperor Charles V. fitted out at the Groyne for the conquest of the Moluccas, landed at the island of St. Matthew, found it uncultivated, but covered with orange and other fruit-trees. He also found some poultry there, and Portuguese inscriptions on the barks of the trees, which proved that the island was not then unknown to this nation. Where Martiniere picked up this anecdote, we cannot say; though the reader will easily perceive the little credit to be given it, from the strange anachronisms with which it is pregnant; yet has it been inconsiderately retained by modern geographers, whom, out of tenderness, we avoid mentioning.

Annobon
island.

WE now come to the islands nearer to the continent, and lying off the coasts of Loango, Mojamba, and the kingdom of Benin. Of these the first which we meet with in our course to the northward is the island of Annobon, or Happy Year, a name given it by the discoverers, the Portuguese, who fell in with it on New-year's day. Annobon lies to the east of St. Matthew, in the latitude of two degrees south, or, according to La Croix, in one degree twenty minutes, and in the fifth degree and tenth minute of east longitude from London, twenty-five leagues south of St. Thomas island, and forty-five from Cape Lopez Gonsalvo. It is, according to Pyrard, about five or six French leagues in circuit; but Baudrand calls it ten leagues in compass. There are two high mountains, the tops of which being continually covered with clouds, occasion frequent rain, if we follow the philosophy now so much in vogue, with respect to meteors and the atmosphere. Annobon has a number of fertile vallies, prolific in Turkey corn, rice, millet, potatoes, yams, bananas, pine-apples, citrons, oranges, lemons, figs, tamarinds, and other delicious fruits. Here also are oxen, hogs, sheep, goats, pigeons, and other poultry, in great plenty, with an equal abundance of fish; but the only mercantile production of the island is cotton, which is esteemed equal to any produced in India, were the quantity but in any degree proportioned to its quality.

THE governor is a Portuguese, with a few European servants about him; all the rest are natives, who pay him an implicit obedience, and are bigotted in their attachment to the Roman catholic faith. On the south-east end of the island are two rocks, one of which is low, and upon a level with the surface of the sea, the other higher and larger, but both dangerous in the night to shipping. These rocks are inhabited by a prodigious number of birds, so tame that the sailors frequently feed and catch them with their hands. Between those rocks the chanel is so deep and clear, that ships may safely pass. On the same side of the island there is a convenient watering-place, at the foot of a rivulet, which tumbles from the mountains down to a valley covered with oranges, citrons, &c. and affording a pleasant and refreshing shade; but the road on the north-west side is difficult and dangerous, though most frequented by ships who have no intention of touching upon the continent. In either place it is no easy matter to take in a sufficient quantity of water, on account of the violent breakings of the sea, and a stone intrenchment which the negroes have erected, from which they annoy all strangers who attempt to land. The true road for large shipping is on the north-east side, where they may anchor in seven, ten, thirteen, or sixteen fathoms, on a fine sand close to the land, opposite to the village where the negroes have thrown up their intrenchment.

THE climate is wholesome, and the air clear and serene for the greater part of the year. Every part of the island is watered by pleasant brooks, and fresh-water springs, which, however, at the new and full moon, or in all high tides, acquire a brackishness and saltness, that seems to prove the contrary of the modern system, that fountains and springs have their origin from the sea, and are rendered fresh by percolation. The banks of every rivulet are covered with palms, whence the inhabitants extract their wine by incision; all sorts of other fruits and roots, as well as a species of black nut of a purgative quality.

<sup>f</sup> SANUT. lib. vii. LINSCH. c. 95. LA CROIX, p. 589, ibid. PURCH. t. v. l. vii. c. 12. LA CROIX, t. iv. p. 588.

<sup>g</sup> SANUT. l. vii.

nerally walks erect on the hind feet, which exactly resemble those of a bear, with this difference, that all the joints are more yielding and flexible. It is a most hideous animal, fierce and strong as it is ugly, infomuch that it was with difficulty three armed men could master it *. Whether this be an animal bred in the brains of our author, we shall leave the reader to determine; we thinking it our business to mention a creature so peculiar.

* Linschot. c. iii. Davity, fol. 644.

- a MERCATOR, and some other voyagers, affirm that this island is uncultivated and uninhabited; which might be true when they lived, though there are now above sixty negro families, besides Portuguese, who live by the product of their own hands, their agriculture, fishing, and grazing or breeding cattle. In the year 1605 the Dutch admiral Matelief found two hundred negroes, and two Portuguese, on Annobon, most of them able to bear arms, expert in the use of them, and trained up in military discipline. La Croix says, it has a town opposite to the road that contains above an hundred houses, the whole surrounded by a parapet. Most of their dwellings are cane huts, and in the whole island there is not a single house built of stone, and only two of wood, which belong to the Portuguese. All the inhabitants are meanly clothed; the women go bare-headed, and have also the upper part of the body
- b naked, modesty being defended by a piece of linen wrapt under their stomach, and falling down in the form of a petticoat, or wide apron, to the knees. As to the men, they wear only a linen girdle round the loins, with a small flap before. The women carry their children on their backs, and suckle them over the shoulder; whence one may conceive the beauteous dimensions of those parts which constitute the most engaging ornaments of a fine person. All the inhabitants are subject to the Portuguese governor, who is the chief person in the island; at the same time that the negroes have their own chief, subordinate to him. They are all rigid catholics, having been either compelled or persuaded by the arguments of the Portuguese to embrace, and, like all other converts, they are bigotted in proportion to the novelty of the belief, and their ignorance of the true tenets <sup>a</sup>.
- c SOUTH of St. Thomas, and between it and the former, is situated a small island, called by the Portuguese Ilha Rolles, and by the Hollanders Rolletjes; between which and St. Thomas stands the Ilha del Cabres, or Goat Island. Both are mountainous, and covered with wild lemon-trees. Next in order comes the island of St. Thomas, the head possession of the Portuguese upon this coast, called by the natives Poncas, but by the Europeans St. Thomas, from its being discovered upon the day dedicated to that saint. The equinoctial line passes directly over it, dividing the town, and even the church, into south and north latitudes, between the sixth and seventh degrees of east longitude from London. It stands in the Ethiopic gulph, commonly called the Gulph of Benin, and sometimes that of St. Thomas, is of a circular form, some say forty, and others sixty, miles in diameter; but, according to La Croix, no more
- d than twelve leagues <sup>1</sup>. The climate is hot, moist, and unwholesome, especially to Europeans, few of whom ever arrive at the age of fifty, though many of the natural inhabitants live to complete a full century. It is observed of the natives, that they are generally of a lean habit, and dry, hard, atrabilious temperament; that the climate impedes growth; and that Europeans, who promised an extraordinary size, were immediately checked in their stature upon coming to St. Thomas, where they never grew a hair's breadth taller; a phenomenon we think by no means reconcileable with that moist hot climate, and, if true, the result probably of some other adventitious cause. Dead bodies putrefy here so suddenly, that they are forced to lay them under ground the moment that life is extinct. But the atmosphere
- e seems to have acquired a peculiar malignancy in the town; though we should imagine that fires would, in some measure, correct its bad qualities, particularly with respect to its moisture. The town, indeed, is situated upon a low marshy ground; but the objection holds in every other part of the island, where-ever there happens to be a groupe of houses, the situation being more or less healthy in proportion to the number of dwellings and inhabitants, yet without any particular slovenliness in their manner of living, or any closeness or default in their buildings. This is a fact attested by such a number of writers, that we have no room to question its veracity, though we must leave the explication of it to philosophers, and the faculty.
- f AT certain seasons of the year the sky is quite darkened by thick fogs, which are dispelled by the fresh winds that blow in the months of July and August. During the foggy season, the Portuguese have found, by experience, that their only defence against its malign influence is keeping close shut up in their houses till the air is purified and refreshed by the north-east winds which blow from Ethiopia and Abissinia across the continent, and give vigour to the limbs of foreigners, relaxed by the moist warmth of those continued mists, which may be compared to a warm bath. It is observed, that these winds, so invigorating to the Portuguese, have a quite contrary effect upon the rigid and hard solids of the natives, who fall into a greater number of diseases during their continuance than the whole year besides. Thus those seasons, which give vigour, spirits, and life, to the Portuguese, occasion the death of a great part of the negroes, and are equally wished for by the one and dreaded by
- g the others.

<sup>a</sup> LA CROIX, tom. iv. p. 6. c. 6. §. 3. RAMUSIO, ubi supra.<sup>1</sup> Auct. citat. ibid.

AT St. Thomas they have two winters, like all other places under the same parallels, but without the cold which distinguishes that season of the year in Europe. What they here call winter is the rainy, or rather foggy, season, which is by far the most sultry, hot, and intolerable, of the whole year. They both begin with the vernal and autumnal equinoxes, or in the months of March and September, when the sun's rays are directly vertical. The rains continue from December to February, and their spring begins with our summer in the month of May, or when the sun is in Capricorn, and continues till it enters the Ram; that is, three months of spring, and an equal number of summer. For the three first months of this period the moist heat is altogether insupportable to persons necessarily exposed to it; we mean Europeans; for, as to the natives, it is life to them; though, when it comes to its height, even they begin to relax, grow faint and sickly under it, are scarce able to drag themselves along, or to touch the earth with their feet, unless defended by thick shoes. Now it is that ardent and putrid fevers break out with incredible fury, sweeping off the Europeans with all the violence and rapidity of a pestilence, beginning with a freezing chillness, which changes into a burning intolerable heat, parched tongue, and tense skin, that commonly carries off the patient on the third, seventh, or fourteenth day, though generally on the third. If they survive the fourteenth day, they almost always recover, unless they have been guilty of some irregularity in the regimen prescribed them. La Croix observes, that, in both fevers, bleeding proves fatal, as the constant experience of the Portuguese surgeons shews; yet we cannot help ascribing this to their ignorance of the time or manner of performing the operation, which could not possibly fail of mitigating the symptoms, were the pulse properly understood. Another extraordinary part of their practice consists, not only in permitting, but encouraging, the patient to drink large draughts of cold water, which, La Croix affirms, is always attended with happy consequences, although he does not condescend to specify them, or in what manner they appear. The disease called Bitios de Cas, indigenous to many parts of Africa, is more frequent and dangerous in the island of St. Thomas than any-where else; for which the only cure is large quantities of lemon-juice. Venereal diseases are also common, especially that species of it known among the negroes by the name of Yaws, which they have now the method of curing by mercurial unctions and salivation; though we are assured by a number of authors, that certain plants, which all the African countries afford, known only to the negroes, have in them the most specific virtues against this uncleanly distemper. It is now observable, that, since the use of mercury has been introduced among them, more die of the Yaws than before: so that we may fairly say of the European practice at St. Thomas, that it is a cure worse than the disease. The last disease we shall mention, which has the appearance of being endemial here, is the dropsy, to which almost all men, both Portuguese and negroes, are subject; a disease this, which may easily be explained from the nature of the climate. We are told, that the negroes cure it in a few days, by mixing the juice of a certain plant, known only to themselves, with the oil of coco-nuts, which they rub all over the abdomen and legs, if they happen to swell. It is possible, indeed, that the virtue of the medicine may be chiefly owing to the deterfive quality of the oil, as some experiments made by Dr. Oliver, of our own country, seem to confirm.

WHEN the court of Portugal first thought of settling a colony in this island, they sent a number of persons, whom they supposed capable of so important a trust; every man of which died in a short time, by the intemperance of the climate. Those who succeeded them had the precaution to make some stay in Guiney, and afterwards at Angola; thus, by approaching gradually, to render the effects of the change less sudden and fatal: the consequence was, that they supported the climate of St. Thomas without any great diminution of their number, or inconvenience to those who survived. We are informed likewise, that John of Portugal sold for slaves all those Jews who refused to embrace Christianity; and that, after ordering their children to be baptized, they were transported thither, from whom are descended the present race of inhabitants, who are a kind of mixed descent between the swarthiness and atrabilious temperament of the Jews, and the more sanguine plethoric habit and jet-black complexion of the negroes. When the Dutch admiral Houtabeau took the island in 1641, he lost the greater part of his crew in a very short time, and fell himself a sacrifice to the unwholsomeness of the climate; by which most of the officers were carried off. In a word, with such fury did almost all the diseases of the place rage among the Dutch, that, in less than a month, scarce hands enough remained of the crews of four ships to work one back to Europe; and they were forced to write to prince Maurice, then in the Brazils, to assist them with sailors, fresh provisions, and wine. The diseases that made the greatest havock among them, were dysenteries, which carried them off in a week, and acute pains in the head, terminating in deliriums, that destroyed life, and inflamed the brain, nay mortified it, as some writers affirm, in the space of two days. The former they attributed to the milk of the coco-nuts, of which the sailors drank to excess, and a and the latter to colds caught by the night-damps, after the excessive heat of the day; tho' both might, perhaps, be accounted for from this cause.

THE same mortality seized the crew of admiral Verdoes in the year 1610, who lost above a thousand men by the epidemic disorders of the country in five days. Verdoes himself, his vice-admiral Storm, seventeen captains of ships, all the land-forces, and the greater part of the sailors, died like infected sheep. It was not therefore without reason, that prince Maurice recommended to the Dutch, while they were in possession of this island, the same policy used by the court of Portugal; namely, the sending none but condemned criminals thither, where they met with a fate no less certain than if they had been punished on the gibbet.

b THE soil of the island of St. Thomas is clammy, viscous, clayey, high-coloured, frequently coarse, and mixed with chalk. It does not easily crumble into dust, on account of the moisture it receives from the heavy dews that fall at night, which at the same time water plants, and render the soil prolific. The excellency and fertility of the earth appears from hence, that if a negro leaves a plantation uncultivated or fallow but the shortest time, trees, plants, and shrubs, sprout forth with amazing vigour. These they convert immediately to use, by burning them to ashes, which proves the strongest and best manure for sugar-canes. This plant grows in all the vallies to a prodigious height, but is less juicy, and produces a smaller quantity of sugar, than might be expected, either from some natural defect, or a default in the manner of squeezing the cane, which is different here from the method used in the Brazils and West India islands. After the cane is planted in a soil manured with vegetable c ashes, it arrives at maturity in less than five months, and those set about the end of January are ripe for cutting in June, those in February in July; and thus they have fresh crops the year round. As soon as they are cut down, they squeeze them in water-mills, or mills turned round by negroes or cattle, which the Portuguese call Ingenbis; the sugar is boiled and formed into lumps, no more of it being refined or purified than is wanted for use; and the squeezed canes are given to the hogs, who fatten extremely upon this diet, get a firm, solid, and sweet flesh, and are often cured by it in their most desperate diseases. Formerly seven ships used to be freighted in the sugar-trade, four for Portugal, two for Madeira and the Canaries, and one for England; but since this production hath been brought to such perfection in the American colonies, the trade of St. Thomas is fallen low, and perhaps the soil may be impoverished by d too frequent culture. The Portuguese have omitted nothing to render their sugars white and solid; they have had refiners and boilers from every nation in Europe; but all to no purpose, the soil communicating a certain flavour and fatness that is incapable of being purged off. Perhaps too, something may be owing to the moisture of the climate, which keeping the cane from drying, gives a particular flavour to the juice, which may grow rancid before it can be boiled and concocted. This occasions their drying them over a slow wood-fire, whence likewise the quality of the fluid parts may be affected, and acquire that viscosity and fatness, by exhaling a proportion of the aqueous part.

THIS island produced neither sugar-canes nor ginger, before the Portuguese planted and cultivated them with great care and labour. In 1645, there were upwards of fifty-four sugar-e mills in constant employment, each of them furnishing yearly about six or seven hundred loads of coarse sugar, or rather of the juice unprepared; the whole being computed by Mandefloe, tho' we have reckoned much less, at forty ship-loads. Probable it is, indeed, that there had formerly been a greater number of mills than in La Croix's time, since the account of the Dutch expedition to St. Thomas, in 1610, mentions their having destroyed upwards of sixty or seventy sugar-mills.

THE Portuguese have been no less assiduous in bringing wheat to perfection, which they imagined must flourish extremely in so rich a soil. Experience, however, has disappointed their expectation, and proved the climate to be too moist, and the earth too viscous, for bringing that precious vegetable to its full perfection. Nothing can be more beautiful than f the first appearance of a crop, which springs up to an amazing height in an incredibly short time; but the ears are observed never to fill well, or produce any thing equivalent to the trouble of the husbandman. Rice and millet flourish here, and perhaps for the same causes that obstruct the maturity of wheat. Vines of the richest kind, melons, cucumbers, figs, ginger, all sorts of roots, pulse, and pot-herbs, together with the fruits of every denomination of the warmer climates, are reared in the utmost perfection, with little labour or expence. From their vines they make excellent wine, but in a small quantity; their attention to the sugar-trade diverting them from improving their vineyards to all the advantage of which they are capable. In a word, the experiments they have made abundantly prove the fallacy of that maxim which prevailed among naturalists, that vines could not be raised to any perfection in g the torrid or frigid zones, or even in countries more moderate than either of these extremes.

THE scarcity of wheat obliges the inhabitants to use rice, millet, and roots, and chiefly the last, for bread. Yams, in particular, are found congenial to the negroes, and prove to them a most delicious and wholesome diet. They have it here of four different kinds, which they distinguish by the names of Benin, Maniconga, Acherevi, and Sasvanec, intimating the places from whence they were transplanted. The two first are the sweetest, if eat fresh; but the latter keep the best. They have also a root they call Mandchacku, which they make into bread; but the natives are not fond of it, and export it chiefly to Angola, where it is in high estimation. This root is much used in Brazil, where it never arrives to the same perfection or size as at St. Thomas; and has particularly this essential difference, that there they press it under a great weight before it is used, in order to express a thin juice and moisture, said to be of a malignant and poisonous quality. Without this previous operation, it produces violent vomitings, and all the symptoms of a true poison. Here is a species of bean they call Fojoos, and a fruit to which they give the name of Pefigos, having this peculiarity, that it grows immediately out of the trunk to which it adheres, like round vials, or large globules of water, which it resembles in transparency, while the leaves hang like fruit from the extremities of the twigs and branches. The fruit incloses a small stone, and eats deliciously, if it has been separated from a thin rind that envelopes it. Here also is a fruit called Cola, the production of a tree of an extraordinary size. The fruit is inclosed in a hard shell, divided into separate parts by thin partitions of the rind, esteemed pleasant and wholesome, and eat by the negroes raw, and by the Europeans roasted, in the manner of chestnuts. It has a kind of agreeable bitterness, that adds a pungency to the taste, but is changed into sweet by drinking a glass of water. A great trade is carried on by the negroes in this fruit, which they export to all the neighbouring coasts of the continent. They also trade largely in palm-wine and oil; but their chief trade consists in cotton, from whence arises a very considerable revenue to the Portuguese. In the island some part of it is manufactured into blue and white, or red and white, striped cloth, for the use of the natives, and also for exportation to Angola, Loango, Congo, and Benin. Here also is found the cabbage-tree, called Abellame by the islanders, which grows to a prodigious height in the space of one year.
MOD. HIST. VOL. VI. I i they

THE island of St. Thomas is well-watered with fresh rivers and rivulets, of a clear, light, wholesome water, that greatly fertilize the soil, says La Croix; tho' we are inclined to believe that the length of the rainy and foggy seasons, together with the heavy dews which fall the rest of the year, would afford sufficient moisture, perhaps too much, to the earth, without the addition of fountains, springs, rivulets, and rivers; many of which, after innumerable windings and branchings, discharge themselves into the sea. In the center it has a high mountain, covered with wood and fruit-trees, the top always crowned with snow, in such quantities that it forms a number of rivulets, which water the sugar-cane plantations in the vallies at the bottom of the mountain. It abounds with a variety of animals tame and wild, as hogs, black cattle, sheep, goats, and a small species of little, red, or high-coloured bay-horse, geese, Guiney hens, ducks, turtle doves, barn fowls, thrushes, partridges, starlings, sea gulls, paroquets, with an infinity of the feathered kind, some valuable for their plumage, some for their flesh, and others for their voices and the melody of their song. In the surrounding sea are found incredible variety of fish, from the whale down to the smallest fish that swims; nor are the rivers less plentifully stocked. In a word, this island might equal any spot on the globe, did the temperature of the climate correspond in any measure to the abundance of its fruits, plants, and animals, as well as the diversity and beauty of the landscape.

PAVAOASAN, or Pavaoste, the capital, is divided into four parts, by two rivers that intersect each other in the very center of the town. It stands on the middle of the gulph, in a plain on the north side of the island; it is of an oval form, and about half a league in compass, containing within this space about five hundred houses, each one storey high; the method of building in all the warmer climates. Towards the sea it is fortified by stone ramparts, which the Portuguese governor erected in the year 1607, by publishing an edict, that every person who entered the town should bring with him a stone, to contribute to the defence and security of the place. All the houses are built of a durable white timber, as hard as oak, and the growth of the island, except the governor's, and two other houses belonging to the Portuguese, which are built of stone. Here are three churches; the largest, called Conception, in honour of the Virgin Mary, is a stately building, that passes for a cathedral; the second is the Santa Izabella, to which adjoins an hospital; and the third, which is no more than a chapel belonging to the castle, is called St. Sebastian. There are several other places of worship without the walls of less note; such as St. Antonio, about half a mile from the town, the Matre Dios, about a league to the south-east, the Holy Trinity, two leagues to the eastward, and St. Ann's church, about the same distance to the south-east.

THE castle, or citadel, of St. Sebastian, composed of four salient bastions, stands upon a point of land on the north side of the town and gulph. It is neatly built with free-stone, hard as flint, the walls 25 feet high, and so thick and strong, that it may be deemed impregnable on that side, provided the garrison consists at least of an hundred men, with ammunition, stores, and every thing necessary for an obstinate defence.

- a THE inhabitants are of two sorts, the outlawed and banished Portuguese, who inhabited it on its discovery, whose descendants still preserve their fair complexion, with no very considerable alteration; and the negroes retained in the service of the Europeans, and such as chuse to reside here from Angola. The former are distinguished from the Portuguese, who go thither to trade, to accept of posts, and to raise their fortunes. They are, however, allowed the honour of calling themselves Portuguese, tho' they and their ancestors, for a series of ages, have been born in the island. Perhaps, indeed, another distinction ought to be made of that mixed progeny, the fruits of the embraces of a negro and a white person, who are in fact true mulattoes. It is customary, besides, to import about five thousand young negroes from Lovando St. Paolo, to be trained in the art of planting sugar-canes, and all the various operations of this manufacture, who afterwards are sent or sold to the West India colonies: at least this was formerly customary, and no late author mentions its being abolished.

THE Portuguese inhabitants dress in the manner of their mother-country, and many of the negroes, and their children, imitate them, where their circumstances will permit it; but the slaves, as well male as female, go naked, except an apron of palm-leaves, or a bit of cloth, which their masters oblige them to wear out of decency.

- As for the common diet of the country, it consists chiefly of bread made of potatoes, yams, and other roots, we mean with respect to the negroes, and palm-wine, mixed with water, or simple water only, and sometimes goats milk. In the hot seasons, five or six families agree to eat together, in caverns under-ground, to avoid the scorching sun-beams, whither each carries his provision, which he has dressed at home. This method is likewise customary among the Portuguese, but at different seasons of the year.

- THE trade of the island consists in sugar, of which they export in the lump about an hundred Arobs, by some writers called Auropes, yearly; each Arob weighing thirty-two pounds; that which is sent into Europe being wrapt up in leaves. La Croix calls this black sugar, probably meaning that made up in rolls. The carriage from the interior parts of the island is down the river in canoes, or in sledges or carts drawn by oxen; which last method greatly raises the price of the sugar; and indeed that trade is of late years much diminished. Their cotton and stuffs, manufactured in the island, constitute the next material articles of the Portuguese trade at St. Thomas, together with the fruit Cola, of which we have spoken. The exports made from Portugal, and formerly from Holland, are Flemish, Roan, and other cloths, threads of all colours, serges, camblets of Liege, serge de Nimes, hatchets, saws, iron bars, salt, copper and brass utensils, with a variety of hard-ware and mechanical instruments, together with Canary wine, olives, raisins, Lisbon wine, flour, beer, and such like articles.

- As to the revenue which the crown raises from this trade, it is inconsiderable, the duties upon imports and exports being extremely low, in order to encourage the trade so visibly upon the decline, and particularly the exportation of home-manufactures. What is chiefly collected is in the island, and paid into the hands of the Portuguese governor. This arises from a slight duty upon fishing, planting, and all manufactures, which, by being laid on gradually, from the meanest artisan or husbandman to the merchant, is thought to fall easier by passing through so many hands, than if the whole duty was exacted at the port or warehouse on shipping or unshipping goods. Upon fish a tax is laid in the following manner, for the support of the insular government: those who fish with nets on the sea-shore pay a tribute of every fifth fish they catch; and those who are so rich as to keep canoes, pay three Sols weekly for their privilege; and in the same manner are the manufactures and mechanic arts taxed.

- ALL the inhabitants, except a few negroes and slaves, are of the Roman catholic religion, but full of bigotry, superstition, and ignorance. The ecclesiastical government is in the hands of a bishop, who resides in the capital, has his see there, though his jurisdiction extends over the whole island, and is a suffragan of the archbishoprick of Lisbon.

- THE island of St. Thomas is the unalienable property of the crown, governed by a viceroy or governor appointed by the king, who is obliged to reside at Pavafan, with his Corregidor, who takes cognizance, under the governor, of all civil, and, under the bishop, of all ecclesiastical crimes. La Croix affirms, that all differences between the townsmen and the peasants, or inhabitants of the country, come in the first instance before the governor, but have an appeal, in the derniere resort, to the government of Lovando Santa Paolo: tho' we are assured, upon good authority, that they are first tried before the Corregidor, the parties appealing in the last instance to the decision of the governor. The inhabitants are obliged to keep guard upon the governor's house, the citadel, and the ramparts; also to repair the governor's house at their own expence, to keep in good condition all the bridges over the rivers, for facilitating trade and travelling. This is a charge that falls extremely heavy, as the rainy seasons make continual devastations, and occasion the necessity of their being almost almost intirely rebuilt every year. Hence we see at how small an expence to the public a this colony is kept, the only one indeed being the governor's appointment, which is paid out of the royal treasury at Lisbon, but much less than the revenue produced by the trade, besides the advantage to the nation from the consumption of its manufactures.

WHILE a treaty between the court of Lisbon and the States General was on foot, respecting this island and some other circumstances of commercial interest, St. Thomas was taken, as we have mentioned, by admiral Jol, who sailed with a squadron from the Brazils in 1641. Jol landed his men about two miles from the town, at a sugar-mill near St. Anne's; where he passed the night under arms, ordering the ships to draw up in the morning under the cannon of the citadel, but without firing a shot, unless the enemy first commenced hostilities. In the mean time, the land-forces begun their march towards the town, unprovided with every thing necessary to its defence, and the citadel mounted only with six pieces of large cannon and some small ordnance. After making themselves masters of the out-works, they gave the assault to the citadel, and were briskly received and drove down from the walls, by cutting their scaling-ladders, with considerable loss. They, however, entered the town without resistance, which they found destitute of provisions, the principal citizens; and of a single man in arms. Here they begun regular approaches against the citadel, which was soon forced to capitulate, notwithstanding the spirit and courage of the governor and his slender garison, but upon honourable terms, the Dutch permitting them to march out with their arms and baggage, engaging to transport them to Europe, and signing favourable conditions for the negro inhabitants, and Portuguese long established in the island (A). Jol becoming master of the citadel and town, did not rigidly adhere to the articles of capitulation; for he assembled the inhabitants, and exhorted them to pay him in a fortnight a contribution for the security of their privileges, property, and sugar-mills. which he threatened otherwise to demolish, tho' he pretended the strictest regard to justice and equity. Two of the chief merchants agreed to pay him a considerable sum, and two thousand Arobs of sugar, for the preservation of their mills and plantations, the privileges of their religion and antient customs, and the protection of the government; but the majority petitioned for passports to leave the island, which he accordingly granted. We have taken notice that this island had before been taken in 1610, by the Dutch, and the city and citadel rased to the ground, because the inhabitants refused, or were unable, to pay a contribution of two thousand ducats imposed by the Dutch admiral Verdoes. The Portuguese, however, had their revenge, by the epidemic distemper that soon swept off such numbers of the conquerors, and obliged them to relinquish the island <sup>a</sup>.

Island of Caracombo.

AT a short distance north-west of St. Thomas stands the island of Caracombo, situated about 15 minutes north of the line, a little above the mouth of the river Gabon. It produces a variety of fruits and plants unknown in Europe, and some peculiar to itself, besides birds and other animals. It is no uncommon thing to find an hundred nests of birds floating in the water upon one branch of a tree, or supported upon a slender twig; an admirable contrivance, pointed out by instinct against the attacks of serpents and lizards, as we are assured by that accurate observer Linschoten. The island is inhabited, and by a race of the most abandoned, profligate, and lewd wretches, at least as to the women, upon the face of the globe. They make nothing of prostituting their bodies to whoever comes in their way, and in the most public manner in the open air. The other particulars related of those islanders favour so much of fiction, that the reader will not be displeased if we refer him to La Croix and Davity for a more minute account <sup>b</sup>. Sufficient it is that they make their bodies no less deformed than their minds, and are monsters, who resemble humanity in nothing but their speaking articulately, and in walking erect upon two legs.

Princes Island.

PRINCES Island, called by the Portuguese Ilha del Principe, because under the conduct of a prince of that nation it was first discovered, or, according to Davity, because it is annexed to the crown, and a revenue drawn from it, is situated in the second degree of north latitude, thirty-eight miles from the continent, and about twenty-four miles to the northward of St. Thomas, says La Croix. This, however, appears to be a mistake, as either the distance must be necessarily greater, or the latitude he supposes erroneous, as St. Thomas, it is agreed

<sup>a</sup> SANUT. l. vii. LINSCHOT. c. iii. THEVET, l. iii. CARDAN. in Hispan. p. 97. DAVITY, t. v. p. 629, & seq. LA CROIX, t. iv. p. 4. c. vi. §. 6. <sup>b</sup> SANUT. l. vii. LINSCHOT. descrip. Guin. c. ii. DAVITY, t. v. p. 642. LA CROIX, t. iv. p. 594.

(A) Here the Dutch found thirty-six pieces of large cannon, six only of which were mounted upon carriages, and fit for use, and some ammunition, but hardly subsistence for a week; so negligent had the court of Lisbon been of the security of this important colony *.

* La Croix, tom. iv. p. 624.

- a by all geographers, lies immediately under the equinoctial. The distance indeed between these two islands is about forty miles in the best maps we have consulted; so the latitude will be about fifty minutes north, allowing for that part of St. Thomas which lies on this side the line. Although the intervening space be so small, yet no places can differ more widely in the nature and temperature of the climate, it being here no less healthy, tho' hot, than it is destructively malignant at the island of St. Thomas. The face of the country is wholly covered with the finest oranges, lemons, bananas, coco-nuts, sugar-canes, and other fruits and plants of the warmer climates; besides a particular species of tree, the trunk whereof frequently measures twenty-four yards in circumference; but no writer mentions the name, or gives any description, of it. They have also palms, of which the natives make
- b wine; vines, but in no great quantity; cotton, which women manufacture into pretty cloths; and Mandiboca, that serves the natives for bread; besides black cattle, hogs, sheep, rabbits, and fish both in the sea and rivers. We are told by the Dutch voyagers, that the natives, whom they found there, went intirely naked, except the chief and his women. He wore a cotton robe, and trowsers of the same stuff, and the women a kind of apron, fastened round the waist by a girdle, and hanging down to the knee. In their hands they held a crooked spear, like the descendants of the Amazons, a crown of flowers upon their heads, and a cross hanging upon their breasts, intimating their religious belief. The king, or chief, never appeared without a little shield on his left arm, and with a sword, dart, or pike in his right hand; while the common people, probably the king's guards, appeared
- c constantly with a long dart in their hands, or upon their shoulders. All the inhabitants they found there were Portuguese or mulattoes, all of them acknowledging the sovereignty of his Portuguese majesty, although they had likewise their own chief. The Portuguese bore no proportion in number to the mulattoes or negroes, and did not exceed 40 or 50; whereas the others, besides slaves, amounted at least to 3000, men, women, and children, and slaves almost to an equal number; all of whom were employed in the plantations and sugar-mills, in cultivating rice, millet, and several other productions necessary to life, or useful in commerce. It is probable that the Christian religion has been first brought hither by the Portuguese.

- In the gulph of Benin are five islands, ranged in a line from south to north; viz. the
- d islands of Annobon, Saint Thomas, Caracombo, and the islands of Prince and Fernando Poo; Fernando Poo's Island. this last forming the northern extreme of the chain. It was discovered by the famous Fernando Lopez, and for a while called Ilhas das Formosas, a name which was afterwards lost in that of Fernando Poo. It lies in nine degrees thirty minutes north latitude, between the high country of Amboses and the river Camerone, about four leagues and a half from the continent, the intervening gut being safe and navigable. In extent it is more considerable than St. Thomas, but greatly inferior in point of fertility, altho' it produces rice, millet, tobacco, fruits, and the sugar-cane. The natives are perfect savages, fierce, treacherous, and inhospitable, governed by seven different princes, who waste the blood of their subjects in perpetual civil wars. Neither the Portuguese, Dutch, or any other European nation,
- e have been able to enter upon trade with them, or hardly permitted to water upon the coast, and never without a strong guard of the natives upon them; so jealous are they of their liberty.

- We come now to the Cape Verd Islands, so called from their proximity to the cape of that Cape Verd name on the continent of Africa, to which they are directly opposite. The Portuguese call Islands. them Ilhas Verdas, or the Green Islands, because the surrounding sea is deeply tinged with that colour, or rather filled with a weed of an exquisite fine green, and lying so thick that ships are scarce able to make their way through. Others, and particularly the French writers, have called them the Salt Islands, from the quantity of salt made in them, and transported to all parts of the continent of Africa; but the general name by which they are
- f known to all Europe, is Cape Verd. It is the opinion of some writers, that the Cape de Verd Islands are the same as Mela has described under the name of Gorgones, in the Atlantic Ocean, and Pliny by that of Gorgades, the residence of the three daughters of Phorcus, known by the fabulous names of Niedusa, Sthenio, and Euryale. Others again believe them to be the Hesperides of Ptolemy, situated near the cape or promontory of that name; tho' most probable it is that they were utterly unknown before the Portuguese paved the way for discoveries of new worlds.

THEY are situate opposite to Cape de Verd, or rather between it and Cape Blanco, about forty-two leagues from the continent, and stretching into the sea, till the farthest is 70 leagues

<sup>a</sup> Navig. Holland 1598, 1599. SANUT. ibid. LA CROIX, p. 626.
p. 642. LA CROIX, p. 628.

<sup>e</sup> LA MARTINIERE, ibid.

<sup>f</sup> SANUT. l. vii. DAVITY, t. v.

<sup>b</sup> LA CROIX, t. iv. p. 631. DAVITY,

t. v. p. 625.

from shore. In general they lie between 13 degrees 50 minutes and 17 degrees 40 minutes north latitude, and between the 22d and 25th degrees of longitude west from London (B). With respect to their number, there is no agreement among writers or voyagers, some reckoning 12, some 11, and others no more than nine, perhaps because some take into their account islands which others think too inconsiderable to be mentioned; or possibly two islands which lie so contiguous as to be separated only by a small gut, may have been described as one. The names of the ten agreed upon are as follow; viz. Ilha del Sal, Ilha Buena vista, Ilha Mayo, Ilha de Sant Jago, Ilha del Fogo, Ilha del Bracca, Ilha del Sant Nicholas, Ilha del Sant Lucia, Ilha del Sant Vincent, Ilha del Sant Antonio, besides others of less note, to which no names have been assigned (C).

It is affirmed, that these islands, if not absolutely discovered for the first time, were at least unknown to the moderns till the year 1440, when Antonio Nolli, a Genoese, fell in with them. According to Jurin †, the Portuguese were the first discoverers, about six years after this period<sup>e</sup>; and Sanutus asserts, that the honour is due to a Venetian, of the family of Cadamosto<sup>h</sup>, sent by the prince of Portugal upon the discovery of unknown countries.

At present they are almost all well-peopled, tho' in some the climate is extremely unhealthy, but in general wholesome, pure, and serene (D). They were peopled originally by Europeans, some say by criminals banished out of Portugal; at least it is certain, that they were uninhabited when first discovered, whatever they might have been in the days of Pliny and Mela, if they had any knowledge at all of these islands. We shall describe them in the order in which they occur.

Mayo Island. ILHA MAYO, or the island of Mayo, lies in the 15th degree of north latitude, and 22d of longitude from London, about nine leagues south south-west of Buena-vista. It is but small, having no more than seven leagues in circumference, its form oval, with a variety of sharp rocks and points projecting into the sea above a mile. La Croix, Davity, and Linschoten, describe it with dangerous shoals and sand-banks round the coast; notwithstanding which Dampier affirms, that he has coasted it almost in a circle, and yet could never discover any thing dangerous, besides the promontories, which render it hazardous to fall in at night too close with the land. Mayo is raised considerably above the sea, but level and plain, except two mountains of considerable height. The shore, according to the last-mentioned writer, is clear, with sandy bays between the promontories, which afford good anchorage. On the west side of the island, where ships generally drop anchor, there is a large sandy bay, and a sand-bank forty paces wide, running near three miles along the shore, within which is a large salt-pond contained between the rising shore and the opposite sand-bank. The whole salt-pond is full two miles in length, and half a mile in breadth, but seldom filled with water. It is the north end which chiefly produces salt, that being never dry, tho' the water evaporates, and the salts form themselves for the whole dry season; that is, from November to the month of May. The waters yielding this salt run in from the sea through a natural sluice, or perforation of the sand-bank, in all spring-tides, by which the pond is filled with a greater or smaller quantity of water, in proportion to the height of these tides. Whatever salt happens to remain in the pond, is dissolved by the additional water pouring in at the sluice; but then they begin to settle again in two or three days, and continue forming into crystals as long as any water remains, or till the next high tide again dissolves them. We are assured by Dampier, who had it from the inhabitants, that the water enters at no other passage than the sluice we have mentioned, nor at any other season but high tides at the new moon; but why that should be, he says, he cannot conjecture; and we will not spend time in resolving the difficulty. Those who come to load salt, and carry it away for exportation, lay it up in houses on the dry land, before the waters break in; they observe, that, contrary

† JURIN, c. 6.      <sup>e</sup> THEVET, Cosm. l. iii. LIN. p. 695. PYRARD, l. i. JARRIC, l. v. c. 44. HERRERA c. v.      <sup>h</sup> MAN. Hist. Venet. l. v. DANDOLO, l. vii. c. 3.

(B) St. Anthony Island is the most northward, Brava the southermost; to the west lies St. Lucia, and to the east Buena vista. This, at least, is the manner in which they are placed in all modern maps, as well as in the writings of Herrera, Sanutus, Davity, Linschoten, La Croix, and all the authors which the reader will find cited in the margin.

(C) Davity indeed alleges, that no particular island is called by the name of Salt Island; but that this is a term applicable to Buena-vista, Mayo, and St. Jago, on account of their producing a greater abundance of this commodity than any of the others*.

(D) The endemial diseases in these islands, in general, are ardent fevers, fluxes, and dysenteries, all of which are frequently fatal; and indeed they are not peculiar to the Cape Verds, but general in all countries lying between or near the Tropics, and subject to violent heats in the day, and cold winds and damps at night.

* Vol. v. p. 625, ad fin.

a to what is remarked of the salt-ponds in the West Indies, the salt chryftallizes here in the dry season only; whereas, at Tortuga, they always form in the rainy season, and never before some heavy showers have fallen. Be this as it will, the difficulty seems to be on the side of the West India ponds, as we are unable to comprehend how salt should chryftallize best in wet weather, or require the admixture of fresh water to make them form. To speak our sentiments freely, we greatly doubt the fact, notwithstanding it is attested by such a number of writers.

FORMERLY the English drove so great a trade in this commodity, that a man of war was continually stationed for the protection of the ships employed in this article; but we have reason to believe that either this trade has since diminished, or that the legislature are less b regardful of the interest of commerce than they have been; for this guard-ship has been laid aside for a number of years. In Dampier's time, no less than an hundred English vessels used to frequent the Cape de Verd ports, and chiefly upon the account of this article, which required no other expence than a little labour, and the mere taking it up and conveying it on board, without we except the pittance bestowed on the natives for their assistance, and the use of their asses in conveying the salt into boats. As the pond is not above a mile from the shore, the price of a load is stated, or rather an ass's labour for a day, at little more than a penny.

THE island of Mayo is a dry soil, consisting chiefly of sand, or a loose crumbling stone, without rivulets, springs, or any natural moisture, except the dews of the night, and the c showers in the wet season, which run off as fast as they fall. In the whole island there is but one spring, and that in the very center, running off in a small stream through a valley confined by the hills. Hence it is that we may account for the barrenness of the island, and why it produces no large trees, which can neither fix their roots in so loose, or draw the necessary nourishment in so dry, a soil. The sand-bank, that forms the salt-pond, produces a species of silk-cotton, that grows on a tender shrub, about four feet high, in pods of the size of a small cucumber or bean-pod. This pod, when ripe, opens at one end, and easily separates into four pieces, the cotton bursting forth at the first aperture that appears; but however beautiful this production may be to the eye, it is of too delicate a texture, and short, to be manufactured or converted into any other use than stuffing pillows, or some d such trifling purposes. The genuine cotton-shrub grows here likewise, but not in so large quantities as to make an article of foreign trade; the whole being manufactured and consumed by the inhabitants.

In Mayo are three small towns, in which all the inhabitants of the island are contained. They are incommodiously situated, at the distance of five or six miles from the road, on the opposite side of the island; each having its church and Padre, or priest, with a certain stipend assigned him. The metropolis is said to be Pinofo, which has two churches and priests, and a considerable number of mean, small, and low huts, but very little superior to the negro hamlets on the continent. The name of the second town is St. John, and of the third, Loango; both contemptible for their size, the poverty of the people, and despicable meanness e of the buildings, which are formed of fig-trees (for the island produces no others of any tolerable dimensions), and the rafters of wild cane.

THE chief fruits of Mayo are figs, water-melons, a few citrons and oranges, all of them bad in their kinds, and pumpkins, which serve the natives for their ordinary diet, together with Calavanas, or a species of bean, of which they are very fond. Dampier takes notice of no quadrupeds, besides goats, of which he says a few are bred; and yet we are told by Jurin, Linschoten, and others, that this animal is so abundant, that flocks of above a thousand together may be seen; besides asses, small horses, monkeys, and apes; nay, some cows and bullocks of a small stature. Of fowls, it produces the Flamingo, in shape resembling a heron, but larger, and of a reddish colour. They delight in society, and keep constantly f together in flocks, feeding amidst the mud on the shore, or by the sides of salt-water ponds. These birds are shy, difficult to shoot, build their nests in ponds, of mud, which they collect into a hillock a foot and a half above the surface of the stagnated water. This little mount they form with a broad base, leaving a hollow at the top, in which they lay their eggs, and hatch their young. They sit upon the eggs in a very extraordinary manner, with their long legs upon the ground, and their rumps over the nest, leaning against the hillock; an ingenious dictate of nature, by which they avoid destroying the eggs in the nest with their weight. The Flamingo never lays more than two eggs, and seldom fewer; the young ones are not able to fly till they are almost full-grown; a defect which they supply by the rapidity with which they run. Their flesh, whether old or young, is lean and black, but g sweet and delicious, without the least taste of fish, though they live upon them and worms. Their tongues are large, with a piece of fat at the root, that is reckoned luxurious eating, and makes a dish of Flamingoes tongues be deemed the most elegant and delicious of all dishes.

dishes. Besides the Flamingo, Mayo produces a variety of other birds; partridges, curleus, a Guiney hens, pigeons, and Michotas, a species of land-fowl of the size of a crow, a green plumage, and sweet flesh. Crusia's are another kind of fowl, nearly of the same size, seen only in the night, and thence esteemed a kind of owl. The flesh of this animal is reckoned excellent for consumptive patients, after every other remedy has failed, and the apothecary's shop been drained. Rabeks, a large grey fowl, esteemed good eating, with a grey plumage, and long legs, resembling a heron, is another fowl common here. Dampier concludes this article with observing, that the pirates, who had, for years before his time, greatly infested these islands, had diminished the number of all animals, and especially of the tame quadrupeds, which they killed for sea-store.

THE sea is plentifully stocked with a variety of fish, mullets, dolphins, bonettos, snappers, b silver fish, porpusses, and a small species of whale that commonly visits the road every day in quest of their prey, during the season that the green turtles lay their eggs.

ALL the inhabitants of this island are negroes, if we may credit Dampier; tho' Sanutus, Linschoten, and La Croix <sup>k</sup>, affirm, that the natives of the Cape Verds in general were descended of Portuguese parents in their time. At present they are subject to the Portuguese, acknowledge their government, and profess their religion. They are a stout, robust, well-limbed, and active people, tho' both males and females are rather gross and bulky, notwithstanding the simplicity of their diet, which is wholly vegetable, and the poverty of the island. Dampier was told by one of the Padres, that the inhabitants amounted to two hundred and thirty souls, who, in general, appeared a good-natured civil people. They c have a negro governor, who holds his commission of the Portuguese governor of St. Fago, and exacts a small duty from every captain of a ship that loads at his salt-pits. The seasons when the shipping arrive are this officer's harvest; he is often treated on board, and spends his whole time with the sailors, in whose conversation he delights. As no European nation, besides the English, used to frequent this port, Dampier says, that their arrival was always expected with impatience, and welcomed with joy, it being the only means the natives had of procuring a little money and necessaries, or of living merrily; for, besides their hire for loading the ships, they likewise made a kind of trade of asses, which the seamen bought to sell again at a high price in Barbadoes and other islands of the West Indies.

Buena-vista. BUENA-VISTA lies north of Mayo, under 15 degrees 56 minutes north latitude. It is also d called Bonvista and Bonnevue; but the first is the true appellation, the others being only abbreviations and corruptions of the original name, which signifies a good prospect; intimating the beautiful appearance it makes to ships at sea. This island is reckoned near twenty leagues in circumference, and is distinguished on the north side by a ridge of white rocks that bound it. The eastern coast, that stretches east and north-west, is terminated with sundry banks to the sea, tho' the interior part is chiefly mountainous. From the northern point there is a large chain of rocks, projecting near a whole league into the sea; against which the waves break with incredible fury. Another point of rocks stretches into the sea, on the southern point of the island eastward, a league and a half beyond that point; and in this bay is the best road for shipping <sup>1</sup>.

Ilha del. Sal. UNDER the parallel of 17 degrees north, and in the 22d of longitude, lies the island called by the Spaniards Ilha del Sal, or salt-island, stretching from north to south about nine leagues, but not above half a league broad. This whole island is full of salt-ponds, where the water chrySTALLIZES into a beautiful salt, the chief production to be met with here, where land is so barren as to bear no trees, no verdure, except a few inconsiderable shrubs. Dampier saw hardly a blade of grass, and no other animals than a few small lean goats, which bore all the marks of the poverty of the country; and yet Davity affirms, that, notwithstanding the apparent barrenness of this island, it produces incredible numbers of goats, some asses, a few small horses, and a great variety of sea-fowls. Perhaps the ravages of the buccaneers might have occasioned their present scarcity. La Croix observes, that a prodigious number f of tortoises lay their eggs on this island, which alone would be sufficient to maintain a number of inhabitants; yet all authors agree that it is a desolate and desert island.

Saint Nicholas. ABOUT seventeen leagues to the east of Salt Island lies St. Nicholas, under 17 degrees 20 minutes north, say our English geographers; but, according to La Croix, De Lisle, and others, in the latitude of 16 degrees 20 min. It is in length seven or eight leagues, and in breadth at some places, particularly at the west end, about three leagues. The road for shipping is about a league from the eastern point, where is a fine bay. The harbour, called by the Portuguese Porto de Penguin, is on the south side, and the entrance to it filled with small islands, but with a good chanel between. Going thence north-west, there is another port, called Fuor Rol, where ships may always be supplied with good fresh water <sup>m</sup>. g a SAINT VINCENT Island is about forty-three leagues distant from the Ilha del Sal, inclining a little to the northward, under the 18th degree, says Bowen, and 17th, according to La Croix, of north latitude. It is five leagues in length, extending itself west south-west. On the north-west side lies a bay, a league and a half broad at the mouth, surrounded with high mountains, and stretching to the middle of the island, being securely sheltered by the mountains from the westerly and north-west winds; whence it is deemed the safest harbour in all the Cape Verd Islands; yet it is difficult of access, by reason of the impetuous winds that blow off the mountains along the coast with so much fury as greatly to endanger shipping, before they can arrive at this place of tranquil security. Besides this, there are several other bays on the south side, in which ships may anchor; and of these the Portuguese generally make choice to load their hides. St. Vincent has also good fresh-water, which is seen to spring up upon digging a little way into the soil of a valley; but the hills afford not a single drop; and this it is that makes the island improper for cattle <sup>n</sup>.

<sup>k</sup> LIHSCH. vol. iv. c. 95. SANUT. & LA CROIX, loc. citat. DAMP. voy. 2d, passim, t. iv. ubi supra, p. 95.

<sup>m</sup> DAPPER, ibid. DAVITY, t. v. p. 627. LA CROIX, t. iv. p. 645.

<sup>1</sup> DAPPER,

b THE island of St. Lucia, which is high and mountainous, and about nine leagues long, lies under 16 degrees 18 minutes north latitude, according to most writers; and yet here too our English geographers differ from the Portuguese, French, Dutch, and all other nations, placing it in 17 degrees 18 minutes north. What the cause of this variation in the situation of islands, so much frequented, may be, is what we are not able to conjecture. On the east south-east side is a harbour, with a bottom and shore of white sand, its mouth defended by two small islands, which afford good shelter and anchorage; but its best road is opposite to St. Vincent, to the south west, where there are at least twenty fathoms water, the latter found in springs at the feet of the mountains. On the west side there is no water; and here it is uninhabited, says La Croix; an expression which implies its being peopled in the other quarters, tho' we do not find this expressly affirmed by writers; but it abounds with goats, sea and land fowl, tortoises <sup>o</sup>, &c.

c THE most northerly of all the Cape Verd Islands is St. Anthony, lying in 17 degrees north latitude; but the English geographers make it one degree further north of the equinoctical. It is divided from St. Vincent by a chanel of two leagues in breadth, clear and navigable. The island stretches from north-east to south-west, and is filled with mountains, one of which is of so extraordinary a height as to be compared with the Peak of Teneriffe; of which we shall have occasion to speak in this section. The top is constantly covered with snow; but, notwithstanding the clearness of the sky, generally hid in the clouds. On the north side it has a good road for shipping, with a collection of fresh water rising from springs, which, however, scarcely merits the name of a pond. The inhabitants amount to about five hundred, chiefly negroes, under the protection of the Portuguese. To the north-west stands a village, containing about twenty huts, and at least fifty families, negroes and whites, under the government of a governor, or, as they call him, a captain, a priest, and a schoolmaster, who trains up the children in the principles of the Christian religion, and the first elements of knowledge, though that seldom exceeds being able to read the bible in a bungling manner. They all speak Portuguese, copy the manners of that nation, but live in the most miserable poverty, although the island produces a variety of fruits, oranges, lemons, palms, melons, bacoas, pomegranates, and the sugar-cane. Here is a large orchard, distinguished at sea by a high palm-tree, where the sailors come to gather the fruits of the season, in which they never meet with any obstruction from the natives. At a greater distance from the sea there is another orchard, from whence the natives bring fruit upon asses to the ships, which they sell at a very low price. The potatoes and melons of St. Anthony are particularly excellent, having a richness and delicacy of flavour peculiar to them; these are therefore eagerly sought after by the mariners <sup>p</sup>.

d IN the latitude of fourteen degrees twenty minutes north, as foreign geographers have it, or directly in 15 degrees, as it is placed in our English maps, lies Ilha del Fogo, or the island of fire, so called from a volcano, or burning mountain, that discovers it at a great distance in the night. On the west side stands a small castle at the foot of a mountain, before which there is a large road, but inconvenient, on account of the high surges which continually roll against the shore. All round the island the wind blows impetuously, and the shore being steep, the water is not fathomable, except near the castle. We are told of no production of this Ilha del Fogo besides vines; though, as it is inhabited, it is probable that other fruits must have been cultivated, as well as grain; and that it is not destitute of quadrupeds and sea-fowls <sup>q</sup>.

e THE Ilha del Brava, or the savage and desert island, is about four leagues in circuit, and as much south-west of Del Fogo, together with two or three small desolate islands to the north of it. On the west side there is a commodious road for watering; but the safest port is on the south-east side, where ships may anchor in fifteen fathom water, close to the shore; and, for

<sup>n</sup> DAVITY, DAPP. ubi supra.
LA CROIX, ibid. 644.

<sup>o</sup> LA CROIX, ubi supra.

<sup>q</sup> DAVITY, t. v. p. 617. etiam Aust. sup. cit.

<sup>p</sup> JURIN, l. v. Voy. Holland. c. 40.

this reason, frequented by the Dutch and Portuguese East-India men. Immediately above this a harbour stands a hermitage and hamlet, occupied by a few contemptible negroes. Brava produces figs, water melons, with a variety of other fruits, millet, rice, and roots, and has also a good number of goats, which the wretched inhabitants are neither permitted to consume or sell without permission from the governor of St. Jago; the island of which we are now to give an account *.

Saint Jago.

ST. JAGO, or St. James's Island, is the most considerable of all the Cape Verds; extending about twelve leagues from north-east to south-east, at the distance of five leagues to the westward of Mayo, and lying between the 15th and 16th degrees of north latitude, and 23d of longitude west from London. It is the most important, best cultivated, and most fruitful, of any we have described in this latitude. The people in general are black, or at best of a mixed b colour, except a few of the better rank; the governor, the bishop, some gentlemen who trade or live upon their plantations, and the Padres, though many of the latter are blacks. On the east side of the island is a town called Praya, with a good port, which is seldom destitute of a considerable number of shipping, unless the crown of Portugal happens to be at war with some other power. It has long been a place where the outward-bound Guiney and India men have been accustomed to touch at for water and refreshments, whether English, French, or Dutch; but few of them call on their return to Europe. The natives bring down to the shore the produce of the country for sale to the mariners and passengers; and the whole coast resembles a fair, every place being filled with hogs, bullocks, fowls, goats, figs, plantanes, and coco-nuts, which they exchange for shirts, drawers, handkerchiefs, breeches, hats, waist-c c coats, and all manner of cloathing, especially linen; for woollen cloths are in no great repute at St. Jago. It is unwillingly, however, they part with their cattle of any kind, but for money or linen, of which the mariners must be cautious: for, like almost all the negroes, the natives here lie in watch for all occasions of filching, being perhaps the most expert thieves in Africa. This vice, indeed, is almost peculiar to the inhabitants of Praya; for, at St. Jago town, where they are more immediately under the eye of the governor, their natural propensity is suppressed by the fear of punishment, and perhaps honesty become as habitual to them as theft is to the Prayans. We cannot imagine that, at so short a distance, and where the blood is constantly intermingled, there should be any constitutional difference, and would rather attribute the distinction to the force of education and wholesome well-executed laws. d

At Praya there is a fort on the summit of a hill, that intirely commands the harbour; and were it properly mounted with cannon, and garrisoned, would be a place of great strength.

THE town of St. Jago is the capital of the island, and indeed of the whole Cape de Verd islands; for they all acknowledge the authority of the Portuguese governor, whose residence is fixed here, as well as the bishop's. It stands dispersed upon the declivity of two hills, between which there is a deep valley, two hundred yards wide towards the sea, but gradually decreasing in breadth as it retires from the shore, in a triangular form, the coast making the base. In this valley, close by the sea, there is a kind of street that runs parallel with the sea across the valley, and houses on both sides, that are watered by a rivulet which falls into a fine sandy e bay, where the sea is always smooth and even as glass. This forms a convenient watering-place for ships, though the entrance be in a manner blocked up, except to good pilots, by a chain of rocks. Near the landing-place stands a small fort, almost level with the sea, in which is kept a constant guard, regularly relieved. On the very summit of the hill, behind the town, is erected another fort, which, by the walls seen from the road, seems to be a fortification of some extent, method, and strength; for no writer pretends particularly to describe it; and possibly the Portuguese may be jealous of permitting foreigners to examine the works. Dampier says, indeed, that he is unable to comprehend the utility of this fort, though it is apparently well garrisoned, and mounted with heavy cannon. The town consists of about three hundred houses, a church, and a convent, all built of rough stone, and greatly superior in f architecture and convenience to those of the other islands. Besides the accidental ships of other nations which touch here, there are two Portuguese vessels which take it yearly in their way to Brazil. These vend among the inhabitants all kind of European commodities, and take in exchange the principal manufacture of the island, striped cotton, which they again sell to good advantage in the Brazils. Besides this, one ship comes directly from Portugal, to take in a cargo of sugar, in exchange for the manufactures of Europe; for there is exported to Lisbon no less than 100 tons of sugar annually.

COTTON is produced in such abundance in St. Jago, that, besides the quantities sent to the Brazils, and sold to other European nations, almost all the natives are cloathed with this manufacture. Here are vines, of which the natives make a wine that is not contemptible; g but as they are supplied with better by the European shipping, it has fallen into disrepute. The * LA CROIX, ibid. Navig. Vert. 1607. LINSCH. Voy. c. 95.

- a chief fruits of the island, besides a profusion of plantanes, are citrons, lemons, oranges, musk, and water-melons, limes, guavas, pomgranates, quinces, custard-apples, papas; of which we shall only describe the two last. The custard-apple is a fruit of the size of a pomgranate, and much of that colour; the husk, shell, or rind, being, for substance and thickness, a kind of medium between the shell of a pomgranate and the peel of an orange; softer than the one, and less tough than the other. This coat is remarkably set round with a variety of small regular knobs or excrescences, within which, or rather within the whole coat, is a soft white pulp, sweet and very pleasant, greatly resembling a custard in colour and taste; whence probably it had this name given it by the English. In the middle are a few black stones, or kernels, but no core, the whole inside besides consisting of pulp. The custard-tree is of the size of a
- b. quince-tree, with long, slender, and thick-set branches, spreading all round. At the extremity of these the fruit grows, upon a stalk ten inches long, slender and tough, hanging down in a beautiful manner with the weight of the fruit. As to the papa, it is found in most of the countries within the tropics; and so indeed is the custard-apple. It is a fruit of the size of a water-melon, hollow as that, and having a strong resemblance to it in shape and colour, both internally and externally; but, instead of the flat kernels of the melon, the papas have a handful of small blackish seeds like pepper-corns, and, like these, hot and pungent to the tongue. When ripe, the fruit is soft, sweet, and luscious, but hard and unfavoury before it has arrived at full maturity; though even then it supplies, when boiled, the place of turnips, or other vegetables, with beef or pork, and is much esteemed by sailors for this purpose. The tree bearing
- c. this fruit is about ten or twelve feet high, the trunk at the bottom about two feet in diameter, and lessening gradually to the top. It has no small branches, but leaves shooting out immediately by a stalk from the body of the tree, amidst which the fruit grows. The leaves are serrated, and of an oval form; but we have before given a description of this curious tree.

THE chief animals bred in this island are cows, horses, asses, mules, deer, hogs, goats, and black-faced monkies with long tails. Of the feathered kind there are found cocks, hens, ducks, Guiney hens, both tame and wild, paroquets, parrots, pigeons, turtle-doves, crab-catchers, curlews, and a variety of others, valuable only for their plumage. Such is the account of these islands given by the authors the reader will find cited in the margin; to which we may add what Jarric affirms, that so numerous are horses in the island of St. Jago, that

d upwards of three thousand, fit for a campaign, can be raised here. The same writer adds, that, in all the Cape de Verd Islands, the Padres officiate as physicians, surgeons, and apothecaries, uniting in their own persons the cure of soul and body; but their medical skill consists chiefly in magic, sorcery, and a correspondence with the devil, or rather in fraud, hypocrisy, and imposture*.

WITHOUT entering upon a dispute of little consequence to our readers, whether the Canary Islands be the same which the antients called the Fortunate Islands, and are particularly described by Ptolemy and the elder Pliny, we shall think it sufficient that we give the reader a just account of them. These are speculative points, for which he may consult our antient history, and the Greek and Latin geographers; though we cannot avoid observing, that, if Ptolemy describes e the same islands, he has certainly placed them near 11 degrees too near the equinoctial, under the 16th degree; from which circumstance some geographers have thought that the Cape de Verd Islands had formerly bore this appellation. We are now well assured by the most accurate observations, that the Canary Islands lie between 27 degrees 10 minutes and 29 degrees 50 minutes north latitude, and between the 12th and 17th degrees 50 minutes longitude west from London. Thevet affirms, that, by the Africans in general, they are called Elbard; and Gomara asserts, that they had the name Canary given by the Spaniards, on account of the number of large dogs which they found on one of these islands. Hernius, however, and Dr. Harris agree, that the word Canary is not borrowed from the Latin term for that animal, according to Pliny, nor from the number of dogs with which they abound, as Gomara conjectures, but from the Cannanites, or Phœnicians, who, as Scylax Cariandenus observes, used to sail often from the continent to Carne, which others think is only a contraction of Canary.

f But these are all conjectures, which serve only to shew the erudition, the ingenuity, and talents of historians for hypotheses, which add nothing to truth, or the improvement of their readers (A).

NOR are writers less divided with respect to their number, than about their situation and name. Gramaye asserts, that six were only known to Ptolemy and Pliny; and that, even in this number, the island of Madeira was included; whereas modern travellers and geographers reckon no less than twelve, exclusive of Madeira; but of these seven only have been thought to merit any description. These are Lancerota, Fuerte Ventura, Gran-Canaria, Ferro, <sup>a</sup> Palma, Teneriffe, and Gomara. To these Purchas adds certain small islands, by the names of Lobos, Roca, Graciosa, Santa Clara, Allegrança, and Inferno; the proper names of which, according to Sanutus, are Vecchio Marino, Sainte Claire, Rocha, Graciosa, and Allegrança; omitting likewise two of the number mentioned by the former compiler.

* Navig. Holland. A. 1598, 99. SANUT. l. vii. PURCH. l. vii. c. 12. LINSCH. c. 95. THEVET, Cosm. l. iii. DAVITY, t. v. p. 627. LA CROIX, p. iv. p. 630, & seq. JARRIC, l. v.

(A) It may deserve notice, that Abulfeda, Ulug Beg, or Beigh, and other Arabian geographers, have called these islands Jazair Alcha A'el or Happy Islands.

WHETHER or not the Canaries were known in the days of Ptolemy and Pliny, certain we are, that, before the year 1402, or, according to some Spanish historians, 1405, the moderns were entirely ignorant of them, though they were peopled by Christians, and even catholics, who must have had some communication with Europe, by their acknowledging the supremacy of the see of Rome, as it is allowed on all hands they did. By what chanel this communication was carried on, or how Christianity came to be planted there, history is intirely silent. <sup>b</sup> This, however, is affirmed, that John king of Castile having invested a Frenchman, called John de Belancourt, with the property of these islands (which had been seen by some mariners, but whose existence only was known) if he could conquer them. This adventurer immediately set to work in providing for his expedition; and he had the good fortune to make himself master of Lancerota, with its citadel, and Fuerte Ventura, after storming a convent of the order of St. Francis. His right he made over, according to Gramaye, five years afterwards to Diego Herrera, by whom it was that Fuerte Ventura was conquered. Sanutus says, that Belancourt undertook this expedition by the permission of the queen of Castile; and that he dying, the property of the two islands was sold by his heirs to Herrera, or rather to the infant Don Henry, who sent Herrera to make farther conquests, in which he succeeded, by reducing Ferro and Gomara. <sup>c</sup> In process of time, the other islands were conquered in the same manner; but it would not be worth while to dwell upon a subject so variously related (B). This much only is certain, that in the peace between Ferdinand of Castile and Alphonso V. of Portugal, after a bloody war in which these monarchs had been engaged, it was stipulated, that they should reciprocally renounce all pretensions prior to the date of this treaty; that henceforward the Canary Islands should inseparably belong to the crown of Castile; and that, as an equivalent, the commerce and navigation of Guiney should belong to Portugal, exclusive of the Castilians (C). This was the treaty signed on the 4th of November, 1479, at Alcobazas <sup>u</sup>.

<sup>u</sup> PURCH. Pilg. l. vii. c. 12. CADAMOST. l. vii. SANUT. l. iii. GRAMAYE Afrique, l. ix. c. 3.

(B) The reader may chuse to have a short view of the progress of the Spanish conquests according to the best authorities. Gramaye affirms, that Herrera, not having the same success in his attempts on the other islands, was so disgusted, that he sold his right to king Ferdinand (for he supposes that he had a right), just before a bloody battle with the natives put him in possession of Gran-Canaria. Afterwards Bartholomew and Alphonso Lugo were sent to reduce Teneriffe, of which they made themselves masters in 1512; and as to Palma, it had been reduced about four years before. Sanutus, on the contrary, expressly affirms, that Gomara and Ferro were discovered by Ferdinand Dorias, and the three others, viz. Teneriffe, Palma, and Gran-Canaria, by Alphonso Lugo and Pietro da Vera, and that these were subdued by order of Ferdinand and Isabella; Teneriffe and Palma by Lugo, and the rest by Vera, a gentleman of Xeres. In Cadamosto's days, there were only four; viz. Fuerte Ventura, Lancerota, Gomara, and Ferro, inhabited by Christians, or annexed to the crown of Castile *.

(C) The following account of the Canary Islands is given by Mandefloe: The wholesomeness of the air, and the fertility of the soil, procured them, says he, the name of Insulæ Fortunatæ, among the antients; tho' one of them is also called Canaria by Pliny, Solinus, and Ptolemy; which contradicts the opinion of those who discovered them in the year 1342, and gave them this name from the number of canes they produced. They are seven in number, extending almost in a direct line from east to west. Lewis Count Clermont having, in the year 1348, obtained a grant of these islands from the pope, fitted out a fleet, in order to subdue them; which was accordingly accomplished, under the protection of the king of Arragon. These conquests, however, being afterwards relinquished by Don Lewis de la Cerda, the Biscayans and Andalusians equipped a squadron, with which they surprised the island of Lancerota, where they acquired so rich a booty, as inflamed the king of Castile with an eager desire to subdue islands, which would add so valuable a jewel to his crown. Doubtless, says Mandefloe, he would have succeeded in this purpose, had he not been diverted by other wars with his neighbours, with whom he had been entangled in a series of wars and bloodshed. Not many years after this, John de Belancourt obtained a commission from Henry III. of Castile, for the conquest of the Canaries; with this proviso, that he and his posterity should acknowledge the sovereignty of the crown of Castile. In consequence of which, he had the good fortune soon to render himself master of the five lesser islands, but failed in the reduction of the larger. The king of Castile, as sovereign, having sent a bishop to preside over the new-acquired flock, the prelate's arrival brought on such quarrels with the nephew and successor of Belancourt, that the king was forced to send thither one Pietro Barba, with a force sufficient to expel the French. Barba gave the islands in dowry with his daughter to one Pereira, who assumed the title of king of the Canaries, and used every measure to subdue all the islands; but unsuccessfully: upon which he sold four of them to Ferdinand the Catholic; reserving only Gomara to himself, with the title of earl. Ferdinand conquered the great islands; and the whole have since continued to the Spanish crown †. Such is the relation of Mandefloe; but upon what authority we are not informed.

* Vide Auct. citat.

† Mandefloe, apud Harris, t. i. p. 806.

a THE Canary Islands lie east to the coast of Biledulgerid, between the 27th degree 10 min. and the 29th degree 50 minutes north latitude, and between the 12th and 17th, 50 minutes longitude west from London. La Croix, however, alters this geography: insisting, that they include all that space between the 26th degree 30 minutes, and 29th degree 30 minutes north latitude, opposite to Cape Nun, about 70 or 80 leagues from the Barbary coast, and about nine or ten leagues distant from each other.

If we attend to the nature of these islands, we shall find that, their situation being so near the tropic of Cancer, the climate must necessarily be hot, as they lie greatly exposed to the strongest heat of the sun, as is sufficiently proved by their early harvests, which happen generally in the months of March and April. The soil, indeed, is every-where admirably rich and fruitful, but particularly famous for the production of that grape of which the Canary wine, so much esteemed all over Europe, is made, and exported in so large quantities.

According to Sanutus, there was formerly but one island so remarkably fertile either in corn or wine, though, at present, they all produce every necessary of life. Here wheat, barley, honey, wax, sugar-canes, oranges, figs, pomgranates, citrons, peaches, pine-apples, with a variety of other fruits, spring up in the utmost abundance and perfection. Here also grows a large quantity of a plant called Orisell, which several botanists affirm to be the Phalaris of Dioscorides (D), and which Delechamp, upon Pliny, calls the second genus of the Barba, or, more properly, grain of Theophrastus. This plant they cultivate with great care, for the nourishment of those little birds so valuable for their beautiful plumage and sweet voices, well known by the name of Canary Birds. In these islands there is likewise produced a great quantity of a gum or resin, called Bre, which is an exudation from the pine by the means of fire; different, however, from the method practised in Norway, and the northern countries of Europe. Nor are the Canary Islands less abundantly supplied with cattle, such as cows, sheep, goats, and wild asses, which run about the mountains in droves; and perhaps their most valuable article of commerce are the skins and hides, in which they deal largely with all the maritime European powers. Their woods are stored with a variety of the feathered kind, and the surrounding seas stocked with shoals of fish, particularly sturgeon, which forms the chief sustenance of the poor. All the islands have ditches and marshes, filled with sea-water at spring-tides, and afterwards evaporated by the heat of the sun, till a fine sea-salt is formed.

As to the original inhabitants of these islands, there are a variety of opinions: but what is advanced by the greater number of writers as the most probable, is the following, though it likewise labours under difficulties, which are too obvious to require a formal refutation.

They are said to have been exiles from Africa, banished hither by the Romans, after having cut out their tongues, for having blasphemed against their gods, or the Roman divinities: it is, however, confessed, by persons perfectly acquainted with their language, that it has not the least resemblance or affinity either to the Latin or Arabic; nor indeed would it be easy to conceive how parents, deprived of the organ of speech, should be able to transmit the language to posterity; for writing, and the orthography, could never teach the sound of the elements, or be able to annex any certain and fixed ideas to the different characters. Nicols says, that all the descendants of the antient inhabitants speak the same language; which, however, is diversified into a variety of different dialects. They were clothed, says the same author, in hides and skins, without any particular cut or fashion. Amidst caves and rocks, their only dwellings, they lived in the most intimate friendship and happy union. Their language varied but little from what is now spoken by their posterity. Their food was the flesh of horned cattle, dogs, and the milk of goats. They made also a kind of pudding, or bread, of milk, and grinded or triturated corn, which they called Goffia, and now common in the island under the same name. Nicols has frequently eat of it, and praises it as nourishing and pleasant to the palate.

F WHEN Cadamosto made his voyage to the Canaries, Anno 1445, the Spaniards were then only in possession of the four smaller islands; the rest being inhabited, as he says, by a race of idolaters, whom the Spaniards called Guanchas, or Guanches; a name which Linschoten, and other writers, apply to their descendants. In number, the inhabitants of Canaria-Gran amounted to 9000, and of Teneriffe to 5000, men, women, and children, of a barbarous nature and gigantic stature. Polygamy was permitted among them, every man keeping as many women as he could afford to maintain, without any restriction of law or custom; and they suckled their children with the milk of goats. All their property was in common; that is, their food was so, for all other property and riches they were strangers to. The earth was cultivated and ploughed with the horns of bullocks; and the sheep shorn, and their beards cut with whetted flints instead of iron instruments, of which they had no knowledge. So much did they detest the notion of shedding human blood, that, notwithstanding they are called a barbarous, no people on earth shewed more humanity in this particular; for having taken a Spanish vessel, the crew of which had grossly insulted them, their hatred could not inspire them with a more rigorous punishment than setting their prisoners to watch their flocks; an employment which they esteemed ignominious and mean. But this excess of rudeness, says our author, did not prevent their having notions of futurity; for each community, or little society, had always two chiefs or kings, one dead and the other living. As soon as any of their princes died, they washed his body with the greatest care, and, placing it erect in a cave, they put a sceptre in his hand, with two jars by his side, the one filled with milk, the other with wine, as the necessary provision for his journey <sup>w</sup>.

(D) This is a genus of the Triandria-Dygynia, with a bivalve corolla, and only a single seed contained in the corolla, in which it perfectly resembles the Orisell.

At the time when Cadamosto visited the Canaries, each island was divided into a number of different kingdoms, or rather lordships, of which Teneriffe alone contained nine. The wars which were frequently kindled among those little states, made them forget the natural sentiments of humanity and tenderness peculiar to this people, and sometimes to carry the fury of revenge to the utmost excess, till the face of the country was overspread with carnage and blood. Yet were their weapons the most simple in the world, consisting of stones, and two kinds of lances; the one armed with horn, the other unarmed wood, but pointed and hardened in the fire. To protect them against the scorching beams of the sun in the hot seasons, and against the inclemency of the cold in their winters, they anointed their bodies with a mixture of tallow and the juice of certain plants, which tinged their skins with all manner of colours, red, yellow, and green; and women, as well as men, made use of this extraordinary defence and ornament. <sup>c</sup>

It appeared likewise, that each island had its particular mode of worship; nay, that the different little states within the precincts of the same island differed both in the form of their religion and government; although within the same societies every thing was in common, religion, customs, language, manners, and property itself. In the island of Teneriffe alone there were no less than ten different sorts of idolaters or pagans, some worshipping the sun, some the moon, and the rest of the heavenly bodies. Polygamy, as we have said, was permitted; but the virginity of the bride belonged of right to the chief; and both she and the bridegroom thought themselves highly honoured, if he condescended to confer upon them this mark of his regard, and to claim his right. They continued long after the conquests of the Spaniards, who suffered them to have their own lords and chiefs. A barbarous custom, which was always practised upon the accession of a new prince, was the sacrificing a certain number of young persons of both sexes, in honour of him, and to procure blessings upon his reign. The manner of performing this inhuman ceremony was this: a great feast was given, at the close of which, all those who were desirous of proving their affection and loyalty, were conducted to the summit of a steep rock, whence, after pronouncing certain mysterious words, and going through a number of absurd ceremonies, they flung themselves over into a deep valley below, and were dashed in pieces by the violence of the fall. In reward of their loyalty, the prince thought himself bound in duty and gratitude to bestow all possible marks of kindness and favour on the parents of the infatuated victims; a circumstance which renders it doubtful, whether these young persons did not devote their lives as proofs rather of filial affection than of fidelity to their sovereign. Many of these customs still remain among the posterity of the Guanches, which will best appear by relating what modern travellers have observed upon their manners. <sup>c</sup>

THE natural inhabitants of the Canaries, say they, are stout and robust, but inferior in size and strength to their ancestors. Their complexion is neither absolutely white nor black, but a kind of mixed colour, or tawny, with large flat noses. They are of a lively and quick genius, alert, active, brave, and cunning; much addicted to war, in which particular they differ from the natural disposition of their ancestors; who, however, from circumstances of policy, were often engaged in war. They are still distinguished by the Spaniards by the name of Guanches; which indeed they merit from their strict adherence to many of the customs and manners of the antients. One quality they have in particular, in common with their gigantic predecessors; that is, a most voracious appetite, and a stomach so devouring, that it is usual for one man to eat up at a meal a dozen of rabbits and a kid; a fact we are scarce able to credit, upon the authority of all those writers whom the reader will find cited in the margin <sup>x</sup>.

THEY speak but little, and with great deliberation, uttering their words between their teeth and lips; and, besides the language of the country, talk Spanish fluently. Doctor Sprat

<sup>w</sup> HERBERT, p. 4. SPRAT's Hist. of the Royal Society, p. 212, & seq. PETER MARTYR, d. i. p. 9. Voy. de CADAMOSTO, apud Ramus. t. i. p. 98. DAVITY, p. 72. <sup>x</sup> Doctor SPRAT, p. 213. DURETTE, p. 74. Voyage de HERBERT, p. 5. LA CROIX, t. iv. p. 670. PREVOST, t. iii. p. 6. CADAMOSTO, apud Ramus. v. i. p. 99. cum multis aliis.

- a relates, that, in Teneriffe, the descendants of the antient Guanches live upon grain formed into cakes with milk and honey; and that they keep their food in skin-pouches, suspended to their belts and girdles; in which they likewise bake them in the smoke. Some of them rigidly abstain from wine, and cannot be prevailed on to taste animal food. So active and light they are, that they run up and down mountains, and skip from rock to rock with an amazing, but hazardous, facility, that often proves fatal to the unexperienced. In all those kind of exploits, they use a pole nine or ten feet long, with which they assist themselves in leaping or sliding from one precipice to another, and in breaking off the sharp angles of rocks, frequently trusting themselves to a step not three inches wide, in which they fix their toes, and seem to hang over frightful heights and precipices. Sir Richard Hawkins had seen them
- b climb and descend steep and high rocks in this manner, and by a method equally astonishing and frightful to the beholder; and Doctor Sprat relates a story of twenty-eight natives, whom the Spanish governor committed prisoners to a castle of a prodigious height, where it was thought impossible but they were perfectly secure. However, they found means to get over the walls, and descended the steep and rugged precipices with a boldness and activity altogether amazing to such as have seen the situation of the citadel. The same writer adds, that the Canarians have a very extraordinary method of whistling, which may be heard at the distance of five miles; a fact that is asserted by a number of other writers likewise, who assure us, that if a Guanch whistles in your ear, it will be some days before you recover the use of that organ, so piercingly loud is the noise.

- c THE learned Dr. Sprat has favoured the world with a variety of curious anecdotes concerning this people: among others, he relates, that the Guanches use stones in all their fights, and throw them with a power equal to the force of a musket-ball. Cadamosto, as we have said, makes the same remark; and both writers agree, that they have seen these barbarians fling stones with so certain an aim as to hit the smallest mark at a great distance, and with such force as, with a few blows, to penetrate and break in pieces a strong shield. Upon the first reduction of these islands, the inhabitants were so expert in this exercise, that a fellow undertook to give twelve oranges to three men, and keep an equal number, with which he would hit one of them at the distance of one hundred paces, at every throw, at the same time parrying off their oranges with his hand, though they pelted him as thick a hail. The trial
- d was made by order of the Spanish governor; and succeeded beyond the fellow's promises, to the great admiration of all the spectators<sup>y</sup>.

- THE chief and most considerable of all these islands is Gran-Canaria, which is honoured with the residence of a bishop, and has an inquisition established in it. Here also the governor of the Canaries has his palace, where he holds courts of justice for the deciding of differences, redressing of grievances, and punishing crimes. At present, we are told, all the inhabitants, both Spaniards and natives of this island, are of the Roman catholic religion. At first, indeed, many of them fled to the mountains, to avoid the persecution of the inquisition, and preserve the liberty of their ancient religion; but they are now all dispersed, or obliged to embrace those notions with which the holy fathers chuse to impress their
- e minds. They are, it must be owned, but sorry proselytes; for the inquisition gives itself but very little trouble about the sincerity of their professions, as long as they are implicitly obedient to their oppressive authority. But we will not enlarge here upon their general manners and customs, as we shall find frequent occasion of mentioning them in our description of the several islands, which go under the general name of the Canaries. We shall only add, that the government is composed of a viceroy, or governor, with three auditors, who form what is called a royal audience<sup>z</sup>.

- WE come now to a particular description of each island; and shall begin with Palma, Palma Island. the most westward and distant from the continent of Africa; taking them in a regular course as they lie eastward. This island, which, according to Barbot and Davity, was antiently
- f called Capraria, lies to the north north-west of Ferro, in the latitude of 28 degrees 30 minutes north, or by the maps of some English geographers, under 29 degrees north latitude, and 18 degrees west longitude from London. The same writers call it ten leagues in length, seven in breadth, and about twenty-six in circuit; though some other geographers describe it of a circular form nearly, except the projection of one angle at the north-east end, which forms a kind of horn. In this island stands the burning mountain Capraria, whence the island had its name; though other writers conjecture, that both the island and mountain were so called from the great number of goats bred here. It is agreed on all hands, that the soil is fertile in corn, wine, and sugar-canes, as well as in fruits, quadrupeds, and birds of all kinds. Nuno de Penna relates, in his Historical Memoirs, that, on the 13th of November
- g 1677, a little after sun-set, there was a violent earthquake felt for thirteen leagues round

<sup>y</sup> DURETTE, p. 17. Vide etiam Auct. citat. ibid. citat. in loc. citat.

<sup>z</sup> DAVITY, t. v. p. 609. SPRAT, ubi supra, & Auct.

the island, attended with a dreadful noise, that continued without intermission for five days; a during which the earth was opened in horrible gaps in several places, but chiefly upon the mountain of Goats, or Capraria, a mile and a half from the sea, from whence issued a violent fire and fierce flames, which vomited up great stones and large pieces of rocks. The same thing happened in several of the adjacent places; and, in the space of fifteen minutes, no less than twenty-eight dreadful gulphs opened round the foot of the mountain; each of them spewing up flames, smoke, and liquid fire. The same author adds, that, on the 20th of November following, there was a second eruption of the mountain, which, in the same manner, poured forth torrents of melted stones and minerals, which run for the distance of seven leagues, where, at this day, large heaps of cinders are to be seen. All the neighbouring lands were intirely wasted, and the inhabitants forced to quit their habitations. b

THIS island has a handsome town of its own name, and a safe harbour, well-frequented by the shipping of different nations, which come hither for wines; these being reckoned equal to Malmsey, and by some thought the best of any produced in the Canaries. These wines, and particularly what is made at a place called Brenin, are bought up with avidity; and of this last there is exported to the West-Indies, and else-where, at least 12,000 pipes a year.

Ferro.

THE next island is Ferro, situated about two leagues, says Prevost, but six, according to other writers, south south-east of Palma. Barbot and Davity affirm, that this is the same island which the antient geographers called Pluvialia, and which goes under the name of Hiero by the Spaniards, Fiero by the Portuguese, Ferro by the Italians and English, and c L'Isle de Fer by the French. Barbot likewise calls it, but mistakenly, the most westward of the Canary Islands, later observations have proved Palma to be the furthest west. It lies under 27 degrees north latitude, and is about ten leagues in circuit (E). This island, according to Thevet, is without doubt the Ombra Pluvialia of Pliny and Solinus. It has some towns, and the capital is adorned with a church and monastery dedicated to St. Francis. The soil is dry and barren, attributed to the scarcity of water, of which there is not a drop, except what is found in some crevices of rocks near the shore. But this deficiency the islanders supply by a strange and miraculous tree, of which stories greatly exceeding all credit are related. As they are told with much the same circumstances by almost all voyagers, it would be an injustice to our readers intirely to omit them, though the credit they deserve must d rest upon their own judgment, as it is not the business of historians absolutely to deny facts, which appear supernatural, if they stand attested by undoubted and universal authority and assent. This tree the Spaniards call Santo, from its extraordinary qualities, and the natives Gawe. The top of it is always covered with a thick cloud, except in the heat of the day, when it seems to be dispelled, which drops a dew that distills down the leaves and branches of the tree in drops of clear water, to the quantity of twenty tons a day. This water is received in a cistern of stone, about six feet deep and twenty feet square, standing on the north side of the tree. So precious is the Santo tree to the inhabitants, that they have secured it with a high wall. If this cloud should sometimes fail, as happens occasionally in the month of August, then Providence supplies the loss of it by a thick vapour that rises e from the sea, and, spreading itself over the Arbor Santo, is received in form of a dew upon the leaves, and discharged in a clear sweet water by the bark and branches into the cistern. When the Spaniards first arrived here, not finding a drop of water upon the island, they asked the natives in what manner they supplied the want of so essential an article of living; and were told, that they dressed all their provisions in the rainy seasons, and kept as much of the water as they possibly could. They had covered the tree with canes, earth, and other materials, hoping to oblige the Spaniards to relinquish their conquest, when they found it wanted water. But an accident destroyed the effects of their artifice; for a woman, who had granted some favours to a Spaniard, revealed the secret to her lover, who immediately gave notice of it to the commanding officer. In a word, this marvellous tree supplies not only f the inhabitants, and the animals wild and tame, of the island with a sufficiency of fresh water, but likewise the shipping, which put in here for that purpose<sup>a</sup>. It is described to be of a middling stature; and Lewis Jackson, who affirms that he had often seen it, compares it to a full-grown oak. Purchas says it is of the thickness of an oak, with a prodigious strong bark, a and leaves resembling those of the laurel, but smaller. It bears a fruit, or kernel, inclosed in a hard shell, of a delicious taste and high aromatic flavour; but whether there be in reality such a tree or not, is what we must leave the reader to determine, after he has perused what we shall subjoin in a note (F). To these particulars we shall add, that, whether water be obtained from one or more of these trees, certain it is, that about 8000 souls, and at least 100,000 head of quadrupeds, are supplied by some means with this element; though all writers agree, that the island affords not a single drop in the natural way, except what the inhabitants preserve in cisterns after the rainy season, and what is lodged in the crevices and chinks of rocks after heavy rains <sup>b</sup>.

<sup>a</sup> LA CROIX, t. iv. p. 702. P. MART. d. i. p. 12. HAWKINS, ubi supra. DURETTE, p. 71. DELLEN, p. 67. LINSCH. p. 177. BUKMAN, p. 7. PURCH. l. vii. c. 12. PREVOST, t. iii. p. 22. NICOLS, ibid.

(E) This island is rendered famous by the French navigators, who fix their first meridian in the center of it, as the Dutch have done theirs through the peak of Teneriffe. At present, however, it is customary among geographers to reckon the first meridian from the capital of their own country; though this leads to confusion in general histories and geographical works, where there ought to be one fixed and established meridian.

b ALTHOUGH the generality of writers, and particularly Linschoten, describe this island as perfectly dry and barren, yet there are not wanting some who affirm, that it produces corn, sugar-canes, and a great abundance of fruits and plants; and this relation is corroborated from the great number of inhabitants, and the large flocks of cattle which cover the face of the country, and could not be supported in a barren island.

c THE next island in our course eastward is Gomara, lying under the 28th degree of north latitude, and south-east of Palma. Formerly the island was barren, and the inhabitants barbarous; at present it is well cultivated, producing great abundance of sugar-canes and wine. Heylin makes it 22 leagues in compass, and eight only in length; adding, that only one barbarous custom remains among the natives, which is the having women in common; for though every man marries a certain woman, whom he is obliged to maintain, yet he cheerfully lets her out to his neighbour, in exchange for his wife; and refusing this good-natured action would be reckoned uncivil and selfish: whence it is that the sister's son always is esteemed heir at law, there never being any certainty of the father. Barbot says, that it has a good haven, and a town of the same name, though the island was antiently called Theode. Here the West India Spanish flota stops for wines, fruits, and the other productions of the country; among which the Sanfons reckon the tree that produces the Sanguis Draconis. The whole country is mountainous, but easy enough to travellers, on account of made roads, which, we are told, are exceeding deep and wide <sup>c</sup>.

d WE come now to the famous island of Teneriffe, which, tho' only the second in dignity, Island of Teneriffe may be looked upon as the first of the Canaries in point of extent, wealth, and fertility. Formerly it was called Nivaria, and is supposed to be the island of that name mentioned by Pliny the elder; but this opinion is disputed. Sir Edmund Scorey says, that it derived the appellation Nivaria from the circle or collar of snow that surrounds the peak of Tenda, now called the peak of Teneriffe. This last name, he alleges, was imposed by the inhabitants of Palma island; for Tener, in their language, signifies snow, and Effe a mountain. It lies under 27 deg. 30 min. north latitude. Prevost, indeed, says, that the south-end of the island stands almost in 28 deg. and the northern extremity in 28 deg. 40 min. which makes more than the difference of a degree in the situation. The form is triangular, extending itself into three capes, the nearest being about eighty leagues or more from the coast of Africa. What renders this island so famous in history, is the celebrated peak, of whose supra, & Auct. citat.

<sup>b</sup> Antient History, vol. vii. p. 147. LINSCH. & Auct. citat. ubi supra.

<sup>c</sup> Vide LA CROIX, ubi

(F) There is not a voyager who has been in the Canaries, a geographer that describes them, or a naturalist who gives a philosophical account of the production of these islands, but asserts the existence of the Santo tree, except Le Maire. It is true, that their relations vary in particulars; some describing more than one tree of this genus, others giving a different account of its stature, and the quantity of water obtained from it; but no one, besides the above writer, pretends to question the reality of the fact. Le Maire, indeed, treats the whole as a fiction; yet his own relation is so contradictory, that very little regard is to be paid to a writer, who is a philosopher in nothing besides his incredulity. When this gentleman was in the Canaries, in 1628, he made all possible inquiry into the truth of the facts we have related. In one place he asserts, that all the natives he had talked to assured him it was a mere vulgar error; but soon after he speaks a different language, and relates, that several of the Canarians believed the fact, and assured him that the tree had all the qualities ascribed to it. Now, besides the inconsistency in this account of Le Maire's, it may be objected, that he took the whole of his relation from the natives of Teneriffe; for he acknowledges his never having been at Ferro, or conversed with one of the natives; whereas many of the preceding writers had been eye-witnesses of what they assert; and, in particular, Jackson, whose relation is uniform, sensible, and consistent; which is more than can be said of Le Maire's. Sir Richard Hawkins had likewise seen the Santo tree, tho' he differs in some circumstances from Jackson and Linschoten. Upon the whole, we cannot reasonably reject the accounts of those persons who assert facts from their own knowledge, unless they are absurd, or that we have detected them in falsehoods. The present fact may be embarrassed with some difficulties; but there is no proving its impossibility; nor is there any thing in it supernatural or absurd, tho' Le Maire has been pleased to call it so. However, we shall leave it to the reader to judge for himself, after he has consulted all the above authorities.

We must add, in support of Le Maire's conjecture, that Barbot has some doubts about the truth of the fact, though he pretends to determine nothing. One English compiler there is, we mean Bowen the geographer, who absolutely rejects it, tho' he seems to have consulted but few authorities, and is indeed a servile copier from Le Maire and Barbot.

height so many marvellous stories have been related, and which Scaliger is not ashamed to a call 60 miles, Panicius, who lived in the island, 70, Thevet, 54, Nicolls, an Englishman, who resided some years here, 47, and Varenius, four miles and five furlongs in its perpendicular height. All the other writers, it is probable, compute by the oblique ascent of a person journeying to the summit; and even then their relations seem extravagant. Sir Thomas Herbert affirms, that the top is seen at the distance of 120 miles at sea, provided the weather is clear; but Sir Edmund Scorey says, that, from the base, beginning at the town of Gara Chico, to the very summit, is but two days journey and a half; which in fact is not equal to one day's journey, if we consider that travellers lie by during the heat, and have also to combat with so many steep ascents, that their pace must be exceeding slow. Although the vertex appears sharp, and the exact resemblance of a cone, yet it is flat for the extent of an acre of b ground, in the centre of which is a dreadful volcano, which frequently breaks out into flames, so violent as to shake the whole island with an incredible force. In the year 1704, there happened the most alarming instance of this that had ever been known. The earthquake began the 24th of December, and, in the space of three hours, twenty-nine shocks were felt. After this, they became so violent as to rock all the houses on their foundations, and oblige the inhabitants to abandon them. The consternation became universal, and the people, headed by the bishop, made processions and public prayers in the open fields. On the 31st, a great light was observed on Manja, towards the white mountains. Here the earth opened, and two volcanos were formed, which vomited up such heaps of stones as formed two considerable c mountains; and the combustible matter, which still continued to be thrown up, kindled above fifty fires in the neighbourhood. In this situation things remained till the fifth of January, when the sun was totally obscured by the clouds of smoke and flame, which renewed and augmented the consternation and terror of the people. Before night, the whole country, for three leagues round, was laid in flames by the flowing of liquid fire, with the rapidity of a torrent, into all quarters, the effects of another volcano, which had burst open at least in thirty different gulphs, within the circumference of half a mile, towards Oratavia. What greatly increased the horror of the scene, was the violence of the earthquake, which never once remitted, but shook with its force some houses into ruins, and kept others tottering upon their foundations, while the miserable inhabitants were driven defenceless and dismayed into the open fields, where they every moment expected to be swallowed up by d some new gulph. The noise of the volcano was heard twenty leagues at sea; and it is credibly attested, that the sea shook at that distance with such violence, as alarmed the mariners, who imagined the ship had struck upon a rock, till the continuance of the motion gave them the first intimation of what it really was. A torrent of sulphur, and the melted ore of minerals, rushed forth from this last volcano towards Guimar; the houses and public buildings of this town were thrown down by the violence of the accompanying earthquake. On the second of February, another volcano broke out in the town of Guimar, which swallowed up, and intirely annihilated a large church. Thus, from the 24th of December to the 23d of February, the inhabitants were kept in constant alarms by continued shocks of earthquakes, and by terrible volcanos breaking out in different quarters of the island. The e late unhappy catastrophe at Lisbon renders such accounts more familiar, but not less curious; we have therefore extracted it, as we find it explicitly related by Martiniere.

To return to the peak of Teneriffe, the following relation, which we find in Sprat's History of the Royal Society, may not be unentertaining. It consists of the journal and remarks of some English merchants, who had resolved to examine this prodigious mountain to the very summit. These gentlemen having provided themselves with all the necessaries for such a journey, set out on horseback from Oratavia, a sea-port on the west side of the peak. "After passing over several bare mountains and barren sandy plains, they arrived at the "foot of the peak, where all the ground is rugged, and filled with large stones, that seem "to have tumbled from some higher situation. When they ascended the peak about a mile, f "they were forced to quit their horses, and, tho' the air was mild in the day, yet was it "so sharp and cold after sun-set, that they were under the necessity of keeping great fires "all the night. From thence, that is, from the black rocks, which stand at the distance "of a mile from the bottom, they proceeded to the Sugar-Loaf, or the conical part of the "mountain, travelling in a white sand, extremely disagreeable from the reflection of the sun "upon the eyes. When they mounted the top of the peak, they found a strong wind, and "continual breathing of a hot sulphureous vapour, which scorched their faces, and rendered "respiration difficult; tho' this last effect might possibly be owing to the rarefaction of the "atmosphere in so great a height. The place on which they stood was about a yard wide, "and formed the brink of a volcano called the Devil's Cauldron, which they judged to be a g "musket-shot over, and about forty yards deep, of a conical form, hollow within, and "covered above with small loose stones, mixed with sand and sulphur, from which issued "a hot suffocating steam. They descended about five yards into this gulph; but, finding "their

- a " their feet slipped, they were afraid of venturing further; tho' some travellers, we are told, have gone quite to the bottom. All round the mouth of the volcano, they observed a pure sulphur adhering to the stones, in chrystals like salt. From the top of the peak they could easily discern the islands of Gomara, Palma, Grand-Canaria, and Ferro; tho' this last be above twenty leagues distant; the chanel separating them, tho' more than ten leagues over, appearing about the breadth of an ordinary river: When the sun appeared, the shadow of the mountain seemed to cover not only the islands Teneriffe and Grand Canary, but even the sea to the very horizon, where the summit of the shadow had the appearance of turning up, and casting its disk into the air. Sometimes, especially during the north-west winds, the clouds hang over and wrap themselves about the peak; whence b " the natives certainly prognosticate an approaching storm. On the top are several excellent springs of water;" but the authors probably mean on the tops of the other mountains; for all writers agree that the top or summit of the peak produces none. " The sandy path to the foot of the peak is steep, almost to a perpendicular. Here also is a cave ten yards deep and eight wide, into which they swung down by a rope held by their servants at the mouth, till they came to a bank of snow. This expedient they were forced to use, because, in the center of the bottom of this cave, was a well, the surface of which was sunk about a yard lower than the snow;" but we do not see the necessity or use of this expedient, on account of the well at the bottom, unless it was to prevent their plunging in. " They were of opinion that this well did not rise from a spring, but consisted c " of melted snow, which was gently distilled down the rock. From their observation, the whole height of the mountain, from the base to the summit of the peak, was two leagues and a half;" which agrees partly with Sir Edmund Scorey's relation. " In many of the paths they took, no trees, shrubs, or plants, except pines, met the eye, and a kind of plant resembling broom, which now and then shot up among the white sands. On the other side of the mountain, where they passed the night, they found another plant, the trunk of which was about half a foot thick; the stem shoots out to the height of eight feet, growing in regular squares, and rising from the ground like the tufts of rushes, on the edge of which grow small red berries, containing a poisonous juice, resembling milk, with this extraordinary quality of making the hair drop off the body. It is said that d " this plant is spread over the island; and that the natives have ineffectually attempted to exterminate it. (H)."

SUCH is the account inserted in our Philosophical Transactions, that has been quoted, transcribed, and translated by so many compilers and historians, tho', in our opinion, to very little purpose, as it is scarce intelligible, and, as far as it can be understood, extremely imperfect in all those particulars which ought to gain the attention of a speculative reader. We have quoted it at large, that the reader may see what degree of credit is due to those writers who have praised this as a curious and complete account.

- As it is presumed few persons will remain satisfied with the above relation, we will subjoin some particulars from the truly curious account of Sir Edmund Scorey. This gentleman observes, e " that almost the whole mountain, to that part of it distinguished by the name of the Peak, is beautifully adorned with trees of various kinds, and the tallest perhaps that any country on the globe can produce. Amidst these, little rivulets come tumbling down the rocks, which add to the beauty of the landscape. He observes, that, at the very summit of the peak, and near the bottom of the mountain, the air is insupportably hot; but extremely temperate, if not cold, about the middle of the height. The proper seasons for making this journey are the summer-months; for, in the winter, the torrents of melted snow and rain so swell the rivulets as to render it impracticable. He says likewise, that the best hours for travelling are from midnight to sun-rise. To a spectator on the top of the peak, the sun, when rising, appears scarce half the dimensions it seems to have to a spectator placed on the lower grounds. f " It likewise appears to the eye as forming a fiery circle, like that made by a coal of fire whirled round. Nothing can be more serene, clear, and beautiful, than the morning sky, while the plains below seemed to be fringed with snow, which, in fact, is nothing more than the white clouds, above which you are mounted several furlongs. All the top of the mountain is perfectly barren, owing perhaps to the quantity of vitrified stones and flints vomited out by the volcano, and spread over all this part of the peak. What merits notice is, that veins of brimstone can be traced amidst the congealed snow, as if the two most opposite elements in nature were here combined. If a great stone be thrown into the volcano, it tumbles down with a hollow and dreadful noise like thunder. This is the gulph described by the correspondents of the Royal Society, called by the Spaniards the Devil's Cauldron. g " Sir Edmund Scorey says, that the Guanches looked upon this as the future residence of the wicked, where they received the punishment of their crimes, by being steeped in liquid burning

(H) We have reason to believe this plant to be a species of the Euphorbium.

burning sulphur; while the good men passed into the pleasant valley of Laguna beneath, to add, by their felicity, to the torments of the others; there being no greater punishment to vice than the having blessings in view, of which they are doomed never to participate.

DR. Sprat relates, from a physician who had lived twenty years upon this island, the following ingenious theory, which he founded upon a great number of observations. This gentleman gave it as his opinion, that the island of Teneriffe, being strongly impregnated with sulphur, had formerly taken fire through every quarter, there appearing huge mountains of calcined stones in all parts of the island, especially in the south-west side, which he imagines were vomited up from the bowels of the earth at this general conflagration. He adds, that the greatest quantity of sulphur lying about the center of the island, occasioned the raising of the peak to its present extraordinary height; for these calcined rocks lie for three or four miles round its bottom: That from the peak to the south-west, almost as far as the shore, are still to be seen the chanel's made by the rivers of brimstone and melted ore, that rushed down with such impetuosity as to cover all the adjacent country, and render it ever since perfectly barren and useless: That some of the calcined rocks resemble silver, some iron, and others copper ore: That in the south-west part of the island are high mountains, of a bluish earth, and stones which have a yellow rust on them, like that of copper and vitriol; and that here are several springs strongly impregnated with vitriol. The same naturalist informs us, that, during his residence at Teneriffe, there happened an eruption of a volcano on the island of Palma, which occasioned a violent earthquake in Teneriffe, and terrified the inhabitants with a rolling dreadful noise, strongly resembling distant thunder. Such is the account of the famous peak of Teneriffe given by this gentleman, which he reduces, and with seeming reason, to two miles perpendicular height from the surface of the surrounding ocean.

As to the rest of the island, it is described in the following manner by the accurate Scorey, whose relation surpasses in minuteness all the accounts ever received of Teneriffe.

THE island of Teneriffe is divided in the middle by a ridge of mountains, which have been compared to the roof of a church, the peak forming the spire or steeple in the center. Scorey says, that, if you divide it into twelve parts, ten of these consist of rocks, woody and inaccessible mountains, and vineyards; and yet, from the small remainder of arable ground, he has seen two hundred and fifty thousand Hanacks of wheat, besides immense quantities of rye and barley, produced (1). Nothing can be more delicately rich than the soil, if the Spaniards knew, or would take the trouble of properly cultivating it; for, besides the abundance in which it bears grain, fruits, and roots, it communicates to them a peculiar flavour and elegance, unknown in other countries under the same parallel. The best vineyards are about Buena-vista, Oratavia, Dante, and Tiguestá, which produce two sorts of wine, the Vidonia and Malvesia, or Malmsey. The first is extracted from a long grape, and is a dull heavy wine, greatly inferior to the other, which is drawn from a large round grape, in such quantities as to be exported to all the corners of the world, and every where greatly esteemed. Great store of the finest melons, pomgranates, citrons, figs, oranges, lemons, almonds, dates, honey, wax, and some silk, equal to that of Florence or Naples, are raised here; and the last article might, with some pains and a sufficient number of mulberry-trees, be cultivated to the highest advantage.

On the north side of the island are found abundance of wood and water. The cedar, cypress, and bay-tree, the wild olive, mastick, and savine, grow here spontaneously, as well as palms and pines, which shoot up to a prodigious height. In travelling from Oratavia to Gurachico, you pass through a forest, which perfumes the air at a great distance with its odoriferous flavour; and these sweet woods are so plenty, that of them are made all the wine-casks and common utensils. Besides the tall straight pine, there is another with a spreading top, like an English oak, which the natives call the Immortal Tree, for its durability, whether in the water or open air. This wood is red as Brasil wood, hard as ebony, but less unctuous than the other pine. The tree grows to so extraordinary a size, that the Spaniards confidently assert, that the boards cut out of one tree only covered the church Los Remedios in the city of Laguna, tho' it be eighty feet in length, and half as much in breadth; a figure probably meaning no more than strongly to express the incredible bulk of the Immortal Tree. But the most beautiful and extraordinary production of Teneriffe is the Draco tree, which grows to an immense stature, all the branches clinging and entwining in pairs at the top, like the Mandragora. These branches, Scorey observes, greatly resemble a man's arms in shape and smoothness; from the extremity of which grow leaves two feet a in length, of the exact form of sedges. The Draco wood is of no value, as it is pithy, and applied to no other use but bee-hives. Towards the full-moon, it exudes a gum of the colour of vermillion, which the Spaniards call Sangre de Draco, more astringent and medicinal than the Sanguis Draconis imported from India and other places; but whether since Scorey's time this tree has been cultivated, and this drug raised to an article of commerce, is what we no-where find; nor do the shops distinguish any particular kind of it by the name of Canary Dragon's Blood.

(1) Four Hanacks and a half are equal to one quarter English measure †.

† Scorey, apud Purchas, l. vii. c. 12. sc. 7. 3.

THE language of the Guanches, says the same writer, has a great affinity to that spoke by the Moors of Barbary; and yet we are assured, that it bears no resemblance to the Arabic. It still is preserved in all its purity by the descendants of those Guanches inhabiting the town b of Candelarin, which, in fact, is wholly composed of this people. Belancourt, who conquered this country, asserts, as we have seen, that they were all pagans; notwithstanding which, Scorey assures us, that they acknowledged a supreme Being, whom they worshipped under the different names of Achuburaban, Achubucumar, and Achquaya-Rerax; expressing by these names the attributes of sublime, powerful, and the author and preserver of all things that exist. When they wanted rain, or had seasons otherwise unfavourable, they brought their sheep, lambs, and goats, to some place of worship, imagining, that, by their plaintive bleating, they would move into compassion the mind of the Deity; and, to set them a-bleating, they always separated the young from their dams. We have seen that they were not destitute of certain gross notions of a future state, from their placing the residence c of the wretched in the volcano on the top of the peak; and Scorey further assures us, that they had some idea of the devil, to whom they gave the name of Guayotta, intimating his malignant corrupt disposition; but he never observed that they were inclined to hold any communication with this evil spirit, or to pay him any kind of worship or adoration.

IN civil affairs, they were not without certain laws and regulations. They had kings, whose sovereignty they acknowledged, and to whom they renewed their fealty upon marriage. The right of inheritance was adjusted to the exclusion of bastards; and the number of their laws was definite, and indeed small; but they obeyed them with that respect and veneration, which could not be paid to a multiplicity of ordinances, which always diminishes their weight and authority. The Guanches were sensible of this; and therefore lesser crimes d were left to the provinces of religion and morality. Shame was the only punishment of slight offences, and that irksome feeling which ever accompanies the sense of doing wrong. Their monarchs had no other palaces than those nature had cut out of the rocks, shaped, perhaps, by art, into some degree of convenience. The royal caves are to this day easily distinguished, by the number of apartments for the accommodation of the household.

For a long time, the island of Teneriffe was governed, we are told by Scorey, by one king, who was distinguished by the name of Adexe. In a course of years, the children of the monarch conspiring against him, divided the island among themselves into nine provinces, each governed by one of the brothers. Hence proceeded the civil wars we have mentioned, which prevailed not only here, but in all the other islands, parcelled out in the same manner e into petty royalties.

THEY had an established form of marriage, consisting in asking the consent of the maid or widow's parents, in a certain ceremonious way. This and the woman's were all that law or custom required, previous to consummation; nor were they more scrupulous in repudiating them. To obtain a lawful divorce, nothing more was necessary than the dislike of the parties; but if they happened afterwards to agree, they might come together, with this proviso, that the children of the second union should be rendered illegitimate, and incapable of inheriting; a restriction that made parents more cautious of separating upon every disgust. Kings alone were exempted from this law; for they might repudiate and take back their queens, without prejudice to the younger children; nay, kings were even permitted to espouse their sisters. When a child was born, it was customary immediately to baptize him; and the form was to call in a neighbouring girl, who was to pour water over the infant's head, repeating at the same time some mysterious words: by this act the god-mother became so closely allied to the family, that law prohibited her marrying into it. f

YOUNG men had certain appointed exercises to strengthen and invigorate them; such as throwing the dart, running, leaping, raising great weights, or throwing large stones; feats of strength in which they glory and delight to this day. Virtue, chastity, and the most punctilious honour, with respect to the fair sex, were in so high repute, that it was an inviolable law, never known to be infringed, that all violences and affronts offered to women should be punished with death: and such was the natural virtue and simplicity of these barbarians, g that even the rudest soldiers and fiercest young people obeyed the dictates of their own minds, with more rigour than all the severity of the law could exact.

THE Guanches of Teneriffe, in particular, were well-made, handsome, and robust; nay, a in general, of a gigantic stature. There was, in Scorey's time, the skull of one of them to be seen in the sepulchre of the Guimar kings, which had eighty teeth, and the skeleton of the body measuring fifteen feet; but Scorey does not pretend that he had seen it; and it is probable it was little more than the tradition of the natives, who might have such tales of their ancestors as are common among the vulgar of all countries. We are the more confirmed in this opinion, because a sensible gentleman of the faculty, after residing twenty years in the island, had, with the utmost difficulty, access to the sepulchral caves. This is a favour scarce ever granted, and not attempted without leave, but at the risque of one's life. He obtained permission, and was even conducted to the tombs, in consequence of the esteem of the people, which he had gained by several services he had done for them in the way of his b profession. The following story, which he relates, seems, however, to corroborate the testimony of Scorey. Several gentlemen being one day employed in hunting a rabbit, the little animal run into a cave, and was pursued by one of the company, who, upon entering in a hurry, was terrified with the sight of a corpse of a gigantic stature. His cries alarmed the company; but, before their arrival, recollecting that it was a sepulchral cave of the Guanches, his fears were dissipated. Upon this, he cut off a piece of skin from the breast of the body, which our author had seen, and affirms was softer, smoother, tougher, and more pliable, than the best-prepared kid-skin; which probably was no other than the goat-skins in which they wrapped the embalmed bodies. One anonymous author relates, from the report of the modern Guanches, that, among their ancestors, this employment of embalming c was confined to a certain tribe, and kept an inviolable secret from the vulgar. This tribe composed the priesthood, and never intermingled with the other tribes by marriage. After the conquest of the island, they were destroyed, and with them perished the art of embalming; of the ingredients used in which, tradition has only preserved a few. It is said they mixed goats butter and hogs lard, which they carefully kept in skins for this purpose. These they melted down with a kind of wild lavender, that grows in this island in abundance. Another herb called Lara, of a glutinous and gummy nature, found now only in a few places; the Cyclamen (K); and, lastly, wild sage; both which are produced in great plenty. These herbs, bruised and boiled with the butter, composed an odoriferous mixture. After having made the necessary preparations, the body was opened and embalmed; d and, when cleared of the intestines, washed with a juice extracted from the pine, probably a sort of turpentine; after which it was set to dry in the sun, or before a slow fire. This operation of besmearing and anointing was frequently repeated, until the balm penetrated the most minute vessels, and the muscles became perfectly conspicuous. The body was supposed sufficiently prepared, when it became extremely light; upon which it was wrapped in goats skins in the neatest manner possible, and with such art, that it is affirmed all the veins, arteries, and tendons, nay, even the features, could be distinguished through it, the body undergoing no other change, after being kept for centuries, than a slight discoloration of the skin. From this custom, it might be inferred, that the Guanches, or antient inhabitants of the Canaries, and particularly of the island of Teneriffe, were either a colony of Ethiopians, e or descended originally from the progenitors of that people. But this is a discussion properly belonging to our Antient History, to which we chuse to refer the reader<sup>d</sup>. However, to render this curious article as complete as possible, without trespassing upon the bounds assigned us, we will beg leave to add a few more remarks from the ingenious Sir Edmund Scorey, to whom we have already been so frequently obliged. This gentleman informs us, that the antient Guanches had embalmers publicly appointed for each sex, neither presuming ever to depart from their own province; a circumstance which reflects great honour on the delicacy of that rude people. He says, the composition they used was a mixture of goats butter, the powder of certain plants, and their juices, boiled into a glutinous unguent, with which they mixed an extract from the pine-tree, and certain stones f finely pulverized. The body was rubbed with this for fifteen successive days, and laid, after every unction, before the sun, or, in the winter, before a slow fire, till it became light, stiff, and dry; after which it was wrapped in goat-skin, and deposited in a cave, the relations and friends keeping for this whole time a continual plaintive mourning, that almost reduced them to the condition of the deceased they lamented<sup>e</sup>.

<sup>d</sup> Ant. Hist. vol. vii. p. 147, & seq. note (H).

<sup>e</sup> PURCHAS's Pilgrims, l. ii. c. 12. sect. 3. p. 787.

(K) The Cyclamen is the Sow-bread in botany; a genus of the Pentandria Monogynia class of plants †.

† Vid. Carol. Linn. Botan. Plant. sub voce.

a THE same author relates, that the Guanches inhabiting the south side of the island were of an olive-colour, whilst those on the north side were fair; especially the women, who had long, light, smooth hair. Their dress was a kind of short coat, made of goat or lamb-skin, without skirts or sleeves, and fastened with thongs, which served instead of seams and buttons. This dress, called Tamarco, was the habit commonly worn by both sexes, only the women added, out of modesty, a kind of short petticoat of skins, that fell down below the knee before, and quite down to the ground behind. Some say, that it touched the ground on every side; that sex deeming it immodest to expose even their feet. Such was the garment in which they lived, died, and were buried; at least the common people were so, who could not afford the expence of the dressed skins used by richer persons in b embalming.

A FRUIT called Mezan, of the size of a pea, formed the whole of their physic in all diseases whatsoever, but especially in fluxes and the Tabes dorsalis; to both which they were particularly subject. From this fruit they extracted a kind of honey, which they call Chacarquem, much esteemed in external applications; after which the fruit was pounded and boiled down in water to the consistence of a syrup, which they took internally for the above diseases. In acute disorders they used phlebotomy at the arms, head, and forehead; performing that operation with a flint. It is probable our author here means the jugulars and carotides. What we have here related is, in general, applicable only to the Guanches of the island of Teneriffe, tho' many of the customs might have been common to all the antient c inhabitants of the Canaries.

As the present manners of the natives are a mixture of their own antient customs, and such as have been introduced by their conquerors, we need not give any description of them, but proceed to a review of the principal cities and towns. The island of Teneriffe has three capital ones; viz. St. Christoval de la Laguna, or St. Christopher's of the Lake, Oratavia, and Santa Cruz. The first of these is by many writers stiled the capital of the Canaries, and the seat of the viceroy. One part of the town stands on the declivity of a hill, the other on one side of that beautiful plain, which Sir Edmund Scorey says was cut out by nature, to add to the felicity of the inhabitants of Laguna. The houses are numerous and compact, but the streets, tho' wide and large, unhappily were laid out with very little regard to regularity; however, as they are embellished with some handsome public buildings, Laguna d furnishes a very pleasing prospect from a distance. The most remarkable buildings are two parish-churches, the convents of St. Diego, St. Francis, St. Augustin, and St. Dominico, an hospital, and two nunneries, some of which are pieces of excellent architecture. The houses of persons of condition have large gardens, and orchards of palm, citron, lemon, orange, and other fruit-trees, adjoining to them; and the whole surrounding country abounds with vineyards. But what adds most to the ornament and conveniency of the city, is that fine plain lying near it, about ten miles in circumference, and so fertile, says Scorey, that nature seems to have intended to complete, by the fertility of this place, the beauty of the scene. On every side, this delightful valley is hemmed and defended by mountains and e hills, so covered with wood, that they bear the appearance of an eternal spring; one species of trees putting forth leaves, while others are passed their bloom, stripped of their beauty, and discover in their looks the shrivelling hand of winter. The true Malmsey wine is made in Teneriffe, and the grape reared near Laguna is said to be the best for this purpose of any the world produces. Here is also the wine called by the general name of Canary, and the Verdona, or green wine; but these grow in greater perfection at Oratavia, the town we are going to describe.

ORATAVIA stands on the west side of the island, and being the chief sea-port, and the emporium of trade, the English merchants and consul reside here. Dampier alleges, on the authority of the natives, that this town is larger than Laguna, the capital; and that f it has a great number of convents, but only one parochial church. Notwithstanding the harbour chiefly gives importance to Oratavia, the port is extremely dangerous, when the north-west winds blow, to which it is fully exposed; however, mariners discover it by a high sea, that rolls before the approach of the storm, and take the necessary measures for their security.

THE third town of any consequence is Santa Cruz, situated in a bay on the west side of the island, defended by two forts and several batteries of heavy cannon; which could not prevent the heroic Blake's destroying sixteen Spanish galleons that lay here, in 1657. This attempt was looked upon as the most hardy and intrepid that had been ever executed; it being then a thing unknown to attack a fleet protected by forts and batteries; tho' all the g maritime states have often since given proofs of its being less hazardous than at that time it was imagined by the best sea officers.

To conclude our account of Teneriffe, the Verdona wine produced here is strong-bodied, a but more harsh and sharp than Canary. As it is but in little esteem in Europe, they export it chiefly to the West Indies, where it keeps well for a long time in the hottest climates. Besides Malmsey, Verdona, and the common Canary wine, Teneriffe island so abounds in all kinds of grain, wheat, maize, and barley, that great quantities are shipped off to other countries; nor is it less prolific in quadrupeds and birds of all kinds. In a word, exclusive of some inconveniencies from earthquakes and volcanos, the universe presents not a more delightful spot for contemplation, ease, and all the felicities of quiet life<sup>f</sup>.

Gran Cana-
ria.

EAST south-east, and about ten leagues distant from Teneriffe, stands the island of Gran-Canaria, or Great Canary, between 27 and 28 degrees of north latitude (L). It is twelve leagues in length, and nearly as much in breadth; yet some of our English geographers, b and particularly Salmon, calls it fifty leagues in circumference, tho' upon what authority we know not; probably upon his own, as he has advanced an infinity of other facts we find supported by no good writer, and indeed intirely contradicted, or omitted, by the most genuine and sensible voyagers and travellers. There are writers, and among them Prevost, who call this island the chief of the Canaries, without assigning any other reason than its name, and the residence of a bishop; from which last circumstance we may collect, that either this prelate has palaces in the different islands, or that all the larger ones are distinct sees. The truth we believe is, that tho' the viceroy, the bishop, and all the people of distinction live in Teneriffe, yet the island of Canary is a bishop's see, suffragan to the arch-bishop of Seville in Spain; for, besides this, there is here a court of inquisition, and the c fovereign council of all the Canaries is held here occasionally. Nay more, in Nicolls's time, 'tis certain there was only one bishop of the Canary Islands; and no alteration in this particular is positively mentioned by any author (M). The capital of this island is called Palma, in Latin, Civitas Palmarum, in Spanish, Ciudad das Palmas, a name by which it is specified in all the public acts and particular contracts, or procedures of justice; yet do some authors call it Canary. It stands on the north part of the island, at a small distance from the sea; and is celebrated for its temperate climate, extent, neatness, and other particulars. It is adorned with a magnificent cathedral, several convents, and a number of elegant buildings, which render it little inferior to Laguna; and it is perhaps superior in point of police, all the principal men of wealth and credit acting in the capacity of civil magistrates (N). d

THE country is more level, and as fertile as Teneriffe; yet the soil is light and sandy, covered over by a coat of rich mould, about sixteen inches thick. Every year produces two crops of all kinds of vegetables. except fruits; the one in February, the other in May, and both plentiful. Their flour-bread in this island is especially excellent, both in taste and colour; in which last it rivals snow itself. Sugar-canes are raised in such abundance, that there are no less than twelve sugar-works, each so large as to be mistaken by strangers for little towns; and the abundance of this commodity constitutes the principal wealth of the island, incredible quantities of coarse sugar being yearly exported. Le Maire specifies four convents of different orders; viz. the Franciscan, Dominican, Bernardine, and Cordelier, houses; all of them rich, and well-built. He had frequently been called in quality of a e physician to the Bernardines, and found that all their diseases proceeded from their strict confinement. He was always treated with the highest civility and distinction by these devotees, who seemed to be a polished, sensible, and discreet set of men, without that austerity and moroseness almost inseparable from their profession and retired life. The same author adds, that the French had a consul at Palma, to whose wife he was called, upon finding her distemper too obstinate for the simple practice of the country.

Fuerte Ventura.

THE island of Fuerte, or Fuerte Ventura, stands about 16 leagues north north-east of Canary Island, one end of it lying under the 28th, and the other extending almost to the

<sup>f</sup> SPRAT'S History of the Royal Society, p. 209. LA CROIX, p. 675, & seq. PREVOST, t. iii. l. v. c. 1. PURCHAS'S Pilgrims, l. xii. c. 7. p. 788. DAVITY, t. v. p. 610. SANUT. l. iii. LINSCHOT. c. 97. CADA-MOST. apud Ramus. c. 7.

(L) Some writers, and in particular Davity and La Croix, make the distance between these islands about 14 leagues; but we have fixed upon the authority of Nicolls, who had long been an inhabitant of the Canaries.

(M) Most modern writers are persuaded, that the present Canary Island is the same meant by Ptolemy under that appellation. La Croix and Beckman reason warmly upon this topic; but it would be wasting time to transcribe their superficial opinions.

(N) Le Maire, who had been here in the year 1628, says, that the town of Palma is defended by a citadel erected on a hill, commanding the town and harbour; but neither regularly fortified, well-mounted with cannon, or sufficiently garisoned. It stands a mile and a half from the harbour; and how at that distance it should command it, is what we do not easily apprehend. In the town he reckons no less than 12,000 inhabitants, whose courage, he says, will supply the weakness of its walls; tho' the truth is, they have, for many years, had no opportunity of proving this extraordinary valour. It must, however, be very populous, considering its small extent.

- a 29th, degree of north latitude, being about fifty miles in length, and variable in breadth; in some parts ten leagues, in others no more than as many miles. The soil is, in general, fertile in corn, roots, and fruits, and beautifully diversified in hills and vallies, well-watered, and supplied with a variety of timber. This island produces, besides the other fruits common to the Canaries, a prodigious abundance of dates, mastick, olives, &c. with orchel for dyeing, and a species of fig-tree, that yields a medicinal balm as white as milk; but the virtues of it we are wholly unacquainted with in Europe, as we are likewise of the name. An incredible quantity of goat-milk cheese is made in Fuerte Ventura, as may be easily conceived from that island breeding upwards of 50,000 kids every year. Their flesh is fat, better coloured, and sweeter, than in any other country; each of them weighing
- b between 40 and 50 pounds. Dapper says, that here are three considerable sea-port towns; Langla, Tarafato, and Pozzo Negro, with two good roads besides for shipping, where they may ride secure against all storms. We find in Herbert, but in no other author, that this island was taken, in 1596, by the English; but has, since that time, been better fortified. On the north coast of Fuerte Ventura, about a mile further in the sea, it is that the little island of Gratiosa stands; with a particular account of which it would be unnecessary to trouble the reader (O).

- THE last island of the Canaries we shall describe is Lancerota, or Lanzerota, formerly Lancerota. Centuria, as we find it in all the antient geographers. It lies under 29 degrees 30 min. north latitude, and 12 degrees 31 minutes west longitude from London. In length it is
- c thirteen leagues from north to south, nine in breadth, and about forty in compass, taking in the bays and creeks (P). 'Tis parted by a ridge of mountains, which afford nothing but pasture for cattle, though the vallies are fruitful, but sandy and thin in the soil. It abounds in grain, fruits, horned cattle, hares, camels, and asses. In Nicolls's days, it was the property of Don Augustin de Herrera; but ships crews had an appeal, in all judicial cases, to the viceroy of the Canaries. One great branch of the trade of Lancerota consists in dried goats flesh, which the inhabitants sell in great quantities to the neighbouring islands, under the name of Tuffineta. In Purchas, there is a curious account of a voyage made to the West Indies by the earl of Cumberland in 1596; in which he made a descent on this island. When
- d he came with his fleet into the road south-east of the island, he received intelligence of a very rich nobleman, who commanded this and the neighbouring island of Fuerte Ventura; upon which he landed 500 men, under the command of Sir John Berkeley, who pursued the natives, but without being able to come up with them. Advancing to the town, they found it deserted, and every thing of value removed, and even the castle, which was strongly built, and fortified with stone-walls and cannon, evacuated by the governor and garrison. In the journal it is said there were here a great number of brass guns, besides heaps of large stones, properly disposed on the walls, to tumble down on the assailants; and the walls were so high, that it was almost impossible to attempt scaling them: in a word, twenty men might have defended it against an army not fully provided with battering cannon. However, Camden
- e differs from this account, and says, that the earl was forced to relinquish his design of mastering the fort, through the mortality which prevailed among his troops. Purchas's account adds, that this town, of which we are not told the name, contained above one hundred houses, all built of rough stone, generally of one story high, with flat roofs. They were all covered with canes laid across the rafters, and plaistered with mud, which the sun had hardened to the firmness of stone. It had but one mean old church, with an altar in the east end, but without chancel, vestry, or any separate apartment for ornament or convenience. It even had no benches or seats, except large stones laid along the walls, and the doors supplied the place of windows. The prettiest and most convenient building was a convent, possessed of a fine garden and pond of clear water, well-stocked with fish. Although the natives were so extremely swift, that Sir John Berkeley was forced to desist from the pursuit,
- f Layfield, who accompanied him, observed their complexion was dark, and their stature more than commonly tall and robust, with other circumstances of resemblance to the Guanches of Teneriffe. Their arms were pikes and stones, which they used with extraordinary dexterity. Whenever the English fired upon them, they instantly fell flat on their faces, and, the discharge of the musquetry being over, applied themselves vigorously to their pikes and stones, with which they wounded a great number of the enemy.

To these seven great islands may be added the small ones of St. Clair, Gratiosa, Rocca, and Alegranza, situated at the north-east end of Lancerota; but they have nothing so peculiar

(O) Notwithstanding the authority of Nicolls, we are inclined to believe that this is the island Lobos, as we find in the best charts; for Gratiosa stands about a league north-east of Lancerota in D'Anville and all the Dutch maps.

(P) This is the account of the authors the reader will see cited at the close of our description; yet Beckman, a judicious writer, calls it but nine leagues long, and about six leagues broad *.

* Vide Voy. à Borneo, p. 4.

as to merit a description. We shall therefore close these observations on the Canaries with a remarking, that the natives of these islands enjoy a clear, serene, temperate air; for, tho' they lie in a warm climate, they are so constantly refreshed with breezes from the sea, that the noon-day heats are very tolerable, and the mornings and evenings inexpressibly pleasant. They never feel pinching colds or scorching heats, nor do the poorest people know the want of cloathing, firing, fruits, or wine. In a word, if fields covered with the finest and richest verdure, hills with a variety of woods and fruits, great abundance of all the necessaries and conveniencies of living, and, in short, a scene the most rural, simple, and elegant, can render people happy, the inhabitants of the Canaries cannot fail of meriting the name given to them by the antients of Fortunate.

Madeira.

We come, in the last place, to give the best account we are able of the islands of Madeira <sup>b</sup> and Porto Santo, from the lame and defective materials furnished us from voyagers and geographers. It is remarkable, that most writers call both these islands by the common name of Madeiras, a word we find commonly used for Madeira in England and Spain; however, as there is certainly but one island of this name, and Porto Santo was always inhabited by a different people, there is no doubt but the noun ought to be singular. This, indeed, is a matter of little consequence, while we have some room to lament the contradiction among writers concerning the extent of this island, the quality of the soil and produce, the disposition of the people, their religion, manners, and other important particulars. Voyagers have only touched upon the coasts, without ever penetrating to the heart of the country, of which they have spoken only by conjecture, and from analogy.

SOME imagine that it was known to the antients by the names of Juno and Antetala; but it is probable the Portuguese were the first discoverers, unless there be truth in the following relation of Ovington's. This gentleman says, that tho' the discovery is attributed by all Europeans to the Portuguese, yet there is a tradition among the natives, which gives the whole honour to the English. They affirm, that an English gentleman, who had married a lady of immense fortune, embarked at Bristol, in the year 1342, for France, and was driven by a storm to the island of Madeira, so called afterwards by the Spaniards, on account of the incredible quantity of trees and prodigious forests it produced. Here he landed, and finding it uninhabited, he fell into a melancholy and despondency, which soon put an end to his life; but the sailors ventured again to sea, and happily arrived on the coast of Barbary. <sup>d</sup> There they met with a Portuguese squadron, to whom they related their adventure, and promised to conduct the admiral to the island they had quitted. Immediately notice was sent to the court of Lisbon, and the proposal appeared so advantageous, that instructions were given to an admiral, with whose name we are unacquainted, to go in search of the island; in which he succeeded, and, in the space of a few years, rendered it one of the most delightful spots in the universe (Q). However, the most probable and best attested account is, that the Portuguese did not become acquainted with Madeira before the year 1431, when Don Henry first sent a colony thither, under the conduct of Tristan Tefora and Gonzales, or Gonzalvo Zarco, who were nominated governors alternately, or, as others affirm, of different parts of the island. Upon this partition of power, it was divided into two provinces, <sup>c</sup> Machico and Funchal; the new colony immediately set to work in clearing the ground, and, for this purpose, set fire to the forests, which burnt with such violence, that the governor and people were forced to seek protection from the flames in the sea, in which they had almost perished, before they were taken up by a ship. So abundant was the fuel, and fierce the flames, that this fire continued, we are told, for near seven years; in consequence of which the soil was so enriched by the wood ashes, that, for a long time, it produced one hundred-fold; tho', we are told, this increase is diminished to twenty-five times the quantity of grain sown, or sugar-canes planted (R). At first the colony consisted of no more than eight

(Q) Nicolls likewise relates this story, positively affirming, that the island was discovered accidentally by an English gentleman, called Mucham, or Markham. It was, for a number of years, imagined that the true Madeira, upon which this gentleman had been cast, was situated between the island of Palma, one of the Canaries, and the island now called Madeira. What, however, greatly diminishes the authority of this whole story is, that no vestige of such person or accident appears in any English historian; and that Hackluyt borrows his whole relation from Galvano. Besides, if the Portuguese were made acquainted with this island so early as 1342, it is surprising they should have neglected profiting by the discovery till the year 1431, or for almost the space of a century; at which time all authors agree the first settlement was made.

(R) Atkins and Ovington both affirm, upon the testimony of the Spaniards and natives, that the ashes, and their salts, occasioned, for a while, an amazing fertility, particularly in sugar; but that a worm, which had crept in, to the destruction of the cane, obliged the Spaniards to convert their sugar-plantations into vintages, which proved equally advantageous, from the excellency of the grape.

The Malmsey wine made here is, according to them, an admirable cordial; and the best vintages in this kind belong to the Jesuits of Funchal. They gather their vintages in September and October, making every year no less than 20,000 pipes. The same authors affirm, that Madeira produces only two kinds of grapes, the one brown, the other of a reddish colour; and from these are made two sorts of wine, one of which is called Tinto, from a eight hundred souls; now, if we may credit Atkins, the island of Madeira can raise eighteen thousand able-bodied men; nor were they much inferior in strength in the year 1640, when, by that surprising revolution, Portugal threw off the Spanish yoke.

THIS island, Barbot is of opinion, is the Carne of the antients, lying in 32 deg. of north latitude, and 17 of west longitude from London, seventy leagues north-west, or, according to some authors, north-east of Teneriffe, and about an equal distance from Sallee in the kingdom of Fez.

b AUTHORS are generally divided about the extent of Madeira. Fryer affirms, that it is the largest island in the Atlantic Ocean; but we have reason to believe, that Teneriffe may dispute this point with it. Most of the very modern geographers call it 140 leagues in circuit; but Cadamoſto, who seems to be nearer the truth, says it is no more than 130 miles; while other voyagers reduce it to forty leagues. The climate is more temperate than the Canaries, and the soil more fertile in wine, sugar, and fruits, but less so in corn, tho' infinitely better watered with springs and rivers, the number of which is infinite. As to cattle, birds, plants, and trees, they are nearly similar; each produces the Sanguis Draconis, mastick, and other gums. The climate is indeed enchanting; for here is a perpetual spring, and flowers, blossoms, and fruit of various kinds, spring forth every month in the year, all in such perfection as cannot be equalled in any other country; even onions, that strongly pungent plant, are here so mild and sweet, that they are eat raw like apples, and indeed preferred to them. Lemons grow to the size of pumpkins, and oranges are produced spontaneously of all sorts and dimensions; besides all the European fruits, peaches, nectarins, melons, apricots, pears, apples, with a variety of others. In Madeira are made the finest sweetmeats in the world, all kinds of fruits being here candied in the most exquisite perfection. The inhabitants excel particularly in making citron and orange sweetmeats, marmalade, and perfumed pastes, preferable to the Italian, whatever fashion and caprice may judge.

c IN the Madeiras, sugar-works were first erected in the west, of which it had an incredible number; and from thence they were removed to America; soon after which the Portuguese, finding the demand for their sugars sink, converted their cane-plantations into vineyards; which appears to be a better reason for this measure than the one we have mentioned from Ovington, of the poverty of the soil. The exports of wines, and the profits on them, are immense, and produce a handsome revenue to the crown of Portugal. These wines are of four different kinds, different both in taste, colour, and strength. The first is of the colour of Champagne, in a small quantity, and but little valued; the second is called Malmsey, and is rich and strong; the third is a wine resembling Alicant, or Tent, and never drank unmixed; and the fourth what is commonly drank in England, under the name of Madeira, of a pale red, not unlike fine small beer, but pleasant and wholesome. Of this last an amazing quantity is consumed in Great Britain and Ireland; but the greatest part of the Madeira wine is sent to the West Indies. One remarkable quality is observed in this wine, that it is greatly improved and refined by the heat of the sun, if the bung be taken off the cask; which is the reason why we drink it in less perfection than in the East and West Indies.

d FUNCHAL is the capital of Madeira, situated on the south part of the island, with an indifferent harbour before it for shipping, fortified by a citadel, and furnished with stone-walls, besides other works which command the road. This town is computed to be a mile in length, and three quarters of a mile in breadth, populous, regular, and decorated with several fine buildings, a variety of churches, convents, chapels, and the governor's palace. Of all others, the Jesuits church merits particular notice, for its dimensions, elegance, and wealth; in which particulars it is excelled by few religious houses in Europe. The cieling is finely painted and gilded, the altar richly adorned, the walls finely designed, and the whole plan equally beautiful and magnificent. Ovington had seen it to great advantage, when the festival of St. Ignatius was celebrated, and high mass performed. The music, he observes, was fine, the ornaments striking, and the illuminations formed a most magnificent and delightful spectacle. Near this stands a large hospital for venereal patients, a disease so common in this country, that hardly any person escapes it; but the hospital is intended only for the conveniency of the poor. Ovington had seen many patients, who were hideous spectacles and shocking objects of compassion; but none, except one poor from its high colour. This, they say, is, in the opinion of some persons, actually coloured by certain ingredients, with which they fine it; but this the inhabitants constantly deny; and we shall see in the text four several distinct kinds of Madeira wine. Ovington adds, that so far has Madeira degenerated from its wonted fertility, that some years are so barren as to endanger a famine, the inhabitants being forced to rely for bread on the supplies brought by the shipping. This was the case in the year 1689, when he was on the island *. Captain Uring goes further, and affirms, that it seldom produces more grain than supplies the people for three months †.

* Atkins, p. 23.† Ovington, p. 10. Uring's Voy. p. 10.

woman, who gave any signs of repentance and contrition, the rest being all of a stubborn, a fierce, and savage disposition, incapable of being moved, or, if they were, too proud to acknowledge it. When Funchal, or Fonchal, as Ovington calls it, was fortified, it would seem the engineer had nothing in view besides rendering it strong on the sea-side; for there all the works, except a single wall, are directed. This was certainly a great oversight, as there are several bays, not far distant from the land-side, where an enemy might safely disembark, and march to the very walls, without opposition. The Portuguese, though numerous, do not constitute the bulk of the inhabitants; the English and French Roman catholics, who live in the Portuguese manner, are justly supposed to exceed the others in number and wealth. Besides these, there is an infinity of mulatto and negro freemen, who are treated with more respect than the most considerable English protestant merchants, who b are, as we shall have occasion to relate, hardly and impolitically dealt with, from bigotted and ignorant superstition. The streets of Funchal are drawn by a line, all the houses neat, and the windows lashed with lath-work, but with openings wide enough for those within to see and be seen. Through these windows many amorous dialogues are held between virgins and their gallants, in a species of dumb language, unintelligible to all besides the votaries of the little god of love. In this method of communicating the sentiments of lovers by the fingers, the Spaniards and Portuguese of Madeira are particularly expert. Even in this religiously bigotted country, churches are made the rendezvous of persons inspired with the tender passion, of men of business, and of those who are either immersed in pleasure, or strongly attached to interest. After divine service, the house of God is converted into an exchange, or prostituted c to the purposes of lust and profligacy; for here all sorts of assignations are made; yet can nothing exceed the decency and gravity of their exterior deportment. The women, who have no domestic chapels, never attend divine service but on Sundays and holidays; and if there be several females in a family, they walk in pairs before the mother, their faces covered with a long veil, but their necks and shoulders exposed, as if they invited the notice of their gallants. On the one side walks an old man, armed with a sword, dagger, and chaplet, or long string of beads, intimating thereby his being the guardian of virgin honour; however, the young gentlemen are not deterred by this formidable escorte from approaching, ogling, and expressing their passion in a manner very witty and ingenious.

ALL the vices, and particularly lust and incontinence, reign in an absolute manner in d Madeira over all conditions of men; and the example of the males has encouraged the females to satisfy their desires in a very impure and lascivious way. The women never lose an opportunity of gratifying their passions, and especially with strangers, without regard to his rank. Ovington attributes the prevalence of this evil to that extraordinary manner they have of marrying their children, without permitting them to see each other before, all matches being made here with an intire disregard to every other purpose, but interest. He relates, that, when he was at Madeira, a marriage was on the point of being concluded between two persons of fashion, who had never set eyes on each other, and both parties were come to the place appointed for the celebration of their nuptials, before they had even an opportunity of expressing their inclinations. However, an accident led the bridegroom to e a room separated by a thin partition from that in which his mistress and another young lady entertained each other. Through a chink he had a full view of them, and their conversation easily distinguished his intended bride; but the other young lady pleasing his inclinations better, he broke off the match, and entailed a perpetual quarrel by the affront between the two families. As parents make up all family-connections without ever consulting their children, it is highly probable that this may be one reason for the looseness of unmarried women. The old folks regard nothing besides the birth, quality, fortune, and religion, of the parties; all alliances with Jews, infidels, and protestants, being rigidly prohibited; but love is too obstinate a passion to be bent to the purposes of avarice and pride. The birth, indeed, of the woman is not so much regarded; but it is deemed infamous to marry a f husband of a different religion; and this severe restriction extends to all the English, with this difference, however, that, upon embracing the popish religion, they are looked upon as worthy; whereas no change of principles can wash off the stain of Judaism and infidelity. Yet there have been instances, where the power of wealth has overcome this objection, and set casuists upon explaining away that shame which would ever be attached to persons less rich and considerable. Ovington declares, that parents pay no regard to the chastity of the young persons whom they intend to connect by marriage; sobriety of morals and continency are, especially in a husband, the worst of all recommendations to the favour of a lady. He relates a pleasant instance of this, which happened during his residence on the island. A widow of fortune at Funchal had proposed a match between her daughter and a young gentleman g of a neighbouring family, and matters were pretty far advanced; but the old lady hearing, that the intended bridegroom had ever enjoyed perfect health, that he was never infected with the venereal disease, and that he always avoided all communication with loose a loose women, immediately broke off the treaty ; affirming, that the gentleman's conduct was the result of some constitutional defect, and not of a prudence scarce compatible with his time of life.

b FUNCHAL, we observed, is the residence of the governor ; it is likewise so of a bishop, and court of inquisition. It contains, says Atkins, six parishes, a number of chapels, six monasteries, three male and as many female ; but here the religious are not so straitly laced as at Lisbon ; though the people are, if possible, more oppressed by the inquisition, the most diabolical of all tribunals. They here are permitted to visit, and to be visited by, strangers, from whom they buy a variety of toys and conveniencies, by means of those heavy taxes laid on the consciences of the people. At present, the bishop of Madeira is suffragan to the see of Lisbon ; but formerly Funchal was the residence of the archbishop of the East Indies <sup>s</sup>. But we shall defer a further account of the clergy, till we come to speak of some general customs.

BESIDES Funchal, the metropolis, there are several other considerable towns in Madeira, viz. Moncerito, Santa Cruz, and Manchico, which some writers affirm to be the same with Santa Cruz, and so called from a church of that name dedicated to the Holy Cross. In the whole island are no less than thirty-six parishes, each of them having their proper churches ; and, besides the religious houses at Funchal, there are dispersed over the island five monasteries, eighty-two hermitages, together with a great number of fine seats and castles.

c As to the general manner of the natives, it is grave, sober, and temperate, but haughty and ostentatious. Even the richest Portuguese lay themselves under severe restrictions of sobriety, which they hardly ever break through ; and drunkenness is a vice intirely unknown among the poorer sort. During the vintage, bread and dried raisins are the whole sustenance of the labourer, together with a little wine diluted with water ; and, without this temperance, it would be impossible for them to escape fevers in hot weather : but long use and custom have now rendered their sobriety constitutional. It is certain, that the excesses of venery, into which they launch, render their moderation in drinking the more necessary, and co-operates with the climate to keep the inhabitants of Madeira the most decent people of Africa in this particular. It is true, that servants, provided with bottles in their hands, always attend the tables of the rich ; but they pretend so exactly to judge of the sobriety of their d masters, that they must be repeatedly desired to fill a glass before they present it. So far do the Portuguese carry their affectation, that none of them are ever seen to make water in public, not for the sake of decency, but to avoid the scandalous imputation of drunkenness. Nothing can be more absurd and ridiculous than the important and proud carriage of the meanest slave, equipped with his sword and poniard, and walking with the gravity and stiffness of a person attending a solemn procession. The very servants employed at table, or in the most servile occupation, never lay aside that long bar of cold iron, with which their thighs are decorated ; as if they would compensate, by this mark of vain distinction, the real oppression and slavery under which they groan. Perhaps it is to this custom we may attribute the frequency of murder in Madeira. This horrid crime of duelling is become a e badge of honour here ; for, to gain the least token of a brave man, it is indispensably necessary that you have dipt your hands in the blood of your fellow-creature. What, indeed, confirms the Portuguese in this barbarous practice, is the protection afforded by the church to criminals ; a detestable privilege, that reflects disgrace on the whole body of their clergy, and intimates their doctrine to be inconsistent with the laws of justice and humanity. Here the smallest chapel, and taking refuge in a consecrated place, will skreen the most notorious criminal from the law ; and these are so numerous all over the island, that no one need ever undergo the punishment which law, reason, and the good of society, require should be inflicted on murderers. Nay, we are told, that touching the altar, the corner of a church, or any thing that has been consecrated, will sufficiently protect a man in the practice f of the worst of crimes ; yet are the clergy no less strenuous in defence of this prerogative, than if the fundamental principle of their faith, the good of the church, and the interests of religion, depended upon it. The most rigorous punishment, therefore, of murder is banishment or imprisonment ; both which the parties may buy off by presents to the clergy, who enjoy a sort of despotic power, which they have acquired in consequence of their number, wealth, and influence, over the minds of the ignorant people. It is amazing that so large a body of idle clergy can be maintained in such affluence by so small a number of laborious laics ; but so it is, the poverty of the latter exactly tallies with the riches of the former ; and as wealth ever implies power, the clergy have engrossed almost the whole prerogative of the island, the governor himself being little more than a cypher. The Jesuits hold the g first rank in the church, having acquired a high degree of reputation from the facility with which they grant absolution to penitents, and from an external severity of manners, and an appearance of superior sanctity; perhaps, we may add, from their superior cunning, sagacity, learning, and attachment to their common interest (S). Hence it is, that they carefully conceal from the public the slightest misdemeanour of any of their fraternity, and assume to themselves the sole right of punishing the crimes of their brethren, even though they should be of the most pernicious consequence to the state and to society. Should any of them be accused, they vigorously defend his cause, conceal his fault, or explain it away by a species of religious casuistry, in which they excel all the rest of mankind: and if they happen to be interrogated, why they should screen a criminal? they answer, that mercy is one of the noblest attributes of the Almighty.

<sup>s</sup> Voy. de WYBOUS VAN WARWICK, vol. ii. p. 500.

THE inhabitants of Madeira always bury their catholic dead in their churches and consecrated grounds. The corpse is dressed out with great magnificence, but seldom inclosed in a coffin; on the contrary, they mix lime with the dust, the sooner to consume it; so different are their manners in this particular from those of the Guanches in the neighbouring islands. This mixture of burnt lime, and the warmth of the climate, have so sudden an effect, that we are told a grave may be opened in the space of fifteen days, by which time the body is wholly reduced to dust.

As the inquisition is violently set against all heretics, the bodies of such are forbid all Christian burial, and regarded as the carcases of brutes. Even the most considerable English protestant merchants are treated with the most ignominious contempt, and forced to throw their dead bodies, as if they were on ship-board, into the sea, unless they pay an extravagant price to the clergy for the liberty of breaking ground. Ovington relates a very barbarous instance of this, of which he was an eye-witness. An English merchant dying, all the other merchants of the same nation, willing to inter the body decently, and yet to avoid the rigorous impositions of the inquisition, determined to have it carried in the night over the rocks into the mountains: however, their design was discovered by that jealous tribunal, and they were watched to the place of interment. Scarce had the corpse been laid in the dust, when they were surrounded by the corregidors and officers of justice, assisted by a large body of armed men, who immediately dug up the body, exposed it to public insults, and then threw it into the sea, with all the possible marks of infamy and disgrace. Hence it is, that however pleasant and delightful the island of Madeira may, in other respects, be thought, yet the oppression of this damnable inquisition renders it no very desirable residence for such as refuse to resign their consciences and understandings to the arbitrary directions of the Jesuits. The volcanos of the Canary Islands are not more terrible to the natives, than the clergy of Madeira, armed with the authority of the inquisition, to the protestants who live under their jurisdiction. It is certain, that English merchants meet with better quarter among Turks and pagans, than where the Roman catholic clergy have the least authority in their hands; and it is remarkable, that the further these zealots are removed from the head of their church, the more despotic, cruel, and bigotted, they become. In Rome, and all the great towns of Italy, protestants converse familiarly, nay, enter into intimate friendship, with the popish clergy; but when the Jesuits find themselves remote from the seat of government, and in a manner out of the eye of the world, there their authority, their oppression, and tyranny, are altogether insupportable.

THE following relation from Ovington merits the reader's perusal. While he was at Madeira, some English sailors, who spoke the Portuguese, having been well received at the Jesuits college, took it into their heads to become converts to their religion, and desired to be instructed in the Roman catholic faith; a request that was cheerfully granted by the Jesuits. The captain of the ship preparing to pursue his voyage to India, ordered a muster of the men, and, upon missing these proselytes, made enquiry after them. It was soon found that they were protected in the Jesuits college; nor were all his petitions, and the remonstrances of the English consul, sufficient to get them returned. The captain resolved then to supply their place by stratagem, and to seize upon the first stragglers among the natives he could meet with. When he was just ready to weigh, he fitted out his pinnace with a number of armed men, to seize upon the first persons they saw, and convey them on board. The pinnace had not cruized long, before two reverend fathers going by water to Funchal presented themselves, and were, to their great surprize, made prisoners by the English

(S) Ovington says, indeed, that he had conversed with several of this order, but never met with above three who were scholars, or so much as understood Latin *; and this, perhaps, is more than he could have picked out of any other society of religious in the island.

The writings of the Jesuits, even in the most distant, barbarous, and ignorant countries, shew them to be, perhaps, the most universally learned body of men in the world.

* Ovington, p. 23.

- a sailors. When they came on board the ship, they were made acquainted with the reasons for this proceeding, and that they must bid farewell to their delicious residence at Madeira, and prepare for a voyage to India, in case they could not prevail on their brethren to restore the fugitive sailors. They desired permission to write to the governor, which they submitted to the inspection of the captain, and filled with prayers and the most passionate instances, that they might be redeemed at any price. At the same time the captain wrote to the English consul, in justification of his conduct. No sooner were these letters arrived, than the people, no less enraged than the clergy, ran about the town, crying out vengeance against all the English, in case the fathers were not immediately set at liberty; insomuch that the merchants residing on the island began to tremble for the consequences of this uncommon adventure.
- b After trying, without effect, all possible means to assuage the populace, who flew about the streets in a kind of phrenzy, they resolved to go on board, and endeavour to prevail on the captain to set the Jesuits at liberty. In case he proved obstinate, they carried with them their money and most valuable effects, resolving never to return to the island, rather than hazard the consequences of the popular rage, if they failed in their design. The captain, however, who was both a man of sense and spirit, perceiving the danger the merchants were in, the prejudice it would be to the national trade to incur the resentment of the islanders, the little service these reverend fathers would be in quality of sailors, and, lastly, the great difference there was between the case of fugitive sailors, who voluntarily deserted the ship and their religion, and two clergymen imprisoned without cause, and forced against their inclination into a service for which they were altogether unfit, determined at length to release them; which
- c he did, to the general satisfaction of all the islanders, and the English merchants. This relation shews how strongly bent on making proselytes the Jesuits are, how tenacious of their rights, and how extensive their influence over a people, who equally dread and respect them.

- BEFORE we quit the island of Madeira, the reader will probably be pleased to see the oldest account of its discovery, as related by Alcaforado, a Spanish writer, who flourished but a few years after the colony was first settled here. This author likewise supposes, that an English gentleman had given the first intimation of such an island to the Portuguese, then at war with the powers in Barbary; and that, upon report of the sailors, it was that the infant Don Henry fitted out a large ship, under the command of Gonsalvo Zarco, who was to attempt a farther discovery, agreeable to the directions of the English. In consequence of the orders received from Don Henry, Zarco set sail for Puerto Santo, in which the Portuguese had left some men, upon their having fallen in with it about two years before; that is, in the year 1419. On his arrival here, he was informed by the little colony, that when they went a fishing a few leagues from shore, they always espied to the south-west a thick cloud, impenetrably dark, raised from the sea to the heavens, and defended by terrible storms, which, however, never dispelled or diminished it. As navigation was at this time in its infancy, and the true figure of the globe but little known, this strange account of the Portuguese at Puerto Santo greatly dismayed and terrified the sailors of Zarco: but he remained
- d firm in his resolution to execute the orders of his prince, and extend the honour and power of his country. He judged, that this cloud was, in fact, a certain sign of the very land he sought after. However, he resolved to remain at Puerto Santo till the storm ceased, which he imagined would occasion some alteration, and perhaps fully explain the phenomenon: but the moon changed, and the cloud remained the same; a circumstance that greatly augmented the fears of the sailors, and persuaded them that it was a defence placed by the Almighty against the curiosity and avarice of mankind, beyond which but to attempt penetrating would be attended with certain destruction. Zarco, however, still continued in his old sentiments; affirming, that this was probably a country so covered with thick woods, as to exclude the sun's heat, and of consequence so moist as to send forth constant exhalations,
- e which, collected into a cloud, occasioned that extraordinary darkness. Fully assured of the truth of this reasoning, he set sail directly towards the object of their fears, in spite of all the endeavours of his crew, by menaces and supplications, to prevent him. As he approached, his men became more ungovernable and clamorous; but the resolution and undaunted firmness of Zarco overcame all difficulties, and even inspired his men with courage. At length they began to perceive something of a darker colour through the cloud; but the distance was too great for them to distinguish what it was, though some of the sailors affirmed that they saw prodigious giants, which soon proved to be the sharp-pointed rocks projecting into the sea. Before night they came so near as to see plainly that all their fears arose from an extremely woody and mountainous country, which they had mistaken for a thick cloud; on which
- f the joy of the sailors was no less turbulent than their fears had been but a few hours before. The first point of land they fairly discovered was called St. Laurence Point by Zarco; after doubling which, he had a fine view to the south of a country clothed with the most beautiful verdure. He now sent a boat to examine the coast; and the first bay she touched was the same, says Alcaforado, that was mentioned by the English, as appeared by the monument of a Masbam, or Markham, with an inscription, which they found here. Immediately the boat returned with the joyful tidings to Zarco, who then went himself on shore, and took possession of it in the name of Don Henry and King John of Portugal, on the 8th of July 1421. Detaching a party to examine the interior parts of the country, they advanced so far as to see the ocean on the opposite side, whence it was concluded to be an island, though it was before believed to be a part of the continent. This, however, not satisfying Zarco, he erected a cross on a high ground near the shore, and coasted quite round till he arrived again at the same place; after which he went in search of some ground less woody than the rest of the country, upon which to lay the foundation of an establishment. At last he arrived at the plain in which Funchal now stands, which, says our author, takes its name from the prodigious quantity of fennel growing upon it in Zarco's time. It is said in this account, that not a vestige of a human creature, besides the English monument, was seen, though the country seemed to abound in fowls and quadrupeds of different kinds. After making all the necessary observations, Zarco set sail for Europe, and arrived at Lisbon the following year. We must observe, however, that this relation of Alcaforado's has been greatly suspected by critics to be a work of much later date than that author, or at least of being strangely interpolated and mangled, which, they affirm, is apparent from a number of circumstances. In our opinion, the most objectionable circumstance is the date of this discovery; for all other writers agree, that a colony was not settled here till about twenty years after. But we have spent so much time on this island, that we believe it necessary to leave these speculations to the minds of readers, who may have more leisure and inclination to enter upon them, while we conclude our account of the African islands with a short description of St. Borondon, and Puerto, or Porto Santo<sup>h</sup>.
- g same,

*Marvellous island of St.
Borondon.*

SOME writers, and particularly Linschoten, in their description of the Canary Islands, mention, as something supernatural, a certain island, which they call St. Borondon, or Porondon, about an hundred leagues from Ferro, probably west, though no writer has pretended to lay down its exact position. Here, it is affirmed, several ships have touched by accident, and all agree in their relations of the state of the inhabitants and island. They affirm, that it is beautifully clothed with a great variety of wood, chiefly fruit-trees; that the vallies are in a perpetual state of verdure, and eternally decked with flowers, grass, and plants, the spontaneous productions of the earth, or with corn and pulse, cultivated with great care by the inhabitants; that the soil is so prolific, as to raise large quantities of corn for exportation; and that the ships, that call here, never fail of refreshments of every kind. They moreover add, that it is peopled by Christians, who have a language of their own, apparently combined of a variety of modern languages; for, say they, whoever understands the European tongues, may make shift to hold conversation with this people. It is remarkable, that no ships, expressly sent upon this discovery, were ever fortunate enough to fall in with the island of St. Borondon, though the Spaniards have made several attempts from the Canaries. Hence it has been called the Marvellous Island; and hence, indeed, we may conclude, that either it exists wholly in imagination, or, at least, that it is surrounded with such currents as insensibly carry ships out of their course, and prevent their meeting with it. Some writers are bold enough to affirm, that it actually disappears upon certain occasions, and shifts its position; while others, with more appearance of truth, allege, that it is frequently overcast with thick and impenetrable clouds, which occasion the disappointment of all the adventurers who have gone on this expedition. But these are facts, the truth of which we will leave the reader to determine<sup>i</sup>.

Porto Santo.

THE island of Puerto Santo lies in the Atlantic ocean, opposite to Cape Cantin in the kingdom of Morocco, and under 32 deg. 30 min. north latitude, and 5 deg. 29 min. west longitude from London. Some writers, and particularly Ortelius, are of opinion, that this, and not Madeira, is the Carne of Ptolemy, while others affirm it, instead of one of the Canaries, to be the Ombrio, or Pluvialia, of Pliny. But most probable it is, that Puerto Santo is the island called Palma by Ptolemy, as the latitude exactly corresponds with his position of it, and with no other. According to La Croix, and the relations of voyages given by Ramusio, this island was discovered several years before Madeira; and yet, what is strange, they make Gonsalvo Zarco the discoverer; and Ramusio relates the very same circumstances of the one voyage which Alcaforado does of the other. Other writers again affirm, that it was not known before the year 1428; and indeed it is probable that the discovery both of it and a Madeira was still of later date. The Portuguese fleet fell in with this island by accident in a storm, and gave it this name on account of the protection it afforded them. It was then uninhabited; but has ever since continued peopled by the Portuguese, and in their possession.

<sup>h</sup> GRAMAY, l. ix. SANUT. c. 8. CADAMOSTO, apud Ramus. ubi sup. MOUQUET, l. i. MYNE Polit. Eccl. l. i. c. 21. DAVIT. p. 621. OVINGTON, p. 10, & seq. ATKINS, p. 23, & seq. DAPP. p. 98. ALCAFOR. apud Ramus. p. 98. OGILB. p. 744. HACKL. t. iii. p. 578. LA CROIX, l. iv. p. 509. BARB. ap. Church, t. v. p. 524. PREVOST, t. iii. l. v. c. 1. <sup>i</sup> LA CROIX, t. v. p. 706. LINSCH. ubi sup.

The island of Porto Santo is but small, not exceeding five leagues in compass, according to Cadamosto; though Sanutus makes it somewhat larger. It has good harbours, and only one bay, where ships may ride securely against all winds, except the south-west. It is in this bay that ships going or returning from India stop to refit and refresh, which is all the trade the inhabitants enjoy. The island produces wheat and corn in great abundance; also cows, wild boars, and rabbits; the latter in incredible numbers. But its most valuable productions for export are dragon's blood, honey, wax, and fish. All the inhabitants are bigotted Roman catholics, under the spiritual jurisdiction of the bishop of Madeira, and the civil power of the governor of that island. In a word, the people here enjoy enough of all the conveniences of life to be extremely happy, were they not frequently molested by the incursions and depredations of pirates, who frequently plunder the villages, and carry off the inhabitants, as happened in the year 1617, when they made above 600 prisoners <sup>k</sup>.

We shall close this part of our history with an account of the Azores, which some geographers describe as belonging to Africa, others to America, and some others, upon better grounds, to Europe. However, as they lie in the same sea with these we have been just describing, we think this the most convenient part for them, especially as it is a disputed point to which of the above three quarters of the globe they belong. Robbe ranks the Azores among the African islands, De Lisle among the American, as being nearer that continent; and most of our English geographers, for the same reason, among those of Europe (T). These islands had the name of Azores, or Azoras, from several flights of hawks which appeared to the first discoverers: they are also called Terceras, from one of them which goes by that name; and, though not the largest, is yet the chief and most considerable (U).

The Azores, Terceras, or Western Isles, are seven in number; viz. St. Michael, St. Maria, Tercera, Gratiosa, St. George, Pico, and Fayal, besides those of Flores and Corvo, which are now included among them, as they are under the same government, and but seventy leagues distant to the westward. Formerly they were called the Flemish Islands, because they were supposed to have been discovered by a Flemish merchant, a native of Bruges, who, in his voyage to Lisbon, A. 1445, or, as others think, in 1449, was driven so far to the west by a storm, as to fall in with the Azores, which he found uninhabited. Upon his arrival at Lisbon, he gave such hints, in relating his adventure, as were sufficient to engage that then enterprising court in a further discovery, which succeeded to their wish. Antonio Gonzalo, in his History of the Discoverers of the World, says, that the great Don Henry, prince of Portugal, thought this so considerable an acquisition to the former discoveries he had made, that he went in person to take possession of the Azores, in 1449. Davity affirms, that the Flemish merchants, on the part of their countryman, sent a colony thither, which settled in Fayal, where their descendants continue to this day. In proof of this assertion, it is urged, that a river in this island is called by the Portuguese, Rio or Ribera dos Flamings. All the others are undoubtedly inhabited by the Portuguese, under a governor of that nation, residing at Angra, the capital of Tercera, and indeed of all the Azores (W). In spirituals, they are under the jurisdiction of the bishop of the Azores, whose capital residence is at Punta Deglada, in the island of St. Michael.

In the year 1457, the inhabitants had a grant from Alphonso V. exempting their trade from all duties to any of the ports of Spain or Portugal; and several other immunities and privileges were granted to this favourite colony. They lie between the 36th and 40th degree of north latitude, and between the 23d and 32d degree of west longitude, about 300 leagues to the westward of Portugal, nearly the same distance to the eastward of Newfoundland, and not much exceeding it to the north-west of the island of Madeira, or the African side of the

<sup>k</sup> DAVITY, t. v. p. 621. LA CROIX, p. 707. etiam Auct. sup. citat. ibid.

(T) Our reasons for placing the Azores among the African islands are, 1st, Because they lie in the same ocean, and not in very distant latitudes from those we have been describing: and, 2dly, Because we have been lately describing several Portuguese islands.

(U) Some writers derive the name from anser, a goose, the first discoverers having found great plenty of these birds on landing there.

(W) Mr. de Thou, or Thuanus, refuses this Flemish merchant the honour of the discovery, which he ascribes to the same Belancourt, who is the supposed discoverer of the Canaries. It is usual, indeed, with the French writers to put in the claim of their nation for all discoveries, howsoever ill-founded. Thuanus says, that Belancourt sold his right to the Spaniards; and these last, says he, have published a book in Mexico, about an hundred years ago, in which they pretend, that Belancourt was employed by them; and that these islands were the first he made in those seas.

Streights of Gibraltar (X). Ortelius has given a map of them from Texeira, the king of Spain's geographer; acquainting us at the same time, that as soon as ships bound from Europe to America touch here, they are immediately freed from all the vermin that before infested them; no species of noxious or poisonous animals being able to live above a few hours in the Azores.

BESIDES the Azores, including Flores and Corvo, there are several smaller islands to the north-west, which merit no particular description; one only excepted, which Kircher affirms emerged all of a sudden out of the sea, at a place where fishermen used to sound 120 feet water. At first this island appeared in form of a groupe of rocks, filling up a space of five or six acres of ground; but afterwards enlarged to as many miles in extent. This event was preceded by horrible earthquakes for near eight days; after which a violent fire broke out through the surface of the sea, flaming up to the clouds, and vomiting out prodigious quantities of sand, earth, stones, and minerals, appearing at a distance like large fleeces of wool, and falling down again to the surface of the water, upon which they swam in a concrete form. This was followed by the emerision of the rocks we have mentioned, and by some others of greater height, which were broke in pieces by another shock of an earthquake, and then united into one solid mass, with the scum swimming on the top of the water. Such is the account of Kircher, which we will not pretend to defend, though that might possibly be done by well-attested similar instances; particularly of an island in the Archipelago, mentioned by Santorino, and some other writers of unquestioned veracity.

THE Tercera, or Azores Islands, are discovered a great way at sea, 30 leagues, says Frezier, by a high mountain called the Pico, or peak, of the Azores, of a conical form, like the peak of Teneriffe. All writers allow, that the Azores enjoy a clear serene sky, and wholesome pleasant climate; and that they are fertile in corn, wine, fruits, and quadrupeds, both wild and tame. Their greatest inconvenience is their being subject, like the Canaries, to violent earthquakes, as well as to the fury of the surrounding waves, which frequently do an incredible deal of mischief to the inhabitants, by overflowing the low grounds, and sweeping off whole fields of grain and folds of cattle, breaking down their fences, and overturning their houses.

THE first island in order is St. Michael, or, as the Portuguese call it, San Miguel, it being the most eastern and largest, computed about twenty leagues in length. St. Michael has several considerable towns and villages, extremely populous, and driving a large commerce in corn, wine, and cattle; but the harbours are bad, and dangerous for shipping. It stands about eight leagues south-east of Tercera, and abounds with arable and pasture ground; though these advantages are more than compensated by the constant terror in which the inhabitants live, every moment expecting earthquakes and volcanos that will swallow them up. This is a misfortune to which St. Michael is more liable, and oftener exposed, than any other of the Azores islands. Kircher gives an account of a dreadful earthquake which happened here on the 26th of June 1638, that continued for eight days, without any intermission, and so terribly shook the island, especially the canton of Vargen, that the people abandoned their houses in the utmost terror and perturbation, living all the while in the open fields. At this time it was, that the new island we have mentioned was formed; and had not Providence directed the wind to blow on the contrary side, this island of St. Michael must inevitably have been destroyed by those showers of liquid stones and minerals thrown up into the air, while the irruption continued. The chief town of St. Michael is Punta del Gada, rendered considerable by its commerce, its strong castle, in which the Portuguese keep a constant garrison, and by the residence of the primate of the Azores.

Santa Maria. NEXT stands the island of Santa Maria, about twelve leagues to the southward of St. Michael, and said to be twelve leagues in compass. It has a strong natural rampart of high mountains and steep rocks, with which it is quite surrounded, in a manner so connected, close, and regular, as requires not the assistance of art, nor of castles, garisons, fences, and fortifications. The interior parts are fertile, populous, and well cultivated, supplying all the conveniencies of life in great abundance. Santa Maria la Prainha is the chief town; besides which the island has the towns of Bodes, Castillo, and a number of villages, which we need not describe. What merits attention, as it constitutes a great part of the commerce

(X) Great pains have been taken by some learned geographers to shew, that the Azores are the Cassiterides of the antients, whence the Phœnicians drew such large quantities of tin; though they never pretended to reconcile their latitude with the position given by the antients, but only to shew the observations taken by the latter to be erroneous; but all the best writers are now agreed that the Scilly islands are the antient Cassiterides, as we have mentioned more fully in our Antient History *.

* Vol. vii. p. 308. Ortelii Geogr. sub Azor. Baudrand, sub voce.

- a of the island, is an ingenious porcelain manufacture, in which china-ware is happily imitated, and this commodity brought to a high degree of perfection.

TERCERA is the next island in order, and is supposed to have derived its name from its Tercera. standing the third in this cluster of islands, in point of situation, though the first in dignity, as appears from a number of circumstances, and particularly from its communicating its name to the rest. This island lies about twenty-eight leagues from the two former, and is computed to be sixteen, and by Labat twenty-one leagues in circumference. Its figure is almost circular, its coasts high, and so surrounded with craggy rocks, that it is deemed impregnable; every accessible part on the coast being defended by strong forts, heavy cannon, and a numerous and regular garrison. Whether it was so in queen Elizabeth's time, when b the earls of Cumberland and Essex made a successful descent on these islands, we are not informed. The only tolerable port in the whole island is the harbour of Angra, the capital; a port this equally secure against storms and an enemy, it being in form of a crescent, the extremities of which are defended by two high rocks, that run so far into the sea as to render the entrance narrow, and easily covered by the batteries on each side. The island is high, and distinguished at sea on the south-east by a point of low land that projects eastward, and by a cape cut on the west side, formed by a point of land, on which are two high hills; lastly, by two small islands, cut perpendicular, about a league to the eastward of the above cape, called Ilbios. Half a league south south-east from these are three breakers, even with the surface of the water, but all of them, according to Frezier, misplaced in the Flambeau de la Mere, and c most other charts.

THIS island of Tercera is fertile, pleasant, and healthy; the very rocks, which elsewhere are dry and barren, produce here excellent vines, though not equal to those raised in the Canaries and Madeira. The land yields large crops of wheat and other grain, pastures for cattle, and a prodigious variety of lemons, oranges, and all those fruits peculiar to cold and hot climates, which are observed to be propagated to the greatest advantage in temperate countries, and between the parallels of 25 and 35, north or south of the equinoctial. Indeed all the above commodities are produced in such perfection and plenty, that Tercera wants none of the necessities of life, besides oil and salt; and why olives may not be raised, and sea-salt made, we are at a loss to conjecture. Perhaps the inhabitants find it necessary to take these d from some other countries with which they trade; and therefore neglect cultivating them. In Tercera grow two extraordinary roots, the one called Bafata, weighing near a pound, and excellent wholesome food for the peasants, though it be neglected by persons of fashion, for no other reason than because it is plentiful, and used by the vulgar: the other is described about the size of a coco-nut, covered all over with fine long fibres of a gold colour, almost equal to silk in softness and fineness, capable of being manufactured into stuffs, but used only instead of feathers in stuffing beds. This root has no name in authors, though it is probable that the natives distinguish it by some appellation. It is remarkable of the Tercera corn, that it will not keep a year without germinating, unless preserved by art. Even wheat requires to be kept close from the air, and buried in caverns cut in rocks, or dry sandy ground, well covered e with a stone. These are the granaries of the inhabitants, from whence they fetch the grain, as the necessities of the family may require. The oxen bred in Tercera grow to a monstrous size, with spreading horns of very extraordinary dimensions; yet they are so tame and gentle, that, when feeding in herds, every one will come to his master as soon as called, it being customary there to give them all certain names. The roads all over the island are rugged and difficult, on account of the woods, mountains, and craggy rocks, which occur within every half-mile, and the ground under-foot resounds as if it were all hollow beneath, which it probably is. Some crevices there are, which emit a sulphureous steam, and others that throw up springs of water so hot as to boil an egg in a few minutes; whence we may easily account for Tercera's being so subject to earthquakes. Within three leagues of the capital is another f spring of a petrifying quality, in which wood, roots, and other vegetable substances, are soon turned into stone as hard as flint; and on the brim of the fountain grow large trees, whose roots are hard as steel, while vegetation goes on, and the rest of the tree continues of the usual consistence of wood. This island produces some excellent timber, particularly cedar, which grows to a very great height and thickness: it is even in such plenty, that their common carts, waggons, and utensils of all kinds, are made of it.

HERE stands the city of Angra, the metropolis not only of Tercera, but of all the Azores islands, and the residence of the governor. It is seated on the south side of the island, about the middle way of the longest diameter, on the edge of the sea, and at the bottom of the harbour we have described, formed by a point of land called Monte de Brazil. The town is g well-built and populous, and is an episcopal see, under the jurisdiction of the archbishop of Lisbon. It hath five parishes, a cathedral, four monasteries, as many nunneries, besides an inquisition and a bishop's court, which extends its jurisdiction over all the Azores, Flores, and Corvo. Angra is surrounded by a good wall and dry ditch, of great depth and breadth, and defended defended by a strong castle, rendered famous by the imprisonment of king Alphonso, by his brother Peter, in the year 1668. We are told, that the town derives its name from Angra, a creek, bay, or station, for shipping; this bay being the only convenient harbour in all the Azores. For this reason chiefly it is that the Portuguese have so carefully secured and fortified these islands; their situation, and particularly of this bay, being so commodious for the refreshment of their Brazil and East India squadrons. This port, which opens from the east to south-west, is not above four cables length in breadth, and not two of good bottom, according to Frezier. However, ships may ride in great safety here during summer weather, because then only gentle winds breathe from the west to north-west; but, as soon as the winter begins, the storms are so furious, that the only safety for shipping is putting, with all possible expedition to sea. Happily these storms are preceded by infallible tokens, with which long experience has made the inhabitants perfectly acquainted. On these occasions, the Pico, or peak, is overcast with clouds, and grows exceedingly dark; but what they repute the most certain criterion is the fluttering and chirping of flocks of birds round the city, for some days before.

At Angra are kept the royal magazines for anchors, cables, sails, and all sorts of stores, for the royal navy, or occasionally for merchant-men in great distress. All maritime affairs are under the inspection of a certain officer, called Desambargador, who hath subordinate officers and pilots for conducting ships into the harbour, or to proper watering-places. The English, French, and Dutch, have each a consul residing here, though their commerce with this, or any of the Azores islands, be but inconsiderable. Most of the public and private buildings have a handsome exterior appearance, but very indifferently furnished within; but their poverty in this particular the Portuguese artfully cloath under pretence of the inconvenience of warm furniture in so hot a climate. Glazing in their windows, carpets, silk or paper hangings, and all such ornaments, would render their houses, they say, intolerably warm; but the truth is, the poverty of the inhabitants renders it impossible for them to acquire any furniture that is elegant, and their pride makes them despise what is mean.

BESIDES Angra, there are several other towns and large villages in Tercera, with a number of forts and garrisons, under the direction of the governor, who has the power of filling up all vacancies that happen among the military officers. The only town, however, that deserves to be mentioned, is Ricya, which is a place of trade, and has the second-best harbour in the Azores. It is well-peopled, hath a large parochial church, two monasteries, two nunneries, and was a flourishing town, before the earthquakes in May and September 1614 almost totally destroyed it; a blow which it has never since recovered. In the whole island of Tercera the inhabitants are computed at 20,000 souls; the men and women living much in the same manner as native Portuguese and Spaniards, subject to the same passions of jealousy and revenge, and having all the other characteristics of the mother-country, rather heightened than diminished.

GRATIOSA island lies the most northern of all the Azores, distant about eight leagues from Tercera, and taking its name from its beauty and fertility. It does not exceed five or six leagues in compass; but is as fruitful in corn, fruits, pasture, and cattle, as is possible for so small a spot, supplying Tercera, and several of the other islands, with a great part of its produce. It is well-peopled, hath a number of villages, castles, forts, and works, for the security of the coast; but no cities or towns.

THE fifth island is St. George, which hath nothing remarkable besides a great number of lofty and full-grown cedars, with which the natives drive a considerable trade. It is besides tolerably fertile in corn, and the other necessaries of life; but so small as to merit no particular description in this work.

WE come now to the island of Pico, so called from some lofty mountains on it, or rather from one very high mountain, terminating, like Teneriffe, in a peak, and reputed by some writers equal to it in height. This island lies about four leagues S.W. from St. George, twelve from Tercera, and about three leagues south-east of Fayal. The mountain Pico, which gives name to the island, is filled with dismal dark caverns or volcanos, which frequently vomit out flames, smoke, and ashes, to a great distance. At the foot of this mountain, towards the east, is a spring of fresh water, generally cold, but sometimes so heated with the subterraneous fire, as to rush forth in torrents, with a kind of ebullition like boiling water, equalling that in heat, and sending forth a steam of sulphureous fetid vapours, liquified stones, minerals, and flakes of earth all on fire, in such quantities, and with such a violence, as to have formed a kind of promontory, vulgarly called Mysterios, on the declivity of the coast, and at the distance of 1200 paces from the fountain. Such at least is the account of Ortelius, though we do not find this last circumstance of the promontory confirmed by later observations. The circumference of Pico is computed at about fifteen leagues; and its most remarkable places are Pico, Lagoas, Santa Cruce, or Cruz, San Sebastian, Pesquin, San Rocko, Playa, and Magdalena, the inhabitants of which live wholly on the produce of the island, in great plenty and felicity a felicity. The cattle are various, numerous, and excellent in their several kinds; 'tis the same with the vine, and its juice, prepared into different wines, the best in the Azores. Besides cedars and other timber, they have there a kind of wood which they call Tei o, solid and hard as iron, and veined, when finely polished, like a rich scarlet tabby, which colour it has in great perfection. The longer it is kept, the more beautiful it grows; hence it is, that the Teixo tree is felled only for the king's use, or by his order, and is prohibited from being exported as a common article of trade.

b THE last of the islands, properly called Azores, is Fayal, and the most considerable of the whole, next to Tercera and Saint Michael. This island takes its name from the great abundance of beech-trees it produceth; besides which, it hath a variety of other wood in such plenty, that the English frequent it chiefly on that account. It also breeds large folds of cattle, flocks of birds, and shoals of fish, with which every part of its coast is well-stocked. The chief port is before the town of Orta, defended by an old castle, some cannon, and a slight Portuguese garrison. Orta is indeed the only town on the island, and but a place of little consideration. As for the other names we meet with in geographers, they are not those of towns, or even villages, but of mean hamlets, which have been passed by pompous names for places of some consequence. We have observed, that this island is peopled by Flemings, who imagining the Portuguese garrison to be a kind of oppressive tax upon them, petitioned his catholic majesty for leave to take upon themselves the defence of the island. Their request was granted, and the event almost fatal; for the English, at different times, c under the earls of Cumberland and Essex, made descents on Fayal, took it, and destroyed the fortifications, after having taken and burnt a squadron of rich homeward-bound ships that lay in the harbour. This induced the king again to resume the defence of the island; since which time a Portuguese garrison has constantly been maintained here. Fayal is the most western of the Azores.

As to the islands of Flores and Corvo, they are improperly included under that name, as they lie seventy leagues west of Tercera.

d THE first of these, or the Ilha des Flores, as the Portuguese call it, takes its name from the Flores. great variety of beautiful flowers with which it is covered. Its dimensions are about seven leagues in compass, every part of which is cloathed with wood, grain, pasture, or some other production useful to life. It is populous, and the inhabitants live happily upon their grain, cattle, and fruits.

ABOUT a league to the south of Flores stands the island of Corvo, so called from the incredible flights of crows seen in it by the first discoverers, every tree or rock in the island being covered with their nests. It abounds in much the same productions as the preceding island; but neither of them are considerable enough to merit a particular account; and the only reason why the Portuguese keep possession of them, is to prevent other nations from establishing such settlements here, as by their contiguity, might endanger the security of the Azores, by taking every favourable occasion that might offer for seizing upon the Canaries, so important to their Brazil commerce<sup>1</sup>.

<sup>1</sup> DAVITY, SANUT. LINSCHOT. DAPPER, BARBOT, CADAMOSTO, LA CROIX, cum multis aliis, in loc. citat.

C H A P. IV.

The history of Abissinia, or Upper Ethiopia.

S E C T. I.

Giving an account of the principal modern authors, quoted through the course of this chapter; and of sundry stratagems made use of to open a commerce with that empire.

e WE have already given in our ancient history<sup>a</sup> the best account we could of this vast, Abissinia little and, in most respects, unknown empire, its limits, inhabitants, cities, &c. as far known to the antients and moderns till as they were known to the ancient writers, and the records they have left us of them would allow; and if the greater part of what not only they, but others of a more modern frequented by the Portuguese.

<sup>a</sup> Vol. vii. p. 179, & seq.

Why so great difference still in their accounts of it.

Their over zeal to convert the natives occasions their expulsion.

All parts of it become inaccessible to the Europeans.

date, have written of it, be either too fabulous or uncertain, either with regard to its true <sup>a</sup> situation, extent and boundaries <sup>b</sup>, as well as with relation to its nature, climate, &c. it must be chiefly ascribed to that erroneous notion, which reigned so long among historians and geographers, that all the countries that lay so near the equinoctial line were, for the most part, waste and uninhabitable; and to the same cause we must attribute that so much less hath been written of it than of many others; and that what we meet with concerning it, before the Portuguese found means to introduce themselves into it, appears at the best uncouth and unsatisfactory; so that it is entirely to the discoveries which these have been enabled to make by their abode in those parts, and their own intimate acquaintance with their inhabitants, that we are obliged for that more perfect knowlege we have of them; perfect only, we mean, in comparison of what we had before they published their accounts of this great empire; though <sup>b</sup> still vastly short of it, on account of the dissonancy we find between them, in many respects, for want of proper means, as well as time, for making their observations with greater exactness and certainty, concerning the true situation of the whole country in general, and that of most of its provinces and places of note in particular. We should perhaps more truly account for the great difference and imperfection which reign through the greatest part of their maps, both with regard to the extent, limits, longitude and latitude, &c. as well as in their descriptions of the inland parts, if we were to say, that those good fathers, jesuits and others, who were sent missionaries thither, to reduce the Abissinian church to the obedience of the see of Rome, had their hearts and minds too full of this one important point, to find leisure for lesser discoveries; which being of such a nature as would rather excite the jealousy than <sup>c</sup> admiration of that rude and ignorant people, they thought might be more fitly postponed till the main end of their mission was once gained; after which they might, with more pleasure and safety, attend to the other less momentous branches of it. The misfortune was, that their untimely zeal for obtaining the one, brought such a dreadful and general persecution upon them, as hath at once quashed all the hopes and prospect of regaining either; not only the missionaries of all denominations, but the very names of Portuguese and Franks, by which they called the Europeans, are become detestable to the whole Abissinian nation, and are hardly ever mentioned without some curse or hateful epithet <sup>c</sup>.

WHAT occasioned this sudden and surprising change, after the Portuguese had been so kindly invited thither by one of their empresses, had done her and some of her successors such <sup>d</sup> signal services, for which they were raised to the highest degree of esteem and confidence in the Abissinian court, will be best seen in the course of this history: at present, it will be sufficient to say, that for their sakes all access to any part of that kingdom is, since their expulsion, become to the last degree dangerous, and in some measure impracticable, to all Europeans, in any disguise, or under any pretence whatsoever. All the passes to it are guarded with the utmost diligence; and no sooner doth a stranger offer himself at any of their frontiers, but he is immediately examined from head to foot, to see whether he carries any arms, letters, books, writings, or any other thing that is liable to suspicion: his skin, hair, complexion, shape, &c. are scrupulously scrutinized, and especially whether he carries with him the scar of circum- <sup>e</sup>cision; which examen is the more easily made, as the travellers into those hot climes hardly wear any other covering than a blue linen shirt; for none here, not even subjects, are permitted to wear either cap, hose, or slippers; that being the peculiar privilege of the emperor. The knowlege of the Ethiopic language, and the dark olive complexion, are no less necessary to help an European to pass unsuspected, than the mark of circumcision: and this fear of admitting any spies or dangerous persons into their dominions, not only makes them thus strict and diligent in examining every passenger, but likewise very severe on all those who run the risk of coming thither unprovided for such a scrutiny <sup>d</sup>; an instance of which strict severity the reader may see in the margin, out of the last quoted author, who resided at Cairo, as consul to the French nation, many years after the time in which it happened (A).

UPON

<sup>b</sup> Confer Atlas JOHNSON, MERCATOR, JOHN DE BARROS Decad. Afæ 3. & al. LUDOLPH, MAILLET, & al. plur.

<sup>c</sup> TELLEZ, PONCET, MAILLET descript. d'Egypte, vol. ii. letter 8. Hague edit. p. 82.

(A) The Abissinian emperor having heard some of his officers, whom he had sent to Cairo, give a certain Capuchin friar, then residing in that city, large commendations for his excellent skill in physic, and surprising success in curing variety of diseases, sent him a kind invitation to come and settle at his court, which he readily complied with; but whilst he was making preparations for that journey, some other monks, of the Franciscan order, took it into their heads that that invitation might extend to all that were skilled in that art, of which most of those good fathers take care to gain a competent knowlege, that being the most effectual means of introducing them among those (otherwise jealous) princes, and procuring them an honourable protection and livelihood.

In this persuasion, some of them ventured, unknown to the Capuchin, to get to that court some time before him, in hopes of meeting the same reception there; and upon their first appearing on the frontiers, news were dispatched to the emperor of their arrival; who sent immediate orders to have them safely conveyed to him, not doubting but his Capuchin was at the head of them, and that the others were only his assistants or attendants. But upon farther examination, finding, by his officers above-

- a UPON the whole, whoever compares these observations of those missionaries, will find them so different and imperfect, that he will have reason to conclude they were made in haste, and without that accuracy which we observe them to use in all other countries, where they make a longer residence, and have better means and instruments for such a work. Whoever reads those who seem to have taken the most pains to review their observations, and reconcile them to each other, such as father Tellez Ludolph, and others of equal capacity, will find still variance enough amongst them to make us wish for, what we are not likely to see in haste, a more accurate survey of the country. To give an instance or two of this remarkable difference, we need but compare the situation of the town of Giesm, which was reckoned the mid-way between the town of Sennaar and the confines of Ethiopia, as fixed by father Brevedent's own observations, who is allowed to have been an excellent astronomer, and one who accompanied the physician Poncet into Ethiopia, but died in the way thither, and places that town in the 10th degree of north latitude *; and the situation which father Tellez, and Mr. Ludolph after him, give it in their map of this empire, and we shall plainly see that one of them must be greatly out; and yet Brevedent took his observation upon the spot. Another proof how little Tellez's map is to be depended upon, is the situation which another Portuguese jesuit assigns, from his own observations likewise, to the kingdom of Dembea; which is such, according to him, that both the poles are visible, and that the antarctic appears the higher of the two; which is the very reverse of what Tellez and Ludolph's maps represent it.

- c It was probably this dissonancy between those authors, that induced a late famous geographer to his imperial majesty to try to give the world a more accurate map, not only of this empire, but of all Africa; which he caused to be printed some years ago at Nuremberg, with some critical remarks upon those which father Tellez and Mr. Ludolph have given us of the Abissinian empire: but as this new one hath not met with the success and approbation which the compiler seemed to promise himself, we shall content ourselves with referring our reader for a farther account of it, as far as relates to our present subject, to the subsequent note (B).

- d We need not therefore wonder, if some of the writers on the African part of the world, particularly some of our atlas's, have extended the limits of this empire so far beyond its due bounds; to say nothing of those of older date, who have stretched its southern ones so vastly beyond the equinoctial line; though they are found to come so short of it by the common consent of all our more modern geographers. They were altogether in the dark about the countries that lay beyond it on that side; and had no other way to supply that great chasm of 600 or more leagues, than by bringing all that vast tract within the limits of it, and bestowing upon its emperors, all that immense territory which they knew not how to dispose of otherwise. By this means they have stretched it from 22 degrees north to 16 or 17 south, and given it an extent of 39 or 40 degrees; which is above twenty-one more than it really hath (C), as we shall shew very soon, from the more authentic testimonies, and more accurate observations, * See PONCET's Voyage to Ethiopia, p. 33.

inter al. MERCATOR, JOHNSON, and DE LISLE.

c FERNANDEZ ap. Codign, lib. i. c. 11. p. 69.

f Vid.

above-mentioned, that he was not of their number, he was so exasperated at the boldness of their attempt, that he caused them to be all put to immediate death. This, our author tells us, happened 50 or 60 years before his coming to reside in Egypt (1); since which time the same vigilance and severity were still observed with the same strictness; and their history furnishes us with a great number of instances of the like nature; though none of them have been sufficient to deter him and others from contriving new stratagems and devices to facilitate an entrance to their missionaries into that kingdom, in spite of all the care and caution which those princes take to prevent it (2), and the extreme danger of attempting to elude it.

(B) We are told by Mr. De la Croze, late professor in philosophy, and library-keeper to the late king of Prussia, of a map of Africa, printed at Nuremberg by J. Bapt. Heron, geographer to his Imperial Majesty, in which are these words: Benevole Spectator, Ludolphum hæcenus incautè secuti sunt, qui quodam novo systemate originem Nili tabulis suis perperam inseruerunt. Nos auctoritatem viri maxime Rev. P. Henrici Schereri, S. J. Geographi celeberrimi, qui ex veris, P. P. Missionariorum sue societatis relationibus tale nobis quale hic posuimus, schema utriusque Nili albi & utri Fluminis, præfiguravit, amplectimur; Curiosque historicæ veritatis indagatoris ad ipsum auctoris opus sumptibus prænobilis viri J. Caspari Bencardi, &c. Bibliopolæ Augustani præstantissime editum, remittimus. This map, we are told by our author, places the sources of the Nile and Niger a great way beyond the equinoctial line, and makes it to flow immediately from the lake Zaire; which paradox is pretended to be founded on the authority of the jesuit missionaries, but without producing any of them. Doth not this strange discord and difference of opinions, flowing from the same source, and founded on the same authorities, give us sufficient cause to wish for some new observations and discoveries, which might put an effectual end to them, and give us a more certain knowledge of those curious and important matters (4)?

(C) This is the case, among others, of the modern Mercator, and Johnson's Atlas, in which they were led by a wrong scent; the authors they followed having placed the head of the Nile about 16 or 17 degrees of south latitude, where lies the lake Zambre and Zayre (so their maps call the south and north sides of the Dambran

(1) Maillet, ubi sup. (2) Id. ibid. p. 83. & seq. (3) Matur Veyssier, La Croze Hist. du Christianisme d'Éthiopie 1739, p. 70, & seq. See also what hath been said on the source of that river, Anc. Hist. vol. i. p. 177, & seq. vii. p. 187, & seq.

observations, of those Portuguese fathers, whose long residence and acquaintance with these (till then unknown) parts, have enabled them to give us a more satisfactory knowledge of them; of whom, therefore, it will not be improper to give some previous account, before we proceed farther, and by way of introduction to the following history.

The Portuguese invited into Abissinia by the empress Helena.

THE empress Helena, grandmother to the emperor David, having received a kind of congratulatory embassy from Emanuel king of Portugal, was so highly pleased with it, that she resolved to send the like to him, with a view of entering into a strict friendship and alliance with him<sup>e</sup>. She made choice of one Mathew, an Armenian merchant, who safely arrived at Lisbon in that quality; and having performed the purport of his commission, returned to Abissinia by the way of Goa, in the Portuguese fleet, accompanied by a fresh ambassador from the Portuguese court. This was a man of quality, named Galvam, who in his return to Abissinia died at Camaran, an island in the Red-Sea; so that the Portuguese vessels, which had brought him thither, were obliged to sail back to Goa. However, the matter was thought of such importance, that a new ambassador was sent thither some years after, viz. Roderigo de Lima; who, after a tedious voyage, landed at length at Massowa, near Arkiko; which places, as well as the island of Sowakem, did then belong to the Abissinians, though since then taken from them by the Turks, who have kept possession of them ever since. Roderigo had with him one of the king's domestic chaplains, named Francisco Alvarez, a person of no extraordinary learning, but yet a man of sound judgment and great integrity, and who was appointed almoner of this embassy; and it is to him that we are beholden for that plain and honest description of this empire, the first of the kind that ever was published, which he printed, together with a relation of his voyage, at Lisbon, an. 1540; and, though short, hath been justly admired for its plainness and sincerity. It hath been since that often reprinted, and translated into other languages, particularly into English; though this last is rather an abridgment of Alvarez, and is only to be met with in Purchas's collection. The next that wrote of the Abissinian affairs, was father Bermudes, who went likewise into Abissinia with Don Roderigo de Lima, and with the character of patriarch, but openly only as an attendant on him, and under the name of master John, for fear of awakening the jealousy of the Abissinian clergy. What he hath written concerning this country, is chiefly what happened to the Portuguese general, Christopher de Gama, his victories, defeat, and death. His account, which is dedicated to Don Sebastian, king of Portugal, and appeared in print an. 1565, is so filled with fabulous stuff, that father Tellez tells us, in his general history of Abissinia<sup>h</sup>, that he is only to be credited in those things which he affirms to have seen, but not in that which he had only by common report.

Ambassies between king Emanuel and her frustrated.

Alvarez writes the first history of Abissinia.

1540.

Father Bermudes writes the next.

The next to him is the celebrated father Peter Pais, the first European who went to view the head of the Nile, and who resided in Abissinia a considerable time, in quality of a missionary, and died there an. 1622. His manuscript was sent thence to Rome, where it is still preserved, and reaches from the year 1556 to that of his death. He was succeeded by another of his society, viz. father Emanuel D'Almeyda, who was rector, or superior, of the convent of Fromona, which the jesuits had been permitted to build there; a man who had not only resided there a considerable time, but who had taken indefatigable pains to travel through most part of the empire, and from whom we have the most complete account of the inland provinces and kingdoms that are subject to it, and of all the monstrous high ridges of mountains that run through the far greater part of them<sup>i</sup>, and in comparison of which, the Alps, Apennines, and Pyrenees, are but pigmies for height; some of the most considerable of which we shall have occasion to mention in the sequel. The next to him in rank and time was father Alphonso Mendez, who was constituted patriarch of Ethiopia by the pope, and wrote the history of it in Latin, after having resided there ten years (D).

Father Peter Pais writes next.

Father Emanuel Almeyda travels thro' the inland parts of the empire.

THE next to him is the celebrated father Peter Pais, the first European who went to view the head of the Nile, and who resided in Abissinia a considerable time, in quality of a missionary, and died there an. 1622. His manuscript was sent thence to Rome, where it is still preserved, and reaches from the year 1556 to that of his death. He was succeeded by another of his society, viz. father Emanuel D'Almeyda, who was rector, or superior, of the convent of Fromona, which the jesuits had been permitted to build there; a man who had not only resided there a considerable time, but who had taken indefatigable pains to travel through most part of the empire, and from whom we have the most complete account of the inland provinces and kingdoms that are subject to it, and of all the monstrous high ridges of mountains that run through the far greater part of them<sup>i</sup>, and in comparison of which, the Alps, Apennines, and Pyrenees, are but pigmies for height; some of the most considerable of which we shall have occasion to mention in the sequel. The next to him in rank and time was father Alphonso Mendez, who was constituted patriarch of Ethiopia by the pope, and wrote the history of it in Latin, after having resided there ten years (D).

THE

<sup>e</sup> ALVARES, BERMUDES, TELLEZ, LUDOLPH, et al. Hist. Abissin. LEZ, LE GRAND, preface to LOBO.

<sup>h</sup> Chap. xx. p. 198.

<sup>i</sup> TEL-

lake, through which that river flows after a long course from its spring head) it was natural for them to stretch the south boundaries at least so far as the source of that river, since it was allowed by all to spring in this empire of Abissinia. And it was no less natural for Mercator to place the kingdom of Goiam along the coasts of that lake, since this was supposed to be the source of that river, and that kingdom the most southern in the whole empire. How the ancients came to be so far out in their judgment about the one and the other, as to lead so many moderns into the same error, we have formerly endeavoured to account for (5); neither could those moderns above-mentioned be possible made sensible of their mistake, but by a discovery that the true situation of that source, as well as the distance of the southern boundaries of the empire from it, were fixed by more certain observations: and for these we are chiefly beholden to Cismas the hermit, who was the first that traced out the way to that so long sought-for spring; and next to him, to father Pais, and other Portuguese missionaries, who by his help arrived at the very spot, where, by proper and repeated observations, they attained to the certainty of its situation (6).

(D) We omit the relation of father Domingo de Urruta, a Dominican of Valentia, which is allowed by all to be a mere heap of lies and forgeries (7), as the reader

(5) See Ancient Hist. vol. i. p. 177, & seq. vii. p. 187, & seq. (6) See Pais, Lobo, Le Grand Relat. d'Abissin. Differt. 3. p. 209, & seq. (7) Le Grand's preface to his version of father Lobo, p. 10, & seq.

- a THE last we shall mention is father Lobo, who likewise resided there nine years, and the greatest part of that time in quality of rector of the college of Fromona above-mentioned, whose description of that empire, and history of his travels, though simple and succinct, gives us a more lively idea of all the places he hath been at, than any other before him; and especially as, if we may believe father Balthazar Tellez, he travelled above 38,000 miles in this empire; insomuch that he scruples not to apply to him that verse of Virgil *;

Father Lobo resides there nine years, and writes an account of it.

Nec vero Alcides tantum telluris obivit.

- b His history hath been since translated into French, and enriched with sundry curious dissertations, and other anecdotes, by Mr. Le Grand, and printed at Paris, an. 1738. From the above-mentioned relations, and the annual letters which were sent by the Abissinian missionaries to the college of jesuits at Lisbon, it was, that father Balthazar Tellez wrote his more comprehensive history of Abissinia; in the compiling of which work, he had the advantage of consulting all that had been printed and written by the aforesaid authors, as he engaged in it at the desire of the whole society; and it is perhaps this very motive that hath inclined him to some partiality for that order, through which, however, every judicious reader will see clearly enough, as it extends little farther than the endeavouring to justify that society from the charge (in all likelihood but too justly) laid to them, of having been the cause, through their hasty and indiscrete zeal, of the reduction of the Abissinian church to the obedience of that of Rome; of the cruel persecution and irreconcilable hatred, the effects of which fell soon after so heavily, not only upon their own society, but upon all missionaries and European Christians without distinction. This is but the same complaint which they have given just cause for in other countries, particularly in China, Japan, &c. as we have shewn in some of the foregoing volumes *. In other cases, where the credit of his society, and the interest of the Romish church and court, are not concerned, he hath judiciously and candidly followed his authors, and from them compiled by far the best and fullest history of that empire we have extant; and it is from him that even Mr. Ludolph hath been beholden for the greatest part of his history; though he takes all opportunities to contradict him, and those of his fraternity. Father Tellez published the work above-mentioned in the Portuguese language, an. 1660; it was printed at the university of Conimbra in Portugal, under the following title: Historia General de Ethiopia alta do Preste Joan, e do que nella Obraram os Padres da Companhia de Jesus. Compоста na Misma Ethiopia per lo Padre Manoel D'Almeyda, Natural Vileu provincial e Vistador que foi na India. Abreviada com nova releycam e Methodo per lo padre Balthezar Tellez Natural de Lisboa provincial da provincia Lusitana, ambos da Misma Companhia.

From these father Tellez compiles his general history.

Why so partial to his society.

- d Among the French, we have Poncet, a physician, who was sent by the French consul at Poncet, a Kayro into Abissinia to cure the emperor of some stubborn disease, in the year 1698 <sup>1</sup>, and hath wrote a pretty succinct account of what he saw in those parts of the country through which he travelled, and of what he learned from the inhabitants he conversed with, concerning the religion, laws, customs, &c. of the Abissinians; but as he went through but a small part of the country, and was obliged to keep himself incog. during his short stay there, of scarce one year; it was not possible for him to give us more than a concise and imperfect description of so vast an empire <sup>m</sup>. Besides, this gentleman had since the misfortune, whether through any thing that dropped from his pen in his aforesaid relation, or some imprudent steps he took after his return to Kayro, to disoblige the whole society of missionaries to such a degree, that they have left no stone unturned to blacken his character, and that of his book. They have decried him as a vile cheat, quack, mountebank, impostor, and a man capable of every kind of baseness <sup>n</sup>, and have even ventured to affirm that he never was at the Abissinian

French physician, writes an account of it.

Why blackened by the jesuit writers.

* Æneid. <sup>k</sup> See before, vol. iii. p. 742, & seq. iv. p. 11, & seq. <sup>1</sup> PONCET's voyage into Abissinia, an. 1698, & seq. <sup>m</sup> LE GRAND's supplement to LOBO, p. 157, 161, 328, 362, 372, & alib. <sup>n</sup> Id. ibid. p. 401.

may see, by the extract given of it at the end of this chapter. It is mostly levelled against the jesuits, between whom and his order there hath passed little else besides bitter jars and invectives. And this it was that engaged the jesuit Codingho, then at Rome, to answer his book, tho' without naming him, by compiling a history of Abissinia point-blank contrary to that, under the following title; De Abassinorum Rebus, deque Æthiopiæ Patriarchis, Joanne Nonio Barreto & Andrea Oviedo, libri tres, P. Nicolao Godigno, societatis Jesu, Auctore. Lugduni, M.DC.XV.

We likewise omit Damian de Goes, a Portuguese gentleman, the recollect Rogers, Jarric, and some others, who either have only transcribed what they mention occasionally concerning this empire, from the chief authors above-mentioned, or confined their lucubrations to the chief difference between the Abissinian and Roman church, with respect both to their doctrines and church discipline, of which we shall have occasion to speak in a more proper place (8).

(8) Dam. a Goes opuscul. Rogers Etat. de la Palestine, Jarric.

court, and that what he says of it, and of his reception and success there, is mere forgery °. Lastly, to complete his character, they make him forsake his lawful wife, whom he had married in Ethiopia, to go and seek his fortune in the kingdom of Yemen, in spite of all his oaths and imprecations to return to Prester John, to rob him of the physical chest, which that prince had caused to be made at his own and the public charges, and to pass from Yemen to Surat, and thence to Hispahan, where he died like a rogue and a vagabond, as he had lived †.

His character vindicated.

His commission to the emperor of Abissinia.

Reception.

These are the invidious colours in which they have had the boldness to draw a man, who, by his long residence and success at Kayro, had gained the character of a skilful physician, and had been pitched upon by the judicious Mr. Maillet, then consul in the same city, to be sent into Abissinia, not merely to cure the emperor of his disease, though even in this case a gentleman of his great discernment would hardly have sent thither such a pitiful quack as he is there represented; but he was, under the character of a physician, to discharge a commission which was thought of much greater moment, viz. to negotiate an alliance and good correspondence between the French and Abissinian court, in order to facilitate a fresh attempt of reuniting the Abissinian church to that of Rome; and, since the very name of Portuguese was become so odious through that whole empire, to try what French policy and munificence would do to reconcile the emperor and his court, and by that means the clergy and people, to the French nation, to the Gallican church, and the Pope's supremacy. And can it be supposed, that a person of the French consul's character would have entrusted an affair of such importance, which required the highest degree of sagacity, caution, zeal, and secrecy, to such an abandoned vagabond? However, we have not yet been able to find that any of this load of invective and calumny hath been able to lessen the credit of his relation; he is still quoted as a person of discernment and sincerity; and where can be the doubt, that a person, who was earnestly pressed by that emperor to come on such an errand to his court, and was by his express order to be received in every place of his dominion through which he passed, to be treated with all possible respect and deference, should have all the opportunities that could be wished to see or be informed of every thing he hath given us an account of, either with respect to the religion, government, customs, climate, and natural history of that country, as well as of the many other curiosities that fell under his own observation during his three years travel through those parts? It is plain, however, that he hath advanced nothing in his book that either contradicts the accounts of those fathers who wrote before him, or appears fabulous or absurd; and if there had, our readers may be well assured we would not give it a place in a work of this kind: and as to matters of weight and moment, he will hardly find any thing quoted out of him, but what is well backed by the testimony of some one or more of the authors above spoken of.

Ludolph's history of Ethiopia.

Great skill in that tongue.

Abbot Gregory's character.

Ludolph's history decried by the Jesuits.

THE last, and indeed the most voluminous writer on the Abissinian affairs, is the often mentioned Mr. Ludolph; a gentleman who hath taken indefatigable pains, and spent the greatest part of his life, to make himself a complete master of the Abissinian tongue, in order to get the best intelligence he could of their religion, politics, government, &c. from their own writings, and to enable others to do the same, by the help of the grammar and lexicon he hath given us of it; and yet the small benefit which he or his curious readers have reaped from his labours, would rather deter any one from following his steps. We have already taken notice, that most of his history is taken from the Portuguese authors above spoken of, though he omits no opportunity to contradict them, where-ever they seem to clash with his Abbot Gregory; a person, to say the best of him we can, but little qualified for the task he had undertaken, and much more unfit to be so closely followed or relied on, either in point of learning, capacity, or integrity, above all other men. Mr. Ludolph himself, whatever high qualifications he might find in him in other respects, doth yet complain, in the preface of the last edition of his dictionary, that he found him so ignorant with respect to the language of Ethiopia, that he was often at a loss for the meaning of sundry words and idioms; that many others were wholly unknown to him; that he very often gave them a quite contrary meaning; and that he scrupled not to own his ignorance to him, both by words and in writing.

If this was the case of the Abissinian abbot, we shall have little encouragement to rely on his testimony; though we should be loth to carry our suspicion so far as some of the Romish writers have done, that Mr. Ludolph had such an artful way of proposing his questions to him, as naturally led him to make him answer them as he wished, in order to confirm what he had most in view in the writing of his history, in contradiction to all the other accounts that have been given us of the Abissinian religion †; viz. that it comes much nearer, both in faith and church discipline, rites, &c. to the Lutheran than to the Roman church; for this is what they

° Ibid. p. 168. & seq.

† Ibid. p. 328, alib. plur.

‡ See LE GRAND Dissertation, p. 177,

- a all with one consent charge him with ; though we shall have occasion, in the sequel of this chapter, to explode a good number of instances they give us of this partiality, both with relation to the Abissinian religion, and to other historical facts they pretend to have been misrepresented by him. It were to be wished indeed that Mr. Ludolph, instead of drawing most of his intelligence from a person of his abbot's character, and, where this failed him, instead of consulting an Armenian merchant (E) about such points as these, which were intirely out of his province, and whom he owns to have been so ignorant, that he could neither read nor write, he had endeavoured to draw his intelligence from more authentic witnesses, such as the Abissinian liturgies, formularies, catechisms, and other such Ethiopic books, which, he tells us, he had in his possession ; and if he had gone so far as to give the public a faithful
- b version of them, every one would then have been much better able to judge of the merit of the controversy, than it is possible to do from the precarious testimony of two such witnesses'. Mr. Ludolph doubtless wanted neither materials nor capacity, much less zeal, for such an expensive and laborious task. Nor was he insensible how much more convincing any proof drawn from such books was, than the evidence of twenty such witnesses ; whom there-fore, if we may believe his own words', he no farther relied on, than as they confirmed or agreed with those books. But the question is, what encouragement he then had, either from the public or from the booksellers, to bestow so much time and cost upon it, after he had been obliged, as he himself tells his correspondent, to submit to the defraying the new impression of his Ethiopic dictionary, unless he had resolved to deprive the world of his labour and talents', which his booksellers told him they did not think of consequence enough to meet with a quick sale. But, after all, had he thought fit to run the hazard of such a copious work, and given the world an edition of all their liturgies, catechisms, and other such theological books, from the best copies, whether printed or in manuscript, with the most faithful version of, and most impartial and judicious notes upon them, would it not have been liable to frequent criticisms and endless disputes ? would it not have given birth to new depositions and confessions, obtained, to use his own words, prece vel pretio, by favour or bribery, to support a contrary reading or interpretation ? But whatever merit the zeal of either of the contending parties may make them imagine worth all that artifice, indecent language, and bitter invectives, which have been used to gain their point ; to us, and we hope it will do so to every serious and unbiassed Christian, it appears of little moment, whether the Abissinian church, confessedly allowed on all hands to consist of a very ignorant and positive clergy, and a blind bigotted laity, which received the first fundamentals of their Christianity from an avowed heretical sect of Christians, to whom they have paid ever since a most implicit obedience, comes nearer in its faith and discipline, to the Romish, Lutheran, Greek, or any other church. If Mr. Ludolph had any such view in writing his Abissinian history, as the jesuits so boldly, though we think, unjustly charge him with (F), we are more ready to pity than imitate his zeal. But one special advantage we shall be enabled to make in the course of this history, from the frequent altercations we meet with between him and those missionaries, and the pains they have so warmly taken to discover each other's faults, that we shall thereby more easily come at the truth, and be less apt to be biassed to either side.

His apology.

The main controversy between him and them of small importance ;

except that it makes them discover each other's faults.

' LE GRAND, ubi sup. 178, & seq.
fin. p. 180, & seq.

* See his letter to Mr. PIQUES, in LE GRAND's relation de l'Abissin.
† See PIQUES's answer to him, ibid. p. 188.

(E) This was one Morat who had been often in Abissinia, and other parts of Asia and Africa ; and being then at Batavia, was, at Mr. Ludolph's request, questioned about the present state of Abissinia, particularly that of their religion ; and in several instances quoted the one in confirmation of what he had been informed of by the other. But besides that persons of his character seldom trouble themselves about any thing but their own commerce, much less about religion ; the Armenians being commonly the most ignorant of their own ; Morat was moreover an arrant rogue, who, under pretence of having a more than ordinary influence on the Abissinian emperor, had engaged, by his interest with him, to establish a most beneficial commerce on the Red-Sea, and coasts adjacent, in favour of the Dutch ; for which they paid him a good round sum before-hand : but when their ships came thither, they found themselves cheated, and were forced to return without success (9).

(F) This charge, after having been laid home to that gentleman by several of the jesuitical fraternity (10), notwithstanding his most express and solemn declaration against it, was very fearfully and strongly confuted by the learned Veyfiere De la Crose (11) ; nevertheless, the next that took the cause in hand against him, hath not scrupled to revive all the former calumnies, as if nothing had been said to confute them, but begins his dissertation on the Abissinian hierarchy in these words : " It is not difficult, for any one that reads Mr. Ludolph's Ethiopic history, to see, that he did not undertake it with any other view, than to shew the difference which he pretends to be between the church of Rome and that of Alexandria, on the one hand, and the conformity which he thinks to have discovered between that very church of Alexandria and that of the Protestants (12)."

(9) Lobo, Tellez, Le Grand, &c. al.

(10) Renaudot.

(11) Europe Savante, tom. x. part ii.

p. 231, & tom. ii. part i. p. 29. See also his Histoire du Christianisme d'Ethiopie, p. 83, & seq.

(12) Le

Maillet's account of Abissinia.

Strives in vain to get a mission introduced, but displeases the jesuits.

The ambassador Morat cried down by them.

The consul's treatment of him.

Dares not send him to the French court.

De Route sent ambassador into Abissinia.

Affassinated at Sanaar.

MONS. Maillet, in his description of Egypt, where he had resided a good number of years as consul of the French nation, hath written something concerning this country, particularly about the great danger and difficulty there hath been, ever since the expulsion of the Portuguese, of penetrating into any part, and especially into the Abissinian court*; and hath proposed some new expedients for removing it, and eluding the care and jealousy of the *Ethiopian*s. But we do not find that any thing like it hath been tried since, at least with any success. He there speaks likewise of some other considerable memoirs, written by him some time before on the same subject, and afterwards published at the end of father Lobo's relation of Abissinia, by his French translator Le Grand; but they contain little concerning that country, except an account of his ill success in endeavouring to promote an embassy between the then emperor of it and the king his master, by the assistance of the physician Poncet above-men-<sup>b</sup> tioned†; in the pursuit of which project they took some steps, which proved so displeasing to some of the jesuits concerned in it, that they have since declared themselves against it, exposed the Abissinian envoy as a cheat, a person of mean birth, and worse character, and who only took upon him that public employ to impose on the French king, and obtain some considerable presents from him. His name was Murat, or Morat, a Syrian by birth, and a near relation of that Murat who had cheated the Dutch, as we mentioned in a late note. He had been in Abissinia, and was known to and employed by the emperor in some commercial affairs, but pretended moreover to have credential letters, as his ambassador to the French king, together with some presents, and a commission to negotiate an alliance of commerce with that court; but the greatest part of those presents he pretended were either lost at sea, or taken<sup>c</sup> from him by the Turkish basha of Massoufa; and as for the emperor's letter, which he carried in a rich brocaded silk bag, he refused to deliver it up to any but to the king of France's own hands; so that the consul, who was eager, notwithstanding all these obstacles, to prove the embassy, was forced to make use under-hand of the basha of Kayro's authority to wrest the letter from him by force, in order to examine the contents of it. But whilst the consul and the fathers of the Holy Land, who were his creatures, endeavoured to support his character of ambassador, the jesuits were as zealous in destroying it; and affirming the king's signet, which was a kind of cypher, or hieroglyphic, of the breadth of a crown-piece, to be counterfeited, which they had discovered by comparing it with that of another letter, sent by that monarch to the patriarch of Alexandria: they likewise represented Morat as a vile<sup>d</sup> fellow, a great bragger, liar, and drinker, who had served as cook in several merchants houses, and had at length assumed the character of ambassador, to raise his fortune‡.

It is not unlikely the consul knew all the foibles of this man, though he still resolved to make the most of his letters and pretensions, in order to reimburse the expences he had been at on his account; yet not daring to trust such a drunken and lying fellow to the French court, chose rather to send his own chancellor thither, with the patched-up credentials and presents. Morat, seeing himself thus over-reached, and, as he rightly guessed, frustrated of the presents he expected to receive there, behaved like a man distracted; and was with difficulty, and the joint authority of the basha and consul, hindered from turning Mohammedan, and betraying the whole secret; but was at length sent away with some small presents; and embarking for Surat, went and died at Hispahan§.

THE consul had at that time provided another string to his bow; viz. one La Noir, commonly called De Route, a creature of his, who was thoroughly acquainted with all the particulars of Morat's embassy, and was pitched upon by him on the like errand, and sent with the same character to the Abissinian court as from the French king. But this last met with a much worse fate than Morat; and after a tedious and dangerous voyage, and other disappointments, was at length assassinated by order of the king of Sanaar, after having been received at his first arrival with all the marks of favour and distinction due to his public character<sup>b</sup>. Some say that it was done pursuant to a private order which that monarch received from the Negus, or emperor, of Abissinia; and others, that his death was owing to a<sup>f</sup> dislike which the gradees of Sanaar had taken against him, on account of his too great intimacy with the then prime minister Ali Zogoyer: and a letter was afterwards trumped up, pretended to be written by the Negus to the Pope, but since brought to his son Tekla Hai-manout, who had by this time dethroned him; which, if genuine, wholly clears him from having had any hand in that assassination. The misfortune is, that most of our accounts from those parts are so often contradicted by the opposite parties on both sides, that no sure depen-

* Vol. ii. p. 80, & seq. Hague edit. 12<sup>mo</sup>.
the Porte, ap. LE GRAND, p. 359, & seq.
& alib. pass.

† Id. Ibid. & p. 428, & alib. pass.

‡ See his apology addressed to the French ambassador at
§ Vid. LE GRAND, ub. sup. p. 162, & seq. 359, & seq. 393,

<sup>b</sup> Id. ibid. p. 170, & seq.

a ence can be given to them<sup>c</sup>; and this only we can be certain of, that his death not only put an end to that consul's project, but that the very notion of a mutual embassy so exasperated the clergy and people, that they readily joined with the emperor's son above-named to dethrone his father, as the encourager of it, though more probably quite innocent and ignorant of both.

But as we shall have occasion to say something more of these (whether pretended or real) Uncertain embassies in the following history, we shall only add here, that the author last mentioned whether the hath published some farther memoirs, written by several hands both for and against, but ambassy was which leave us still much in the dark about the validity and other circumstances of that true or false. embassy<sup>d</sup>, as well as how far the consul and some of the good fathers who assisted him in it, The jesuits pro-
b were innocent or guilty of all that strange artifice that was used to support and make it pass for current at the French court. But upon the whole, they do but too plainly shew, that its miscarrying was not owing to their want of zeal, or of using all possible endeavours to make it succeed, whether it was real or pretended.

But whilst the consul was taken up with the management of this affair, which his sanguine hopes made him consider as a matter of the greatest advantage both to the French commerce and to the Roman church, the jesuits, more refined politicians in things of this jest another nature, had projected and carried on to a great forwardness another scheme of their own, scheme, in which the Alexandrian patriarch joins with them. whom the Abissinian church wholly depends, had been so far wrought by those dexterous Sends an am- c fathers in favour of the Romish church, and the Pope's supremacy, as to dispatch an ambassador to the courts of Paris and Rome, with vast offers of assisting with all his power and authority the Romish missionaries, through all the countries belonging to his patriarchate, in re-uniting the Coptic church to that of Rome<sup>e</sup>. The person pitched upon for this embassy was one Ibrahim Chunnab, a Maronite, who was strictly charged to execute it with the utmost secrecy in both courts, whilst the good fathers loaded him with letters of recommendations and other encouragements, which procured him an honourable reception where-ever he came, but more particularly at the court of Versailles, where he was admitted to the royal presence, and caressed by all the prime ministers; and after a stay of about-four months, (that is from August 24 to November 25, 1702, during which time he was treated with all the honours of an ambassador) was dispatched with new credentials and recommendatory letters to the Pope, several cardinals, and other members of the society de propaganda fide. The misfortune was, that this project was so highly relished at the French court, that they thought it necessary to send their consul at Cairo express orders to act in concert with the patriarch and the jesuits, and to forward it with all his power; and this it was that occasioned its ruin; for the consul, whether out of dislike to it, or to those who had formed it, and who were the same that opposed his own, and exposed his ambassador as a cheat, or whether it was innocently done, divulged the whole secret by his imprudent conduct, and his publicly examining the old patriarch about it, who, now sensible of the imminent danger he was in, not only from the Turks, but from his own clergy and laity, had no other way to evade it, than by Whom the con- d denying the whole purport of Ibrahim's embassy, and alleging that the two letters he had entrusted him with to the Pope and the French king, were only letters of compliment, which he thought might be of service to him: Upon which the consul sent no less than three certificates one after another, to the court of Rome, signed by several monks and his own chancellor; all which were shewn to his holiness by cardinal Fabroni; so that he had not resided long at Rome, before he found a quite different treatment than he had met with at Paris, his public character not only questioned, but exposed as a vile forgery and imposition, and calculated only with a view of some considerable gain. The fathers of the mission of the Holy Land, a set of monks quite opposite to the jesuits, and who now acted under the consul's direction, were the most zealous of all in discrediting him, and exploding all he alleged in Whom the consul exposes as a cheat at Rome.
e his own defence. This obliged him to present a memorial to the Pope, complaining of the unjust methods which some people had taken to discredit his commission, and thereby to prevent the good intentions of the patriarch, and the so much desired conversion of the Ethiopians; and begging his holiness to send some proper person into Egypt, to be fully satisfied of the whole matter from the patriarch's own mouth, to the end that if he was proved a cheat, he might be punished as such; and if a faithful messenger, he might have justice done to his character. The proposal was thought so reasonable, that his holiness immediately appointed Don Gabriel, a Maronite, of the order of St. Anthony, to go to Kayro, which he did with all possible expedition, but spent near two years in that journey. His defence and memoir to the Pope.

<sup>c</sup> Vid. eund. ibid. & p. 436, 442, 449.
<sup>e</sup> Id. ibid. p. 164, & seq.

<sup>d</sup> See Dissertat. LE GRAND, ubi sup. p. 406, & seq. 421, & seq. 428, & seq. & alib. pass.

The patriarch complains against him
and the consul.

Message to the Pope.

Ibraim's legacy to the Pope justified and confirmed by the patriarch.

But no reparation is made to him.

Is shipwrecked in his way home.

The Abissinians more jealous and irreconcilable by those ambassies.

And our accounts thence more uncertain.

BUT not long after his departure, Ibraim received a letter from the Alexandrian patriarch, a telling him, that he was surprized to find, that, instead of observing the secrecy he had so earnestly enjoined him, he had so far divulged that important affair, that it had reached the ears of the French consul at Kayro, and all that part of the world; insomuch that the fathers of the Holy Land were come in one body to question him in a public manner, whether it were true that he was come over to the Latin church, and had sent an express messenger into France, to confirm an alliance with it; that upon his asking them what reason they had to put such interrogatories to him, they answered, they were ordered by the court to do so; upon which he told them, that the letters which he had given to him were only for his private service. He then desires him to go and acquaint the Pope, that he had assembled all the bishops under him to consecrate the oil which is used at the coronation of the Abissinian monarchs; a thing which had not been done during the space of twenty years; and to beg his holiness's blessing upon it. He received another some time after, in which he tells him, that he had finished the consecration of the holy oil, and had sent some of it into Abissinia by the hand of father Bisbot, a jesuit, who was to go privately into that country, in company with Du Route, lately mentioned, whom he had entrusted with a letter to the emperor, and another to the Abissinian abuna, or patriarch's delegate there. In both those letters he acknowledges Ibraim to be his agent and confident, and himself to be an humble dependent on his holiness, to whom, as such, he gave an account of his actions; so that, if these letters were really sent by that patriarch (G), nothing could more effectually justify the character of Ibraim against the clamours which the Holy Land missionaries had raised against it at the court of Rome. But what did it still more effectually, was the return of father Gabriel from Kayro, who confirmed all the particulars of Ibraim's ambassy, as well as the contents of the two letters above-mentioned, in a new one, which he brought from the patriarch to the Pope.

IBRAIM, thus justified by so many unquestionable hands, was very pressing at the Romish court for a proper reparation to his character; but after many delays and excuses, was told, that Rome was not a proper place to obtain justice against the fathers of the Holy Land; and that as to the French consul, he must apply to the French court for redress. At which being highly dissatisfied, he left that city about the end of the year 1705, leaving behind some presents, which the Pope had designed to send by him to the Alexandrian patriarch, but which were afterwards conveyed to him by another hand. Ibraim was soon after shipwrecked on the coast of Cyprus; and having lost all his effects, and the greatest part of his papers, and obtaining a certificate of his misfortune, went and settled at Saïde<sup>f</sup>; which put an end at once to his public character and ambassy, and to this promising and deeply concerted scheme of the society, as they had done to that of the French consul.

CAN we therefore wonder at the vigilance of the Abissinian monarchs to keep all the avenues to their territories so strongly and closely guarded against all approaches of the Europeans, when they see what plots and contrivances they are capable of, what dangers, labours and expences they will expose themselves to, and what their views and designs tend to, in endeavouring to gain at any rate a fresh entrance into them? On the other hand, where there reigns such jealousy and emulation, not to call it by a worse name, between those missionaries of different orders, who yet profess to have the same meritorious views, the reducing of that whole country under the Pope's subjection, can it be at all surprising that the accounts we have from thence should come to us so lame and dissonant, unsatisfactory, and misrepresented by the opposite actors and writers of them? We cannot finish these remarks on the conduct and relations of those indefatigable zealots, better than with the words of one of

<sup>f</sup> LE GRAND, ubi sup. p. 166, & seq. 478, & seq.

(G) Whoever hath read the different accounts we have of these transactions, and the many pretended anecdotes that have been trumped up by both sides, in plain contradiction to each other, will easily agree with us that this caveat is far from impertinent; and that if both parties do without a scruple charge each other with sundry forgeries of this nature, we shall not be censured for too scrupulously calling any of them in question.

But this letter of the patriarch's is still more liable to suspicion, even allowing him to have been as zealous for the church of Rome and the Pope's supremacy as the jesuits represent him, as it exposed the writer, not only to the loss of his patriarchate, but of his life; especially at this particular crisis, when all the Roman missionaries had been expelled out of the Turkish empire, under the severest penalties; and, on the other hand, the Alexandrian clergy and laity were so justly alarmed at the public manner in which the consul and his Holy Land fathers had questioned him about his legacy and conversion.

Whom could he confide such a dangerous witness against himself with? How could he be sure that the messenger would not betray him, or be intercepted in his voyage to Rome?

But for Ibraim or his patrons to counterfeit such a letter, had nothing either so hazardous or difficult, and may the more easily be supposed to have been the case, as we do not find that either the Pope, or society de propaganda fide, paid any great regard to that, or to the next which he produced from the same patriarch; and we may add, to the confirmation which father Gabriel brought with him from Kayro, as may be reasonably inferred from their avowed refusal to make due reparation to his character, and the strange manner in which he was dismissed from that court; which behaviour can hardly be any otherwise interpreted, than as a plain discountenancing of the whole affair, and putting an effectual end to that negotiation, without publicly exposing those who had set it on foot.

- a the most sagacious among them. They seem, by the tenor of them, to be directed to the French consul above-mentioned, though his name is carefully avoided, and are to this effect.
- “ I never did myself the honour to speak to you about this new invention of ambas-“ fies, nor about the envoys which it hath set on foot, Signor Morat and Mr. Du Route.
 “ You have doubtless had a more ample account of that matter at Kayro; it being of such “ a nature, that the bare recital at once discovers and destroys what money and obscurity had “ kept up. It was not possible to discover in France, things that had been concerted at such “ a distance from it. Had that court been rightly informed concerning those two Ethiopic “ embassies, the French would not have risked their lives in those countries, nor the public “ money been so lavishly spent upon them. But that scene is now at an end; and the court b “ will learn all the main particulars relating to it from you. I shall only add, that though “ there were no danger to be feared from the unbelieving Mohammedans, and other savage “ nations and hot climates through which one must pass, they would be sufficiently felt in “ Ethiopia itself. The Abissinian Christians are under subjection to the patriarch of Alexan- “ dria; they are born and brought up in that belief and dependence: they have been under “ it from the earliest ages of the church, and of that patriarchate, in the same manner as “ France, Spain, &c. have been under that of Rome. To endeavour at this time to alter “ that dependence, is to endeavour to change an ancient law or custom, which is impracti“ cable; and for one man to act alone in it, and without assistance, can never be the way to “ succeed in it. The same thing had been formerly attempted by the way of the Atlantic c “ ocean, but to as little effect. To succeed in an attempt of this nature, one should begin “ at the foundation, and its chief, that is, at the church and patriarch of Alexandria, which “ are no less obliged than the rest to acknowledge the superiority and supremacy of Rome;
 “ and then you may hope, by their joint assistance, to meet with better success in Abis- “ sinia *.”

By this time we hope our readers are so well apprised of the character of the several writers who have obliged the world with their relations of Abissinia, and the various motives, views, and interests, which have occasioned that great variety which is found in their respective accounts of that country, and of those transactions which they have either been witnesses to or concerned in, that they will be less liable to be biased to, or imposed upon by, either side; so that we d may now more safely venture to lead them through the several parts of this history.

* Vid. LE GRAND, ubi sup. p. 434, & seq.

S E C T. II.

The situation, division, various names, extent, limits, provinces, &c. of the Abissinian empire; with an account of the Gallas, and their several conquests.

- e THIS empire is situated entirely under the torrid, and, as some imagined, uninhabitable zone; and lies between the 8th and 17th degrees of north latitude, and between the 31st and 40th of west longitude from our London meridian. The former is taken by drawing a strait line from the old country of Focay, lying a little above Swakem, and forming its northern boundary under the 18th degree, quite to that of Bergamo, its utmost southern boundary, which lies under the 17th, and will consequently be about nine degrees in length. But as at this present time the country of Focay is dismembered from the empire, (so that we must reckon only from one degree above Mazowa, that is from the 16th to Bergamo above mentioned) it will be still shorter by one degree. Hence appears the great error of old geographers, who extended its southern limits so far beyond the equinoctial line, as to place the f head of the Nile several degrees south of it; which is, by the latest and most accurate observations, found to be almost 13 degrees on this side of it<sup>a</sup>.

THE breadth of the empire is commonly computed from the coasts of the Red-Sea, eastward, to the banks of the Nile, in that part where it winds itself most westward, and surrounds the greatest part of the kingdom of Gojam, in the form of a peninsula, and where it extends itself somewhat above nine degrees, or, according to Almeyda, who had travelled it over more than once, about 140 Portuguese leagues<sup>b</sup>. In other parts, however, both southwards and northwards, those limits are much contracted, as the reader may see by the map annexed; but not to such a degree as to require a farther descant.

THIS empire, however, hath formerly been vastly more extensive, having been since stripped of above one half of those kingdoms and provinces which were once subject to it; Kingdoms and provinces subject to it.

<sup>a</sup> ALMEYDA, MENDEZ, LOBO, et al. pl.

<sup>b</sup> Id. ubi sup.

the greater part of which were either invaded by the Gallas, a barbarous people we shall have a occasion to mention in the sequel, or revolted from it. Of these latter, some had made themselves independent, and had princes of their own; and others had put themselves under the protection of the Mohammedans, long before the Portuguese set foot into it, and several others have done the same since, out of dislike to the extraordinary partiality which some of the Abissinian monarchs had expressed for the church of Rome, as we shall see in the sequel of their history. How many more may have followed their example, since we have lost all correspondence with those parts, time may perhaps discover: however, as to those kingdoms or provinces which were still in subjection to the empire at the time when Don

Those that are dismembered
from it.

Alphonso Mendez was there, they are as follows. Among the first, 1. Tigre, 2. Dambea, 3. Begameder, 4. Gojam, 5. Amabara, 6. Dancali, 7. Narea, and 8. part of Xaoa. The latter are, 1. Mazaga, 2. Salent, 3. Ogara, 4. Abargale, 5. Holcuit, 6. Salgaad, 7. Semen, 8. Salowa, 9. Oleca, and 10. Douba; amongst which, some of the kingdoms, as well as the provinces, are wholly subject to the Abissinian emperors; and others are only vassals, and pay a kind of tribute to them of horses, corn, &c. according to their extent and fertility, as will be farther seen in the sequel.

THOSE that had been dismembered from it are as follow. 1. Argot, 2. Dowaro, 3. Ogge, 4. Balli, 5. Adea, 6. Almala, 7. Oxelo, 8. Gantz, 9. Bethzamora, 10. Guragua, 11. Buzana, 12. Suffgamo, 13. Babargamo, 14. Cambat, 15. Boxa, 16. Gumzr, 17. Conch, 18. Damot, 19. Doba, 20. Motta, 21. Awra, 22. Holeca, 23. Oylat, 24. Guedem, 25. Ganh, 26. Martvabet, 27. Manz, and 28. Bizamo. By the loss of these last, the extent and size of which the reader may see in the map, one may judge how greatly inferior this empire is to what it hath formerly been.

Boundaries and extent.

It is at present bounded on the north by the kingdom of Nubia, or Senaar; on the east, by the Red-Sea, and the coasts of Abex, or Abesh, which have been since dismembered from it, and make a province of the Turkish empire; and lower southwards, by the kingdoms of Dongali and Dowara, and part of the country of the Gallas; on the south, by lower Ethiopia; and on the west, by the river Maley, which divides it from Shankala, or the country of wandering Ethiopians, and falls into the Nile, after it hath run a good way into the Nubian

Inclosed on all sides.

dominions<sup>d</sup>. Hence it appears, that this empire, even when in its utmost extent, was for the most part inland, being contiguous to no ocean, except in that small part on the east, which adjoins to a tract along the coasts of the Red Sea, upon which the Abissinian emperors had formerly some considerable ports, whence they drove a commerce with other parts of the world; but since the Turks have made themselves masters of them, the whole empire is so inclosed on every side by variety of nations at enmity with, and beyond measure jealous of them, especially since they had given so kind a reception to the Portuguese, that all access to it from any side is become, if not absolutely impracticable, at least extremely difficult and dangerous, as was hinted a little higher<sup>e</sup>.

Supposed the ancient kingdom of Sheba.

THIS country, whatever its extent may have formerly been (A), is with no small probability believed, by most learned men, to have been the Sheba of the Old Testament, whence that great queen, whom Josephus calls Nicaulis, and styles queen of Egypt and Ethiopia<sup>f</sup>, and the Evangelists queen of the south<sup>g</sup>, who came from those remote parts to hear the wisdom of Solomon<sup>h</sup>. It is likewise believed to have been the kingdom of the famed queen Candace, styled queen of Ethiopia, whose eunuch, or, as he is there called, her high treasurer, or prime minister, came to worship at Jerusalem; and, in his return homewards, was baptized by Philip the deacon<sup>i</sup>, and from whom the Abissines acknowledge they afterwards received the

And of the queen Candace.

<sup>e</sup> Id. ibid. vid. & DAVITY, DAPPER, LUDOLPH, PONCET, & al. PONCET, LUDOLPH, & al. sup. citat. <sup>f</sup> See before, p. 166, & seq. <sup>g</sup> Ant. l. viii. c. 2. <sup>h</sup> 1 Kings, x. pass. See Anc. Hist. vol. i. p. 801. <sup>i</sup> Acts viii. 26, & seq.

(A) By this we do not mean only whilst it held those above mentioned provinces which have since revolted from it, but that much vaster extent which it is affirmed to have had when it spread itself from the Red-Sea to the kingdom of Congo westward, and from Egypt to the Indian sea southward; at which time it is said to have contained no less than thirty-four large kingdoms, and about eighteen considerable provinces (1); which prodigious extent may be justly looked upon as no less fabulous, as the pretended lineal descent of their monarchs, through an uninterrupted series of the same imperial family, from Ham, the son of Noah, the founder of their monarchy, down to Basilides, who so kindly invited the jesuit missionaries, an. 1624. and gave them those great encouragements to establish the Pope's authority in that empire, which we have taken notice of in the foregoing section.

But not to dwell on such improbabilities, we may justly enough join opinions with many great and learned men, that their dominions, in ancient times, extended still much farther than they are allowed to have done, before those large provinces and kingdoms were dismembered from them; and that it might then include those of Nubia, Habex, and Ajam, so as to be bounded on the north by Egypt, and the Barcan deserts; by the Red-Sea and eastern ocean, on the east; by Zanguebar and Nigritia, or Negro-Land, on the south; and by Nigritia, and Zabara, on the west; or, in other words, all the vast tract of land that lies between the 5th and 20th degrees of north latitude, all which was included under the common name of Western, or African, Ethiopia (2), as distinguished from the Eastern, or Asiatic (3).

(1) Vid. Lobo, ap. Le Grand Relat. de l'Empire d'Abissin. p. 63, & seq. (2) Id. ibid. vid. & Tellez, Histoire General d'Ethiop. Ludolph, & al. sup. citat. (3) De his vid. Homer. Odyss. l. ii. Herod. l. ii. iii. & vii. Dionys. Hesiod. & al. vid. & anc. Hist. vol. vii. p. 179, & seq. D'Herbelot Bibl. Orient. sub. Habsh.

a gospel. With what pomp and magnificence the former paid her solemn visit to the Hebrew monarch, both the sacred text, and Josephus, informs us <sup>k</sup>; and the grand manner in which the minister of the latter travelled to and from Jerusalem, gives us reason to think she was not inferior to her in power and magnificence: and we are farther assured, by some of the ancient writers <sup>l</sup>, that this country was commonly governed by queens, and that a good number of them had already reigned there in their time, under the name, or rather title, of queens. Candace, supposed to have been common to them all, as that of Pharaoh was to all the kings of Egypt; the term Candace importing their sovereign authority (B).

AGAIN, that this country is the so much celebrated island, or rather peninsula, of Merce of the The ancient ancients, whose queens are said to have borne that common name, or title, we have already so Meroe.
b plainly shewn in our ancient history <sup>m</sup>, against those who have placed it in Egypt, or anywhere else, that we shall not need any farther proofs for it here. Lastly, this country is supposed by many moderns to be the so much sought-for dominions, whether real or imaginary, over which Prester John is pretended to have been sovereign; and are still called after his name by them, as we shall see in some of the subsequent paragraphs.

It is indifferently called Abissinia, Abyssinia, Abessinia, and Abassia, but more properly Its various Habessinia, with a strong aspiration from the Arabic Habesh, which signifies, a mixture, or names. confusion; the country being peopled by a mixt variety of nations <sup>n</sup>. If we may believe Strabo, that name was given to it on account of the vast wildernesses, and stony deserts Whence de- with which it abounds, and which the Egyptians call abasses. Some others conjecture it to rived.
c be taken from Abaxa, the capital city of the kingdom of Adel, whose monarchs were once masters of this <sup>o</sup>; all which etymologies another judicious author, with no small shew of reason, rejects, as uncertain and frivolous; and thinks the name of Abissinia to have no more certain signification, than those of many other kingdoms, better known to us by our acquaintance with the people, than by the original of their denominations <sup>p</sup>. However that be, it is plain the Abissinians themselves absolutely reject both the name and its etymons; and affect to call themselves Itjopians, and their country Mangbesta Itjopia, or kingdom of Ethiopia, which is one of the principal names by which that was known to the antients <sup>q</sup>; though that be rather an epithet to denote the blackness of its inhabitants <sup>r</sup>. As for the distinguishing epithet of Upper, it may have been given to it either on account of the Nile's d descending from it into the Lower, or on account of its being nearer than it to the Arctic pole, which, with respect to us, is always above us, according to the verse of Virgil,

Illic vertex nobis semper sublimis <sup>s</sup>.

BUT there is one name which the Portuguese, tho' without any foundation, have bestowed Whence called upon this empire, or rather emperor; viz. that of Prester John, Presbiter John <sup>t</sup>, or, as Prester John's some others have turned it, Preste or Precious John <sup>u</sup>. As this imaginary monarch, and his dominions, which seem wholly to owe their origin to some French missionaries of the Holy Land, have been sought for in vain in India, and other parts of Asia, and been since translated by the head and shoulders into Afric, and fixed in this very Abissinian empire, without the leave or knowledge either of its emperor, or of any of his subjects, we might perhaps reasonably excuse ourselves from entering further into that dispute, which, tho' of more curiosity than moment, hath exercised the heads and pens of many learned men to so little purpose; especially as the most judicious among them have given up the notion of such a priestly kingdom as chimerical. Nevertheless, as many of our English readers may be desirous to know by what mistake or artifice this name came to be fixed to this empire, it will

<sup>k</sup> Ub. sup. vid. & 2 Chron. ix. pass. <sup>l</sup> PLIN. l. vi. c. 29. STRAB. l. xvi. c. 17. <sup>m</sup> Vol. vii. p. 190, & seq. <sup>n</sup> Vid. LUDOLPH Hist. Ethiopia, l. i. c. 1. <sup>o</sup> MENDEZ Ethiop. l. i. c. 1. <sup>p</sup> MANUEL, ALMEYDA, ubi sup. <sup>q</sup> See Ant. Hist. vol. vii. p. 180. <sup>r</sup> Ibid. p. 183. <sup>s</sup> Georg. I. <sup>t</sup> Vid. J. DE BARROS, Decad. 3. l. 4. DIEG. DE CONT. GODINGHO, l. i. & al. <sup>u</sup> Id. Chron. Reg. EMAN. c. 6. Vid. & MENDEZ, LOBO, & al.

(B) The first of these queens, whose name the sacred text doth not mention, the Abissinians call Nicaula, and Macheda; and the translation of their gospel, Nagbista izeb, or queen of the south. They shew, to this day, the town where, they pretend, she kept her court; which, by its ruins, appears to have been a very considerable place. There is likewise another village, which they call Saba, or Shiba Land, and believe it to be the place of her birth (4).

The second of these queens they call Judith, and believe to have been converted, by her own prime minister, to Christianity, and to have been very zealous in propagating it through her empire. So that, according to them, this empire received the Jewish religion from the former, who had been converted to it by king Solomon; and the Christian from the latter, who was converted to it by Juda, her high treasurer, after he had been baptized by the apostolic deacon above-mentioned (5).

(4) Tellez, Almeyda, Ludolph, Lobo, & al. vid. Le Grand Relat. ub. sup. p. 64.

(5) Id. ibid. & seq.

That title not known in any part of Abissinia.

not, we hope, be thought foreign to our general design of this work, if we give them in a few words the best account we can meet with of it among the writers of that controversy<sup>w</sup>; for it plainly appears from the unanimous consent of all the Portuguese who have been in Abissinia, and more particularly from that of the Jesuits, and other religious missionaries, who were sent thither, several of whom have travelled thro' that whole country from end to end, over and over again, that there was not the least trace or footstep to be found of any such name or title as that of Prefter or Presbyter John; nor any of the natives that knew, or had ever heard of, any emperor so stiled or dignified, or any thing in their language that bears any analogy or allusion to it; but, on the contrary, seem to be surpris'd, to hear that the Portuguese had taken that unheard-of notion of their Negus, or emperor, and his dominions, being stiled Prefter John<sup>x</sup>.

Prefter John's dominions in Asia.

Christians of St. Thomas there.

Prefter John the common name of those kings.

Other arguments to prove it.

ON the other hand, it appears from Marco Paulo, and other travellers, that there was such a great and potent empire in Asia, whose sovereign was a Christian, and was stiled the Presbyter John, but was a Nestorian, and subject in spirituals to the patriarch of Babylon; all which hath been so fully proved by the learned authors quoted above, that nothing material hath been since offered by the other side to disprove it. Of these heretical Christians, or, as they are commonly called, Christians of St. Thomas, or of the mountains, the reader may see a learned and succinct account in the relation of the patriarch Dom. Alex. Monefes's journey through those parts, by Father Ant. de Govea. The monarch above-mentioned reigned in the mountains of India; and his name being Jochannan, which in the Hebrew, Syriac, &c. being the same which the Latins and Greeks render Joannes, and we John, was the common name of all the monarchs of that empire, as that of Pbaraoh was to all the kings of Egypt<sup>y</sup>, and that of Cæsar to all the Roman emperors, &c. The title of Prefter, which is only a corruption or abbreviation of that of presbyter, was given them, it seems, on account of their having the cross carried before them, in the same manner as it is before the Romish bishops. To these authorities above-mentioned, we might add some others mentioned by the judicious Du Cange, in confutation of that exploded notion of Abissinia being the country or dominions of Prefter John; viz. a letter from Pope Alexander III. still extant in Raoul. de Dicet. in Matthew Paris and Brompton, written an. 1180 or 1181, to the monarch above-mentioned, inscribed, by that pontif, Illustri et magnifico Indorum regi, et sacerdotum sanctissimo: To the illustrious and magnificent John, king of India, and most holy priest. A second from Geoffry, prior of the Dominican friars, mentioned likewise by Matthew Paris; and a third, the testimony of William of Tripoli, quoted by Gerard Mercator, Marco Paulo (C), Vincent de Beauvois, and Sanutus, all of whom concur in confirming the contrary opinion, that Prefter John's dominions in question are no-where to be found but in Asia<sup>z</sup>, notwithstanding all the specious glosses which some other authors have made use of to invalidate so great an evidence. But we shall remind our readers of a much stronger still, and which we have just hinted at in a former volume†; viz. a full account of that Asiatic prince, his dominions, and other particulars, from indubitable authority, but which did not come to our hands till after the whole history of Asia, where it properly belongs, was printed off, and all the volumes relating to it completed; upon which account we were obliged to postpone it to the end of this extensive work, where we shall subjoin a supplement of all the material articles which may have been omitted or overlooked in the course of this Modern Universal History.

How it came to be brought into Abissinia.

THE next question, therefore, that naturally occurs, is, by what mistake or artifice it came to be translated into Africa, and fixed so positively in this Abissinian empire by the authors on the other side? What gave the first occasion to it was, without all perad-

<sup>w</sup> DE BARROS, ALF. MENDEZ, ALMEYDA, TELLEZ, LUDOLPH, GOES, GODINGHO, Hist. Ethiop. JARRIC, Thesaur. vol. ii. c. 14. & al. plur. <sup>x</sup> Id. ibid. vid. & LOBO, ap. Le Grand, ubi sup. p. 233, & seq. <sup>y</sup> See Anc. Hist. vol. i. p. 423. <sup>z</sup> DU CANGE Notes on Joinville ap. Le Grand, ubi sup. p. 234, & seq. † Vol. i. p. 665, & 714.

(C) This famous author, whose father had been employed a considerable time at the court of the Cham of Tartary, from which he returned anno 1272, and who had himself been brought up at that court, and had been intrusted by that prince in some considerable employments during the space of 17 years, says expressly, that Ung-chan, who was defeated by Genghis-chan, was Prefter John. Mercator likewise assures us, upon the testimony of Marco Paulo's father and uncle, who went a second time to the Cham of Tartary, as well as William of Tripoli, who passed with them into Armenia, that about the year 1038 Coirem Chan reigned over all eastern Asia; and that after his death, a certain pastor, or Nestorian priest, named John, subdued the whole country of Najam, and soon after the whole eastern empire under his government; and that the title of Prefter was given him, and superadded to that of king, on account of his priesthood (6). This kingdom the above-mentioned Geoffry affirms likewise to have been situate near Armenia. All which put together, and added to the authorities quoted above in the text, may be reasonably thought sufficient to fix this empire in Asia.

(6) Fid. Lobo Abiss. ap. Le Grand Relat. ubi sup. p. 234, & seq. & al. sup. citat.

venture,

- a venture, owing to the two first persons whom John II. king of Portugal, sent into Asia in search of it. This prince, as well as some of his predecessors, having conceived an extraordinary desire to find out this so much celebrated empire, in order to enter into an alliance of commerce and friendship with its opulent monarch, sent two of his subjects into Asia by land, to get what information they could about it. The one, called Peter Covillam, after a long and fruitless search after it, being returned from India to Kayro, found there some memoirs conveyed thither by Alphonso de Payva, the other person whom that monarch had dispatched upon the same errand, but was dead in his journey without having gained any certain intelligence concerning the land he went in search of. However, whether these memoirs furnished him with some hints towards finding it in this Abissinian empire, or whether mere hazard threw them in his way during his stay at Adem, Suakem, and other parts along the western coasts of the Red Sea, he there heard so much talk of the Abissinian emperor, in whose dominions he was, and of his being a Christian, and carrying a cross in his hand; that his subjects were all schismatic Christians, who had their bishops, secular and regular priests, sumptuous churches, abbeys, monasteries, and other traces of such a Christian empire as he was in search of, none of which had fallen in his way in any of those parts of India thro' which he had travelled, he was easily led to conclude that he had gone upon a wrong scent; and that this, if any, must be the happy spot so eagerly sought for by, and till now so little known to, the Portuguese. What might perhaps still more confirm him in this conjecture, was, that the emperors of this country were all of the priestly order, and must be ordained before they could be crowned; and, after that, still continued to execute the priestly functions. Whether he was really misled by these appearances, or weary of such a painful and fruitless search, or sought only to save his character by imposing upon the king of Portugal, we will not determine: but upon this slight foundation he immediately wrote to that monarch from Kayro, whilst he made himself ready to take a journey into Ethiopia, to make some farther discoveries, to give his notion a still greater currency both at that court and other parts of Europe, in which he succeeded even beyond his expectation. Pleasing news being usually rather hastily believed than scrutinised, his account met with such a general approbation where-ever it reached, that the Abissinian monarch was every-where dubbed and proclaimed the true Prester John, and that of Asia to be a supposititious one, owing perhaps probably to the inattention of the authors on the other side, and their not considering that Abissinia is frequently called India in Afric, or African India. However that be, by this pretended discovery of Covillam, the real Prester John was soon buried in oblivion, not only in Portugal, but all over Europe, and the supposititious one cried up and proclaimed in his room.

- WHAT seems to have farther contributed to confirm this latter in these his supposed dominions, is, that Marco Paulo makes his Prester John to have had his usual residence at Arkiko, a sea-port upon the coast of the Red Sea, and is the first town in Abissinia on that side, but since taken by the Turks. This is absolutely inconsistent with the notion of his reigning in the Asiatic India, much less in the kingdom of Chatay, because these two are at as great a distance from each other as Portugal is from Peru. To this we may add, that both the kingdom of Chatay, which is supposed the same Christian empire mentioned by S. Antonin, bishop of Florence, hath been since sought for with so much toil and labour by such numbers of travellers, especially the missionaries, thro' every part of Asia, and to so little purpose, so many monstrous lies written and published about it, that the very notion of any such monarchy hath been long since given up as chimerical by the far greater part of them; or, at most, that there remains nothing at present in all those eastern parts but the bare names of the fields on which this celebrated Chatay stood, and its emperor Prester John once reigned<sup>a</sup>; though there are still many, especially among the Portuguese, who firmly believe that this famous kingdom will one time or other be discovered and come to light again†.

- Thus far goes the account which those learned authors above quoted give us of the first introduction of this new title into Abissinia, which is the point we were most concerned about in this chapter, and about which they all unanimously declare their opinion; that both Covillam and Payva, who seem the first broachers of that notion, were certainly mistaken. However, as there are still very many, especially among the missionary fathers, who still persist in the opinion that there is no Prester John to be found out of the Abissinian dominions, so some of them have mustered up several fresh testimonies, which, if authentic, do at least prove that those emperors were acknowledged by the title of Prester John some score years before those two gentlemen wrote any thing about

<sup>a</sup> Jesuits Travels, by BALTH. TELLEZ, ch. i. John, p. 245, & seq.

† See the letter in LE GRAND's dissertation on Prester

The improbability of it.

F. Lobo's conjecture about the origin of that title.

The kingdom of Tigre described.

Kingdom of Tigre, its site and extent.

Metropolis of Axuma.

Its ruins.

Fremona, the residence of the Jesuits.

it to the king of Portugal. Of this nature is a letter from the grand master of Rhodes to the French king Charles VII. in which he informs that monarch of the dreadful overthrow which this emperor, whom he styles Presbyter Jobannes, Indorum imperator, had given to the Turks, &c. which letter bears date July 3d, A. D. 1448; whereas those two gentlemen were not sent in search of that empire till an. 1477. But, besides that the contents of that letter are contradicted by the history of those times <sup>b</sup>, if the title of Prester John was so long before known to belong to this Abissinian emperor, what need was there for sending Covillam and Payva to seek for him so far into India? and why to search for his dominions as for an empire altogether unknown to them, as well as those that sent them? The same objection will hold more strongly against what is urged from the letter of Pope Alexander to that prince, which we have mentioned a little higher, and of some others urged on the same subject; for they being still of much older date than that, makes it still more incredible that his title should have been so long known before at Rome, and yet be so far a secret to the king of Portugal, as to send so far to find it out; and, still more, that his two messengers should travel so far forward and backward before they could succeed in their search. But we have dwelt long enough upon this trite subject; and shall now close it with a singular conjecture of Father Lobo, concerning the origin of this priestly title, as it is related by Thevenot, to whom he communicated it, which is to this effect; That the Abissinians were very fond of making pilgrimages to the Holy Land, and more particularly about the time in which the French were engaged in their wars with the Saracens in Asia; so that by their frequent conversing with the French missionaries about their respective countries, government, &c. they might probably enhance the grandeur of their monarch by joining the priesthood to the other pompous dignities which that prince was possessed of; and these missionaries might become the first propagators of it in Europe: which conjecture, whether well founded or not, doth at least plainly intimate, that that good father, than whom none was better acquainted with that empire, could find out no other original for this new title of Prester John, than that of his brethren of the Holy Land, and therefore makes no difficulty to stile them the sole authors of it <sup>c</sup>.

We come now to give our readers a description of the several kingdoms which still compose this great monarchy; and shall begin with that of Tigre, or Tigra, as the largest and the most considerable in all respects, and as it is the nearest to the Red Sea, and the Turkish dominions and conquests. It hath Nubia or Sinaar on the north; the sea above-mentioned on the east; the kingdoms of Angot and Dancali on the south; and those of Dambea and Bagamender on the west. Its length, from north to south, which is taken from Mazowa (D), or Arkiko, now belonging to the Turks, to the desert of Aldoba and mount Sement, is computed about 300 Italian miles; and its breadth, from the same desert to the province of Bul, about half, or, according to others, almost the same <sup>d</sup>. What rendered this kingdom still more considerable before the loss of its two ports mentioned in the last note, was its metropolis of Axum, or Axuma, which was likewise that of the whole empire, and the place where its monarchs repaired to be crowned. We have formerly given an account of its situation, stately ruins, commerce, and other particulars <sup>e</sup>, from which one may judge of its former opulence, though it is now reduced to a poor village, scarcely affording shelter to an hundred inhabitants; yet, ruined as it is, the Abissinian monarchs are still obliged to receive their crown there.

ABOUT half a degree south-west of Axuma, or, as the Portuguese corruptly write it, Cathumo, or Cachumo, stands the town of Madgoga, so called formerly from the murmuring noise of a neighbouring rivulet. It hath since received the name of Fremona from the Jesuit missionaries, who had their residence in it, on account of one Father Fruementius, the first of their order that came into these parts. This place became still more celebrated by the long residence and death of Father Andrea de Oviedo, sent thither patriarch of Ethiopia by the

<sup>b</sup> See the letter in the Specilegium Patr. p. 556. & in LE GRAND, Dissert. 4. du Pretre Jean, p. 245, & seq. <sup>c</sup> LE GRAND, ubi sup. p. 133, & 146. <sup>d</sup> TELLEZ, LUDOLPH, LOBO, & al. <sup>e</sup> Ant. Hist. vol. vii. p. 184, 215, (H). Vid. & auct. sup. citat.

(D) Mazowa, Matzua, or Maqua, is a small island on the Red Sea, over-against Arkiko; which last is the first sea-port belonging to the continent of Abissinia. It was formerly a very considerable place, and lies under the 15th degree of N. latitude; but the Turks have since deprived the emperors of this valuable and convenient harbour, the best on the whole coast. From Mazowa, or Arkiko this kingdom extends itself about 11 or 12 leagues along the coast, as far as Dafalo, another sea-port, but less frequented on account of its shallowness. But even this the Turks have made themselves masters of, and thereby deprived the Abissinian empire of the only two harbours it had; which is justly reckoned an invaluable loss to it, as hath been lately hinted (5).

(5) De his, vid. Tellez, Ludolph, Almeyda, Lobo, Poncet, & al. plur. See also before, p. 168.

- a pope; since whose death it still continued the residence and seminary of all the missionaries of that order who came into Abissinia, the greatest part of whom lost their lives for the cause they came to preach there, the supremacy of the church and pope of Rome, until their final expulsion out of that whole empire, of which we shall give an account in its proper place. Other cities or towns are very few and mean, both in this kingdom, and every-where thro' the whole empire. This of Fremona hath been found to stand in 14 degrees and a half of N. latitude, and the whole kingdom lies between the 13th and 16th of the same, being reckoned of about the same extent with that of Portugal. It hath, according to the patriarch Mendez, 44 governments under it; but, according to Mr. Ludolph<sup>f</sup>, only 27, besides seven maritime ones, which are dismembered from it, and have governors of their own, whom
- b they stile Babrnagash, that is, overseers or superintendants of the sea; which prefectures, however, are not to be looked upon as so many distinct governments, seeing one Babrnagash may, and hath sometimes two or three of them under his command; so that, according to the last author, this kingdom, or viceroyalty rather, can have, at the most, no more than 34 districts or governments under it. How these different governments are regulated, will be seen in a subsequent section, to avoid repetitions; and we shall only add, that the extent of this kingdom, and variety of its governments, have in all probability been the main cause why some geographers have split it into no less than four distinct ones in their maps, one of which they call Tigray, which they place near the line; a second in ten degrees north, which they call Tigre; between these two a third, called by them Tigra Mabo; and a
- c fourth still farther, on which is that of the Babrnagash above-mentioned<sup>g</sup>.

Division of that kingdom.

Falsely split into four kingdoms.

CONTIGUOUS to Tigre, on the south, is the kingdom of Angot, formerly rich and fertile, but now almost ruined by the Gallas, who have dispossessed the Abissinian emperors of the greatest part of it; and the small remains they have left them have hardly any thing worth mentioning, except the poverty of its inhabitants. Angot kingdom ruined.

- THAT of Bagameder (E), or Bagamedri, lies west of that of Tigre, and runs almost contiguous to it, extending itself from it quite to the Nile. Its length is computed to be about 60 leagues, and its breadth 20, but was formerly much more extensive, several of its provinces having been dismembered from it, and joined to that of Tigre. A great part of it is very mountainous and rocky, especially towards the east, which is mostly inhabited by those
- d wild nations mentioned in the last note. Some towns, tho' much decayed, there are still left in this kingdom; particularly the metropolis of its name, where the viceroy is obliged to go and receive a fresh crown, besides that with which he is crowned at the emperor's court. This town, which is in all other respects inconsiderable, is seated on the small river Bachlo, or Baxillo, which divides this kingdom from that of Ambara, on the south side of it: the others are still less worth notice. It is divided into 13 governments, most of them fertile, and well watered by small rivers, besides the Bachlo above-mentioned, particularly the third in rank, named Dabr; which Ludolph's Gregory compares to Germany on those two accounts<sup>h</sup>.

Bagameder kingdom, its extent.

- THE kingdom of Amara, or Ambara, is contiguous to Bagameder on the south, and is divided by the Nile from that of Gojam on the west side. It is computed to extend itself about 40 leagues from east to west, and is considered as the most noble and honourable in the whole empire, upon several accounts: First, As it is the usual residence of the Abissinian monarchs, and consequently of the chiefest of the nobility. 2. On the account of its peculiar dialect, different from all the rest, and, by a new line of emperors brought up in it, is since become that of the whole court, and of the politer part of the empire. Here stand likewise the two famed rocks of Guechon, or Guexen, and Ambacel, where the princes of the blood were formerly confined and educated. Lastly, This kingdom is looked upon as the centre of the empire; and, though small in comparison of some others, hath nevertheless no fewer than thirty-six districts or governments, but concerning which we can find
- f little else but their names, which the curious may see in Ludolph's history<sup>i</sup>.

Kingdom of Ambara, why the noblest of all.

Its peculiar dialect.

FARTHER west still, and on the other side of the Nile, is the celebrated kingdom of Gojam, which is almost surrounded on every side by that river, excepting only on the north-east side, where it is inclosed by the Dembean lake; on which account, as hath been hinted a

Kingdom of Gojam.

<sup>f</sup> Lib. i. c. 3. & al.

<sup>g</sup> Travels of the Jesuits, from TELLEZ, c. 2. p. 9. LUDOLPH, DAVITY, DAPPER,

<sup>h</sup> Lib. i. c. 3. Vid. & TELLEZ, LOBO, & al sup. citat.

<sup>i</sup> Lib. i. c. 3. §. 8, & seq.

(E) So called, we are told, from the vast numbers of sheep that are bred in it; Meder signifying land or earth, and Beg a sheep (6). We may add, that the mountainous parts, which are mostly inhabited by the wild or wandering Agas, Gallas, and Caffres, are the chief pastures for them; those mountains affording great plenty of aromatic herbs to brouze upon, which gives their flesh an excellent taste and flavour (7).

(6) Vid. Lobo ap. Le Grand Differt. 3. de Nilo, p. 109. Poncet, & al. sup. citat.

(7) Id. ibid. Vid. & Ludolph, lib. i. c. 3.

little higher, it is now judged by most learned to be the island, or rather peninsula, of a Merce<sup>k</sup>. Its length, from north-west to south-east, is somewhat above 50 leagues; and its breadth, from east to west, where it is broadest, about 30. Both these sides are bounded by the Nile, which taking its spring at near the middle distance between them, and almost in the centre of the kingdom, as we have elsewhere shewn<sup>l</sup>, surrounds, and as it were intrenches it every way by the oval compass it takes about it, in return for giving birth to it.

THE country is fertile, but much higher and mountainous towards the middle, and those heights are mostly inhabited by a people said to be the descendants of Hagar, Abraham's Egyptian maid. The north-west part of the kingdom is likewise mountainous, and inhabited by the Agaus or Agaux, but different from those of the same name who live in the mountains of Lusta, and waged a long and bloody war against Soltan Segued, from whom they had revolted. These, we are speaking of, dwell mostly about the spring-heads of the Nile, and spread themselves a great way. They profess Christianity, but are much addicted to idolatry and superstition: in other respects they are not unlike the Abissinians<sup>m</sup>. We shall have occasion to speak of some of these stupendous mountains, among the natural rarities of the empire. We are told that some of the highest, towards the north part of this kingdom, are inhabited by Jews; but we are more apt to believe them to be some of the antient race of Abissinians, who still retain the old Jewish rites; for though it be scarcely doubted, that there are great numbers of Jews dispersed through the whole empire<sup>n</sup>, as they are every-where else, yet they are seldom known to prefer such desert habitations before the more inhabited plains and places of commerce: neither is it likely they would chuse to stay to bleach themselves on those inhospitable rocks, unless we suppose some rich mines to lie hid amongst them, which keep them more profitably employed.

THIS kingdom contains twenty districts or governments; a greater number of heathens than any other in the empire<sup>o</sup>. Northward of Gojam lies that of Dembea, which is parted from it by the lake of its own name and the Nile, and is one of the flattest countries in all Abissinia; on which account it is frequently overflowed by both, as well as by other rivers which flow from the mountains into them. It is not above 24 leagues in length, from east to west; and about 12 or 13 in breadth, exclusive of its lake. But if we add this to it, which is large enough to be stiled by the inhabitants the sea of Dembea, and spreads itself along the southern and south-east side of it, it will have above double that extent from north to south<sup>p</sup>. It hath some mountains of an extraordinary height, the chief of which we shall describe in their proper place. Some geographers likewise mention several considerable cities, and a good number of towns; and yet Mr. Ludolph, or his Abissinian abbot, mentions none of the former, and but that of Guba, or Gubai, among the latter, which he says is the queen's residence, as well as that of the emperor whenever he leaves the camp<sup>q</sup> (F).

HOWEVER that be, this kingdom is still considerable, on account of its having been the chief one in which the Abissinian monarchs made their usual residence, or kept their principal camp and court, in the time of the patriarch Mendez, to whom the emperor Segued gave the whole territory of Anfras, in order to induce the Jesuits and him to settle in it, who accordingly built some stately churches and monasteries, which, together with the royal palace, greatly added to the magnificence of that kingdom. The viceroy of it hath 14 prefectures under him, and takes the title of viceroy of Dembea Cantiba; but on what account our authors do not tell us<sup>r</sup>. The natural and artificial rarities belonging to it will be mentioned in the sequel under their proper head.

THE last kingdom worth taking notice of is that of Narea, or Enarea, which is the farthest and last of them all, being situate under the 9th, and part of the 8th degree of N. latitude, and under the 30th and 31st of W. longitude. It was formerly governed by its own monarchs,

<sup>k</sup> See before, p. 169.

<sup>l</sup> See Antient Hist. vol. i. p. 177, & seq. vii. p. 187, & seq.

<sup>m</sup> TELLEZ, ECHINARD, LOBO, ap. Le Grand, ubi sup. Dissert. 2. p. 202.

<sup>n</sup> Vid. TELLEZ, & al. sup. citat. LUDOLPH, l. i. c. 9. §. 19. CODIC. l. i. c. 4.

<sup>o</sup> CORNEIL. LA MARTINIÈRE, & al.

<sup>p</sup> Lib. ii. c. 11. Vid. & CODIC. lib. i. c. 4.

<sup>q</sup> Lib. ii. c. 11. Vid. & CODIC. lib. i. c. 4.

<sup>r</sup> LUDOLPH, l. ii. c. 17, 18.

(F) Those geographers have done the same by almost every kingdom we have already spoken of, as well as by some others that are to follow; and yet Mr. Ludolph's Gregory assures us, that there are not above five or six towns in the whole empire worth taking notice of, including the metropolis Axuma, now almost ruined (8), and some others built by the Portuguese missionaries; and we shall have occasion to observe in its proper place, that this is by far the most probable, both from the genius and custom of the Abissinians, and from the testimony of those missionaries who appear to be best acquainted with this empire.

(8) See before, p. 172. Ludolph, Ethiop. l. ii. c. 11.

a who, as well as their subjects, were heathens; but, being since conquered by the emperor Sagbed, or Segued, somewhat above a century ago, as will be seen in the sequel, <sup>conquered and converted.</sup> were obliged to embrace Christianity, with all the errors of the Abissinian church; for, till then, no Jesuit or missionary had penetrated into their territories. But there is still a considerable part of it unsubdued, and perhaps unconverted; for that which is so, extends hardly above 30 or 40 leagues on either way. However, the whole kingdom is reckoned <sup>Rich and fertile: rich trade with the Caffres.</sup> rich and fertile, producing great plenty and vast quantities of cattle, and driving a very considerable commerce with the Caffres, who bring thither abundance of gold, which they exchange for clothes, salt, and other commodities.

b THE Nareans are, even by the Abissinians themselves, allowed to be the best and handsomest people in all Ethiopia. They are tall, stout, and well-shaped; and, in their dealings, honest, wise, faithful, and undisguised. They are also brave and warlike, and have always gallantly defended their country against the incursions of the wild and barbarous Gallas, though these have proved strong and numerous enough to subdue above half the Abissinian empire. The tribute they pay to the Abissinian emperor seems rather to proceed from their loyalty, than any force or obligation; as, on the one hand, they receive no assistance from him against those common invaders; neither, on the other, doth he keep any standing forces, garrisons, or fortresses, to maintain them in awe: and, should he moreover have occasion to do so at any time, he would find it a very difficult task, being seldom known to have any to spare, on account of the frequent revolts which happen in the heart of the empire; and, if he had, they must be obliged to pass through some of the territories of those barbarians. This kingdom is said by some authors to have mines of gold; but that probably is owing to the great quantity of that metal which the neighbouring Caffres bring into it; which they would hardly do, if the Nareans had any such rich mines of it; <sup>Gold mines, why concealed.</sup> unless we will suppose, as is most likely the case, that they, as well as those of other kingdoms of this empire, designedly conceal, and forbear seeking for them, lest the fame of them should move the Turks, or the plundering Gallas, to invade them, as they have frequently endeavoured to do, and deprive them at once of their liberty, and of the most valuable product of their country. Thus much shall suffice for the most considerable kingdoms that are still subject to the Abissinian emperors.

d THE provinces that continue to obey them are still in a worse case than those kingdoms, being not only heavily taxed by those princes, and cruelly oppressed by their governors, but likewise very much ruined by the Gallas; as are several of those other kingdoms who have revolted from their obedience, or been subdued by some neighbouring states, such as the Turk, the king of Adel, and others at war with the Abissinian monarchs; in all which there is little else to be seen but poverty and misery among the subjects, and griping avarice among those that govern them, as may be seen in almost every page of the Jesuits travels through those countries. But as we have had so frequent occasion to mention those Gallas, Galli, <sup>The Gallas, who, and whence.</sup> or Balli, as they are stiled, who have made such dreadful havock here, it will not be improper, before we go farther, to give our readers some account of those plundering barbarians, especially as they have got possession of so considerable a share of this empire, and have now in some sense acquired a large part, if not by far the largest part of it. For the better understanding of which, we must here take notice, that they are divided into eastern, southern, and western, according to their situation with respect to Abissinia. The eastern are seated along the frontiers of the kingdom of Tigre and Dancali, and have seized the greatest part of this last, together with those of Angot, Dowaro, Olfale, Xoa, &c. <sup>Their conquests and settlements.</sup> The southern extend themselves along the river Hoax, or, as Mr. Ludolph calls it, Howas, from the frontiers of the kingdom of Adel westward, and have made themselves masters of the greatest part of the kingdoms of Gomar, Bergumo, Guragea, Cambate, Ganza, Ceuta, Damota or Dumut, &c. The western spread themselves all along the river Maleg, where they possess those of Bizamo, part of Xoa or Shewa, Gaffat, Gonga, and some part of that of Gojam on the west; but how far up northwards, towards Nicoia, we are not told. Thus far had these wild people not only dismembered this great empire of a considerable number of its provinces, but likewise hedged it closely in on three sides in the time of the Portuguese first coming thither; and how far they have encroached into it after their expulsion, from which time those emperors became still weaker, and less able to suppress their inroads, for <sup>The emperor's want of force to suppress them.</sup> want of a sufficient number of forces, artillery, and garrisons to guard their frontiers, we can only guess from the distracted state of the empire at that time, both from the foreign wars and domestic broils that then raged on account of religion, and the partial preference which had been shewn to the Romish, against the national church, by the then reigning

<sup>a</sup> See Abbot GREGORY ap. Ludolph, l. i. c. 3. §. 12. Vid. & TELLEZ, LOBO, & al. sup. citat.

ALMEYDA, LUDOLPH; & al. sup. citat.

<sup>b</sup> Vid. int. al. ALPHONSO, MENDEZ, LOBO, & al.

LUDOLPH, l. ii. c. 16. TELLEZ, LOBO, DAVITY. DAPPER, & al. sup. citat.

<sup>c</sup> TELLEZ,

<sup>d</sup> Vid.

emperor Basilides; for it is not to be supposed that that fierce invading nation would let slip a any such opportunity of penetrating still farther into his dominions, when they saw him so powerfully beset from within and without (G).

Their original. THEIR origin is variously conjectured; the generality of the learned think them descended from the Jews; but whether from those whom Shalmanezzer king of Assyria, or Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon, transplanted from Palestine, or from those whom Titus Vespasian, Adrian, or Severus, expelled from thence, and settled in some of these parts of Ethiopia, they are not agreed. It is plain, however, that, 'bating the single ceremony which they retain amongst them, in common with the Jews, Arabs, Abissinians, &c. there is so little affinity in their religion, customs, manners, language, or even in their name (H), that we cannot but wonder how that notion came into their minds upon the evidence of one single b rite so common among most of the nations in these parts. Were we to be allowed to offer our conjecture about it from their name (and no more than a bare conjecture can be offered in this case), we should be more willing to allow both them and it to be of Celtic or Gallie extraction; that name signifying in that language, as we have formerly shewn *, stout or warlike, an epithet which the antient Celtes and Galli, or Gauls, took much pride in, and have made themselves famous by, not only in Europe, but in Africa, where they erected a powerful kingdom, and held it some centuries, with a bravery answerable to it, till, being at length driven from it by the Romans, they might go in search of new habitations farther towards these mountainous parts, as was customary for them to do, rather than submit to a foreign yoke, as the reader may see by what hath been said of them in the ancient c history z.

How they came to adopt the right of circumcision. THE only difficulty will be, how to account for their adopting, afterwards, the rite of circumcision, to which they seem to have been utter strangers, in all their other migrations and settlements; for in all other respects, we shall shew them to bear a greater resemblance to one another, than to any other nation we know of. But here may we not reasonably suppose, that upon their coming to settle in these parts, after their expulsion from their African conquests, at which time the Abissinian empire was both more extensive and flourishing, they might be prevailed upon to admit of this ceremony among them, which they saw was practised, not only in all dominions, but by all the neighbouring nations, far and near, either to ingratiate themselves the more effectually with them, or, which perhaps d is more likely, in order to get leave to settle amongst them; especially as we have formerly shewn, that this custom hath been received and constantly practised by several nations, who yet used it not in a religious or political, but in a physical sense; that is, to preserve health and cleanliness in those parts, to help procreation and fecundity a; and, accordingly we are told, at their first coming into these parts, they were neither Christians, Mohammedans, nor Heathens, having neither temples nor idols, nor hardly any knowledge of God. But that since they have been intermixed with the subjects of the empire, who are Christians, and

* See Ant. Hist. vol. ii. p. 242, & seq. & notes. See also their hist. in vol. vii. z Anc Hist. vol. ii. p. 251. vi. p. 525. vii. p. 242, & alib. pass. a See Ancient Hist. vol. i. p. 427, (R), vol vii. p. 201, (D).

(G) This strange invasion and devastation, we are told by the missionaries, had been in some measure foretold by their too zealous and strenuous patriarch John Bermudes, the same who came into Abissinia with the famed Christopher de Gama, and who, being banished on that account by the emperor Claudius, or, as he is otherwise called, Amal Segued, solemnly told that prince, upon his departure, that the empire would be shortly ravaged by swarms of black pismires, as a punishment for his obstinacy and treachery. Soon after which he saw all his dominions invaded by Turks, Moors, and Gallas, some attacking him on the south, others on the north, and especially on the east, where they stripped him of all his sea-ports on the coasts of the Red Sea; whilst the Gallas, who had attacked him on the south, gave him a fatal overthrow, in which he lost his life, as will be more fully shewn in the sequel (9).

(H) There is one etymon of their name insisted on in favour of this far fetched original, which would be scarcely worth mentioning, but for its palpable absurdity; viz. that the word Galla, or Calla, signifying milk in the Hebrew, they were so denominated from the whiteness of their complexion †; as who should say, milk-whites; but, besides that the milky whiteness is no where known to be the common complexion of the Jews almost in any country, much less in this hot one, it is plain to the merest novice in their tongue, that חלב cheleb, and חלבה, and not Galla, or Calla, signifies milk.

It must not be supposed, however, from this forced etymon, that they are really of a white complexion; for they are not only of as deep a tawny or black as any African, but look upon a white man with a kind of wonder and dislike *; nevertheless they may easily be supposed to have been white at their first coming into Afric, though they in time degenerated into downright tawny-moors; for such certainly were the Vandals, and other northern nations that came hither from Europe, and who might probably be deemed to be denominated Gallai, from their complexion, tho' that was the general name of their whole nation ‡.

(9) See Lobo ap. Le Grand. Relat. ubi supra, pag. 66, & seq. & alib. † Jesuits Travels, lib. i. c. 12.
* Lobo ap. Le Grand, p. 22. ‡ See Ant. Hist. vol. ii. p. 242. (B). vii. p. 241, & seq. 532, & alib. pass.

- a those of the kingdoms of Adel and Adea, who are Mohammedans, they have adopted circumcision, rather as a custom of the country (I), than as a religious rite *.

THIS seems still farther confirmed, by the account which the missionary fathers give us of their origin, upon the testimony of the Abissinians, and Mr. Ludolph, upon that of his abbot; the former believing, that they were some of the old inhabitants of the eastern coasts of Afric, that is, those of the Red Sea, from which they gradually spread themselves still nearer to the Abissinian frontiers; the latter affirming them to have been a band of discontented slaves, who, like all other banditti and free-booters, having gathered themselves into hords, or tribes, seized on all the territories they could get footing in, round about the Abissinian confines; and, taking the advantage of an unsuccessful war, which the emperor

- b was then engaged in against the king of Adel, first invaded his frontiers, and, by degrees, made themselves masters of the great number of out-provinces which we have lately mentioned; which account, when divested of that usual hatred and resentment which the Abissinians must naturally be supposed to have conceived against them, in consequence of that invasion, and the horrid ravages and cruelties that accompanied it every where, may probably amount to no more than this, that they came thither a tribe of exiles, that had been driven out of their old habitations, and, having been permitted to settle on the out-skirts of the empire, under the protection of its monarchs, took every opportunity that offered to them, not only to shake off their allegiance, but to seize on as many of his dominions as they found incapable to defend themselves against them, and to form themselves into independent states in those new conquests (K).

Now it would be difficult to shew, that this was ever the practice of the exiled Jews anywhere; but that it was that of those northern Galli, or Gauls, that over-ran so many kingdoms and provinces, in Europe, Asia, and Afric, is beyond all dispute; and that it was a constant maxim among them, which they publicly owned and gloried in, that the longest sword, or strongest arm, gave the justest title, we have formerly shewn<sup>b</sup>; neither did they ever lose sight of it in their practice, except when their power was unequal to it, we have almost as many instances as there are paragraphs in their history.

- d BUT these are not the only instances in which these Gallas resemble the ancient ones; one may find almost the same conformity run through their religion, government, martial discipline, manners, and customs, of which the reader may be an easy judge, by comparing the account we are going to give of the one, with what we have already said in the ancient history of the other<sup>c</sup>, only with this difference, which we hint here as a necessary caveat; viz. that as these of Abissinia, since their first arrival into this part of Africa, have hardly had any conversation, except with nations much more barbarous than themselves; such as the Caffres, Agas, Gafates, &c. it must not be wondered, if they are found, in some instances, degenerated from the nobleness, politeness, and martial valour, of those ancient ones; tho' even in this respect, we may safely take a second caution with us, viz. that our account of them, coming to us through the hands of the Abissinians, whose settlements they so forcibly and unjustly invaded, it is scarcely to be supposed that they should have done them strict justice in it, but rather, that they have either concealed or disfigured their virtues and good

* TELLEZ Travels of the Jesuits, l. i. c. 12. alib. pass.

<sup>c</sup> Vid. int. al. vol. ii. & vii. pass.

<sup>b</sup> See Anc. Hist. vol. ii. p. 252, & seq. vii. p. 370, &

(I) And we may farther add what father Lobo tells us *, who conversed some time among them, that it is not the children who are circumcised, but the men, and that not till they are past bearing of arms; which may be sooner among them than with us, because their young men are commonly their soldiery, who are allowed to live as it were at random; but after they have quitted that life, they are circumcised, live with their wives, and take care of their children, which till then were left loose to the wide world.

(K) It is not easy to guess at the time of their first settling in these Ethiopic dominions; but that of their first shewing themselves in the hostile manner above-mentioned, is supposed to have been about the year 1537, under the reign of the emperor David, otherwise siled Onag-Segued, of whom we shall speak more fully in the sequel; about which time, the moor Granbe, king of Adel, had waged a successful war against him, and subdued several provinces on that side; for that gave the Gallas, or Balli, such an encouragement to attack him on theirs, if they were not privately in league with, and instigated to it by, that king, that they entered his dominions with a numerous host, put all to fire and sword, and made themselves masters of a large territory on that side also (10).

Father Lobo reckons no less than six nations of them, that he must have passed through in his way to Abissinia by land, whom he found so fierce and uncivilized, that it quite discouraged him from pursuing his journey, through such vast desert and arduous tracts of ground as they occupied on that side, and made him try a new and more expeditious way, if any could be found, to reach the Abissinian court (11). By this one may guess how far the rest of them may have spread themselves on the two other sides of the empire, where they met still with less opposition than on this.

* Relat. de l'Abissinie, p. 22.

(11) Lobo 2d Voyag. ap. Le-Grand, p. 25.

(11) Tellez, Lobo, Almeyda, Ludolph, Davity, Dapper, & al. sup. citat.

qualities, if any they observed in them, and exposed their vicious ones in the most disadvantageous light.

- Their religion.* WITH regard to religion, they are allowed to acknowledge a supreme governor of all sub-lunary things, whom they call l'Oul; but whether they mean by it the heavens, or the sun, or the Creator of them both, we are not told; but it is only said in general, that they pay no outward worship; and that in this, as well as other parts of religion, they appear to be
- Cruel customs.* very ill instructed and ignorant<sup>d</sup>. They are also given to very strange superstitions, and have some barbarous customs amongst them; in some of which, if they are not belied, they
- Cruelty to their children.* seem to out-do even the wild beasts, particularly in their unnatural neglect of their own children, and, instead of breeding them up, and providing for them, as even the most barbarous nations are wont to do, during their tender years, leave them to wander at random, like little savages; by which means they contract, with their robust hardiness, a natural ferocity, which being afterwards improved, by their being so early initiated into the martial trade, they become not only stout and intrepid, but to a great degree brutal and cruel. They are taught the use of the sword, and that it is an honour and happiness to live by it, as giving the best title to every thing they possess, and being the most effectual means of preserving it: they are brought up to a desire of glory and conquest, and to despise slavery and death. Their youth are not allowed to cut their hair, the doing of which dubs them
- Their way of gaining esteem.* men, till they have killed an enemy, or some wild beast, such as a lion, tyger, leopard, &c. after which they are permitted to poll their heads, leaving only a lock on the top, as the Japanese, and other Indian nations do; and this inspires them with an uncommon ambition
- Bloody trophies.* to signalize themselves by their bravery, as the most effectual means of raising themselves into esteem, and obtain the more honourable seats at their councils, festivals, &c. for the greater number of these actions a man hath performed, the higher he is raised. For this reason, they take care to save all the heads of those enemies they have killed, as trophies of the greatest value; and whenever any contest, or doubt, arises about them, as when there is no beard upon them, and may be supposed to belong to a female, they have a law, which obliges the person to produce a more decisive part along with it, else they are not admitted. To prevent, therefore, all disputes, they are obliged to lay those trophies, that are gained in battle, before their proper officers, at the head of their tribes, as soon as the engagement is over: there they are publicly viewed and examined, and, if approved, are entered into
- Way of fighting.* the common register; after which, the owner hath liberty to carry them to his own tent, together with his share of the spoil or plunder, which is adjudged to him according to the share he hath had in the victory: by this method, all collusion and deceit is prevented, or else discovered and punished, it being every man's concern to discourage and detect all such false pretences to merit, as well as that of their commanding officers, to inflict an adequate punishment on the delinquents.
- Way of fighting.* THEY are no less severe in detecting and punishing their cowards and runaways. It is even a capital crime among them to give way after the onset is begun; so that they all fight either to conquer or die, neither giving, nor asking, quarter, and fall on with such vehement fury on the foe, that there is no possibility of making head against them<sup>e</sup>; and this is the reason they have gained so many signal victories over the Abissinians, though much superior in number and strength, and provided with better horses and arms than they.
- Way of fighting.* Whenever, therefore, the Gallas make any of their excursions into the territory of an enemy, instead of trusting to numbers, as the Abissinians and other Africans do, they commonly chuse a select number of determined youths, to the amount of 8,000, or 10,000 at the most, who, being all sworn to stand by one another to the last, fall on, and fight with such desperate intrepidity, as seldom fails of putting an enemy of twice or three times the number into a speedy disorder: and of this the great emperor Sultan Segued, who had often experienced their valour, to his own cost, was so sensible, that he was wont to say, "That
- Way of fighting.* "the Ethiopians never could stand the first shock of the Gallas; for which reason he always
- Way of fighting.* "suffered them to penetrate a good way into the country, that they might have time to
- Way of fighting.* "plunder and cool; and at their return, when they had loaded themselves with booty, and
- Way of fighting.* "were thinking only how to convey it home, and enjoy the prize, and their first fury much
- Way of fighting.* "abated, he then laid in wait for them in the way, and called them to account for what they
- Way of fighting.* "had got; by which means, he not only recovered the booty, but sacrificed their lives to
- Way of fighting.* "his resentment<sup>f</sup>."
- Mean cavalry.* THE Gallas, heretofore, had no cavalry among them, but have learned, since their coming into Ethiopia, to fight on horseback as well as on foot. Their horses, indeed, are mean, in comparison of those of the Abissinians; but yet they keep their ranks so close, and

<sup>d</sup> LOBO, & al. ap. LE GRAND, ub. sup. p. 66.
Jesuits letters, c. xii. lib. i.

<sup>e</sup> LUDOLPH, & al. ub. sup.

<sup>f</sup> Id. ibid. vid.

a engage in such good order, that an enemy seldom can stand the shock. The saddles they use are very light, plain, and easily made, and their stirrups thin and small, because they put not their feet, but only the great toe, in it; all which they have learned of the Abissinians, who all ride, the emperor not excepted, barefoot. Their weapons are the bow and arrow, and the dart, when they fight at a distance; at all which they are very expert, and the sword among those of high rank, and the club and pole, with one end hardened in the fire, when they come to close engagement: they likewise have the use of shields, which are commonly made of strong bull's or buffalo's hide. Way of riding. Weapons.

THEIR government shews itself no less of Gallic extract than their martial discipline. They have no kings, but are divided into a great variety of tribes, (some make them amount to above sixty) each of which chuses a chief, or general commander, whom they call luva, lowa, or lubo<sup>b</sup>, from among themselves, every eight years, or oftener, if one dies before that time, and him they obey as their prince or sovereign. The first thing which those luvas do, after they are chosen, is to signalize themselves by some plundering inroad into the empire, at the head of a select flying army, killing and ravaging where-ever they come, sparing neither quality, age, sex, or place, in order to gain to themselves and soldiers a stock of wealth and fame; so that it seems as if this unfortunate empire was their granary and magazine, where they go for a supply of all their wants. At his return from this first irruption, which they stile dela gritto, or general muster, because it is out of that that he picks up his select flying camp, his authority is confirmed, which reaches only to military affairs, that is, to convene the great council at proper seasons, where all civil matters are finally decided, peace or war resolved; and if the latter, he commands in chief, and distributes to the respective officers under him their several posts and commands; and in the like manner when the war or expedition is over, assigns to each man their proper honours and rewards, according to their merit and behaviour: but if any discontent, or matter of complaint, arises, the national council hath then alone the power to confirm, alter, or abrogate his former sentence or decree; but whether to depose them for male-administration, we are not told; though that is most likely to be the case, among such a fierce and warlike people<sup>1</sup>. To give our English readers some idea of the wretched state, and mock grandeur, of these octennial monarchs, we shall oblige them with the description which father Lobo gives us of one of them, and his court, and of the reception and treatment he met with there; but which, to give it no better place than it deserves, we shall subjoin in the following note (L); neither did we find the subjects much better bred; for having had the complaisance to tear a white handkerchief into a good number of slips, and divided it among them to satisfy their avidity after it, they became so greedy and troublesome for more, and gathered in such tumultuous troops about him, that, to avoid their fury at his refusal, he was forced to barricade himself, and his four Portuguese companions, in his hut, and to fire a gun over their heads; the noise of which laid them all flat on the ground, and soon frightened them into a deep submission<sup>2</sup>. They are nevertheless so proud, with their excessive poverty, that they neither till, sow, or plant, or gather any thing that the land produces, except, perhaps, when they snatch a cudd out of a cow's mouth to put it into their own; that being reckoned a most delicious morsel among them; so that all their spacious plains and vales only serve to afford their cattle such food as the earth naturally brings forth. They look after their cattle, drink their milk, and eat their raw flesh, which is all their food, except, perhaps, human flesh, which we are told they likewise eat<sup>3</sup>; so easily are their hunger and thirst satisfied. They have not the use of bread, nor of any succedaneum to it; but when they find any in the

<sup>1</sup> See Anc. Hist. vol. vii. p. 366, & seq.

<sup>2</sup> TELLEZ, LUDOLPH, & al.

<sup>b</sup> LOBO, ub. sup. p. 23. TELLEZ, LUDOLPH, & al. ub. sup.

<sup>3</sup> LOBO ub. sup. Voy. 2. p. 22, & seq.

* LOBO ub. sup. p. 19.

(L) Being obliged, says the good father, to pay my respects to the lubo, or king, in order to discover a new way into Ethiopia, I found him with all his wives and flocks about him; the place where he received me being a hut, thatched with straw, but somewhat larger than those of his subjects. His manner of giving audience to strangers is somewhat singular: he appears seated in the midst, with all his courtiers about him, sitting against the wall, each with a goad, or staff, or club, in his hand, longer or shorter according to his rank; the longer, the more dignified. As soon as the stranger enters the place, all those courtiers fall foul upon him, and bastonade him, till he has regained the door, and got hold of it with his hand; upon which they return to their seats, and he is complimented, as if nothing like it had been done to him. I myself, says he, did not fare one jot better, notwithstanding the peaceable and friendly offices that had passed between us; and when I asked the meaning of so strange a ceremony, I was answered, that it was to make those that came among them sensible of the valour and bravery of their nation above all others, and how reasonable it is for them to behave submissively to it. And well might they think so, seeing they hardly know any other people, except those indigent wretches that cross over mountains and forests to traffick with them; yet, adds our author, they have such high esteem for the Portuguese, that they stile them the gods of the sea (12).

(12) Lobo, ap. Le Grand Relat. de l'Abissinie, Voy. 2. p. 23, & seq.

Their reason for it.

Strange way of repelling their enemies.

*Good qualities.
Faithfulness.
Regard for their oaths.*

Zeal of some of their converts.

Abissinian countries, where they make their frequent inroads, they seize greedily on it, and eat it with a good appetite, yet will not this induce them to sow any corn in their own lands: and this reason they give for it, that the Ethiopians, and other enemies, may not be tempted to invade them, and reap the benefit of their labour; for it is their constant custom, whenever they find any neighbouring states to pour in their troops among them, to retire into some remote parts, with all their families and cattle; which last is all their wealth; the carrying away of which, is carrying away all: so that the enemy, finding nothing to subsist upon, during the several days march, and the long barren tracts they have still to go over, to come at them, they must of course be obliged either to go back, or perish; for neither the Abissines, nor any of their neighbours, have the forecast to make a sufficient provision of food and drink for such long journies; and, finding two such powerful enemies as hunger and thirst, in the way between them, are more effectually repulsed, than they could have been by all their weapons and brutish bravery. To this strange warlike policy it is, that they are able to secure their conquests against an enemy, in all other respects, superior to them; and to defend themselves, without striking a blow, against them; whilst their poverty, and the barrenness of their country, is as effectual a barrier against all invasions<sup>1</sup>.

THE Gallas are not, however, without some good qualities; they are honest, and true to their promise, and are never known to violate an oath. Their ceremony of taking of them, is, by bringing a sheep to the place, and anointing it with butter; after which, the persons, or if it be taken in the name of a tribe or family, the heads of it, lay their hands upon its head, and solemnly protest, that they will religiously observe every part of their engagement. The explanation they give of this ceremony is, that the sheep is, in some sense, the mother of all that swear, and the butter is an emblem of the mutual love of the mother and her children; and, consequently, that a man ought never to violate an oath which he hath taken upon the head of his mother<sup>m</sup>. They have given, likewise, some further marks of their fidelity and good disposition, both at the emperor's court, and in sundry noblemen's houses, where they had been bred up, and where they proved so tractable and docile, as not to be exceeded even by the Abissinians themselves. But that which crowns all, if not exaggerated, is, that some of them, who had been converted to Christianity by the Romish missionaries, proved as constant in maintaining it under tortures, as they had been ready to embrace it in words<sup>n</sup>. To conclude this digression, if it be really one, concerning these invaders and destroyers of so many rich provinces of this once opulent and flourishing empire, and whom the good fathers last quoted believe were sent thither as a punishment for the heresy of its inhabitants, and their apostacy from the true Christian faith, and what they stile the true catholic church; we may observe, on the other hand, that Providence hath been no less kind and merciful to these provinces, that still continue under its monarchs, by fencing them with such prodigious lofty and rugged mountains, whose height renders them no less inaccessible to their cavalry, which is the main force of these invaders in all their expeditions, than their extreme coldness doth to their infantry: whilst, on the other side, their continual wars and feuds, one tribe and kingdom against another, as providentially prevents their uniting their whole strength against it, which if they had, they would long ago, in all probability, have made themselves masters of the whole<sup>o</sup>.

<sup>1</sup> TELLEZ, LUDOLPH, LOBO, & al.
ALVAREZ, p. 60, & al.

<sup>m</sup> LOBO, ub. sup. Voy. 2. p. 24.
<sup>o</sup> TELLEZ Travels of the Jesuits, ub. sup.

<sup>n</sup> TELLEZ, ALMEYDA,

S E C T. III.

The climate, soil, product, animals wild and tame, vegetables, insects, &c. of Abissinia.

Natural history of Abissinia.

Climate.

WE have already hinted, that this was one of the countries which the ancients deemed uninhabitable, on account of its being within the torrid zone, where, they imagined, not only men and animals, but even trees and vegetables, must be all burned up. This mistake hath been since sufficiently exploded; and this large empire is so irrefragable a proof of the contrary, that though it lies, as we shewed in the last section, between the 8th and 17th degrees of latitude, yet are we now well assured, that it is so far from being liable to any excessive heat, that it is, for the most part, as cool and temperate as Portugal and Spain; insomuch that, in many provinces, they are quite free from those scorching heats, which rage among more northern nations in the height of summer; or, to speak still more clearly, are more afraid of the cold than heat<sup>a</sup>. This must, however, be understood only of some

<sup>a</sup> TELLEZ, ALMEYDA, LOBO, LUDOLPH, PONCET, & al.

a of their vast mountains and high lands ; for, as to the low and flat, the vallies and sandy Difference of deserts, they cannot but be excessively, and at some times intolerably, hot. Another difference winters.
 of climate we must likewise suppose of course, in a country of such vast extent, not only as they draw nearer to the line, but, as they lie nearer or farther from the Red-Sea (A). However, in the main, the country is very healthful and pleasant all the rest of the year, the people healthy and sprightly, enjoying a clear and serene sky, and commonly live to a good old age.
 They divide the year into four seasons, as we do, viz. the spring, called by them Matzau, on Their four account of its following the winter, and in which the fields are covered with verdure, and seasons.
 begin to be enamelled with variety of flowers ; it begins with them on the 25th of September.
 The summer, named by them Fzadai, begins in December, and is that in which they gather b their harvest. The third season begins in March, and is called by them Hagain ; but though Winds.
 it immediately follows the summer, yet can it not be properly called autumn, because it is not that on which they gather their fruits, as here in Europe, but rather the very hottest season of the whole year. And, therefore, with respect to Abissinia, the year might be more truly divided into three seasons, viz. the spring, which begins September 25 ; summer, which may be divided into two parts, the milder of which, named Fzadai, begins on the 25th of December, and the hottest, on the 25th of March ; and then follows the winter, which begins on the 25th of June<sup>b</sup>. This last chiefly consists in violent rains, which lay all the low-lands under water, and is thus described by the Abissinian abbot : The winter, with us, doth not con- c sist in the mere rains which come down from the clouds ; for, besides them, the earth every- where opens her mouth, and throws out water ; which thing happens in the very houses which chance to be built in low lands ; for which reason, we seldom build them but upon high ground*. Violent storms.
 As the sphere is almost direct here, so the days and nights are very near equal, and the twilight very short accordingly.

As the climates and seasons differ in this empire, so do the winds ; some, especially on their lofty mountains and high lands, being almost constantly refreshing and delightful ; others, on the low lands, where the air is less agitated are hot, troublesome, and unhealthy. At some seasons they are violent and stormy, particularly one, which they call Sendo, which, in Whirlwinds.
 the language of Ambara, signifies a serpent ; which blows with such fierceness and violence, that it pulls up trees by the roots, overturns houses and every thing, even sometimes the rocks, d which it meets in its way, and even whirls them up into the air. Gregory, the Abissinian abbot, affirms, that these whirlwinds may have been seen with the naked eye, the grosser part of them close to the earth, and the rest winding itself upwards like a serpent<sup>c</sup> ; but whether visible or not, it is certain they are felt in many, if not most other countries, and in as impetuous a manner, though not perhaps so frequently as here.

THE great difference of cold and heat between the high and low lands, is likewise Thunder and attended with terrible thunders and lightnings, which very often prove hurtful to men and lightning.
 beasts, and do great harm to the product of the earth ; for these are commonly attended with such prodigious rains, as seem to threaten a second deluge ; for at such times, they do not come down in drops, but in torrents, that seem to fill the lower atmosphere : by these, the Excessive e rivers swell with such prodigious swiftness, and to such a degree, that they quickly lay all the rains.
 low lands under water, and run with such violence, that they seem as if they would sweep all before them. Neither are they like our hasty showers, short and fierce, but last the best part of three whole months, and make what is called the winter-quarter among them ; during all which time, there is not a day in which it doth not rain, more or less, in the same plentiful manner : but commonly the mornings are clear, and enjoy such a fine sunshine, that where the waters have a free current, the ground appears as if it had received no rain at all ; but soon after mid-day, the clouds gather thick and fast ; and an hour or two after, a violent

<sup>b</sup> LUDOLPH, lib. i. c. 5. DAVITY, DAPPER, TELLEZ, &c.
 LUDOLPH, ubi sup. l. i. c. 5. §. 43.

* Ap. LUDOLPH, ubi sup.

<sup>c</sup> Ap.

(A) Accordingly we find, that those ports which are contiguous to that sea, as from Mazura to Dancali, have their winter in December and January, much like what it is in Portugal ; and this mildness reaches about 12 or 14 leagues up the inland, without any extreme cold, or excessive rains ; as if nature only dispensed the latter to moisten and refresh the earth, without incommoding its inhabitants ; whilst farther up the inland, they are troubled with very fierce and lasting rains, till you come to the high mountains of Byzan, two days journey short of Dowaro, where the winter begins about the middle of June, and lasts till almost the end of September. And thus, we are told by father Emanuel d'Almeyda, he found it to be, in all parts of the empire through which he travelled (1). So that according to these observations, the winter, through all the inland of Ethiopia, is in the same months as it is on the coasts of India, from Diu to cape Comari ; and on the coasts it is the same as in Portu- gal : whereas it is the reverse on the opposite coasts of Arabia, from the mouth of the Red-Sea to the islands of Curia-Muria, where the winter is from June to Septem- ber ; as on the coasts of India, and up the inland of Arabia, it lasts from November to February, as in Por- tugal (2).

(1) Tellix Travels of the Jesuits, lib. i. c. 7. vid. & Ludolph, Davity, Dapper, & al.

(2) Id. ibid.

Their inconveniency and danger.

storm arises, mixed with dreadful lightning and thunder, so that the whole atmosphere seems a to be turned into fire and water; during which time, those that cannot get under some good shelter, run great hazard of their lives from both; for the lightning is no less hurtful and destructive to men, cattle, trees, houses, &c. This storm commonly lasts three or four hours, more or less; after which the sun shines again on the sudden as clear as ever; and thus it continues to be during the whole winter season: for which reason, they seldom build their houses on low, but always as much as they can on high ground. There is another great inconvenience attending these violent and tedious rains, viz. that they make most of their rivers impassable, there being neither bridges nor boats among them to help them over, so that passengers are often confined some considerable time before they can pursue their journey: they have, indeed, in some provinces, a way to convey themselves over by the help of a rope, b which they throw across the river, and fasten to some tree, or post, on both sides. Some will venture over upon some rafters, or floats, fastened together, which is not done without great danger, and many of them lose their lives by it <sup>d</sup>.

Unwholesomeness.

BUT the greatest inconveniency which attends these great and continued rains, is, that they infect the air with a dangerous malignancy; for, falling upon a ground that hath lain dry and quite parched up near nine whole months, as soon as they begin to fall upon it, they naturally raise such vast quantities of unwholesome vapours, as seldom fail of producing some grievous distempers, from which even those that keep themselves altogether at home are seldom exempted <sup>c</sup>. Neither doth the danger end here; for the waters that are left in divers parts, begin, with the return of the spring, to corrupt and stink, and cause an infection c in the air, and fresh distempers in men and beasts; so that if it were not for these violent stormy winds, which begin to blow early in the spring, the air would be quickly stagnated, and a pestilential disease reign through the whole empire <sup>f</sup>.

Bad diseases caused by the stagnated waters.

The soil mostly fertile.

Wheat and other grain.

Harvest.

THE soil is various, according as the ground is higher or lower, stony, sandy, or flat; but, for the generality, where it can be tilled and well watered, it produces very large crops of wheat, barley, millet, and other grain; and would much more, if the people were more diligent than they commonly are in cultivating it. They have, indeed, two harvests, which in some measure supply their want of industry. Their trees are crowned with a constant verdure; and, if they labour under a scarcity of fruits, it is rather owing to their negligence, than to any fault of the soil, it being manifest it is capable of bearing as great a variety of d them as any country in Afric. The only kinds they cultivate here, are the black grape, peach, four pomgranate, sugar-canes, almonds, and some citrons, oranges, &c. <sup>e</sup>. Roots and herbs they likewise have, which, notwithstanding the heat of the country, grow naturally among them; and more they might have of other kinds, if they were not so idle and incurious about them.

Make no wine.

THEY do not so much as make wine of their grapes, though in all likelihood they would yield a very good kind; whether it be owing to their ignorance or indolence, or that they prefer those liquors which they draw from their sugar-canes and their honey, which is here very excellent, and in most prodigious quantities, and of many different sorts, as we shall observe in another place. They have a kind of fig, among other sorts, which they call e ensette, and the Arabs, mauz, which is not unlike the celebrated one that grows in India to a prodigious size, and is that which Mr. Ludolph hath endeavoured to prove the dudaim of Moses; which ours, and other versions, render mandrakes; of which we have taken notice already in our Ancient History <sup>b</sup>.

Grain most in use.

THE chief grain that is most in use in this country, as being in some measure natural to it, is a small one, which they call teff, and yields a good nourishment. It is thin and slender, and so small, that one of mustard will out-weigh eight or ten of it, and would make very good and palatable bread, were it but made in a more cleanly way than they generally know, or care to do. But this is not the only instance in which the Abissinians display their slovenliness, for they are so in every thing else, even to a very offensive degree. f

Cattle, how fed.

No hay made.

THEIR cattle fare much better; for though here is neither oats nor hay, yet they have plenty of barley, with which they feed their horses, camels, dromedaries, and other large beasts. Though their low lands produce very good grass, sufficient to nourish vast numbers of cattle; yet, as they do not make any hay of it, they are obliged to supply that defect with that, or some other sort of grain. One misfortune is, that notwithstanding their plentiful crops, they are often reduced to a kind of famine, either through the vast swarms of grasshoppers that infest them, or, which is still worse, by the frequent marches of their soldiery from one province to another; the former destroying only what they find growing upon the ground,

<sup>d</sup> TELLEZ, LUDOLPH, LOBO, & al. ubi sup. sup. citat.

<sup>e</sup> TELLEZ, LOBO, LUDOLPH, &c.

<sup>c</sup> LOBO, ubi sup. p. 80. PONCET, & al.

<sup>f</sup> Id. & al. <sup>b</sup> Vol. i. p. 441, (Y) vid. Hist. Ethiop. lib. i. c. 9.

a whereas the latter devour all that is laid up in their storehouses, the inhabitants being obliged to find them in provisions where-ever they pass <sup>1</sup>.

THEY have not only the same variety of medicinal and odoriferous plants, herbs, and roots, that are to be met with in Europe, and which here grow spontaneously, and without cultivation, but a great many more which are unknown to us, and are all excellent in their kind: amongst them, that which they call amadmagda, hath the specific virtue of recovering and healing dislocated or broken limbs, of drawing out splinters of broken bones that were left in the flesh. The affazoe hath the most singular virtue, not only against all poisons, but against all venomous creatures; insomuch, that the very touching them with it, stupefies and deprives them of sense; and what is still more surprising, if not exaggerated, the very shadow, or scent of it, drives away the most poisonous serpents, or so benumbs their limbs, that they may be handled, or killed, without danger. Those that eat of the root, we are told, acquire such special virtue from it, that they may handle, or wallow naked with, all sorts of serpents, without receiving any hurt <sup>k</sup>, which virtue they retain for some years (B). This extraordinary plant is so much the greater blessing in these parts, as, we are told, they have some kinds of serpents that kill by their breath, at three or four yards distance: they are short, and thick about the middle, and have a wide mouth, at which they suck in a great quantity of air at once, and then breathe it out in as great a quantity, and with such force, against the man or beast they intend to kill, that they seldom fail of effecting it <sup>l</sup>.

BESIDES the plants above-mentioned, the country produces great quantities of fenna; whole plains are seen covered with cardamom and ginger; the last of which hath a most agreeable scent, and is four times as large as that of India. Here is also plenty of cotton, which grows on shrubs, like the Indian <sup>m</sup>. Flowers are here, likewise, in vast quantities, and surprising variety; insomuch, that the banks of their rivers are adorned, the greatest part of the year, with jasmins, roses, lilies, jonquils, and a vast number of other kinds, which are unknown in Europe; and among these is the rose, which grows upon trees, and is much more odoriferous than any that grow upon shrubs.

THERE is scarce any country that produces greater quantities, or variety, of animals, both domestic and wild, than this of Abissinia: among the former, horses, mules, asses, camels, dromedaries, oxen, cows, sheep, goats, &c. are bred in vast numbers, they being the principal wealth of its inhabitants; and a stranger cannot but be delightfully surprised to see the vast herds of stately cows and oxen grazing in the fields, especially in the kingdoms of Tigre, Gojam, and some others of the empire; their fat oxen, in particular, are of so monstrous a size, that they have been mistaken, at a distance, for elephants; whence the notion came, that this country bred horned elephants. These horns are so large, as to contain above ten quarts of liquor, and are used by the people instead of pitchers, or wooden vessels, to carry water, wine, milk, or other liquids; and four of them full, are a load for an ordinary ox. But besides these large ones, that are fatted for slaughter, and have the milk of three or four cows given them every day, they have an ordinary sort, designed for labour and carriage, whose horns are so soft and flexible, that they hang down like a dead weight *. Neither doth it yield a less delightful prospect, to behold the sheep, goats, and other small cattle, browsing at a distance, and covering the adjacent mountains and steep rocks, where they feed upon such aromatic herbs, as give a particular flavour and taste to their milk and their flesh.

THEY have likewise here some of the finest breed of horses, of all colours and sizes, and as sprightly and mettlesome as those so much famed ones which are bred in Andaluzia, and other parts of Spain; and, when all broke and managed, will gallop, trot, pace, curvet, and wheel about, with as much docile agility, as the best of ours; but the choicest breed among them is the black, of which they have the greatest quantity (C); though there is no want of those of the roan, bay, grey, dapple, cream-coloured, pye-bald, and other colours;

<sup>1</sup> Id. ibid.

<sup>k</sup> TELLEZ, ALMEYDA, LUDOLPH, l. i. c. 9. PONCET, & al.

<sup>l</sup> Vid. LOBO Relation,

ubi sup. p. 116, & seq.

<sup>m</sup> PONCET, p. 65.

* DAPPER, TELLEZ, & LUDOLPH, ubi sup. l. i. c.

10. LOBO, ubi sup. p. 70, & al.

(B) This seems most likely to be the plant, which the Psyllæ, a people of Africa, mentioned by Pliny (3), and much famed for their skill in enchanting all sorts of serpents and venomous creatures, and being surprisingly familiar with them, made use of among them; but concealed the secret from the rest of the world.

For we are told by several of the jesuit missionaries, that they have seen much the same juggling tricks played by some Abissinians, and other Africans, in several places, both in and out of Abissinia, with such dexterity, as make them much admired by the populace (4).

(C) Accordingly we are told by Elmakin, an Arabic historian, that Cyriacus, king of Nubia, who is also said to have reigned at that time over Abissinia, appeared in the field against the Saracens, with whom he was at war, at the head of 100,000 of his negroes, mounted on the like number of these black horses (5).

(3) Nat. Hist. lib. vii. c. 2.

(4) Vid. Ludolph, Tellez, Lobo, Poncet, & al. ibid. & Pliny. ubi sup. lib. xi.

(5) Vid. Dapper Abissin. & al. sup. citat.

Way of riding. none of which are shod as ours are; they are commonly used for the war only, and must be led by the bridle over the mountains and defiles; but on the plains they are mounted, and run very swift. Their saddles are very light, but sure, like those of our managed horses, only rising a little higher both before and behind; their stirrup-leather is commonly long, but the stirrups are small, as they only clap their great toe into them.

Mules. INSTEAD of horses, for long marches, they make use of mules, which are commonly very gentle, sure-footed, and fit to go over craggy mountains; these they train up to an easy, yet quick pace, and are most commonly preferred to horses by the Abissinians, not only on that account, but much more out of regard to their own pedigree; for, as they boast themselves to be descended from the Jews, whose princes, and great ones, are recorded in scripture to have chiefly rode upon mules, so they count it an honour to do the same here, and to have their horses led by the bridle, till some martial engagement obliges them to mount.

Camels and dromedaries. THE last domestic animals worth naming, are, the camels and dromedaries, which are likewise bred up in great numbers, on account of their extreme usefulness for carriage, and long journies, through those hot and barren deserts: but as these differ little, either in shape or use, from those we have described in our general account of Africa, we shall refer our readers to what has been said there of them. There is one sort, however, of them in this country, which, though of the camel kind, yet is well worth our notice here; they call it giratacacheme, or slender-end, on account of its uncommon shape, it being much taller than the elephant, but as finely and slenderly made, as that is clumsy and unwieldy; insomuch, that a man on horseback may easily pass under its belly: the common height of its fore-legs is reckoned about twelve spans, or four yards; but that of the hinder somewhat shorter. The neck is proportionable, and long enough to reach to the ground, and graze, grass being its proper food, and the whole, in most respects, answerable to the description which the ancients give of the camelo-pardus.

Elephants all wild here: AMONG the animals of the wild kind, the elephant deserves our first notice, as they breed here in such prodigious numbers; and yet none of them were ever known to be brought up tame in the whole empire; for which reason, we may justly rank them among the wild kind, though they are of a different nature in several countries we have seen through the course of this history: however, they seem quite natural to this climate, or rather, a native nuisance to the country, by the dreadful havock they make among the corn, and other grain, of which they destroy ten times more with their large feet, than with their mouths, &c. They root up large trees, and break small ones, to feed on their leaves; by which, in time, they destroy whole forests, as they commonly go in large droves, from fifty to a hundred, or more. The food they affect most, is that of a tree, not unlike our cherries, but which is full of pith, like our alder, but of a delicious taste to them. Their size is so monstrous, that a man, mounted on a tall mule, cannot reach their back by some spans. As to their shape, extraordinary docility, and other particulars relating to them, they have been so amply described in some former volumes, that we shall not need add any thing to it. The next is the rhinoceros, a creature of a monstrous bulk and make, and a mortal enemy to the elephant: but this creature hath been likewise described already; and though most of the Portuguese writers affirm it to be a native of this empire, yet we do not meet with any that pretend to have seen it there; from which we may conclude, that they may be as scarce as the elephants are numerous in it.

Lions large and numerous. (D). Lions are here likewise in great numbers, and very destructive and dangerous: they have them of several sorts and sizes, and particularly those that are stiled of the kingly or royal breed: and as they do a great deal of mischief among the large cattle, the Abissinians are no less industrious and adventurous in destroying them, and will even encounter them with their lances, or with a dagger; for that noble animal, fierce as it is amongst other brutes, will not encounter a man, except he be assaulted by him, or greatly pinched with hunger. They are so large, that some which have been killed by the inhabitants have measured eight cubits in length, from neck to tail, particularly one in the kingdom of Tigre, near p. 271, 713, & alib. pass.

<sup>a</sup> TELLEZ, LUDOLPH, DAPPER, & al. ubi sup. ibid.

<sup>q</sup> LOBO, ubi sup. p. 69. TELLEZ, LUDOLPH, & al.

LEZ, LUDOLPH, lib. i. c. 10.

<sup>o</sup> See before, vol. v. p. 681, & seq.

<sup>p</sup> Idem

<sup>r</sup> See before, vol. ii. p. 545, & seq. iii.

<sup>s</sup> See before, vol. v. p. 684, & seq.

<sup>t</sup> See LOBO Voy. 2. p. 69. TEL-

<sup>u</sup> Id. ibid.

(D) Some think that the fathers Gaspar, Schot, Coyar-ruvias, and others, have confounded this animal with the Bada, or Abada, mentioned by F. Johan dos Santos, which is about the size of a colt of two years, and hath two horns, differently placed, the one on the fore part of the head, which is about three or four spans long, and of a dark brown, or quite black hue, smooth, and sharp-pointed, with a small rising on the top; the other on the back of the head, but shorter, and more slender than the other. We are told, that the bones of this animal, burnt to ashes, and mixed with water, make an excellent pulice against all kinds of tumours, draws the peccant matter out of the flesh, and heals the wound it makes in it (6).

a Maegoga, an. 1630, which was destroyed by a shepherd in the open field, with a throw of his dart: this fierce creature was coming down from the mountains, all covered with the blood of the many creatures it had gored and rent in pieces, when the shepherd seeing him at a good distance making towards him, took that interval to dig a great hole in the ground, and upon his approaching within reach of his weapon, he cast it at him with such force, that it pierced him through the shoulder: the monster, after many dreadful roars and leaps, fell luckily into the pit, where he was dispatched by the victorious countryman, not without many grievous wounds<sup>w</sup>, as well as great danger and difficulty. We shall say nothing of their tigers, leopards, wolves, foxes, various kinds of apes, and other beasts of prey; which, though numerous, fierce, and mischievous, have nothing particular in this from those of other hot countries. Many of the Portuguese authors affirm the famed unicorn to have been seen in some parts of the empire, particularly in the kingdom of Damot, and territories of the Agas, which are both woody countries; but add, that its flight from one wood to another is so swift, that they had not time enough to examine, much less to shoot at it, though they have ventured to give a description of it, which we shall not repeat here, but refer our readers to what hath been said of it, and its various kinds, in a former volume<sup>x</sup>.

Killed by the Abissinians.

THE wild mule, or, as some falsely call it, afs, and the Abissinians zebra, or zecora, is also a native of this empire; but having been already described in a<sup>y</sup> former volume, we shall only say of it, that the Gallas are now possessed of the countries where it mostly breeds: it is, however, so much admired for its beautiful shape, colour, and stripes, that kings and emperors look upon one of them as a present fit for them; especially as they can, it seems, be easily tamed, though naturally wild: two thousand sequins have been given for one of them by an Indian Moor, in order to carry it to the great mogul<sup>z</sup>. The wild afs hath been often confounded with the zecora, though it be different from it, as it hath horns and cloven hoofs, like the deer kind: it commonly hath a white strake, that comes down from its buttocks to its hams: its fur is harsh, and of an ash colour; its flesh tender, and good to eat. There is another much of the same kind, but with a dark-brown skin, very smooth; its legs are much shorter behind than before, and yet is much swifter of foot than a buck. We shall conclude this article of wild animals, with the description of a singular one, which we shall give in the author's own words. "This extraordinary animal," as he styles it, "is no bigger than one of our cats, and hath the face of a man, with a white beard, and its voice mournful; it always keeps upon a tree; and they assured me, that it is there brought forth, and there it dies. It is so very wild, that there is no possibility of taming it: when they have caught one of them, with a design to bring it up, all the care they can take of it, cannot prevent its pining itself to death. They shot one of them in my presence, which clung fast to the branch of the tree, twining its legs about it, and died some days after<sup>a</sup>."

The zecora, or wild mule.

Wild afs.

An extraordinary animal.

AMONG the amphibious kind, the crocodile and hippopotamus, or sea-horse, are the largest, and the most destructive to man and beast. The Nile is, as it were, their nursery, from whence they make their excursions into the adjacent lands, and destroy all that come in their way: but, as they are likewise common in Egypt, where we have already given a description of the former, we shall refer our readers to it<sup>b</sup>. The latter, or sea-horse, is twice as large as an ox, and hath a head near three times as big as that of a bull: its legs are short; the fore-feet, or hoofs, divided into five clefts, and the hinder into four: its skin is sleek, hard, and of a dark-brown; the jaws wide, and full of teeth, and from the under one come out four fangs, near two spans in length; two of them are sharp and strait, and the other two crooked, like the tusks of a wild boar: some describe him with the same number in his upper jaw, but without any foundation, unless these of Ethiopia differ, in that respect, from those of Egypt, and other countries<sup>c</sup>. His head is the only part which hath any resemblance to that of a horse, having a white strake, which comes down between his nostrils, and a white star on the forehead: he spends the day commonly in the water, and the night on land, where he hath his pasture, and falls foul on all that comes in his way; and as he is very clumsy and large, destroys as much with his feet as he doth with his rapacious mouth; and, like the elephant lately mentioned, not only devours, but tramples all down, grass, corn, herbs, roots, Turkey wheat, and all that the poor inhabitants had sown for their subsistence: but what is still more terribly destructive, it stifles both man and beast that come under the reach of its claws, with its huge weight, and sucks only the blood out of their bodies, leaving the hippopotamus.*

*Crocodile and

The latter described.

Its dreadful jaws.

*Terrible
harack.*

<sup>w</sup> Jesuits Travels, l. i. c. 7.
Travels, l. i. c. 7. vid. & LUDOLPH, & al. sup. citat.
Ant. Hist. vol. i. p. 181, & seq.

<sup>x</sup> See vol. v. b. xxi. c. 1.

<sup>y</sup> See before, ibid.

<sup>z</sup> PONCET voyage to Ethiop. p. 66.

<sup>c</sup> Conf. LUDOLPH, l. i. c. 11. MAILLET, LOBO, & al.

<sup>2</sup> Jesuits
<sup>o</sup> See

Subject to the gout.

White teeth.
More valuable than ivory.

Skin proof against weapons.
Monstrous size, and dreadful voice.

The water-lizard.

Fishes plentiful.
The torpedo ;
its strange qualities.

Fowls and birds.

Ostriches.

Ibis, or serpenteater.

rest to rot on the ground, or to become a prey to crocodiles, and other voracious creatures<sup>d</sup>: a yet is it of so fearful a nature, that it flies at the sight of an armed man, and much more so at that of fire, or fire-arms: but is much more bold in the water, where he will attack boats and barges, and often overturns them; especially the females, when they come to have colts, at which time they part from all the rest, and keep solely to them, and attack all that come in their way: at other times they keep with the male; and it is as common to find one of them with many females, as with us to see a bull among many cows; yet so jealous are they, that one never sees two males together in one herd. They are often troubled with a kind of cramp, or gout, in their limbs; at which time they have no power to defend themselves, but lie flat upon the ground, with one of their fore-feet under their belly, and shew all the tokens of an acute pain. At such times as these it is that the inhabitants destroy them, b chiefly for their teeth, which are of a finer white, and retain it much longer, than any ivory: they likewise esteem their left hoofs, as a sovereign remedy against melancholy. Their skin, bones, fat, and almost every part of them, is turned to some advantage; which is an encouragement to the natives to hazard their lives in search of them. The misfortune is, that their hide, which is smooth, and near two inches thick, is proof against any of their weapons; so that there is but one small spot on its forehead at which it may be wounded. The hide of one of them, they say, is a sufficient load for three or four camels; and a man that stands upright in the belly of one of them, can hardly touch the back-bone with his hand. We do not find, however, that any Nubians, Abissinians, or people of any other nations, ever caught one of them alive, or ever could discover any creature that is its mortal enemy, as the ich- c neumon, or water-cat<sup>e</sup>, is to the crocodile, the sword-fish to the whale, or the ibis to the flying serpent<sup>f</sup>; though that doth not prove that the Divine Providence hath left him without such a one, notwithstanding they have not been yet able to discover it: and thus much may suffice to give our reader an idea of that dreadful monster, whose very roaring is so loud and terrible, that it chills the blood of every creature that hears it<sup>g</sup>.

To this we shall only add the water-lizard, called by the natives angueg, and by the Italians caudiverbera, from the vast strength and keenness of its tail, with which, they tell us, that creature, which is scarcely bigger, and more slender, than a cat, can cut a man's leg off at one blow: its skin is smooth, and without hair; its aspect foul and frightful; it feeds on grass when it gets out of the water; and Mr. Ludolph's Gregory gives it the shape and form d of a dragon, whatever he meant by that name*.

HERE is likewise great plenty and variety of fish, both in their large lakes and rivers, of which we shall have occasion to speak in some following section: at present we shall just mention one, on account of its strange properties; we mean, the famed torpedo, or torpid fish, which is frequently caught in both of them, and is affirmed to be of so cold a nature, that it conveys an immediate chillness and numbness into the blood of every one who but barely touches it; insomuch, that the inhabitants make use of it to allay the excessive heat which they suffer under some of those burning fevers which are so very frequent in most parts of this empire; and this is done by the bare touch of the creature. Some think it might be as efficacious against the gout, though the experiment cannot but be somewhat dangerous: but e the Abissinians apply it in the cure of tertian and quartan agues; though the application causes such excruciating pains in all the limbs of the patient, that they are forced to tie him fast to a board all the time: they are even superstitious enough to think it an efficacious remedy to drive devils away<sup>h</sup>. However, as to its strange chilling quality, several Portuguese fathers have confirmed it by their own experience; and add, that the pain that follows the touch is instantaneous, and almost intolerable<sup>i</sup>.

WE should certainly tire our readers, were we to go through the vast variety of fowl, of all kinds, with which this country abounds, or even with those that are in some measure peculiar to it. Those that most deserve attention, among the latter, are the ostrich, the largest and most unwieldy of all the volatile kind, and which, though its feathers are not able to f raise it from the ground, yet by the strength of them, and the motion of its feet, can move with greater swiftness than the fleetest horse in his full speed. We have formerly given some account of this strange bird, and of the manner of catching it<sup>k</sup>, as well as of the ibis, or bird which destroys those innumerable flying serpents, which annoy this country at some times of the year, and would soon reduce it to a wilderness, if the Divine Providence had not appointed that beneficial race to destroy them<sup>l</sup>. This bird is more properly a native of

<sup>d</sup> See LUDOLPH, lib. i. MAILLET descript. of Egypt, vol. ii p. 126, & al. mult. vol. i. p. 181.

<sup>e</sup> Ibid. p. 182.

<sup>f</sup> TELLEZ, ALMEYDA, LOBO, LUDOLPH, MAILLET, & al. plur.

<sup>g</sup> LUDOLPH, l. i. c. 11. TELLEZ, DAPPER, & al. vid. & BOCHART, l. iv. c. 3.

<sup>h</sup> LUDOLPH, l. i. c. 11.

<sup>i</sup> §. 13. & seq. TELLEZ, ALMEYDA, LOBO, & al.

<sup>j</sup> Id. ibid. vid. & codig. l. i. c. 11.

<sup>k</sup> Anc. Hist.

vol. vii. p. 200.

<sup>l</sup> Ibid. vol. i. p. 182. vid. LUDOLPH, l. i. c. 12. §. 8. & seq. & al. sup.

a Egypt, but is no less a benefactor to Abissinia, in clearing it from so destructive a plague; for which service he is called, in the Ambaran language, the serpent-eater.

THE pipi, so called from its constantly uttering those two syllables, hath an admirable instinct in directing huntsmen to their game, and will not leave them till they follow them to the place where it lies; but they must take care not to do so unless they are well armed; for it often leads them to some fierce wild beast, or monstrous creature, as it did once a friend of Mr. Ludolph's, and a native of Tigre, to a tree, to which hung a serpent of a prodigious size, which obliged him to run away back faster than he came<sup>m</sup>. This extraordinary bird, it seems, chiefly lives upon the blood, or flesh, of those creatures that are thus killed by his direction. The abagun, or stately abbot, as that name imports, is in some measure peculiar b to this country, it being found no-where but here and in Peru. It is only remarkable for its beauty, and for a kind of horn growing on its head, instead of a crest, which is short, round, and split at the upper end like a mitre<sup>n</sup>. The feitan, favez, or the devil's horse, resembles a man armed with feathers, commonly walks with a majestic gravity, or runs with surprising c swiftness; but when too closely pursued, expands his wings, and flies away. Its height is near that of a stork, but its shape more genteel and beautiful. That which they call the cardinal, from the beautiful redness of all its feathers, except those on its breast, which appear of the colour and smooth gloss of the finest black velvet, is another of the charming birds that are natives of this country: as is also that which they call the white nightingale, with a d tail of the same colour, about two spans long, which, when it flies, looks like a white piece e of paper fastened to its rump<sup>o</sup>.

WE should never have done, were we to go through all the great variety of the feathered kind, both wild and tame, with which this empire abounds, in common with ours, and other European countries, but which excel them, for the most part, either in beauty, goodness, largeness, &c. For we are told, for instance, that their partridges are as big as our capons<sup>p</sup>, and that they have several kinds of them, as well as of pigeons, turtle-doves, and a great number of others. We shall therefore conclude this article with one species of them, which seems peculiar, as well as of singular use to it, viz. the maroc, or honey-bird, so called from its particular instinct in discovering the hidden treasure of the industrious bees, of which they have also a great variety; some of which are domestic, and kept in hives, others d which lay up their honey in hollow trees, and a third sort which hide it in small holes and caverns in the ground, but which they take surprising care to cleanse for their use, and afterwards to stop them so close and so artfully, that it is next to impossible to find them out, though they mostly lie along the highways. This last, though of somewhat a darker colour than that of the hives, is not inferior to it in goodness; and it is this kind that the maroc discovers to the inhabitants, by an unusual noise and fluttering of its wings, which, when perceived by the passenger, he has nothing to do but follow him to the place, where the feathered guide takes up a more delicious note, and pursues it till his man hath taken possession of the hidden store; in the plundering of which he takes care to leave behind a small quantity to his songster, it being the chief food he lives upon. These last kind of bees are e in the greatest plenty; and, we are told, their being deprived of the sting, which the others are provided with, by the wise Author of nature, is the reason of their thus laying it up safe under ground: its wax is much whiter, and fitter for chirurgical applications, as well as the honey is for physical compositions, and both a kind of unlaboured treasure to the inhabitants<sup>q</sup>; on which account, as well as for the vast herds of cows they keep, and the plentiful quantity of milk they yield, this land may be said to have the second title to Palestine, of being stiled, A LAND FLOWING WITH MILK AND HONEY.

To counterbalance these, and other blessings we have already mentioned, they are not without a proportionable variety of obnoxious animals, serpents, and insects, equally hurtful, besides those wild and dreadful beasts, lately described; among which, we may place in f the first rank those devouring and frequent swarms of locusts, which, in one season, leave whole kingdoms and provinces desolate; and the dire effects of which destructive vermin are inimitably described by the prophet<sup>r</sup>. A fire devoureth before them, and behind them a flame consumeth: the land is before them as the garden of Eden, and behind them a desolate wilderness; yea, and nothing escapeth them, &c. This country being extremely mountainous and rocky, is so much the more apt to breed them; and accordingly doth, in such vast multitudes, that they come like very thick clouds, which cover the whole surface of the earth, and even eclipse the light of the sun at noon-day. Their teeth are so sharp and hard, that they not only devour every blade of grass, root and branch, and the leaves of the trees and bushes, but also the wood of the small twigs, and even the bark of the largest trees, leaving

<sup>m</sup> LUDOLPH, ibid. §. 12, & seq.
 ub. sup.

<sup>n</sup> LOBO, relat. p. 71.
<sup>q</sup> TELLEZ, ALMEYDA, LUDOLPH, LOBO, & al. plur.

<sup>o</sup> Id. ibid.

<sup>p</sup> Id. ibid. & al.

<sup>r</sup> Joel. ii. 3, & seq.

Time of their going off.

Depopulate whole provinces.

on every thing they have touched a nasty burnt hue, as if it had passed through the fire, a which exactly answers the description above quoted out of the prophet; so that the sad effects of them are felt sometimes for two or three years after. They commonly range the whole season, shifting from place to place till about their Michaelmas tide, which they celebrate in the month of November; about which time a westerly wind begins to blow, which drives them all into the Red Sea<sup>a</sup>. We need not trouble our readers with a fuller description of them, they having of late made such threatening approaches to these isles. Heaven grant they may never come nearer us! for if they did, we should soon be reduced to a worse plight than the Ethiopians, and other African nations, whom necessity hath taught to turn that destructive plague into a delightful nourishment (E). Notwithstanding which precautions, the devastations they make are so terrible and universal, that whole kingdoms and provinces become depopulated; and the inhabitants being obliged, by the famine which they commonly leave behind, to remove into others for subsistence, where they appear, at their arrival, more like ghosts than men, having nothing left but the bare skin upon their bones, and being scarcely able to crawl or speak. What is still more deplorable, is, that this famine is commonly attended with some pestilential distemper<sup>b</sup>, no less destructive than those which, as we lately hinted, are caused by the stagnated waters, after their violent and continued winter rains.

THIS country hath likewise its full share of serpents, and variety of reptiles, insects, and other vermin, infesting either men or beasts, or the fruits of the earth: we have already mentioned some of their serpents, and other venomous creatures, as well as the salutiferous herbs with which Providence hath furnished them, by way of antidote and preservation against them; beyond which we cannot add any thing worth our readers attention, seeing they so nearly resemble those which we have had occasion to describe in other parts of the world, through the course of this history.

<sup>a</sup> LOBO, ubi sup. p. 81—86. TELLEZ, ALMEYDA, & al. vid. & LUDOLPH, lib. i. c. 13. pass. <sup>b</sup> Id. ibid.

(E) They have, it seems, found out several ways of destroying, and dressing them for food. As soon as they see them coming at a distance, the whole country rises up in arms against them: they knock them down with flat wooden or leather weapons, not unlike our butchers fly-flaps, but larger, and heavier in proportion; and as they fly in such thick swarms, the ground is soon covered with their carcases, which they sweep up in heaps, about three or four feet high: to some of these they set fire, which burns their legs and wings, and parboils the rest of their flesh, which is now become such a delicious morsel with them, that after they have eaten their fill of them, they strew the rest with salt, and preserve it for future food. Others dry them only in the sun, and preserve them for use; and having pounded them in a mortar, make a kind of thick spoon-meat of them; which one of our authors, who tasted it, tells us, had an ill flavour and taste (7); owing, probably, to their having been kept too long; but the people, to palliate it, told him, that they only eat them out of devotion and respect to St. John the Baptist, who is recorded to have made them and wild honey his constant food (8).

(7) Lobo, relat. 2. p. 81 & 86. vid. & al. sup. citat.

(8) Math. iii. 4.

S E C T. IV.

Of the several people and nations that inhabit the Abissinian empire; their complexion, features, genius, disposition, arts, trades, and occupations, dress, food, drink, and other customs.

The various nations inhabiting this empire.

Jews anciently settled here.

HAVING now gone through the several climates and soils of this country, and given d an account of its chief products, vegetable and animal, we come now naturally to describe the various people that inhabit it, whom, for distinction sake, we shall at present in general divide only into Christians, Jews, Mohammedans, and Gentiles, without entering into any particulars about their respective religions, which will be better seen in a subsequent section. By the Christians, we chiefly mean, not only those of the Abissinian church, who are the principal natives of the country, but those whom the Roman missionaries brought over to their own communion, and continue still in their adherence to it; of whom we are told, there are great numbers scattered about, notwithstanding the grievous persecutions that have been raised against them and their teachers<sup>a</sup>. The Jews have been settled in this empire time immemorial, exclusive of those who are said to have come hither from Palestine, with Meni- c leck, the son whom the queen of Sheba had by Solomon, of whom we shall say more hereafter.

<sup>a</sup> De his, vid. TELLEZ, ALMEYDA, ALVARES, CODIGN. LOBO, LUDOLPH, JARRIK, DAM DE GOEZ, LE GRAND, & al.

These

- a These looked upon themselves as natives of the empire, and were settled in Dambea, Vegora, and Samen, where they defended themselves a long series of ages, in some of the most strong and rocky parts of these kingdoms, till they were at length dislodged and driven from thence by the emperor Susneus, commonly called Soltan Segued. Of these ancient Jews, many embraced Christianity, from the earliest times of its being propagated in this empire, which lessened their number considerably: since which, the empire has been so streightened and mangled by the Gallas, vast numbers of them having been slain, and the rest so severely handled by that emperor, that many of them fled into other countries; others were obliged to embrace Christianity, and lived comfortably there, by their several trades; some by weaving, others by making darts, javelins, ploughs, and other iron instruments of husbandry and war, they being reckoned the best workmen in that branch in the whole empire; by which means their number is very much decreased to what they were even in the twelfth century<sup>b</sup>; and those that remain, are forced, for the most part, to live in some of the most craggy and mountainous parts of the country. Neither hath their extreme indigence and misery been capable of making them forget or set aside their ancient distinction of caraites and talmudists, of which we have formerly given a full account<sup>c</sup>, but retain it with as vehement zeal and inveteracy as ever (A).

Persecuted by Soltan Segued.

Embrace Christianity.

Exercise trades.

The others keep their old distinction.

- NEXT to the Jews are the Mohammedans, who are in some measure dispersed through the whole empire, in such numbers, that they are reckoned to make up near one-third part of the inhabitants of the Abissinian empire, yet live friendly and quietly with the Christians, with whom they are every-where intermixed. Many of these give themselves up to agriculture and farming; but those that make the greatest figure, and get the most riches, are the factors: for since the Turks have deprived the Abissinians of their sea-ports on the Red Sea, they allow not any of the Christians to resort thither for commerce, so that they have engrossed it wholly into their own hands; and whatever gold and other commodities are exported, must be conveyed thither by the Mohammedans, who there exchange them for silks, stuffs, and other merchandizes, which they sell to them at a very high price; and as they are not over-conscientious, making the greatest gain of this traffick with the Christians, they quickly grow immoderately rich, and get vast estates by this factorship, to the impoverishing of the Christians<sup>d</sup>. How Mohammedism was first introduced into this empire, will be seen in a more proper place; and we have had frequent occasion, through the course of this work, to observe how very much that religion, if it deserves that name, is apt to inspire its professors with a more than ordinary contempt for all others, and to behave with singular haughtiness and tyranny towards all other nations, where-ever they gain the upper hand<sup>e</sup>; and though the frequent attempts of the Turkish Soltans, to make themselves masters of this large and noble country, have hitherto proved, in a great measure, abortive, yet it is much to be feared, that their stripping it of all its sea-ports and commerce, seizing on so many of its frontier provinces, joined to their having introduced their religion not only into most of the neighbouring kingdoms, but even into every part of this empire, will some time or other furnish them with the unhappy means of enslaving it, especially as the ignorance and indolence of the Abissinian clergy, and their subjection to the patriarch of Alexandria, who is a subject, and too often a creature, to the Porte, and sends such delegates among them as are the most unfit to rule over that sinking church, doth so largely contribute to the still farther propagation of Mohammedism.

Mohammedans very numerous.

Engross the whole commerce and riches of the empire.

The danger of its being at length subdued by the Turks.

Gentiles inhabiting part of this empire.

THE Gentiles, which inhabit several considerable parts of this empire, are chiefly the Gallas, of whom we have already given an account; some tribes of whom the emperor having suffered to settle in his dominions, in order to make use of them against those of the same nations who have seized on so large a part of them, are ever at war with him; and the Agaus, who are settled in the kingdoms of Bagameder and Gojam; in the former of which

<sup>b</sup> Id. ibid. vid. & BEN. DETUDELA Itinerar.

<sup>d</sup> TELLEZ, ALVAREZ, LUDOLPH, & al. sup cit.

<sup>c</sup> See Anc. Hist. vol. i. p. 597, & seq. iv. p. 174, & seq.

<sup>e</sup> See before, vol. i. p. 17, & seq. 97, & seq. & alib. pass.

(A) There is still a third sort of them, we are told, who inhabit some parts of the Abissinian frontiers, between them and the Caffres, who dwell along the Nile; these own no dependence on the emperors, but are a kind of republic of themselves, and are supposed to be descended either from those whom the kings of Affyria and Babylon (1) carried away captive, or from those who dispersed themselves over the world, or were sold by Titus Vespasian after the destruction of Jerusalem. On which account they were never incorporated with those that came hither with Minileck, the son of Solomon, king of Israel, but looked upon as aliens, and bear to this day that epithet, being called by the rest Salaxa, or strangers, or exiles. They retain still their Hebrew bibles, though in the corrupt talmudic dialect, and have their synagogues like the rest; but where their worship and singing is performed in a more careless and slovenly manner, if possible, than it is amongst the rest (2).

(1) 2 Kings xvii. pass. xxiv. & xxv. pass. vid. & Ant. Hist. vol. i. p. 891, & seq.
Travels of the Jesuits, l. i. c. 8, & al. ub. sup.

(2) Ludolph, l. i. c. 14.

The Agau, their high situation and intrenchments.

their territories, which are called Lasta, are so mountainous, rocky, and so full of inacces- a sible passes, that they could never be subdued, but have been able to maintain themselves in it against the united forces of the emperor. Those of the kingdom of Gojam inhabit likewise a large territory, about twenty leagues in length, and about seven or eight in breadth, very rocky and mountainous, though nothing like that of Lasta. It is divided into about twenty districts, each under its particular head: the inhabitants are stout and fierce, and have their habitations along the Nile. Their mountains abound in provisions, and are full of thick woods and bamboos, which grow likewise so close, that they serve them instead of ramparts and trenches against their enemies. Through these, they cut such streight and narrow ways, and with such variety of turnings and windings, that one would take them for some spacious labyrinths. Within these they intrench themselves, in time of war, at about a mile distance b from the entrance, which they take care to stop, as well as all the avenues and ways, by laying large trees across them. These close thickets they call scutes, or secutes; and, being thoroughly acquainted with all their avenues, they fall out like so many wild beasts, and almost with the same savage fierceness, and with their bows and arrows make a dreadful havock among all that venture to attack them<sup>f</sup>. But besides these kind of out-works, they have their furtatas, or deep caverns, some in the solid rock, others under-ground, supposed to be the work of nature; but whether so, or of art and labour, are equally strong and difficult of access: the entrance of them is very narrow, but the inside spacious and convenient; and in some of them they have springs of good water, for their own and their cattle's drinking. In these they commonly live in time of war; in them they keep their hoards of mil- c let, barley, and other grain, together with their cattle and families, whilst the enemy is in their frontiers; and from these they make their sallies and armed excursions upon them, through the crooked and intricate paths and defiles, through which it is next to impossible to pursue them back to their dens.

Excursions on all invaders.

Spacious dens.

Way of living.

Dress.

Bravery.

Subdued and converted.

Other gentiles

Languages.

Ethiopic the learned language.

We know little of their religion, if they have any, except that they are addicted to many superstitious customs; and those of Gojam to some kinds of sorcery. They have great plenty of honey, of which they make a pleasant liquor; and abundance of cattle, on the milk and flesh of which they live, much after the manner of the Gallas. Their cloathing is no other than the skins of those beasts, which they beat with large heavy clubs, till they have brought them to a sufficient thinness and pliability; these they throw, men and women, over their d bodies, and tie them about their middle, without any other garment. They are commonly of a very dark complexion, though not quite black like the negroes, and, for the most part, tall and well-shaped, stout, and warlike, yet far from the rapacious temper of the Gallas, and other neighbouring invaders, living contented within their territories, more solicitous to preserve them from invasion than to intrude upon theirs<sup>e</sup>: by which means they have been able to defend themselves against the free-booting Caffres on the one side, and from the imperial forces on the other, from time immemorial; though they have been since forced to submit to the superior arms of Soltan Segued, a warlike prince, who not only subdued them to his obedience, but obliged them to embrace Christianity, about the year 1614, as we shall see in the sequel of this chapter. We shall say nothing of the Gafates, and some other in- e terior heathen nations, dispersed through other provinces of this empire, concerning which we find little else mentioned by our authors, except their names, and the part they have acted in some of the wars, or other transactions that are to be met with in their history, without any farther particulars relating to them, worth our readers notice.

Among such a variety of nations, and such a number of kingdoms and provinces, there must be supposed a proportionate variety of languages, the major part of which are wholly unknown to us. The Jews that still remain there, speak a kind of Hebrew, but as corrupt as is their religion and morals. The Moors use their own Arabic, but no less short of the purity of that ancient tongue. Every nation, province, and almost district, hath its own f dialect: that which is in use at court, and amongst the most polite, is that of the kingdom of Ambara, but is spoken more or less corruptly in other provinces<sup>h</sup>: that of the kingdom of Tigre, however, is that which comes nearest to the old Ethiopic, which was forced to give place to that of Ambara, after the failure of the Zugean line, though it had been, time out of mind, the current language of Ethiopia, and comes indeed nearest the ancient Ethiopic.
This last still retains its pristine dignity, and is yet in use, not only in all their religious and learned books, in the king's letters patent, and all their records, but in their liturgies and religious worship. But of this we shall have the less to say, having formerly given as full a description of it, and of its peculiar character, and affinity to the ancient Hebrew, Syriac, and other oriental languages, as the narrowness of our limits would permit, and to which we <sup>f</sup> Travels of the Jesuits, lib. i. c. 8. §. iii. c. 5. LUDOLPH, & al.

DOLPH, & al. ub. sup.

<sup>e</sup> Id. ibid.

<sup>h</sup> TELLEZ, LU-

a shall now refer our readers, and to the more elaborate account which Mr. Ludolph hath given of it <sup>i</sup>.

THIS character and language is by them still stiled Leshona Geez, which may be properly enough translated, the learned language, as it is in constant use, and that in which not only all their sacred and religious books are written, but which is, or should be, understood, at least, by all their bishops and clergymen; though the generality of those of the latter sort think themselves sufficiently versed in it, if they can but read and perform their clerical functions in it: in all other respects, both they and their greatest dignitaries are not only very ignorant, but very zealous to continue so; thinking it both useless and dangerous either to hold any disputes with those that are of a different church or opinion, and even to read any of their books; and that it is sufficient for them implicitly to adhere to all the articles and rites of their own, as we shall further shew, when we come to speak of their religion. As for arts and sciences, or any branches of what we call polite literature, one may as well look for it among the Caffres, and other wild Africans, as either among their clergy or laity.

In all other respects, the Abissinians in general, both priests and people, have a very good character given them by most Portuguese and other writers, both with respect to their persons and minds, their natural disposition, and moral virtues. With respect to the first, they are commonly well made, though of a brown olive complexion; their shape is tall, and in some even majestic; their features well proportioned, their eyes large, and of a sparkling black, their noses rather high than flat, their lips small, and their teeth exceeding white and handsome (B), contrary to the inhabitants of Senaar or Nubia, who have flat noses, thick lips, and their complexion of a very deep black <sup>k</sup>. With respect to their inward disposition, we are told they are, for the far greater part, a sober, temperate people, naturally inclined to virtue and piety; one finds them commonly less addicted to those vices which reign with us in Europe; one may likewise observe, in their mutual conversation, a great degree of simplicity and innocence <sup>l</sup>. They seem quite averse to all kind of cruelty, and would, in all likelihood, have continued so to this day, had not the Portuguese exasperated them into an equal abhorrence of all Franks, or Europeans. They seldom have any quarrels one with another; if they have, and their anger rises to any height, as it sometimes happens on particular occasions, or when they have drank a little too plentifully of wine, or sava, which is a kind of ale made of barley-flower, mixed with some intoxicating drugs, they never decide it by the sword, as is done in Europe, but, at the most, by cuffs and cudgelling; and as soon as their heat is allayed, by that, or the intervention of cooler reason, to which they are ready to give a listening ear, they immediately submit to an arbitration, or lay the whole matter before the ruler of the place. Here they are allowed to plead their own cause by word of mouth, without the help of a lawyer, or the tedious and chargeable train of bills and answers; and when judgment is once given, whether by the judge or the arbitrator, they faithfully stand to it, without grudge, murmuring, or appeal: by which excellent method they save a great deal of time, charge, and discontent, and are quickly rid of all the other anxieties that constantly attend our law-suits (C).

THEY

<sup>i</sup> See Ant. Hist. vol. vii. p. 197, & seq. vid. & LUDOLPH, l. xv. c. 1. & al. pass. PAYS, LOBO, LUDOLPH, & al. sup. citat. PONCET, p. 90, Fr. Edit. & 70, Engl. relat. 1607, 1608, p. 38.

<sup>k</sup> TELLEZ, ALMEYDA, <sup>l</sup> GUERREIRO, Ann.

(B) This is the general character that is given them, with regard to their persons, by the consent of all the writers above-mentioned, but was most eminently displayed in that of Zaga Christus, a native, and, according to his own pretensions, a prince, of the Abissinian empire, and the son of the emperor Jaacob, who was slain in a battle against Susneus, or Sigued, his competitor. This prince appeared in France in the year 1653, and was treated there as such; but whether deservedly or not, which hath been much disputed, he is yet allowed to be a native of that empire; and such a one, as (according to the description which the learned Bochart, who saw him there, gave to Mr. Ludolph) eclipsed all the princes of the blood, with the gracefulness of his person and conversation (4). Yet is not this last gentleman the only one that believed him an impostor, by many; tho' others, no less numerous and judicious, made no question of his being really descended from the imperial family of

Abissinia (5). However that be, he died in France, in the 26th year of his age, at Ruel, near Paris; and the picture which so many eye-witnesses have given us of him, sufficiently shews how far the Abissinians exceed the Nigritians in the comeliness of their shape and features (6).

(C) This admirable disposition of the generality of the Abissinians is unanimously confessed by all the relations we have of them, and even by father Tellez, who is seldom, in other cases, inclined to speak well of them; however, we must except those of the kingdom of Tigre, who commonly indulge their resentment to a much greater length, especially in case of bloodshed; in which not only the nearest relations, but all the kindred of the deceased, live years together in open enmity to the slayer, and all his family: this they called having blood between them, which is seldom expiated without shedding a great deal more on each side. The truth is, if

(4) Ludolph, lib. ii. c. 7. §. vii. p. 53, & seq.

(5) Renaudot contra Ludolph, Rogers, Palestin, & al. vid. & lib. cui Titul. Les etranges Evenemens du Voyage de S. A. Serenissime Prince Zaga Christi, &c. (6) Vid. Tellez, Almeyda, Lobo, & al. sup. citat. La Croix. Hist. du Christianisme d'Abissinie, l. i. p. 76.

Genius for learning.

The Nareans
the most esteemed of all.

The genius and disposition of the Abissinians.

Decent behaviour at church.

Regard for their saints, relics, and images.

Their women enjoy great liberty.

Their dress.

The peculiar privileges of the women.

The habit of the men.

THEY are naturally docile, and fond of knowledge; which was one of the main motives <sup>a</sup> that induced them to give the jesuit missionaries so kind a reception at their first coming: and if there is not more learning found amongst them, it is rather for want of proper means than of capacity of attaining it, especially since they are so hemmed in on all sides, that they cannot venture out of their country without imminent danger, nor receive any strangers amongst them, on the same account. But the most esteemed of all the subjects of this large empire, for sense, ingenuity, courage, equity, and other social virtues, are those of the kingdom of Enarrea, which is one of the last conquests of the Abissinian monarchs; though, as we have hinted heretofore, it hath continued the most faithful of all their native subjects ever since <sup>n</sup>.

ALL the Abissinians, in general, are naturally religious, even to a high degree of bigotry and superstition; great frequenters of their divine worship, devotees to their numerous saints, <sup>b</sup> strict observers of their fastings and long Lents (D). They behave with great respect and modesty, not only towards their clergy, but more especially in their churches, which they never enter but with their bare feet; on which account the pavement is commonly covered with carpets, or something equivalent: they are never heard to speak or whisper to each other, to blow their noses, nor even to turn their heads on one side. They are denied entrance, if they neglect to appear clean and neat, both in their bodies and dress. Perhaps they have learned this from the Mohammedans, who are intermixed among them, and who, however remiss soever they are in other particulars of their religion, yet always behave with the most exemplary respect in their mosques <sup>o</sup>.

THEY pay no less a regard to relics and all kinds of religious imagery, of which they have <sup>c</sup> great variety, both in their churches and domestic oratories; such as crucifixes, pictures and statues of the virgin Mary, and all their saints. They even affect to wear their little images about them, by way of ornament as well as devotion; and a present of this nature is more regarded amongst them than one of a far more intrinsic value <sup>p</sup>. Their very women, though far from that recluseness and strictness which is so common over all those warm climates, affect much to mix these superstitious ornaments among those which are more peculiar to their sex and different ranks; the meanest amongst their trinkets, and those of quality among their finest jewels. The latter usually go gorgeously dressed in the richest silks and brocades; their upper garments are wide and full, not unlike our church surplices. They attire their heads and hair an hundred different ways, and take care to have their ears adorned with the <sup>d</sup> richest pendants. They spare no cost to embellish their necks with the most costly ornaments of chains, jewels, or other embellishments <sup>q</sup>: and in these vanities they are the less to be wondered at, as they indulge themselves in a much greater liberty of going abroad and visiting than the Turkish and other ladies of this part of the world; who, though mostly confined at home, and seeing none but their husbands and slaves, yet are no less curious and lavish to shew themselves to them in the most advantageous and rich attire. The habit of men of quality is a long fine vest, either of silk or cotton, tied about the middle with a rich scarf: that of the citizens is much the same, but of cotton only, they not being allowed to wear

<sup>n</sup> See before, p. 17.

<sup>o</sup> See before, vol. i. pass.

<sup>p</sup> PONCET, & al. sup. citat.

<sup>q</sup> TELLEZ,

LUDOLPH, PONCET, & al. ub. sup.

we may believe the accounts which the missionaries give us of them, they are of a light unsteady temper, cruel, treacherous, and vindictive, equally ready to break, as to take, the most solemn oaths; to swear allegiance, and rebel, against their lawful princes; who, on their sides, are no less readily disposed to forgive the greatest crimes and affronts, and to receive them again into favour. But the worst charge of all, and perhaps that which hath been the mother of most of the rest, from that quarter, is their apostasy from the Roman catholic faith, after they had once so readily embraced it; of which, more in its proper place (7).

(D) They observe four Lents, like the oriental churches; viz. the great Lent, which lasts fifty days; that of St. Peter and St. Paul, which lasts forty days, more or less, according to the nearness of their Easter; that of the Assumption of our Lady, which lasts fifteen days; and that of Advent, which lasts three weeks. In all which Lents they abstain from eggs, butter, cheese, and do not touch any eatable or drink till after sun-set; but after that they may eat and drink till midnight. Instead of butter they use oil; but as they have no olives, they extract theirs from a small grain, which is far from unpleasant.

With the same strictness they fast on all Wednesdays and Fridays of the year; and always go to prayers before they begin their meals on those days. The very peasants leave their work to have time enough to perform that duty before they offer to break their fast.

They dispense neither old nor young, nor even sick persons, from fasting, though in some cases they abate something of the rigour of it. Their children themselves are bound to it, from the first time of their being admitted to the holy communion, which is commonly about ten years of age (8).

The monks are still more strict and rigorous. Some of them eat but once in two days of their meagre fare; and others, we are told, eat only on Sundays, and spend the rest of the week in devotion: some of them spend the whole holy week without eating or drinking. Many other instances of mortification are practised by those monks, and other devotees, which are scarcely credible, and for which we shall refer our readers to the authors themselves (9).

(7) Jesuits Travels, l. i. c. 8.

(9) Ibid. ibid.

(8) Tellez, Almeyday, Ludolph, l. iii. c. 6. §. 81, & seq. Poncet, & al.

- a silk, neither is their cotton of the same fineness. The common people have only a pair of cotton drawers, and a kind of scarf, or piece of the same linen, with which they cover the rest of their body; and, till about a century ago, this was the common dress of all the country; none but the emperor and royal family, and some distinguished favourites, were allowed to wear any other: and that piece of cloth served them at night for a blanket or sheet to wrap themselves in. As to the women, we may suppose that they were allowed to go as fine and genteel as their circumstances would allow them, seeing they were permitted to appear abroad, and visit their friends and relations. How they came by such an uncommon privilege in this, above all eastern countries, we cannot find; only this one may plainly perceive, that their husbands are far from being pleased with it; and rather bear with it as b with an ill habit, against which they can find no remedy, than as a mark of politeness and grandeur.

It is still harder with those who have married princesses of the royal blood, and who, on that account, stretch their privileges much farther, and think no gallantries, how injurious soever to their honour, ought to be denied to them: in which liberties they are so far upheld by their own relations, that all complaints against them will not only be in vain, but be taken very ill.<sup>1</sup> It is not so indeed with those of inferior rank, who, excepting these gadding excursions, which custom allows them, are generally very observing and faithful to their husbands. These are obliged, for the most part, especially among the meaner sort, to condescend to some of the most laborious offices of the family; such, particularly, as that of grinding all the corn that c is used in it, which the lowest male slaves will refuse to do: for as they have no mills, they are forced to grind all things by hand, whether it be for bread or for drink; and this must be repeated every day, because what is made one day will be good for nothing by the next, which makes the task still harder; because it requires much labour and firing to prepare them. If these were the mills an Abissinian once boasted of, saying, "That the emperor had no less than 500 of them in his camp," he might as well have said 5000; for a less quantity could have hardly been sufficient for it; and this shews rather their want of industry, than their grandeur.

In their marriages they are in some points rather too strict, as in forbidding it to persons in the second, third, and even fourth degree of consanguinity; but in others very remiss. They d allow marriage to be of divine institution; and (if we will believe the relations of the missionaries<sup>2</sup>) they give it even the title of sacrament; in consequence of which they think it unlawful for a man to have more than one wife at once. Neither do they allow any to be lawful, unless the persons have been joined by a priest: and yet there are numbers of them that have a plurality of wives, and live with them unmolested. Such are, indeed, deprived by the church of the benefit of the holy communion, on account of the scandal it brings to religion: but the state, not deeming polygamy to be detrimental to society, suffer it to go unmolested (E).

DIVORCE likewise is reckoned unlawful, except in case of breach of conjugal fidelity; and yet nothing is more commonly practised amongst them, even where no such plea is so much as e pretended. Nay, we are even told that, till the coming of the missionaries thither, they used to contract their marriages in such a manner, and with such reserves, as they thought would render them invalid, and open a door for such divorces; that is, with such tacit or express consent that they should part from each other, whensoever they found that they could not mutually agree; and even gave each other some security for the performance of their promise. The principal motive for these divorces, besides that allowed by the gospel<sup>3</sup>, were want of children, or strife about them, a mutual dislike or disagreement, bodily infirmities, a linger-

Women of quality dis- honourable to their husbands.

Lower class of women grind corn for the family.

Have none but hand-mills.

Marriage abused among them.

Polygamy tolerated by the state.

Divorces, why so frequent.

How obtained.

<sup>1</sup> Id. ibid. vide et Lobo ubi sup. p. 73.

<sup>2</sup> See LE GRAND ubi sup. dissert. 13. p. 335, & seq.

<sup>3</sup> MATTH.

(E) The missionaries boast of it as a great piece of merit, not only that they reformed these abuses among all their converts, but likewise that their example excited the Abissinian clergy to do the same among their laity. Thus one of them tells us, that a man of his acquaintance had lived so long peaceably with his three wives, that he had had no less than thirty-seven children by them, without receiving any other censure or molestation than that of his being debarred from the sacred communion and church-worship. But, upon his repudiating the two last, he was again re-admitted to both

(10). So remiss had they been in that point, till the coming of these fathers among them.

Father Tellez moreover mentions an ancient custom among the Abissinian emperors, of having not only a great number of wives, but likewise a multitude of concubines, supposed to have been introduced among them, in imitation of their progenitor, Solomon, king of Israel: but adds, that when Susneus, or rather Soltan Segued, came to be converted to their church, these good fathers refused him absolution, till he had cast them all off except his first (11).

(10) Alvarez Hist. Abiss. c. 20. Vide Ludolph, lib. iii. cap. 6. § 99, & seq. (11) Hist. Abiss. l. i. c. 19.

ing sickness, and such-like ; in all which cases the woman hath the same privilege of abrogating a the marriage contract with the man. The dissatisfied party, in such cases, applies first to the Abuna, or patriarch, or to their bishop ; and having obtained the desired divorce, which is seldom denied, if the party cannot be prevailed upon to withdraw his or her suit, they next petition for a licence for contracting a fresh marriage, and obtain it with the same ease ; even where the reasons alleged are so frivolous, that the prelate cannot admit of them, they may have recourse to some inferior priest, of a more pliable nature, who will make no difficulty to marry them ; in which case they are only liable to be excluded from the sacred communion for some time more or less. This makes these divorces as frequent as they are easily obtained ; among married people, especially those of the richer sort ; whilst, with regard to the grand motive, the breach of fidelity on either side, they find often a gentler way of salving that sore, b by some fine, or present, equivalent to the wrong, or at least such as the wronged party deems to be such : for married people, it seems, have here each of them their own lands, goods, and chattels, in proprio, and so can make a suitable compensation for the transgression<sup>u</sup>. But where such a composition cannot be agreed on between the injurer and the injured, the women are commonly the most severely punished of the two, and in a way that is something singular ; for first she is condemned to the loss of all her goods, and to go out of her husband's house in a mean or ragged dress, with an express prohibition never to come into it again. 2. All that she is allowed to carry out with her is a sewing needle, by which she may get a livelihood. 3. Sometimes she is condemned to lose her chief ornament, her head of hair, and to be closely shaved, except one single lock on her fore-top, which only disguises her the more. All c this wholly depends on the husband's will, who, if he thinks proper, may take her in again ; or, if he doth not, they may both marry where they will or can. If the husband be the offender, he is likewise liable to be punished, as well as the woman with whom he hath offended ; but that seldom mounts higher than a fine upon them both, which is appropriated to the plaintive wife. Thus likewise the paramour of the adulteress, if convicted, is condemned to what they stile the Circo-arbah, that is, to a fine of forty cows, horses, suits of clothes, &c. and, if unable to pay it, he remains a prisoner with the husband, at his discretion, till he doth ; or, if he lets him go before, he obliges him to swear that he is going to fetch what will satisfy him ; upon which the guilty person sends him some wine, and a piece of cow's flesh, and they eat and drink together ; and, upon his asking pardon of the offended, he first d remits him one part of the fine, and then another, and a third, and at last forgives him the intire fine.

Upon the whole, marriage among them is no better than a firm bargain or contract, by which both parties engage to cohabit and join their stocks together, as long as they like each other, after which they shall be at liberty to part. So that there can but little gallantries or courtship be required before-hand, or any other ceremony, except the consent of the parents, and the interchange of a few presents ; excepting what is performed by the priest at church, or at the church door. This custom of meeting and blessing the candidates for marriage at the church doors, is doubtless derived to them from the Jews, among many others ; none but priests and deacons being married within the body of the church. We find something like it practised e formerly in England, and taken notice of by old Chaucer, in his Wife of Bath, in this distich ;

*She was a worthy woman all her life,
Husbands at the church-door had she five*.*

In this part of the matrimonial celebration, the officiating prelates or priests are very liberal of their ceremonies, prayers, incensing, and singing. We shall give an instance of one, as related by an eye-witness†, in which the Abuna, or patriarch, officiated in chief. f THE bride and bridegroom were waiting at the church-door, where a kind of bed or couch had been prepared for them, and on which the patriarch ordered them to seat themselves : he then, with his cross in one hand, and an incenser in the other, makes a kind of procession round them ; and then, laying his hands on their heads, tells them, that as they now become one flesh, so they ought to have but one heart and one will : this is followed by a short exhortation, suitable to the occasion ; after which he goes into the church, and celebrates the divine office, at which they both assist ; and that being ended, he gives them his blessing, which makes the marriage valid, and so dismisses them. The more religious sort not only attend divine service, but receive the holy communion either just before or after their being a joined (F) <sup>w</sup>. What other festivities and rejoicings attend those nuptials, we are not told; except that, even after consummation, the husband and wife keep their separate tables; or, if they agree to eat together, each bring their own victuals, ready dressed, with them, or send them in before, by their servants or slaves. ex- Husband and wife keep two tables.

<sup>u</sup> See TELLEZ, ALMEYDA, ALVAREZ, LUDOLPH, LOBO, and LE GRAND, ubi sup. Hebr. lib. ii. c. 27.

† ALVAREZ ubi sup. Vide & LE GRAND, dissert. 13. p. 340.

* SELDEN UXOR

We have already hinted, in part, how sober and moderate they are in their eating; and we might have added, that no food can be well coarser, meaner, or more disgusting, than theirs, even among the better sort. A piece parboil'd, or half broil'd, but for the most part quite raw flesh, mostly beef. This is served up on an Apas, or cake of bread, ground and made by the women, of wheat, pease, millet, teff, or other sorts of grain, according to their circumstances: so that this Apas serves them not only instead of a dish or plate, but like- b wise instead of a napkin or table-cloth, which they never use at their tables. For whenever they have any chicken or mutton broth served up, or any other spoon-meat, the Apas serves them instead of spoons to eat it with, and of a cloth to wipe their mouths and hands. These last dishes are commonly served up in black earthen porringers, or dishes, covered with what they call Escambias, which are like caps made of fine straw. Those of the greatest quality, and even the emperor himself, have no better at their tables; and that which is oldest is most esteemed among them *. As their meats have nothing that is inviting, so neither have the sauces which they eat with them; they commonly swim with butter turned into oil, and taste even a Spaniard or Portuguese, can hardly tell how to behave, when invited to their table (G), and are usually obliged to rise with an empty stomach. They have one cleanly custom at their meals; viz. to wash their hands before they sit down, because they touch every thing they eat with them; and those of high rank are still more nice in that particular, who have their victuals cut into bits, and conveyed to their mouths by some young pages <sup>r</sup>. The rich are fed by hand.

THEIR tables are commonly round, large enough among the rich for twelve or fourteen persons to sit about them; but so very low, that the guests only sit upon carpets, and the meaner sort upon mats, or on the ground. They observe the good old custom of not drinking any thing till they have finished their meals; their common rule is, Plant first, and then water. But after the table is cleared, the cups and flaggons are brought in, and plied so merrily about, especially at their feasts, that the quantity makes ample amends for the small- d nesses of the liquor, and seldom fails of setting their tongues a running, till their brain being quite turned, their legs can hardly carry them from their seats. For their common liquor is neither wine, cyder, fine ale, or strong beer, but is made of five or six parts of water to one of honey, mixed in a jar, with a handful or two of parched barley meal, which sets it a fermenting; after which they put into it some chips of a sort of wood which they call Sardo, which, in five or six days, takes off the fulsome taste of the honey, and makes the whole very palatable and wholesome, tho' nothing so strong as our wines, and other fuddling liquors. They Carousing at their feasts. Common drink weak.

<sup>w</sup> De his vide TELLEZ, lib. i. c. 16. v. 35, & seq. ALVAREZ, LUDOLPH, lib. iii. c. 6. § 102. iv. c. 4. § 2. Lobo, voy. 3. * Vide TELLEZ, &c. ubi sup. <sup>r</sup> lid. ibid. ubi sup. Jesuits Travels; 1. ii. c. 12, & al.

(F) It is not to be supposed, that all their marriages are celebrated with such pontifical ceremony: nevertheless whether this office be performed by a bishop or a priest, the same rites of incensing, processioning, chanting, &c. at the church-door, and assisting at the divine service, are always observed, whenever there is a mutual desire in the married couple that their marriage should be made as valid as possible; because, in such cases, a divorce is not obtained without great difficulty, unless it be for breach of conjugal fidelity. But when they enter that state only with a view and tacit reserve to cohabit no longer than they can like each other, then the ceremony is only performed either at the church-door, or in any other place, by any obscure priest; for then they think their union less binding, as it is indeed deemed less valid by the clergy (12).

This is the sad account our missionaries give us of the shameful prostitution of that holy rite, both by the priests and laity; if their joint and strenuous zeal against these holy fathers and their church, which hastened their expulsion out of the whole empire, hath not, perhaps, too far induced them to exaggerate it.

(G) And this is not only on account of the ill look, relish, and flavour, of their nicest dishes, but because it is reckoned amongst them a piece of high breeding to gobble large mouthfuls, and to make as much noise as they can in chewing their meat; it being a common saying amongst them, That none but beggarly wretches chew their meat only on one side, and none but thieves and robbers eat without making a noise. All which, added to the uneasy posture of sitting, and other parts of the oeconomy of their table, render their best treats almost insupportable. Their greatest regale is a piece of raw beef, brought in reeking warm from the beast; and if they invite company to eat with them, the whole quarter is served up at once, with plenty of salt and pepper. The gall serves instead of oil and vinegar. Some add a kind of mustard, peculiar to them, which they call Man-ta, and which is made of what they draw out of the paunch of the ox or cow. This they stew some time on the fire with pepper, salt, and a sliced onion, before they bring it to table, which, when covered with such a large piece of warm raw beef, and seasoned with the above-mentioned sauces, is as highly esteemed among them, as one furnished with the greatest dainties would be among us (13). But this dish can only be purchased by the rich, on account of the pepper, which is very scarce and dear in this country.

(12) See Tellez, Almeyda, Lobo, Ludolph, & al. sup. citat. & al. sup. citat.

(13) See Lobo, ubi sup. p. 72. Tellez, Ludolph, wine.

Make no

Mean furniture.

Beds.

Indian quilts.

Other bed-clothes.

Nicety in adorning their hair.

Go bareheaded.

How men and women adorn their hair.

Their dress suited to the climate.

Meanness of their houses.

might, indeed, make excellent wine from their grapes; but whether thro' indolence, or ignorance of managing it so as to keep<sup>2</sup>, they content themselves with the hydromel above-mentioned, or with a sort of beer made of barley meal, mixed with some intoxicating drugs for their common drink: though they make a kind of extempore wine for the holy communion, which is extracted from dried grapes, soaked some days in fair water: this is done to avoid its contracting any acidity; which, according to their canons, renders it unfit for that use (H)<sup>3</sup>.

THE furniture of their houses, even among those of higher rank, is much of a piece with that of their tables. No fine paintings, tapestry, or other ornaments, are to be seen in them; and indeed their way of living is in some measure incompatible with any such finery. Even their beds are no better than couches, the best of them; on which they lay their upper garment to wrap themselves in; whilst underneath they have nothing but hides, more or less fine or soft, to lie upon. Some of their princes, and great and rich men, have, indeed, since the Portuguese opened a kind of import of Indian commodities, got the way of purchasing Indian quilts, with silk borders, which now come to them from the ports of the Red Sea; and these they spread upon their couches, chiefly in their outward chambers, that they may be in full view of those that come to visit them, and serve them instead of chairs. As to the meaner sort, they mostly lie on mats on the ground, or perhaps with a hide or two under their upper day garment, with which they wrap themselves about at night<sup>b</sup>. But the oddest furniture of their beds is their bolster, if we may give that name to a forked piece, which serves not to lay their heads upon, which would greatly discompose the much studied oeconomy of their head<sup>c</sup> of hair, about which they are extremely curious, both men and women; but to support their necks in such a manner, that the least curl be not ruffled by the pillow underneath. By which means also the butter, which they lavishly bestow upon it, in order to give it a shining smoothness, is preserved from being licked up by whatever they lay under their heads.

BUT our readers will perhaps less wonder at this piece of vanity, when they are told that the hair is the only ornament of their heads<sup>c</sup>, none but the emperors alone being allowed to wear either cap or any other covering: which is a great inducement to them, as they have a great deal of idle time upon their hands, to bestow some part of it in this pleasing amusement. And this they do even to a degree of emulation, each striving for the most elegant symmetry in the plaiting and curling their own. The truth is, their hair not being apt to grow thick<sup>d</sup> and long, but mostly thin and frizzly, there seems to be some additional art required to keep it in a tolerable order, answerable to each sex; and therefore, whilst the men take much pains in braiding it up in various forms, the women strive to have it hang loose in the like variety of curls and ringlets, excepting the fore-top, which they are still more curious and nice to adorn with jewels and trinkets, according to their rank. Upon the whole, their dress is chiefly accommodated to the climate, and where they are situate so long a time under the scorching beams of the vertical sun, that they are hardly able to bear any clothes to touch their flesh, their chief care is to have them as light, and to hang as loose as possible, during that season. Hence it is, that their cloak, or piece of cloth that covers their bodies, and their breeches and womens drawers, are made so wide and long, as to let in as much air as possible; which in the cooler seasons they bring much closer to their bodies; and then the richer sort appear in handsome banyan vests, open only to the waist, and closed with small buttons: these have little collars, and very long and straight sleeves, gathered in at the wrist. Some authors have mistaken them for shirts; though they have another light garment under them, next to the skin, which is made of thin taffety, sattin, or damask, according as the season and their circumstances will permit<sup>d</sup>.

AND as they are thus negligent and inelegant in their dress, food, and furniture of their houses, so are they, and much more, with regard to the symmetry and architecture of their buildings, which is owing to their living in tents or camps, after the manner of their monarchs.

<sup>2</sup> TELLEZ, LOBO, LUDOLPH, l. i. c. 9. § 19. et al. ubi sup. § 81, & seq. & al. ubi sup.
<sup>c</sup> Ibid. <sup>d</sup> TELLEZ, LUDOLPH, LOBO, PONCET, & al.

<sup>a</sup> Ibid. <sup>b</sup> Ibid. Vide LUDOLPH, l. iii. c. 6. Vide & Jesuits Travels, l. i. c. 8. & alib. pass.

(H) Their ritual expressly enjoins the priests to take special care, that the wine which they use in the divine service be neither sour, nor without its natural taste and flavour; and, in cases of necessity, to make use of such as they shall express from the dried grape. And we are told, that one of the Jesuit missionaries, being in doubt about the lawfulness of such wine for the service of the mass, was answered by the physician Poncet, often quoted in this chapter, that the water which soaks into the dry grape doth only restore it to its natural state, and supplies the place of that which was conveyed into it by the root or sap of the vine, and had been since evaporated in its drying (14).

(14) Vide Le Grand, differt. 12. p. 328. Gregor. Abissin. apud Ludolph, l. i. c. 9. § 19, & seq. iii. c. 6. § 81, & seq. & al. sup. citat.

- a So that, excepting some few old royal palaces and churches, of which we shall speak among their artificial rarities, here are neither public structures nor private buildings to be seen throughout the whole empire; and those which they stile houses, would hardly deserve the name of huts amongst us; being built of nothing but clay and laths, or splinters, put together in the meanest and most slovenly manner; so as to be easily reared, and as readily abandoned, when they think proper to remove their quarters<sup>e</sup>. The same method is taken by the inferior sort who follow the royal camp, and are not able to purchase pavilions or tents, and as quickly build themselves such huts, and with almost as little trouble, as is commonly taken up in rearing of a large tent. Thus, whatever some authors have romanced concerning their stately edifices, number of their cities, towns<sup>f</sup>, &c. is found by experience to be all b false. We have taken notice of the once-famed city of Axuma being reduced to a poor despicable village<sup>g</sup>, though it still retains its antient dignity, and title of metropolis of the whole empire. All the rest, if ever any of them made any figure heretofore, were either encom-c passed with walls, or adorned with noble structures, are now reduced to the same dismal plight; excepting, perhaps, that they contain a greater number of such scattered huts as we have described, and so ought rather to be called large villages, than cities or towns. And this is so far evident, that Abbot Gregory, and as many other Abissinians as have travelled into Europe, could not forbear being astonished at the largeness and magnificence of our great cities, and looking upon them as so many prodigies of human industry, and much more so, when they found them stand at such small distances from each other<sup>h</sup>: they being unable to conceive d how it was possible to find sufficient quantities of wood, victuals, and other necessaries, for the vast number of people and cattle which they contained.

No palaces, cities, castles,
&c.

Their pretended cities were villages.

The most noted of them.

- WHAT other places worth naming are to be met with in the whole empire, are only these few; viz. 1. Fremona, of which we have already spoken<sup>i</sup>, and which owed its grandeur to the Portuguese missionaries, whose residence it became in the reign of the emperor Adam Segued, who chose it for them, on account of its being at a great distance from his court, as he was no friend to them, but, as they pretend, was more inclined to Mohammedism than to Christianity<sup>k</sup>. So that it is most likely to have fallen into utter decay, since their total expulsion (I). 2. Gubay, in the kingdom of Dembea, remarkable only for being the residence of the empress. 3. Dobarna, in the kingdom of Tigre, and the residence of its viceroy.
d 4. Nanina, in the kingdom of Gojam, formerly inhabited by the Portuguese, till their total expulsion. And lastly, Macana Gelace, in the kingdom of Ambara, worth naming only for being the native place of abbot Gregory<sup>l</sup>.

- NEITHER had the emperors either castles or palaces to keep their court in, till the coming of the Portuguese missionaries among them, but lived altogether in their stately pavilions, attended with all their nobles, guards, and other retinue. And such strangers were they to all kinds not only of stately, but even of common regular buildings, that when the celebrated
e Father Pays undertook to build a magnificent edifice for Soltan Segued, in whose high favour he then was, none of that prince's subjects knew so much as how to dig the stones out of the quarries, much less how to square or work them fit for use: insomuch that he was obliged to f teach them both that, and how to make the proper tools for the carpenters, joiners, masons, and, in a word, for every part of the work, and how to join the stones with the red clay mentioned in the last note, instead of the usual mortar made of quick-lime. Hence the g reader may guess at their great astonishment, when they, who had never till then been used

Father Pays builds a sumptuous palace
for the emperor;

which asto-nishes the whole nation:

<sup>e</sup> Ibid. ibid.

<sup>f</sup> See URETTA's fabulous account of them in the appendix to this chapter, and all the maps of this empire, &c.

<sup>g</sup> See before, p. 172.

<sup>h</sup> See TELLEZ & al. sup. cit.

LUDOLPH, lib. ii. c. 11. § 18,

& seq.

<sup>i</sup> See before, p. 172, & seq.

<sup>k</sup> LOBO, & al. sup. cit.

<sup>l</sup> Lib. i. c. 3. § 10. ii. c. 11. § 20.

(I) This place, which stands near the conflux of two streams, from whose murmuring noise it had the name of Maegoga (for that of Fremona was given it by the Jesuits, from the famed Frumentius, or Fremonatius, the first bishop of Axuma), had been well fortified by those fathers against the robbers and freebooters of that territory. They had built a strong house of stone and clay on the second head of the abovesaid brook, to which several others were added quickly after, which lay scattered at a distance from each other, upon the declivity of the hill, and each of them had a good inclosure of stone and clay.

The whole was surrounded with a stout wall of the same materials, flanked with seven or eight bastions, and lofty curtains between each of them. Within they had between twenty and thirty muskets, and a drake, which were managed by the sons of the Portuguese; so that the place was looked upon as impregnable. They had likewise built a stately church in it, of the same materials, which were here to be found in great plenty. The quarries furnishing them with a stone almost fit for any work, and which is digged about three or four inches thick, and of what breadth or length one will, without the help of either pick-ax or wedge; and is easily parted with slight iron crows. The clay likewise, which is here of a reddish hue, is of so glutinous a nature, that it makes a good strong cement, without the help of quick-lime (15).

(15) Travels of the Jesuits, lib. iii. c. 6. Lobo, ubi sup. voy. 3. p. 79. Le Grand, dissert. 2 p. 202. Ludolph, lib. ii. c. 11. § 19.

to see even a few stones regularly set upon one another, did now behold not only a large stupen- a dous structure, reared with so much strength and regularity, but even high and stately stories raised one upon another, and for which they had not so much as a proper word, but stiled them Babeth-Laibeth, or house upon house. How must they be surprised at the elegance and symmetry of the several wide and noble stair-cases, by which one ascended from the one to the other ; to say nothing of the spacious galleries that led through all the apartments of the whole building ; and of a vast variety of other ornaments, within and without, as might have made it a fit residence for the greatest monarch in Europe. What extraordinary idea must this stupendous fabric, of which we shall give a sketch in its proper place, give to that whole nation, of the greatness and magnificence of the Romish church and its sovereign pontiff, as well as of b the city of Rome, his metropolis, in which alone so many hundreds, not only of the like, but even much grander and more superb structures, are the common palaces of his inferior cardinals and bishops, and almost of every ambassador that is sent thither by their respective crowned-heads ? a powerful motive, of a worldly one, to make the whole indigent clergy of Abissinia feel the immense difference between the Roman and the Egyptian patriarch ; between the richness and splendor of the Romish court, and the poor and slavish one of Alexandria. It served no less to convince the Abissinians, who came from all parts of the empire to see and admire it, of the truth of what they had told them, concerning the magnificence of the European edifices, and of the superior genius of those nations, who could contrive and complete such incredible monuments of art <sup>m</sup>. What became of it after the universal expulsion of the Portuguese, we c can only guess ; and that if it escaped the fury of the natives, it must of course have soon fallen into decay, for want of proper hands to keep it in repair.

And shews them the magnificence of the Europeans.

Few trades or manufactures.

THEY have but few manufactures among them ; and tho' linen and cotton be their chief dress, and their country as proper for producing them as any in Africa, their indolence is such, that they cultivate no more than just serves their present want ; and the less quantity of either serves them, as they make no use of any, either at their tables, or for their beds, and a scanty portion will suffice the common sort to cover their bodies with. The Jews are said to be their only weavers, as they are in most parts of the empire their only smiths, in every metal, and every branch of their manufacture, which are likewise very few and inconsiderable. What carpenters, joiners, masons, &c. this country produces, may be easily guessed, from the meanness of their buildings and furniture ; and the same may be said of such other trades as d are in use in other countries, as taylor, shoe-makers, &c. from the plainness of their dress.
The potters, and makers of horn trumpets, and drinking cups, are indeed in the greatest request : these, and some still inferior sorts of tradesmen, are incorporated into tribes, or companies, and have their several quarters, neither intermingling, nor intermarrying, with the rest, but the children commonly following the business of their parents <sup>n</sup>.

GOLD and silver smiths, jewellers, and other such curious arts and trades, are altogether unknown to them, unless it be by some of their manufactures being brought among them by way of traffick or exchange ; and these are only to be met with among the great and opulent.

Turks engross the whole commerce.

Their brokers,
who.

The same may be said of their silks, brocades, velvets, tapestry, carpets, and other costly stuffs, which are all brought hither by the Turks, by the way of the Red Sea, and exchanged e for gold-dust, emeralds, and fine horses. The Jews, Arabians, and Armenians, are the common merchants, or brokers, between them and the Abissinians ; these last seldom or ever travelling out of their own country, or being indeed suffered to do so by the Turks ; who, as we have elsewhere hinted, being become masters of all their sea-ports, enrich themselves by this monopoly, and are extremely careful to prevent any trade or traffick being opened into this country by any other nation, or of its being carried on by any other hands but their own <sup>o</sup>.
Besides the commodities already mentioned, which are exchanged between them, the Turks bring them several sorts of spices, and among them, pepper ; all which are but too few to give their common food a tolerable relish ; and yet the pepper, which is the most coveted by them, is brought thither with such privacy, and the price of it is so very high, that none but f the very richest of all can purchase it. In return for these, the Abissinians bring them skins, furs, leather, honey, wax, and ivory, in great quantities, for which they are forced to take what the brokers please to give them <sup>p</sup>.

Commodities
exchanged.

Their singular hospitality.

THEY have neither inns, taverns, nor public houses, for the entertainment of strangers, but are beyond measure hospitable to them, considering their extreme indigence. If one of them stays longer in a village or camp than three hours, the whole community is obliged to lodge and furnish him with proper necessaries for himself, servants, and cattle, at the public charge. In that case, he need only enter into the first hut or tent he likes, and acquaint the master of it with his wants, who immediately goes and informs the lord, or chief of the al. <sup>o</sup> See before, p. 168, & alib. pass.

<sup>m</sup> TELLEZ, PAYS, LOBO, LUDOLPH, & al. ubi sup.

<sup>n</sup> LUDOLPH, l. iv. c. 5. pass. TELLEZ, LOBO, &

<sup>p</sup> LUDOLPH, ibid. c. 7. pass. TELLEZ, & al.

a place, of it ; upon which, a cow is forthwith killed, and so much of it sent to him as will suffice him and his company, together with a proportionable quantity of cake or bread, and beer or hydromel, and other proper conveniencies for their lodging : and all these they are the more careful to supply him with, because their neglect would be liable to be punished with a fine of double the value of what they were bound to furnish him with, should he prefer a complaint of it to a proper magistrate. This laudable custom, however, is not without some great Abused by va- inconveniencies, inasmuch as it gives encouragement to a parcel of idle vagabonds to abuse it, grants. and causes the country to swarm with that destructive vermin <sup>a</sup>.

<sup>a</sup> Vide int. al. LOBO, p. 73; & seq. LUD. ibid. c. 6. § 46.

S E C T. V.

Of the natural and artificial rarities of Abissinia.

b AMONG all the natural rarities of this country, which may justly challenge our admiration, we may reckon the surprising longevity of the men, under the various changes of their climate, from the extremes of the most sultry and burning heats, to the most vehement and continual rains and inundations, and the many distempers which they naturally occasion <sup>Natural rarities.</sup> And next to that, the liveliness and fecundity of the women, and especially the ease and quickness with which they are delivered, though they commonly bear two or three children at a birth ; insomuch, that without the assistance of doctor or midwife, of cordial, or other medicines, they go through their pregnancy without qualms or uneasiness, and without feeling any of those dreadful and tedious pangs of child-birth, which commonly terrify and affect that tender sex, in ours and other parts of the world : here they have little else to do but kneel and stoop before they are delivered of their burthen, and rise up strong and active ; and, in a very little space of time, are able to return to their domestic employments. They scarcely allow themselves the formality of a few days lying-in, nor any of the comfortable changes of diet proper to their condition ; and suckle and rear up their offspring, whether they have more than one or two at a birth, without any intermission from their other family concerns <sup>Agility and fecundity of the women.</sup> This fecundity is still more remarkable in their domestic animals, as well as wild beasts ; about which we need not repeat what we have said in the foregoing section, and to the vast product of their ground, in spite of the epidemic indolence that reigns amongst the inhabitants.

THE next we are to speak of under this head, is, that of their metals and minerals, salts, and other fossils. Of their mines of gold, we have already hinted something, tho' with diffidence, on account of the fear which the natives are in of tempting the Gallas, and other incroaching neighbours, to seize on them, should they once be apprised of them ; so that tho' this country may be as likely as any other in Afric to produce plenty of that valuable metal, yet they prudently chuse to have so tempting a treasure concealed from strangers, and content themselves with what is, or perhaps they pretend to be, brought to them from Cafraria, Nigritia, and other parts, rather than to hazard the enslaving of their country, by owning their having any of their own ; for it is plain that they gather quantities of that which the tor-rents bring down from the mountains, and which often comes in large grains, and of a fine pure nature, some of which, we are told, is even found about the roots of their trees <sup>Gold mines.</sup> Silver is still more scarce among them ; but whether owing to the same policy, or to the want of proper hands and skill to manage them, we do not hear of any mines they have of it ; though by their having some of lead, one would be apt to conclude, they must likewise have some of silver : but what they want of the latter, is richly compensated by what they have of the former ; and much more so, by the great quantity of iron they draw from their mines, and which is reckoned of greater use and value. The misfortune is, that they are not only quite ignorant of every branch that belongs to the digging of it, but look upon it as a slavish, dismal, and hazardous business, and far beneath the high opinion they entertain of their own nation above all others. To dig and labour so far in the dark bosom of the earth, with a small glimmering light, to be forced to bear with the unwholsome damps and vapours of a subterranean dungeon, to be in continual danger of being overwhelmed by the ground over their heads, which they know not how to prop, or of being annoyed, if not drowned, by springs from beneath, which they neither know how to drain, or draw away ; these, and many other difficulties and dangers, which they frame to themselves, make them look upon such a work as fit only for the worst of slaves, and content themselves with so much of that ubi sup. Vide LUDOLPH, l. i. c. 7. § 1, & seq.

<sup>a</sup> See before, p. 181, & seq.

<sup>b</sup> Vide TELLEZ, LOBO, LUDOLPH, PONCET, CODING, & al. plur.

<sup>c</sup> Id.

useful metal as they find on the surface of the ground<sup>a</sup>; so that we need not wonder if we hear of no mines, or any other metals, such as copper, tin, &c. nor of any other minerals, which require digging at any distance below it.

Mines of salt.

THEY are much more expert and ready at working at their salt mines, where there is less labour and danger, and of which they have a considerable number, especially on the confines of the kingdoms of Tigre, Dancali, and Angot. This salt is not like that which we make in Europe, of sea water, or salt springs, but is ready made to their hands, by the Divine Providence, and in such vast quantities, that those mines, which are no other than huge rocks or mountains of solid salt, are in some measure inexhaustible. These rocks are hewn in pieces, somewhat in the shape of our bricks, but of different sizes and weights: the salt, though very solid and hard on the surface of the rock, is much softer within the mine, till consolidated by the sun, and is no way inferior in taste and goodness to the best of our own. From these parts, in which these huge rocks grow, and called from thence the land of salt, those pieces are dispersed through the whole empire, where they are bought, especially at the fairs, not only as a necessary commodity, but as the most current money, by which they can furnish themselves with all other goods they want, and where they bear a greater or lesser value, according to the distance of the place from whence they are brought; thus, in those parts which are near the mine, one hundred weight of it will purchase what they reckon equivalent to about five of our shillings; at a greater distance eighty pounds will do the same; and so at a farther distance, will sixty, fifty, &c. do the same. At the imperial camp, or court, ten pounds will still be equivalent to a crown; and, in some of the most distant provinces, three pounds of it will fetch a small piece of gold, called a darim, but of what value our author doth not tell us<sup>f</sup>.

Salt the chief coin of the country.

Its different value in all parts of the empire.

THERE is still a farther use made of this salt by the Abissinians, which is that of being a condiment to mutual love and friendship; so that they never go out without a small piece of it in their purse, which commonly hangs at their girdle. Whenever, therefore, any two friends or acquaintance meet, their first greeting is, to take the piece out of the bag, and offer it to the other's mouth, and each gives a lick at the other's piece with his tongue: to refuse this compliment, on either side, would be looked upon as a gross affront, and an open declaration of some inward resentment or private grudge; or, at best, as a piece of ill-manners and unpoliteness<sup>g</sup>, and is, for that reason, readily complied with (A).

A vast plain of salt.

A red salt used for physic.

THEY have also some large spacious plains, whose surface is incrustated with another sort of salt, and in the fetching of which, many hundreds of camels, mules, and asses, are daily employed; particularly in the confines between Dancali and Tigre. This salt, like the former, is carried in bricks about a span long, and four inches in breadth and thickness, is very white, hard, and in the greatest plenty, though the caravans are continually going and coming with it; the plain that yields it being said to be four days journey in length. To this last we may add a third sort, of a reddish colour, which is hewn from an intire rock: this is commonly used in physic; and the mountain must be passed by night, the heat being so violent in the day, that it often stifles both man and beast; and the very shoes are parched, as if they were laid upon burning coals<sup>h</sup>.

High and stupendous rocks and mountains.

An impregnable barrier to the empire.

THE next sort of natural rarities, is their stupendous, high, craggy, and almost inaccessible mountains; in comparison of which, the Apennines, Alps, and Pyrenees, are but mere hillocks, and little eminences; and yet are here in such vast numbers, that there is not one province, or kingdom (except that of Dembea, which is for the most part a fertile plain, especially about the large lake of its name, of which we shall speak in its place), but what is covered thick with them; so that one can scarcely travel a day's journey without meeting with them; some of which are so lofty, steep, and craggy, that they are at once dreadful to behold, and no less dangerous and difficult to go over; and yet of such singular service are they to the country, that they seem designed by Providence as impregnable fortresses, without which, that small part which is left of that once vast empire, would long ago have been swallowed up by the Turks, Gallas, and other hostile nations, if those impenetrable barriers had not stood there to guard it on every side. Whilst their inaccessible summits seem vastly to

<sup>a</sup> LUDOLPH, l. i. c. 7. § 1, & seq. TELLEZ, LOBO, & al. <sup>f</sup> LOBO, ubi sup. p. 74. <sup>g</sup> Id. ibid.
<sup>h</sup> ALPHONSO, MENDEZ. See Jesuits Travels, l. iii. c. 8. LOBO, & al. sup. citat.

(A) It is not unlikely that this custom of carrying a piece of salt in their bag, was at first introduced with no other view than to moisten their parched mouths, as they travelled thro' those broiling climates; whence common civility and good nature might induce them to offer it to those strangers they met, and were perhaps destitute of it. It might very probably be the natural clamminess of their tongues, which is usually occasioned by excessive drought and heat, caused some difficulty of speaking to one another, till it was diluted by the salt, that gave birth to this odd, and, to all appearance, unpolite ceremony. But this we only offer as our private conjecture, no author having given us any account how it was first brought in among them.

- a out-top the highest clouds, the vallies beneath look as if they were going to hide themselves in the lowest abysses of the earth; the former partaking of the keenness of the second and third regions of the air, and the latter, by their excessive heat, remind you of the central fire of the earth. These stupendous ridges, which the natives call Dambas, present you, at a distance, with a delightful variety of shapes; one sort bearing such a resemblance to some vast extensive city, that you can hardly forbear thinking that you see the high walls, towers, bastions, and a great diversity of other structures, as you approach nearer towards them. Another sort of them appears, some like pyramids, others like towers of various shapes, some of an exact square, others of as perfect a round from top to bottom, as if they had been turned, or wrought with the chissel; some appear of a vast and most difficult ascent; and b when you come up to what you supposed to be the top, you find it to be only the foot of another, full as high, craggy, and difficult<sup>1</sup>.

Dreadful vallies.

Various shapes.

- Of this nature is that which is called Guça, or Guza, in the kingdom of Tigre, which travellers, who come from the Red Sea, must cross, in going to that of Dembea, and which, when you have gained the top of it, presents to you a handsome spacious plain, in the midst of which stands another mountain of equal height, which you must likewise go over, after you have sufficiently refreshed yourself on the fertile and delightful top of the Guza. The ascent takes up about half a day's journey, and goes winding all the way up; the paths are very narrow, and cut into the side of the solid rock; and all the way you go presents you with the most deep and dreadful precipice, the bottom of which cannot be reached by the naked eye, but only offers a gulph, which at once makes one's head quite giddy, and fills the heart with a continual dread. Should any of the caravans, that keep going up and down these steep and narrow roads, chance to meet another in its way, they are in the greatest danger, both man and beast, of being thrown down the precipice, and broken into a thousand pieces before they reach the bottom, unless they take the utmost care in passing by one another. The mules are by far the best for those that ride, because they are the surest footed; but they have an ill faculty with them, that they will always go close to the edge of the precipice, and cannot without great risk be turned to the other side of the road, or to keep to it when one hath. What adds still more to the horror of the journey, whether it be up or down the steep declivity, is, that at the bottom of the valley below, there commonly runs a swift torrent of water, with a most hideous roar, which being echoed by the adjacent rocks, and often heightened by loud winds, as well as by the continual trampling of the men and beasts upon the rock, increases the horrid din to such a degree, that one cannot possibly hear one's self, much less one another, speak, though ever so loud, or ever so near<sup>2</sup>.

Is only the basis of Lamel.

Difficult access.

Frightful access.

- BUT the wished-for summit once attained, which is reckoned above three hundred fathoms perpendicular above the plain top of Guza, and the most difficult part of all the way, being only provided by nature with a sort of steps like winding stairs, two or three cubits high, and uncouth, on both sides of the rock, one is made ample amends by the beautiful prospect it at once presents to the view, which is not that of rugged and intersected peaks above, and deep gaping valleys beneath, as one might expect, and as the Alps and Pyrenees afford, but of a small, tho' delightful, plain, about two miles in compass, and a musket-shot in breadth, and terminated at one end by a new, flat, and upright rock, like the back of a chair, of which this little plain is the seat; so that, take the whole mountain together, that of Guza seems to be a kind of pedestal to this; and this, which the natives call Lamalmou, represents, in some measure, a chair without arms, the back of which is the upright rock at the end of the plain, which is as perpendicular as if it had been hewn out with a chissel. Along what we call the seat of this wonderful and supereminent chair, is pleasantly situate a town of the same name, whose inhabitants make a handsome livelihood by helping the caravans to load and unload the beasts of burthen, a good part of the way of the craggy ascent above-mentioned, in order to help them to leap from one step to the other; so that one would be surprised to see with what facility they make them climb and keep their feet, and they themselves convey their burthens from one stair to another, thro' every difficult part of this ascent.

The fine prospect from the top of Lamalmou.

Beautiful shape.

Difficult ascent.

A town upon it.

- BUT what yields a still more surprisngly delightful prospect from this little lofty spot, is the unbounded view of the whole kingdom of Tigre, though the largest of the whole empire, and of the ridges of mountains of Semen, which run across, and intersect it in various parts, and which, at that height and distance, appear no higher than small hillocks. The misfortune is, that this little town, though strong and populous enough to defend itself against all assaults of any enemy, is but poorly furnished with all necessaries for human life, except water, which they have in plenty, and very good; every other kind, almost, they are obliged either to fetch from the lower lands, or to purchase at a dearer rate from the caravans, which doth not a little lessen the gain of their labour, and keeps them still poor and indigent<sup>3</sup>.

The people poor.

<sup>1</sup> TEIJER, PAYS, KERCHER, PONCET, ALMEYDA, LUDOLPH, LOBO, LE GRAND, & al. mult. See the Travels of the Jesuits, l. i. c. 7. ALVAREZ, ALMEYDA, &c.

<sup>2</sup> Id. ibid.

<sup>3</sup> Id. ibid.

Guexen, a famous rock.

Described.

The princes of the blood confined upon the top of it.

Mount Tadbaba-Mariam described.

The burial-place of the emperors.

Whispering-place.

Beasts, cattle, and goods, craned up and down.

Way of travelling.

Lakes.

The large one of Dembea. Its extent.

MUCH of the same nature is the famed mountain, or rock, of Guexen, situate between the kingdoms of Ambara and Xava, on the summit of which was such another, but larger plain, well watered and wooded, and with some ground for tillage and pasture, and guarded on all sides with strong and difficult passes made by the natural rock, and in which the princes of the blood were formerly kept prisoners, and whence they were fetched to be raised to the imperial throne. This stupendous and impregnable mountain is a perpendicular rock, in the nature of a fortress, the breadth of which, on the top, along the slope, may be about half a league, but at the bottom is about half a day's journey in circuit; the height is such, that the strongest cannot cast a stone with a sling high enough to reach the top. The ascent, tho' not very steep at first, grows by degrees so difficult and painful, that even their cows, which in this country climb and skip like wild goats, cannot be hoisted up without slings and pulleys. On the top is nothing to be seen but a parcel of poor huts, dismally put together, of stone and dirt, covered above, and lined within, with straw, with scarce any tolerable furniture besides. These served for mansion-houses both for the unfortunate princes, who were sent thither, and for their guards. About the middle of the plain were two springs which supplied them with water, the one to drink, and the other to wash themselves in. A few corn fields they had for tillage, and some pasture ones for their cattle, and some few trees, in form of a thicket, served them for a shady refreshment*: in this dismal solitude they spent their lives, till either raised to the empire, or set at liberty by death. This rigorous custom was, however, set aside about two centuries ago, as we shall see in its proper place: but the most considerable of them all, according to father Alphonzo Mendez, is that which they call Thabat Mariam, or more properly Tadbaba Mar-jam, whose summit vastly out-tops all the rest, and even the clouds, by far, and is likewise very spacious. This famed mountain, whose bottom is watered by two large rivers descending from it, hath seven handsome churches built upon it, one of which, dedicated to St. John, is very rich and beautiful, having been formerly the burying-place of the Abissinian monarchs, of whom there are five monuments, covered with tapestry, which hath the arms of Portugal; from which one may conjecture them to have been presented for that purpose by king Emanuel, to the then emperor David<sup>m</sup>.

THE last we shall mention under this head, is that celebrated hollow high rock, in the kingdom of Gojam; just opposite to which stands another, much of the same height and bigness, so exactly placed by nature, that it echoes back a word barely whispered in the other, with such force, that it is heard at a great distance; and the joint voices of three or four persons speaking together, sound as loud as a great shout from a numerous army<sup>n</sup>. And thus much shall suffice, for the extraordinary mountains of this empire. Those who want a large detail of them, may read the description which father Almeyda, who had gone over most of them, hath given us of the rest of these dreadful and gigantic piles; the very reading of which fills one with a chilly dread, rather than delight. We shall only add here, that some of those craggy ascents we have spoken of, would be wholly inaccessible in many places, had not necessity forced those, otherwise indolent, people, to have recourse to cranes, and other such shifts, by which they draw up, and let down, both the beasts and their burthens, by dint of ropes and pulleys; inasmuch, that even their mules and oxen, which naturally climb like wild goats, must be craned up and down in the same manner<sup>o</sup>. Their way of travelling through this rocky and mountainous country is upon mules, or asses, which are the best, and, as we lately hinted, the most sure-footed beasts, to clamber up and down those craggy ascents; but in the plains the camels are the most commonly used, as the best fitted by nature for those hot, dry, and sandy climates, their horses being only to be mounted in time of war, to charge the enemy.

THE next natural rarities of this country are their lakes and rivers. Of the former, we meet with few of any note, except those of Zoai, or Zowaia, in the kingdom of Xaoa, out of which springs the river Matchi, which falls into the great Hawash, or Xaoax, and with it is buried or absorbed in the sandy deserts of the kingdom of Adel, and that of Dembea in the kingdom of that name, and stiled by the inhabitants Bar-Dambea, or the sea of Dembea (B). This last is by far indeed the most considerable of the two, on several accounts, but more particularly of its largeness, and its vast length and breadth, it extending itself from the

* Id. ibid. <sup>m</sup> Id. ibid. vid. LOBO, & LE GRAND, Dissert. l. ii. p. 206. ap. Ludolph, l. i. c. 6. §. 15. <sup>o</sup> Id. ibid.

<sup>n</sup> KERCHER & PAYS,

(B) It hath had several strange names given to it, both by ancients and moderns, for which we can see no foundation. Ptolemy calls it Colue; John de Barros, Barceau, probably from one of its islands; as Ludolph calls it Lacus Tzanicus, from that of Tzana, one of the most considerable in it (1). Some geographers give the lake two names, and call the south part Zambre, and the north part Zaira (2); though there be not the least ground for such a division, the inhabitants giving it the name of Bahr, or sea. It is not therefore unlikely, that those

(1) Hist. Ethiop. l. i. c. 8.

(2) Vid. Atlas of Mercator & Johnson, an. 1635.

- a the 12th to the 14th degree of north latitude, almost thirty in most places, and thirty-five leagues where longest; and in breadth from ten leagues, where narrowest, to almost fourteen or fifteen where broadest, and about ninety miles in circumference, exclusive of its deep bays, creeks, and other windings: the waters of it are sweet and clear; and breed great plenty and variety of fish. The country round about is plain, fertile, and delightful; and the inside of the lake abounds with a multitude of islands of different sizes, the largest inhabited by Abissinian monks, and very pleasant and fertile: about seven or eight of them have monasteries, which, though going to decay, appear to have been formerly stately edifices; and among the various products which they yield, they have such fine citron and orange trees, as exceed any in the empire for beauty and fine taste. One of these islands, and the most barren of all, which the inhabitants called Dek, is made the prison, or place of confinement, for great prisoners of state <sup>P</sup>.

- THIS great lake is navigable, and the Abissinians sail on it in flat-bottomed boats, which they call tancoas, and which are not made of wood, but of a kind of rushes they call tambuas, with which its waters abound, each of which is of the thickness of a man's arm, and about two yards in length. This tambua grows likewise in other lakes, and all along the banks of the Nile, and is used for the same purposes, though this last is thinner and longer than that which grows in the lakes, and is the same which Pliny hath described to us <sup>1</sup>, and which the ancients called papyrus, and was serviceable to them not only in making of their paper, but likewise their boats, sails, and other tackle; the like of which is done by the Abissinians with their Dembean reeds. The misfortune is, that this lake breeds multitudes of hippopotami, or sea-horses, which not only endanger the navigation but destroy great quantities of fish, and make a dreadful havock where-ever they come, as they usually do, to graze upon the land. However, it breeds neither crocodiles nor alligators, as the Nile doth; so that the cattle may safely feed on the fertile pasture grounds adjacent to it, and come and drink of its wholesome waters, without any danger from those amphibious monsters: and as for the sea-horses, there are people who make it their business to destroy them, and live upon their flesh, and cut their skins into long straps, called allengas, which the Abissinians use instead of whips and spurs to their horses. Much less is it infested with tritons, mermaids, and other sea monsters, as some authors have pretended <sup>2</sup>, who have been since confuted by others of greater authority, who have resided in that kingdom <sup>3</sup>.

- WHAT is still more singular of this lake, is, that it receives the Nile into its bosom, and gives its waters a free passage across it from west to east, without intermixing its own with it. Hence it is that the ancients, and many of our modern geographers, have imagined that celebrated river to have its rise from thence, though the contrary hath been since discovered by eye-witnesses, who have been at the pains to trace it back from the place where it falls into the lake, quite up to its famous, and so long sought-for springs, which are above twenty leagues in a direct line distant from it, as we have formerly had occasion to shew in our ancient history of this country, to which the reader is referred for a more particular account <sup>4</sup>.

- It will not be, however, foreign to our general design, to observe here, with the ingenious Mr. Maillet, an author who was not only personally conversant with most of the missionaries, and other Portuguese authors, who have wrote so decisively concerning the two sources of this famed river, but with many others who have had occasion to visit those parts, how little reason there is to acquiesce in the account they give us, of this so much boasted discovery, especially as the merit and reputation of it is so apt to inspire one with an ambitious desire after a title, or even some bare pretence to it.

- THIS seems no less evident to us, from the artful preference they have given us of these two springs, to a vast number of others, which, by their flowing into the same common stream, though perhaps from a much greater distance, might intitle them, with as much justice, to that dignified name: for when so many different brooks thus join their waves into one common stream, as they do here, how can one, with so much seeming certainty, assign that title to any one or two of them, exclusive of the rest; and yet unless this can be done,

<sup>P</sup> TELLEZ, LOBO, LUDOLPH, & al. sup. citat. Atlas, an. 1653.

<sup>1</sup> Nat. Hist. lib. xiii. c. 11.

<sup>2</sup> Vid. JOHNSON'S Anc. Hist. vol. i. p.

<sup>3</sup> TELLEZ, ALMEYDA, LOBO, LUDOLPH, & al. ubi sup. 177. vii. p. 187, & seq.

authors followed the common error, that this vast receptacle received its waters from the two great rivers of Zaida, or Zaira, and Coanza; the former of which discharges itself, on the contrary, into the Abissinian sea, near the coasts of Kongo; and the latter runs its course eastwards, towards the kingdom of Angot; whereas it is plain, that the river Nile is the only one that is known to flow into this lake, which is the cause that its waters rise to such a prodigious degree in winter, by the many other rivers flowing, as well as by the torrents that fall from the adjacent mountains into it, in such vast plenty (3).

(3) Id. ibid. vid. Cornille, la Martiniere, & al. sup. citat.

the head spring of that river may justly be deemed as unknown to us as it was to the ancients. <sup>a</sup> What is the Nile itself, with all that multitude of streams that flow into it, but a mere brook, before the Jemma, which falls from the distant mountains of Dengla, with a much greater force, and a much larger quantity of water, swells it into the bulk of a river; or, to speak perhaps more properly, receives it into its bosom, and by a strange and un-natural requital, is forced to yield at once its waves and dignity to that proud intruder.

BUT here we are told, that this last is stamped by nature with the marks of the sovereign dignity: its forked head, tipped on the top with two wonderful bottomless springs, running down from two small hillocks, adorned with delightful trees leading to it, into a small lake, the clearness of the streams, the hollow ground through which it runs, the pleasant track of verdure which it leaves above-ground all the way that its waves run under it, the hollow <sup>b</sup> trembling ground through which it glides, and the constant tribute of water paid to it by a great number of brooks on both sides, these, and a variety of other topographical embellishments, whether real or imaginary, whether peculiar to that river, or common to those that flow into it, are what hath determined the good fathers to fix the diadem on its head, preferably to the Jemma, or any other pretender.

THUS much may suffice with regard to the source of this celebrated river. As to the cause of its not mixing its proud waves with those of the Dembean lake, a fact founded on frequent and unquestionable observations, it is rightly supposed to be the largeness and violence of its stream; which having received several other large rivers into it, and running its course downwards, with an unusual rapidity and sundry dreadful falls, carries all before it with an irresistible force, <sup>c</sup> and makes itself a chanel of twelve or more leagues through the Dembean waters, for so far it is from the place of its entrance to that of its sallying out of that lake <sup>u</sup>.

Chief rivers of the Nile described in the Anc. History.

Tacaza.

Its course along the famed desert of Aldaba.

THIS river is justly esteemed by far the most considerable of all Ethiopia, on many other accounts besides those already mentioned; but as it hath been fully described, both with regard to its springs, windings, cataracts, rivers falling into it, and other particulars relating to it, in our Ancient History <sup>w</sup>, we shall refer our readers to the place above quoted, to avoid needless repetitions, and go on with describing those which have not been at all, or but transiently, mentioned there. Among these last is the Tacaza, which, as we formerly hinted, is one of the principal ones that falls into the Nile, and is supposed the Astaboras of Ptolemy <sup>x</sup>. It hath its source on the ridge of mountains called Arywagua, on the frontiers of the kingdom of <sup>d</sup> Angot, next to that of Bargemder, where, at the foot of the higher-seated mountain toward the east, break forth with great force three several springs, within a stone's throw of each other, and joining their streams together, make up a considerable one, which runs eastward some days journey, between the territories of Daphana and Hoage, which lie north of it; thence crossing the kingdom of Tigre, it runs through the province of Sire, leaving its fertile lands on the east, and its celebrated desert of Aldaba on the west, once as famed for the number and austerity of its anchorites, as that of Thebais; thence continuing its course still northwards through the province of Holeait, and the low-lands of the Caffres, it at length enters into the kingdom of Dequin, inhabited by a kind of Moors, called Baulons, where it soon after loses itself in the Nile. This river, though not so large quite as that it runs into, <sup>e</sup> is in many places very deep, and abounds with crocodiles and sea-horses, both of an extraordinary size, and the fish, formerly mentioned, called torpedo <sup>y</sup>.

The Zebec, its rise and course.

THE Zebec rises in the kingdom of Nerea, and is said to be larger than the Nile; it rises in a canton of Boxa, belonging to that kingdom, and taking its course first westward, and then eastward, and thence southward, surrounds in some measure the kingdom of Gingiro into a peninsula, as the Nile doth that of Gojam; after this, it continues its course southward beyond Ken, and is supposed to be the same that disembogues itself at Mombaza <sup>z</sup>.

The Mareb runs part of its way under ground.

THE Mareb, another considerable river, hath its source at about two leagues distance westward from the town of Debaroa, since called Fremona, in the kingdom of Tigre, whence winding itself to the south, and entering into the sandy territories of the Caffres, <sup>f</sup> it comes down with a dreadful fall from a rock thirty cubits high, and buries itself a long way under-ground, yet not so low, but that if one digs a few yards deep, as the Portuguese did when they carried on the war in those parts, one finds not only plenty of sweet water, but of good fish. A little farther southwards the river rises again, and winding itself into the more fertile kingdom of Dekin, or Dequin, distributes all its fattening treasure of water on those lands, as if it had forgot to go any farther, or to return into the ocean <sup>a</sup>. In the winter season, this river, we are told, takes a different course before it buries itself

<sup>u</sup> TELLEZ, PAYS, ALMEYDA, LOBO, & al. ibid.

<sup>y</sup> ALMEYDA, LOBO, TELLEZ, LUDOLPH, & al.

Santos Ethiop. orient. l. v. c. 1.

<sup>w</sup> Ubi sup.

<sup>x</sup> Anc. Hist. vol. vii. p. 189 (I).

<sup>z</sup> TELLEZ Travels of the Jesuits, l. i. c. 4. JOHN DOS

<sup>a</sup> TELLEZ, ALMEYDA, LOBO, LUDOLPH, & al.

- a in the sands, and runs between the provinces of Suroa, Affa, Harve, and Towat; and gliding along the foot of the monastery of Halleluja, which stands at a small distance from Fremona, above-mentioned, and consequently from the place where it rises; after which it enters into the sandy lands, and there sinks itself out of sight <sup>b</sup>.

ANOTHER river, almost equal to the Nile, is the Hbax, Hadax, or according to Mr. The Haoax. Ludolph, Hawash, which rises between the kingdoms of Xoa on the north, and of Ogge and Fattegar, on the south, and directing its course eastward, receives several large rivers, particularly the Machi, or Matsbi, which flows from the great lake of Zawaja, or Zoaj, Machi. in the kingdom of Ogge, above-mentioned; thence, with this new addition, it hurries its rapid stream into the kingdom of Adel, which it enters at a place called Anca-Garrele, where the fathers Pereira and Machado, two jesuit missionaries, were beheaded, by the Mohammedan king, in hatred to Christianity. This noble river makes ample amends to the inhabitants for the scarcity of rains, which fall here but seldom; and being, like the Nile, drawn into numerous chanel, enriches all that tract, by watering their fields and fertilising their vallies, so that they produce the greatest plenty of corn and cattle; and at length, like the Mareb above-mentioned, buries itself in the earth <sup>c</sup>, as if it thought it a more honourable sepulchre than the sea (C).

OTHER rivers of this empire having little in them worth our reader's attention, we shall content ourselves with the bare naming of those of most note; such as the Bachilo, or Baxilo, which divides the kingdoms of Begemder and Ambara; the Guexem, or Queccam, which divides the latter from that of Valaka, or Olaca; the Anguer, which joining its stream with the Maleg, carries their fertility through the kingdoms of Damot, Narea, Bizamo, and the cantons of the Gaffates and Gongas; all which, and many others we omit, may be best seen in the map of this empire, at the beginning of this chapter. And thus much may suffice for the natural rarities of this empire.

THEIR artificial ones, at least such as may be relied upon, are much fewer in number, as the reader may judge by what hath been said above of their trade and manufactures; yet some of them are of such an uncommon nature, as to deserve the attention of a curious reader: we mean those ten stately churches cut out of the solid rock, by dint of the hammer and chissel, and so highly extolled by the patriarch Alvarez, and father Tellez; the latter of whom hath only given us the names, but the former hath obliged the world with a description of them. What still increases the wonder, is, that they were all completed, by the command, and at the charges, of one of their great monarchs, named Lalibela, of whose glorious reign and actions we shall give a further account in its proper place. Their names are, St. Emanuel, St. Saviour, St. Mary, the Holy Cross, St. George, Golgotha, Bethlehem, the Martyrs, Marcureos, and Lalibela; which last bears the name of its noble founder, and is by far the noblest structure of all the rest, though himself was interred in that of Golgotha. This pious and magnificent prince, being sensible of the scarcity of archi-

<sup>b</sup> LOBO, ubi sup. p. 212, & seq.

<sup>c</sup> TELLEZ, & al. sup. citat.

(C) It will not be improper here to acquaint our readers, that this is the same river which a fabulous author calls the Niger, or black river, for no other reason than because it runs through the country of the blacks; as if no other rivers of this and the circumjacent empire did the same, but run through the countries of the whites. This river, of which that writer makes the Nile to be only a branch (though it be certain there is no such river in this Ethiopia, as we shall see when we come to speak of it in its proper place) he goes on to tell us, in his romantic way, forms three lakes; from the one of which a river flows, which always runs over stones of great value, such as rubies, saphirs, emeralds, garnets, &c. besides gold-dust; and falling into the sea at Melinda, hath a great fishery of pearl and ambergris at the mouth of it (4).

To this imaginary river of our monkish author, we shall add another no less fabulous, and no less celebrated by the romantic Hebrew rabbies, viz. the Sabbation, or Sabbatic river, which is affirmed to flow with a swift and loud current, during the six first days of the week, and to be dried up during the whole sabbath, or seventh day. Josephus is the first who tells us that Titus saw it in his way through Syria (5), but makes it to flow only on the sabbath day, and to be dry all the other six; which is the reverse of what its name imports. Pliny, upon the credit of some Jewish fabulist, speaks more properly of it (6), when he says that in Judea rivus omnibus sabbatis exsiccatur, a river in Judea is dried up every sabbath day.

But the rabbins abovementioned speak of the Sabbation, or Sabbatic river, in a much higher strain, and place it in different parts of the world; some beyond the Euphrates, some in India, and some in the Abissinian empire (7), and pretend that it is so rapid, wide, and deep, that it is impossible to cross it, and that on the sabbath it is quite dry; for which reason, the Israelites, who are pretended to possess large territories and dominions on the other side, place guards along its banks, to prevent being invaded by strangers on that day. Jonathan Ben Uziel, the pretended author of the Chaldee paraphrase, an author more ancient than Josephus, mentions likewise this Sabbation; but few of the learned believe that paraphrase to have been his. So that, upon the whole, Josephus seems to be the first broacher of that fabulous river, of which no mention is made by any other author, except Pliny, who probably had it from him (8).

(4) Ludow. Urett. Hist. de Ethiop. lib. i. c. 29.

(5) De bell. Jud. lib. vii. c. 24.

(6) Lib. xxxi.

(7) Vid. Rabinos citat. in Bibliot. Bartoloc. vol. i. p. 100, & seq. Bibl. Rab. Wolfii.

(8) Vid.

Ludolph, l. iv. c. 8. §. 115. Buxtorf Lexic. Talmud. sub voc. Calmet, & al. plur.

fects and workmen in his own empire, for the carrying on of such vast designs, sent for a competent number of them out of Egypt; a kingdom which hath been always famous for them, ever since the building of the celebrated pyramids; and these, by his munificence, completed all these churches, we are told, in the space of twenty-four-years, in the wonderful manner above-mentioned <sup>d</sup>. We shall refer our reader to the description which Alvarez hath left us of these stupendous structures, the completing of which in that singular manner, and in so short a time, would appear at least very incredible, were we not told at the same time, that the rocks out of which they were thus curiously hewn, were of so soft a nature, that the workmen's tools went easily through them; though they hardened afterwards to such solidity when exposed to the sun and weather. Neither is it improbable that they might have naturally something of that form before-hand, since we find such variety of other figures <sup>b</sup> represented by them, and as exact and regular as if they had been cut with a chissel: a few instances of which we have seen under the last article.

Ancient churches belonging to monasteries.

SOME of their other churches, particularly those which belonged to their most celebrated monasteries, appear to have been formerly large and sumptuous structures, and might be deservedly ranked among their artificial rarities, not only on that account, but much more for their singular form, they being mostly built after the model of the temple of Jerusalem, and divided into the same three atria, or partitions. Some of them are of a round figure, and have a square chapel in the centre, of square stone, with four gates, facing the four cardinal points; the portals and windows were of cedar, or some other curious wood, neatly wrought. The roof above rises in the form of a cupola, but within appears always gloomy, <sup>c</sup> as having no first light. Without the square, between it and the round walls, was the body of the church, which looked more like a cloister, and was well lined all over with cedar wood, and the roof was supported with pillars of the same, very costly and beautifully wrought. Most of them, however, are gone to decay: and of some of them, little more was left than their ruins, or at best some few fragments, still serving to the same religious uses <sup>e</sup>.

Run to decay.

The imperial palace described.

WE omit sundry other such rarities, both natural and artificial, mentioned by Athanasius Kercher, which those who can give credit to them may see in his large collection. And the last we shall mention here, is the famed imperial palace, built after the European taste, by father Pays, of which we promised to give a short account under this head. This stately edifice was faced within and without with large square stones, neatly wrought and joined together. <sup>d</sup> Among the stately apartments of it, was one fair spacious room, fifty feet in length, and fifteen in breadth; and on the same floor, a square bed-chamber, together with a spacious stair-case in the middle, leading from the lower to the upper floor. From this ascended a second, leading to the flat roof of the house, which was guarded about with a handsome parapet. On the top of this upper stair-case was built a little room, like a closet, in which the emperor used to delight himself much, because he had from thence a distant view of the whole Dembean lake, and all the adjacent country, the palace being built on a rising ground, in the large peninsula called Gorgora, on the northern side of the lake: from thence also he could see nearer at hand all that went in and out, without being perceived by any body <sup>f</sup>. This delightful spot being the place where that monarch used to spend the greatest part <sup>e</sup> of the winter, and had caused it to be beautified with stately gardens after the European manner.

<sup>d</sup> ALVAREZ, TELLEZ, LOBO, LUDOLPH, KERCHER, & al. plur.
<sup>f</sup> TELLEZ, & al. vid. & LUDOLPH, l. ii, c. 12. LOBO, & al. sup. p. 116.

<sup>e</sup> TELLEZ, & al. sup. citat.

S E C T. VI.

Of the government, laws, emperor's court, power, coronation, pompous titles, camp, retinue, army, revenue, and other prerogatives.

Government of Abissinia; IT plainly appears, by all the records of this once vast and opulent empire, that its government was from its first foundation monarchical and despotic, and that, though its origin and uninterrupted series of monarchs, which the Abissinians so much boast of, be at best very precarious and doubtful, yet there cannot be found, either in their tradition or annals, or through any of those great revolutions which it hath undergone during so long a series of ages, a period of time, in which those princes did not rule with despotic sway, and claim an absolute right over the lives, liberties, and fortunes of their subjects, as well as an uncontrollable a troublable authority in all matters ecclesiastical as well a civil<sup>a</sup>. There never were among them any written laws concerning their government, much less any to restrain their exorbitant power, or secure the subjects the least privilege or property; but his sole will is the universal law. Notwithstanding which extensive prerogative, derived to them from time immemorial, we find not that the clergy have so wholly acknowledged or submitted to it: but that they have, upon various occasions, strenuously opposed it, not only in matters wholly religious and ecclesiastical, but even in some that were merely political, such as the succession or coronation of some of their emperors, as we shall see in the sequel.

The emperors power absolute.

WE have already observed<sup>b</sup>, that these princes boast themselves descended from Menilebeck, or David, the son of the great Solomon king of Israel, by the queen of Sheba. This prince, according to them, did, after her return from Judea, reign twenty-five years, and was succeeded by this son, from whom descended a series of princes, in a direct line, down to the year 960, when the crown passed into another family; in virtue of which noble descent, they stile themselves Nagush, and are always addressed either by that of nagusha nagasht, or king of kings; or by that of hatzeghe, equivalent to the French sire. But, besides these, they assume commonly some other pompous ones in their edicts, letters, and other public writings: such was, for instance, the letter of the emperor Lebna Danguil, al. David, al. Soltan Segued, (for he bore all those names) to Emanuel king of Portugal; in which he stiles himself David the beloved of God, pillar of the faith, kinsman to the race of Judah, son of David, and of Solomon, son of the pillar of Sion, emperor of the great and high Ethiopia, and of its great kingdoms and provinces, &c. They likewise bear in their arms the lion of the tribe of Judah, holding a cross, with this inscription in Ethiopic, The lion of the tribe of Judah is conqueror<sup>c</sup>. The respect that is paid to their presence, is answerable to their title and dignity, none of their subjects approaching it without the deepest marks of submission, and such as come little short of adoration, that is paid to several Indian princes, of whom we have had occasion to speak in some former volumes<sup>d</sup>. They do not indeed affect, like them, that majestic piece of grandeur, of being seldom seen by their subjects; for these will often shew themselves to them in public, and even admit them into their presence; but this is never done without the greatest solemnity; and those who are thus far honoured, are obliged to fall prostrate on the earth before him, and kiss the ground as they approach his person. Something like it they observe even in his absence, insomuch, that they never hear his name mentioned without bowing their bodies very low, and touching the ground with their hand. As for all the other marks of their boasted grandeur and magnificence, it chiefly consists in the retinue that constantly attends their court, or rather their camp, for we have already observed that they chiefly live in tents. In these one may indeed see something of imperial pomp and state, though vastly short of that of the Chinese, and other monarchs, in their progress from place to place<sup>e</sup>. They are not only accompanied by their own household and guards, which make up a numerous shew, but by all the grantees and officers of the empire, which out-vie one another, not only in the largeness and splendour of their retinue, but in the richness of their dress, and the sumptuousness of their pavilions; so that their camp always takes up a large space of ground, and makes a very magnificent shew; to which the regular disposition of the streets, and great variety of tents, streamers, and other ornaments, and especially the many lights and fires at night, contribute not a little; so that the whole appears like a vast open, and regular city, in whose center, or on some eminent part of which, is displayed the imperial pavilion, outvying all the rest, in height, bulk, and richness. Next to it, are those of the empresses and royal family, and then those of the lords and ladies of his court, all appearing with a proportionable, though inferior lustre. To these, we may add those stately large ones which serve them instead of churches, upon which they likewise bestow no small cost, to adorn and enrich them both within and without. As to the rest of this imperial camp, we must expect nothing extraordinary in it, except its vast extent, and the good order that is commonly kept in it, together with its market-places, courts of judicature, and other tribunals of justice, and the places where the young nobility perform variety of exercises on horseback, which afford likewise a delightful sight. All the rest appears only a huge variety of long extensive lanes, made up on all sides either of mean ordinary tents, or low miserable huts of laths and clay covered with straw, which serve for his guards, soldiery, and a prodigious multitude of sutlers and other attendance<sup>f</sup>.

WHEN the emperor removes this his camp, or, as it may properly be stiled, his metropolis, which is done oftener or seldomer, according to his pleasure, or the condition the empire

<sup>a</sup> TELLEZ, ALMEYDA, LOBO, LUDOLPH, PONCET, & al. plur.

<sup>b</sup> See before, vol. v. p. 623.

<sup>c</sup> 1 Kings, x. pass. vid. & TELLEZ, ALMEYDA, LOBO. Vid. & LUDOLPH, Ethiop. lib. ii. c. 1. pass. & al. plur.

<sup>d</sup> See before, vol. iii. p. 576, & seq. & vol. iv. pass.

<sup>e</sup> See before, vol. iii. p. 582, & seq.

<sup>f</sup> TELLEZ,

ALMEYDA, LOBO, PONCET, LUDOLPH, DAM. GOEZ, & al. plur.

is in (D), (some princes having changed places in two, three, or more years, others but once a in six or seven, or even as far as ten years) their chief care is to chuse a most convenient spacious spot, well furnished with water, and especially with wood, because when that begins to fail them, they are obliged to remove; and it is scarcely conceivable what havock they make of it, for want of observing a due order in felling of it; so that vast forests, mountains, and vallies, are frequently laid bare in a little time; insomuch, that whenever this huge unwieldy incampment removes, there is then no more to be seen for a long while after, but the mere naked ground; and it is looked upon amongst them as a great, if not an incredible wonder, that such great cities as are in other parts of the world should be able to subsist so long a time in one place, without being in extreme want of wood. The emperor, in his march, whether in time of peace or war, is always attended by his azaques and chief ministers: he appears with a crown on his head, which is made up of pieces of gold and silver, embellished with some sea pearl; for other kinds of jewels were never so much as seen in Abissinia, if we may believe abbot Gregory, and the generality of Portuguese missionaries; though Poncet, on the contrary, describes the empress as covered all over with jewels, when he had the honour to be admitted to her presence *. He also wears a kind of cap, or hat, made after the Indian manner, and commonly brought from thence. It was likewise the custom formerly, for these princes to be surrounded with a set of Indian curtains, to keep them from public view; but that having been long ago set aside, they will now frequently leave their mule, and shew themselves on a stately prancing horse. Some time before they begin their march, proper officers are sent all the way before, to the governors of every province and place where they are to pass, with orders not only to provide them and the whole army with all necessaries, but likewise to clear and repair the roads, and especially to clear the woods, through which their way lies, of all superfluous branches, briars, and every thing else that may retard their march; though they can travel but slowly, and by short journies, by reason of the multitudes of women, children, cattle, and other luggage that commonly follows them. These orders seldom fail of being executed with the utmost exactness by the country-people, because, upon the least deficiency, they are sure to be severely fined; and, which is still worse, are frequently undeservedly so, through the knavery of the overseers; so that on the time appointed, they all punctually come with their quotas of cows, corn, beer, hydromel, &c. all which are afterwards distributed with the same exactness among the several ranks and orders of the army; it being a standing law, throughout the whole empire, that every district and canton, through which the emperor or his army are to pass, shall find them in all those necessaries, and make the roads fit for them ‡. Besides these purveyors above-mentioned, the Titmerari, or officer that commands the van-guard, takes upon him the office of quarter-master general, and fixes his pike on the spot he chuses for the imperial pavilion; after which, every one of the rest knowing his own rank, and the ground that he is to take up, they easily guess by their eye where their tents are to be pitched; so that the whole encampment is completed in a trice, and with its usual readiness; and with such regularity and exactness, as well as dispatch, that, notwithstanding their being so frequently removed, yet every one knows the ways and paths so well, that he can go to the tent of any one with the same facility that he can to his own, or as we can find a lane, street, or house, in any of our cities, or most populous towns.

THE camp is divided into seven parishes, every one of which hath its head priest, with all his deacons and inferiors under him, who assist him in the instruction of youth, in performing the divine service, and other functions of the priestly office. Whenever the enemy hap-

* English edit. p. 53.

‡ Id. Ibid.

(D) These removes are chiefly occasioned either thro' the want of wood and provisions, or by the different wars which those princes have in hand, sometimes with one enemy, sometimes with another, they being in a great measure surrounded by them on every side. During some part of the time of the missionaries residence in those parts, the emperor had his camp at a place called Dencas, where it continued ten whole years; but before that, he had five or six other places, in which he had tarried only one, two, or three years. The emperors have likewise a place for their winter quarters, where they retire with their wives and household, as it were from business, especially in the time of war, and return to the camp with the return of the spring (9).

The imperial army, as we shall see by-and-by, is supplied with provisions, in their march, by the people of the country thro' which they pass; but if it stays any time in one place, the emperor, or, in his absence, his head general, have no other way to subsist them, than by assigning certain towns to them; in virtue of which, they not only strip the poor people of their provisions, but carry off all that they can lay their hands on; by which means, whole cantons, and sometimes provinces, are quite ruined, and almost depopulated; the poorer sort being forced to abandon their dwellings, and either to go and settle in some more distant ones, or, which is often the case, to turn vagabonds, and live upon the hospitality of the people (10).

(9) Tellez, Almeyda, Lobo, Ludolph, Dam. de Goes, Codign. & al. al. pass.

(10) Id. ibid. See before, p. 199, &

pens to be near, the army is ordered to march close, and in the best order; the van-guard and rear drawing up close to the main body. The wings spread themselves out; and the emperor keeps in the centre with his guards, great officers, ladies, &c. leaving still a sufficient interval for inclosing the baggage. At other times they observe little or no order in their marches, saving that there is always a number of warlike instruments, with kettle and other drums sounding before, and a set guard marching around him. He always mounts and alights in his tent; and, if he hath occasion to alight by the way, the guards immediately make a ring about his person, and spread their cloaks to keep him unseen; and if it is with a design to take rest, a couch, which is commonly carried near at hand for that purpose, is brought to him, on which he lies on cushions covered with carpets of the finest silks. We omit some other curious, though less material, instances of the power and grandeur of the Abissinian monarchs, which some writers have given us an account of <sup>b</sup>, as we do not find them mentioned by the principal authors we have hitherto followed. To come therefore to some more important ones:

We have already hinted, that the Abissinian crown is altogether hereditary, and must be preserved in the same family, that is, in the posterity of Menilebek, their first monarch; but the succession to it is not so absolutely tied to the primogeniture, but an emperor, if he pleases, may set aside his eldest son, or any other of them, for the sake of a younger, whom he favours more, or thinks more worthy of it. This often proved the cause of much jealousy and misunderstanding between the young princes, and sometimes of long and cruel wars between them; and in all probability gave birth to that severe custom, held in this empire, of confining all the princes of the blood to the fortrefs or rock called Amba-Guexen, lately described. The occasion of it, as well as that of its being afterwards abrogated, appearing more singular than clear, the reader may see in the margin (E). But, whatever gave rise to it, sure it is, that the successor to the crown was always fetched from thence while that custom lasted, in order to be invested with the regalia of that empire. Till that time, they were kept, with the rest of those unfortunate prisoners, under such a very strict guard, that no creature was permitted to come near them; nor could any message or letter be conveyed to them, till it had undergone the examination of their gaolers, whose business it was to keep them under the strictest and severest discipline; insomuch that they would not allow them to wear any better clothes than those cotton ones, which were the usual garb of the common people, lest a more distinguished dress should inspire them with ambitious thoughts <sup>c</sup>.

We have a remarkable instance of this related by father Tellez, which is as follows: One of these guards or gaolers, who was naturally very rigid, observing that one of those young

Crown hereditary.

Young princes confined in a fortrefs.

A notable instance of one of them.

<sup>b</sup> DAM. GOES Mores Abissin. pass. ILLESC. Pontif. Hist. l. vi. c. 22, & al. DOLPH, & al. ubi sup.

<sup>c</sup> TELLEZ, LOBO, LUDOLPH, & al. ubi sup.

(E) This rigorous custom, we are told, was not introduced till the year 1260, when the then emperor Iqubnu, or kon-Amlacus, having bequeathed the empire between his five (some say nine) sons, with a restriction, that they should reign alternately, every one his year, according to their seniority; the youngest of them, named Free-Hecam, not having patience to stay till his turn came, and being vexed to see those of his brethren, who had already reigned in theirs, sitting at an upper table, whilst he and the rest were obliged to take up with a lower, and to go and wash their hands in another room, because it was thought unseemly to do so before their betters; all these, joined together, inspired the ambitious youth with a design to abolish that shifting annual government, and to grasp it all into his own hands.

He found it difficult to carry on such a project without imparting it to some friend; and that friend found it no less dangerous to keep a secret, so that, instead of succeeding, he found himself intrapped in his own snare: for, as soon as it came near his turn to mount the throne, as he was studying all proper measures to secure all his other brethren in some such strong place as that of Guexen above-mentioned, his confidant revealed the whole secret to the then reigning brother; who liked the project so well, that he sent both the projector, and all his other brethren, under a strong guard, to the Amba-Guexen, as the fittest place for his purpose. Soon after which, Herod-like, growing jealous of his own sons, he sent them all likewise into the same dismal confinement. This is the substance of what our authors tell us (11) gave rise to this unnatural custom, which continued in use somewhat above two hundred years.

As to the occasion of its being afterwards abrogated, it was as follows: Nabad, the prince then on the throne, and the father of Onak Segued, the last prince of that country who came out of that dreadful confinement, had a son about eight or nine years old, of whom he was exceedingly fond. A counsellor, who came to court one day, seeing him standing by his father's side, could not forbear taking notice to the emperor, how big his son was grown; whereupon the young prince, who had a ready apprehension above his years, was struck with terror at the expression; and, fixing his weeping eyes upon his father, said, in a moving tone, "What am I then grown up for Amba-Guexen?" Which words made so deep an impression upon him, that he immediately resolved to abolish that inhuman custom; and not only swore himself, but obliged his counsellors, and officers of his court, to do the same; viz. that no son of his, nor of any other emperor, should thenceforth be ever confined to that place; which oath hath been so faithfully observed ever since, that no prince of the blood hath ever been sent thither from that time (12).

(11) Tellez, Almeyda, Lobo, Poncet, Ludolph, & al. sup. citat.

(12) Tellez, Almeyda, Lobo, Poncet,

princes was better clothed than the rest, and was more nice and careful in his dress, not only a severely reprimanded him for it, but tore it off his back; and threatened him, that if ever he caught him again in such finery, he would provide him a dress that would not please him. Some years after, this prince was raised to the imperial throne, and ordered that guard to be brought before him; who, coming with a heart full of the deepest apprehension, cast himself at his feet, and begged pardon for what he had formerly done to him. His fears, however, were soon turned into joy and gratitude, when that generous prince, bidding him rise, presented him with a rich suit, and a gold bracelet of great value, and dismissed him with words to this effect: You did your duty as became you, and I am highly pleased with it: and, as you have served my father so faithfully, I doubt not you will do the same by me: return to your former charge<sup>k</sup>. This behaviour, which chiefly tended to make those guards b more rigid and severe, plainly shews, that, however hard that prince might deem his condition to be whilst under that cruel restraint, yet he did not think it politic or safe, now he was on the throne, to abate any thing of that severity and harsh confinement. And we may very well question, whether any thing less than the extreme grief and tears of so tender a young prince as he, whom we have just mentioned in the last note, could have prevailed upon the emperor Nabod, his father, to abolish a custom of such long standing, and which had been till then looked upon as one of the greatest securities to the monarch upon the throne, against any domestic faction or rebellion.

That custom since abrogated;

and revived
again.

WE may add, that (if what father Alvarez tells us of his own knowledge may be credited, and all his brethren own that he may be safely depended upon so far<sup>l</sup>), this custom was not c so thoroughly banished out of the empire as Tellez would insinuate, since he, Alvarez, positively tells us, that David, one of the sons of that very Nabod, having been raised to the throne, and defeated by his elder brother, was sent with all his younger brethren to that doleful confinement; and adds farther, that he saw one of the youngest of them, who had found means to escape, taken, and relegated to the same place. We shall not take upon us to reconcile two such different accounts; but only observe, that it is not at all likely, in such a fierce contest between so many young princes for the succession, he that proved conqueror over the rest should scruple the reviving such a custom for his own security, tho' ever so justly and reasonably, and, we may add, ever so solemnly, abolished by their father, and all the nobles of his empire<sup>m</sup>.

F. Uretta's account opposite.

NEITHER shall we trouble our readers with the opposite account which father Uretta, the Dominican, hath given us of that princely prison; who rather describes it as an earthly paradise, in which those princes enjoy every kind of pleasure and happiness, except their liberty, and are educated in a manner suitable to their birth<sup>n</sup>. That author is esteemed too fabulous to be credited against the consentient testimony of so many missionaries, whom he point-blank contradicts, not only in this, but in most other parts of his history, which is for that reason generally looked upon as fabulous, and by them represented as a heap of romantic forgeries<sup>o</sup>; yet is he not the only one who contradicts those fathers in many material points (F); and it will perhaps remain a doubt, on whom we may most safely rely, till a fresh access to these dominions be opened again to the Europeans. However, with respect to the nature of this e manner of confining these young princes, we shall only beg leave to observe, that the delightful description which Uretta gives us of it being the most natural, and by far more for the honour of the Abissinian monarchs, than the dismal and melancholy one of Almeyda and his brethren, it is scarcely credible that so zealous a subject as the abbot Gregory would have confirmed the latter, had he not been convinced that it was the most agreeable to truth.

Ceremony of coronation;

THE manner in which any of these young princes was brought out of that wretched abode, to ascend the throne, was as follows; which, by the way, was not done till after due consultation, and a strict enquiry into the character of the happy person. If the emperor, indeed, did declare him during his life, there was then no debate or opposition; but if he had not done it, the nobles and officers of the army had a right to chuse him whom they thought most f worthy of the crown. As soon as they had agreed upon a successor, the viceroy of Tigre went at the head of some forces, and incamped at the foot of the mountain, whence, with a

<sup>l</sup> TELLEZ, LOBO, LUDOLPH, & al. sup. citat.
DOLPH, ubi sup. lib. ii. c. 8. § 35, & seq.

<sup>1</sup> See before, p. 202, & seq.

<sup>m</sup> Ibid. ib. Vide LU-

<sup>n</sup> Hist. de Ethiopie.

<sup>o</sup> THEVENOT, LUDOLPH, TELLEZ, & al.

(F) The reader may see, in particular, Poncet's description of some of the royal palaces, especially of the great city of Gondar, its vast concourse of merchants, and affluence; description of its houses, churches, and other buildings; the apparel of the empresses, whom he represents as covered all over with jewels (13); and many more of the like kind; all which are quite contrary to the account of the missionaries, and Mr. Ludolph's Gregory.

(13) See Poncet, English, p. 53, &c.

a proper retinue of grandees and officers, he went up to the top; and, entering the hut or cell of the prince elect, he, with the usual formality, fixed the Belul, or imperial ear-ring, to his ear, which was the token of his election; immediately after which, the other young princes were sent for, to come and pay their homage to, and congratulate him, on his happy accession to the crown. The reader will easily conceive with what a heavy, not to say envious, heart they paid him that compliment, and took their final farewell of him.

As soon as the new emperor was come down, the governors, and other officers, came at the head of the army to meet him; and, as soon as they approached him, they all alighted together and saluted him; and, upon his giving them the signal, they all mounted again, and taking him into their center, conducted him to the Debana, or imperial pavilion, with loud acclamations of joy, heightened by the sounds of the trumpets, kettle-drums, and other musical instruments. Here he alone alighted within, whilst all the rest did the same without the Debana, and was soon after solemnly anointed by a proper prelate, called the Saraje Macare, whilst the rest of his clergy accompanied the ceremony with psalms and hymns suitable to the occasion<sup>p</sup>. Presently after that ceremony, he was invested with the imperial robes, and the crown was set upon his head, which, as we lately hinted, was made of several pieces of gold and silver, shaped like lillies, or flower-de-luce's, intermixed with pearl seeds, and fixed on a kind of hat or cap, of blue velvet; on the top of which was a cross of the same metal: the sword of state was drawn and put into his hand, and he being seated on the throne, a herald (or, as father Tellez styles him, the Ker Ace, or head chaplain) immediately proclaimed him emperor, in words to this import; We have caused—to reign; whose words were on a sudden answered by the loud acclamations of the whole assembly and army, who came to pay homage to him. and anointing:
Other ceremonies on their coronation.

THE sceptre, or an equivalent to it, is unknown amongst them, though it bears such a lively representation of the regal power and dignity in the sacred books of the Old Testament<sup>q</sup>. Some have indeed fancied, that the cross which they hold in their hand, was used by them instead of it; but that is a mistake, and this last is carried by the clergy in general, in token of their sacred function, the emperor being obliged to be ordained priest or deacon before he can be crowned, as we shall shew in the sequel. A kind of ritual, which we suppose contains the whole duty of a good sovereign, is next read and explained before him, either by the metropolitan that anoints him, or by some of his substitutes; but whether that prince promises, or swears to the observation of it or not, we are not told. From thence the new monarch goes and assists at the divine service, and receives the holy communion; and is afterwards accompanied by his court and army to the royal tent, through the joyful acclamations of the people, and with the sound of the trumpets, silver kettle-drums, and variety of other musical instruments; and the whole solemnity closed with feasting, and other tokens of joy<sup>r</sup>. We have omitted the whimsical ceremony of cutting the cord, which is peculiar to this country, and is to precede the coronation; but which being below the grandeur of such a solemnity, we shall give it our readers in the margin (G). That of cutting the cords.

THE

<sup>p</sup> TELLEZ, ALMEYDA, LOBO, LUDOLPH, & al.

plur. <sup>r</sup> TELLEZ, ALMEYDA, LUDOLPH, & al. sup. citat.

<sup>q</sup> Vide int. al. Gen. xlix. 10. Ps. cx. 2. & al.

(G) This ceremony is performed in the old ruined city of Axum, formerly described (14), that being still the place where the Abissinian monarchs are crowned. The same authors have added some other circumstances to it, which, tho' ludicrous, and beneath the dignity of a coronation, yet, thro' long standing, received as an irrevocable sanction; and there are few nations that have not adopted something, at least as whimsical and trifling as this we are going to speak of, in their grandest solemnities; witness the champion's office at the coronation of our monarchs.

There is an ancient stone, all over carved with unknown characters, standing at about the distance of two bow shots from the cathedral of Axum, at which the emperor elect is obliged, as he goes thither, to alight, and perform the ceremony called the cutting of the cord, which is commonly a silk line, or ribbon, which the maidens of Axum hold across his way. The place, before his coming, is spread over with rich carpets; and those of his retinue that go before, open the way to him through the crowds on both sides; and he, being alighted, marches three times towards the silk line, and is asked by the maidens who hold it, Who he is? to whom he answers, I am king of Israel; and they reply, Then are you not our king; and he draws back. But being asked the same question at his third approach, and answering, I am king of Sion, he draws his sword, and cuts the cord with it; upon which they joyfully cry, then are you truly our king, the king of Sion; upon which the air is immediately filled with the loudest acclamations of joy, with the firing of the army's small arms, and the sound of variety of warlike and other instruments. The cord being cut, the abuna, or metropolitan, and his clergy, who stood at some small distance from it, and come on purpose from Dembea to perform the ceremony, march forwards towards him, and introduce him into the outward court of the church, with proper psalms or canticles, in their own tongue; where being crowned and anointed, he is thence conducted into the church to hear divine service, &c. Thus far father Tellez, and his brethren (15), concerning the coronation of the Abissinian monarchs.

(14) See before, p. 172.

(15) Tellez, l. iii. c. 53. Ludolph, l. ii. c. 11.

They have plurality of wives of different religions.

Chuse them from among their subjects.

Ceremony of their nuptials.

Feasting and carousing.

The queen how proclaimed.

THE next grand ceremony relating to the Abissinian monarchs, is their nuptials, and the manner of marrying, and declaring their empresses. We have already observed, that they allow themselves the liberty of having a plurality of them, like their ancient progenitor Solomon king of the Jews : and they not only imitate him in that, but likewise in taking those of different religions, whether Gentiles or Mohammedans ; and some of them have carried this licence so far, as, like that Jewish monarch, to allow their heathen wives to have their own temples and idols ; so that one might see, on one side, the church of God, and on the other, a Pagan temple, as it was the case in Soltan Segued's reign ; though others indeed had so much regard to religion, as to cause those Pagan or Mohammedan princesses to be instructed and baptized in it before they married them. The generality of them, however, chuse to marry the daughters of noble families, of which there are abundance in some of their chief provinces and kingdoms, especially in that of Tigre ; whilst some of them, paying a greater regard to the natural endowments of the mind, or the beauty of the person, than to the nobleness of their extract, which they thought added nothing to their own grandeur, chiefly chose them for the former ; they being thought sufficiently ennobled by being preferred to the imperial bed<sup>1</sup>.

As soon, therefore, as the monarch has pitched upon any young lady for his wife, she is brought away from her parents, and lodged in the house of some of his relations, in order to come to a better knowledge of her good qualities. If he is satisfied with her in that point, he takes her with him to church on a Sunday, where having assisted at the divine service, and received the holy communion, they are led back to the imperial pavilion, attended by the whole court, in their richest attire ; there the abuna, or chief prelate, commonly performs the matrimonial ceremony ; which ended, the emperor, as is usual at all other times, dines by himself in his own apartment, and she in hers, in company with a number of other ladies. The nobles, clergymen, and deptaras (H), are likewise sumptuously treated at other tables and tents, with variety of meats and liquors ; and the feast generally does not conclude among the male guests, till all the plenty of liquors, which had been prepared for them, be quite drank out : after which, every one lays himself down on the next convenient place that comes in his way, and sleeps it out till the next morning ; a custom observed, not only at these royal weddings, but in most of their other feasting ; but in such royal ones as these, care is taken that there be a plentiful supply of those liquors lodged before-hand in some convenient part of the pavilion, where the guests may come as often as they please to replenish their cups<sup>2</sup>.

THE conclusion of the nuptial festivity ended, the bride is not immediately declared empress (K), but is kept some days, weeks, or months, according to the emperor's pleasure ;

<sup>1</sup> See before, p. 207.
§ 99, & seq.

<sup>2</sup> TELLEZ, ALMEYDA, ALVAREZ, LOBO, & al. See LUDOLPH, lib. ii. c. 6.
" TELLEZ, & al. sup. citat.

In that at which father Pays was present, of the emperor Segued, on Sunday, March 23, 1609, the imperial army that accompanied him to that solemnity, consisted of 25,000 men and 1500 horse, all dressed in their best accoutrements. The emperor, together with the grandees of his court, appeared richly clad and mounted, and their horses in most sumptuous furniture. The monarch had on him a costly vest of crimson damask, and over it a Turkish robe of rich brocade ; which, like the ancient Roman gowns, had narrow, but long sleeves, hanging down to the ground : the vest, as well as robe, would have done the same, had it been let loose ; but the former was girt with a broad girdle, all of pieces of gold, curiously wrought : a thick golden chain went several times round his neck, whence hanging down on his breast, and the ends falling very low behind, gave him a grand majestic air, as he was himself a handsome man (6).

Father Uretta, in his usual way, adds many other pompous circumstances attending this coronation ceremony ; which, if true, would greatly add to the grandeur and magnificence of it (17) : but being rejected by Tellez, and the rest of his society, as fictions and fables, or, at best, as devised by a fertile brain, to shew how such a grand ceremony might be performed with a more suitable splendor (18), we shall not trouble our readers with them (19).

(H) The deptaras, or deptaras, we are told, are a peculiar sort of ecclesiastic chanters, or singers, they have among them upon these occasions ; and who boast themselves not only of Jewish extract, but to be descended from the ancient Jewish scribes. Their office here, as well as at church, is to sing, and beat a kind of a drum, and to dance and skip with such violent gestures and dreadful noises, that one would imagine the church, or place where they play their antics, was coming down about one's ears ; and yet these men are in great vogue and esteem among the great, as we shall see elsewhere.

(K) The title of Itigue, which is the most honourable that is given to the emperor's consort, is variously rendered queen, empress, and highness. When joined with their proper name, it is then shortened into Ite, or, as some pronounce it, Ethie, as Ite Miriam, Ite Hamelmal, queen Mary, or queen Hamelmal (20).

It is, however, to be observed, that though she be declared queen in the manner we are describing, yet she is not permitted to take the high title of Ite, or Itigue, as long as the late emperor's mother is living, to whom alone that title is given ; inasmuch that not only the wife of the reigning emperor, but he himself, calls her mother, though he be not her son, and pays her the same honour as if she had been really such (21).

(16) Jesuits Travels, l. iii. c. 13.
l. i. c. 9.

(17) Hist. de Ethiop.
(19) Tellez, ubi sup. Jesuits Travels, l. i. c. ult. Vide & Le Grand dissertat. 7th.
Ludolph, l. ii. c. 1. § 66. iii. 10. 66. See also his index under Itigue.

(18) Tellez, ubi sup. Jesuits Travels, (20) See
(21) Tellez, ubi sup. Ludolph,
ubi sup.

- a nor is she admitted to dwell with him in the royal pavilion, but hath one assigned near, yet separated from it by a different inclosure, and comes from thence to it when sent for. On the day she is to be installed Itigue, or empress, she appears in his tent, seated on a couch near the imperial throne, on which his majesty sits likewise, but higher by one step; and both are clad in the richest apparel, as well as the nobles and officers of his court, who assist at the solemnity. Upon a signal made, one of the dignified chaplains, who is commonly a prelate, goes out into the court, and standing on a chair, or desk, proclaims her empress in these words, Anagafna danguecera shem, that is, We have have ordained our slave to reign (L); or, as Ludolph words it, the king hath created his servant——queen<sup>w</sup>. This is immediately answered by the loud echoes and acclamations of the by-standers; after which she is dignified with the title of Itigue, or Ethie, which is equivalent to that of highness with us. As to the ceremony of crowning, we do not find that it was ever used to any of them, unless when the imperial dignity was solely vested in them, else the emperors alone are honoured with it.
- b We have lately hinted, that the Abissinian emperors are in holy orders; and, we are told, that many of them heretofore have been consecrated priests, and used to officiate as such, and to consecrate the sacred elements, and to administer them to the people; but with this restriction, however, that if they ever chanced to shed human blood, whether it amounted to murder, or only man-slaughter, they were, ipso facto, deprived of their priestly office, and could never more officiate in it<sup>x</sup>. Some of these authors still carry this point much higher, as the reader may see by one or two quotations we have subjoined in the margin (M), but which to us appear of no credit. It is plain, that since the coming of the Portuguese among them, there have been none of those monarchs in higher orders than deacons; a privilege, which it seems is granted likewise to the nobles and great officers of the court, and which, for aught we can find, is coveted by them for no other end, than that they may not be obliged to remain with the common laity in the body of the church, but be admitted within the curtains (as they stile that part of the chapel which answers, as we conjecture, to our chancel) among the clergy, and receive the communion with them. In consequence of this ordination, they are likewise allowed to carry little crosses in their hands when they go abroad, and to give them to the laity to kiss, as the rest of the clergy do<sup>y</sup>; which, by the way, plainly shews, that that which the emperors carry in their hands hath no analogy to the
- When allowed to be called Itigue, or highness.*
- Emperors take holy orders.*
- Mostly that of deacon.*
- Their motive for it.*

<sup>w</sup> LUDOLPH, l. ii. c. 1. § 68. TELLEZ, l. i. c. 10. <sup>x</sup> See LE GRAND, and the authors quoted by him, Differt. 4. p. 240, & seq. <sup>y</sup> ALVAREZ, c. 97. TELLEZ, l. i. c. 10. LUDOLPH, l. iii. c. 7. § 30, & seq.

(L) As harsh as the word slave may sound in our ears, it is in such common use amongst them, that even the king's own kindred and brethren have it given to them; so that when he raises any of them to any dignity, such as that of viceroy, which is the highest under him, their commission always runs, We have constituted——our slave, viceroy, or governor, &c. without giving them the title of brother or kinsman: and well may he stile them slaves, seeing they are all such to him, from the highest to the lowest; and their lands, lives, &c. are wholly at his disposal (22).

To soften, however, the harshness of that word, the Abissinians set a higher value upon a slave of their own country, and will give much more money for him, ceteris paribus, than for a stranger; for which, some of their literati have found out this learned reason; that their emperor is called Prester Jan, or, according to the Persic etymon, Chan; which last signifies with them, a prince, or sovereign; so that that title implies his being chan, or prince, of the Prester, or best, slaves (23).

But as little undervaluing as they think the title of slave is among them, it was not so accounted by the Portuguese when they were there; one of whom, they tell us, having obtained some great post from the emperor, and, as a subject of the king of Portugal, who calls them all his children, disdaining to be stiled a slave to that of Ethiopia, offered a good sum of money to the herald, or crier, who was to proclaim his promotion, to leave out that odious title, and call him only by his name; but that was more than the officer dared to do (24).

(M) The words, as quoted by Le Grand, run thus. Ethiopiæ reges omnes sunt sacerdotes, liturgiam celebrant super altaria; & quamdiu regnum obtinent, nihil quidquam manu propria occidere solent. Si quis contra fecerit, amittit jus liturgiæ (25). Another author adds some other particularities, such as, that the kings pulled off their crown when they went to officiate, and sat bare-headed all the time of divine service; that if they administered the Holy Communion, they received it themselves after all the rest. One thing more he adds, that if any of them had killed any thing, he lost all right and title to the obedience, or allegiance, of his subjects (26). The Abissinians likewise mention several of their kings who exercised the priestly function, particularly their famed Caleb, who did so during forty years. He lived, according to them, in the sixth century, and waged a long bloody war against Danawas, a Jew, then king of the Homerites, and totally ruined his kingdom; by which one would conclude, that the law against their shedding of blood was not then in force.

What credit may be given to those authors, we will not take upon us to say; but if there was such a law as absolved the subjects from their allegiance to a king in priestly orders, who had shed any blood since his admission into it, we need not wonder, if they have since contented themselves with the lower one of deacon (27).

(22) Tellez & al. ubi sup.

(23) Ludolph. l. i. c. 14. § 11, & seq.

(25) Simon Episcop. Asmon. apud Le Grand, Differt. 4. de Prester Jean, p. 240.

(27) Id. ibid. & seq. Ludolph, l. ii. c. 1. § 40. ibid. 24. § 21, & seq.

(24) Tellez, l. i. c. 10.

(26) Abuselach apud eund.

Bestowed upon infants. royal sceptre used among other nations. This order of the diaconate is bestowed upon the children, and even sucking infants, of great men, in order to intitle them to the same privileges; by all which one may judge, what regard the Abissinians pay to the clergy, and their sacred functions; seeing the emperor himself, absolute as his power is in all other respects, would not be admitted into the sanctuary, or chancel, if he was not first ordained deacon, but must submit to receive the communion at the gates of it, with the rest of the laity: and these are, as far as we can see, all the orders so much talked about of this pretended Prester John <sup>a</sup>.

The emperor's vast power. BUT in all other respects, except what relates to church discipline (to which they usually conform), one may affirm, that his authority is boundless over his subjects. He is the only sovereign over all the kingdoms and provinces of the empire, nor hath any other king under him (N). He disposes of all the lands throughout his dominions, excepting in the kingdoms of Tigre and Dembea, where there are some noble and privileged families, whose properties and dignities he never alienates from the ancient possessors. Such are, in the former, the Babrnagaes and Xumos, or governors of Sirave, Syre, Dembea, &c. and in the latter, the power of the Cautiba, which never departs from the family: though even in these, the emperor, in one or two years, more or less, as he sees fit, takes these commands from the possessors, and gives them to some other of the same family <sup>a</sup>.

allows no kings under him.

His chief officers of the empire.

It was their custom heretofore, never to appear in public; and it was seldom known that they troubled themselves with the affairs of the government, the care of which they chiefly committed to their two prime ministers, whom they called the Bahluded, or favourites. That custom hath long ago been abolished, and they have since thought it more convenient to shew themselves to their subjects, at least three or four times a year; though none, even to this day, is allowed to see them eat, except the pages that feed them <sup>b</sup>. Even the empress herself is denied that privilege, though she herself eats in company with her ladies; and when they give audience to foreign ambassadors, they always sit behind a curtain out of sight. Instead of a favourite minister, they have created a chief officer, whom they call Rash, or principal, and who is generalissimo. He hath under him two head overseers over all the rest; the one stiled Bellatinoche Goyta, or Gouta, that is, the lord of the servants, who is a kind of high-steward. This officer's power extends itself, not only over all the viceroys, governors, Xumos, and generals of the army, but likewise over the Azagues and Umbares, who are the civil judges of the empire. The other is stiled Takak, or Zekase Bellatinoche Goyta, or lord of the lesser servants, and is only a kind of under-steward to the king's household, which is commonly composed of men of a lesser rank (O).

Places all bought and corrupted.

Appeals dangerous and few.

Which fills the country with robbers.

THE misfortune is, that not only these, but all places that are under them, are rather sold to the highest bidder, than given to the fittest or worthiest; and consequently more is given for them than they are honestly worth: so that to be gainers by them, or even to save themselves, the owners are obliged to oppress all that are under them; and those governors and officers, from the highest to the lowest, become rather the plunderers than the protectors of the people. What is still worst by far, these last can obtain no redress against their oppressors; for though there be appeals from the inferior to the supreme courts, and even from them to the emperor, yet the remedy proves so often worse than the disease, that few, if any, dare venture upon it. But as this is the case of all arbitrary governments, where places, and justice itself, is venable, we shall not dwell longer upon this subject; only one inconvenience, arising from that general corruption of offices and officers, we cannot forbear taking notice of, because, perhaps, more severely felt in this empire than in any other; viz. that the universal poverty and misery which it spreads every-where, fills the whole country with swarms, not

<sup>a</sup> Id. ibid.

<sup>a</sup> Id. ibid.

<sup>b</sup> See before, p. 195.

(N) Some have indeed affirmed, that those of Dancale and Gingiro, the former of whom is a Mohammedan, and the other a heathen, were subject or tributary to him. But they neither are dependent, nor pay any tribute to him, but only acknowledge him as a powerful neighbour, who is every way superior to them, and with whom they think it their interest to live in peace and friendship (28).

(O) We have been indeed told, by the fabulous father Uretta, that the emperors were served by none but kings sons, and princes of the royal blood; but if we may depend upon the rest of our Portuguese writers, and the Abissinian Gregory, these monarchs are so far from it, that they will have none but slaves of their own breeding up to be about their person, or to wait at their court; and these, not of their own subjects; but the Agas, Gallas, Gongat, and Caffres, who are brought up there from their youth, and whom they often afterwards prefer to be Xumos, and raise them to such other employments, as their merit and abilities intitle them to; and they give this reason for their preference, that they find none so faithful, as those whom they breed up and raise from nothing; and that if they do not all prove so, yet they are in general more trusty than any of their own Abissinians (29).

(28) Tellez, ubi sup. l. i. c. 10. Ludolph, ubi sup. l. i. c. 2. § 11. iii. c. 11. § 9, & seq. Lo'bo, ubi sup. voy. 2. p. 48, & seq. (29) Tellez, ubi sup. Ludolph, & al.

a only of idle vagrants, such as we have already spoken of on another occasion <sup>c</sup>, but of desperate banditti, and murdering robbers, who range through all the provinces that are at a distance from the imperial camp, and, for want of a sufficient body of troops, or through their being too often employed in some war with the adjacent kingdoms, or through the remissness of the government, cannot be suppressed, or deterred from committing the greatest outrages on the poor natives, and the vilest cruelties and robberies on the travelling strangers, who come thither to traffick <sup>d</sup>. But what can be said of these enormities, if they are not only winked at, but even countenanced, by the government : and if that be really fact, which is affirmed by a late author, that those banditti are incorporated under one chief, or captain, who pays a certain yearly tribute to the emperor, and even buys that post from him <sup>e</sup> ? But to return.

Whose chief buys his post from the emperor.

b We observed a little higher, that the viceroys and governors of the kingdoms and provinces of the empire were under the Bellatinoche, as well as the military commanders and civil magistrates, or judges. All these hold their several courts of judicature, where all causes, either civil or criminal, are brought and decided ; only those of the martial kind, have martial officers to preside in them ; the others are tried before the civil judges before-mentioned : these last are called Umbarés, or chairs, because they alone are allowed to sit, whilst the plaintiff, defendant, and the rest, stand ; and, upon proper occasions, will even sit down upon the ground in the highway, or open field, to try a cause ; and every body that will, may be present at it. They make use of no writing, nor keep any records, much less allow lawyers, attornies, &c. to argue for or against either ; both plaintiff and defendant (or, in criminal causes, the accuser and accused), plead their own cause ; the former speaks first, and the latter after him ; each may answer and reply to the other three or four times, by turns ; after which the judge, commanding silence, asks the opinion of the by-standers ; and, according as the evidence turns the scale, for the one or the other, pronounces sentence upon the spot, which, in some cases, is without appeal, but in others may be removed to a superior court ; as first, to the viceroy, or governor ; thence to the Bellatinoche, or lord high-steward ; and lastly, from him to the emperor. In criminal cases, if the accused is cast, he is either kept prisoner by the judge till he has made satisfaction to the accuser ; or if the crime be capital, as murder, he is delivered up to the plaintiff, to be punished with death, at his discretion, and that of the relations of the deceased ; which custom they seem to have borrowed, among many others, from the Jews ; and these relations either sell the murderer's life for a certain value, or put him to death in what manner they please. But when a murder cannot be sufficiently proved against any man, all the inhabitants of the place are severely fined, or put to some corporal punishment ; which at once prevents all concealments of that kind, and by that means a great deal of blood-shed. The greatest inconvenience of these courts of justice, is, that they allow of no witnesses to be heard, but those of the plaintiff ; which it is not always in the power of the defendant to discredit or invalidate, though he is permitted to use all proper means to do it <sup>f</sup>.

Justice, how administred.

*Altogether
venal.*

Capital punishments.

May be redeemed.

c THEY have here three kinds of capital punishments ; the first is, that of burying the criminal in the earth, quite up to his mouth, and then to cover his head with thorns and briars, and lay a heavy stone upon them ; the second is, that of beating them to death with thick clubs, about two feet long, with a heavy head at one end, of the bigness of a man's two fists ; but the third and most usual is, that of piercing them through with their zagays, or lances ; in which case, the nearest relation of the deceased makes the first thrust, the rest following him in due order ; even those that come last, or after the criminal is expired, commonly dip their weapons in his blood, to shew that they are likewise concerned to revenge the murder of their relation. What is still more dreadful, and in some measure barbarous, is, the feasting and loud rejoicings which these relations make over the criminal, from the time that he is delivered up into their hands, to the time of his execution, but more particularly on the night preceding it ; to all which the prisoner is witness, as well as to the preparations which are made for it ; all which frequently exasperates his own relations to such a degree, that it scarcely fails of ending in the death of some of his most zealous prosecutors <sup>g</sup>.

How inflicted.

Prosecutors cruel in inflicting them.

d THE emperor's army is nothing answerable to the extent of his dominions, nor indeed to the exigencies of them, considering how surrounded they are on all sides by enemies, and how frequently his frontier provinces are invaded and plundered by them. They seldom exceed 40,000 men, when he brings them all into the field, but often fall very short of that number. Of them, between 4 and 5000 are horse, and the rest foot ; and of the former, about 1500 are well sized, mounted, and accoutered ; and about one half of them wear

*The emperor's
army.*

coats

<sup>c</sup> See before, p. 199.

<sup>d</sup> Vide auct. sup. citat.

<sup>e</sup> LE GRAND Dissertat. des Rois d'Abissin. p. 255.

<sup>f</sup> TELLEZ, LOBO, LUDOLPH, CODIGN. &c. l. 1. c. 16, & seq. also Num. xxxv. pass. Deuter. xix. 6, 12. & alib. pass. Jos. Ant. l. iv. c. 7. PHILO Legis Legat. & seq.

<sup>g</sup> Id. ibid. LOBO, Relat. p. 98.

Their weapons.

Want of arms and martial discipline.

The soldiers stout and hardy.

Poor allowance.

Carry their families with them.

Drums and other martial instruments.

Solemn attendance of the clergy.

coats of mail and head-pieces, but all the rest are as indifferently armed and accoutred; having no other arms, offensive or defensive, than a spear and buckler (P). They are very little acquainted with fire-arms, and as poorly furnished with powder and ball. There is in the whole about 1500 fire-arms, and not above 3 or 400 musqueteers in any action, and they, for the greatest part, so ill trained to the use of them, that they never make above one firing, for want of a greater supply of powder and ball. They seldom have any to use at their exercises, except some few of that higher rank, and these commonly use a rest with their muskets; and those are rather an incumbrance, especially in their wars with the Gallas, and other such wild enemies, so that they are little the better for their exercises. The rest being still worse disciplined, their armies, battalions, and squadrons, are commonly drawn up with as little regularity; so that the very first shock frequently begins and ends the battle; one side turning their back, and the other pursuing, without ever endeavouring to rally, or knowing how to go about it; neither is it looked upon as a disgrace to run away from the enemy, because it is become a common practice <sup>a</sup>.

It may be justly said, nevertheless, of the Abissinian soldiery, that if they perform no better, it is intirely owing to the want of discipline; for they commonly are very stout and hardy, inured to hunger, thirst, and fatigue, beyond expression, being trained to it from their youth, and continuing in the field the greatest part of the year, equally capable of bearing the most excessive heat, the sharpest cold, and the most violent rains, and all this with a surprisngly small sustenance. Even this they get out of the few lands which the emperor allows them, whilst they continue in his service, to live upon, and no longer; for as soon as they begin to fail, they are taken from them, and given to new ones. What is still harder, is, that they take their wives and children along with them; and these are commonly so numerous, that a camp of 30,000 men may be justly said to consist of above 100,000 persons, and all obliged to live on the product of the lands which are assigned to them for their maintenance: and hence it is that the Abissinian monarchs are able to raise such great armies upon any occasion with so little charge, all their subjects being either farmers or soldiers <sup>b</sup>.

We have already had occasion to describe the form and magnificence of the imperial camp, in speaking of his metropolis; as likewise of the manner of its marching, both in time of war and peace; in both which he is always placed in the centre of his army. He observes the same method in all engagements, where he is always surrounded, not only by his household and guards, but likewise by all his nobles and chief ministers, and composes a small kind of separate army. In this, as well as in the rest of the great body, they have the use of drums and kettle-drums (these last much larger and louder than ours), besides trumpets, hautbois, flutes, and other instruments, whose music, however, is more remarkable for its confused noise and din, than for any either courtly or martial harmony. We omit a great variety of other instances of gaiety and grandeur which attends the imperial army, especially when the emperor is there in person, which some authors have lavishly heaped together <sup>c</sup>, in order to raise its magnificence above even that of the eastern monarchs, but which we think their bare word is not a sufficient warrant for inserting here; the only thing we find worth adding to what hath been already said of the imperial army, is, that it is always attended with a vast number of priests, and even prelates, who not only perform the divine service in pavilions, <sup>d</sup>

<sup>a</sup> Id. ubi sup.

<sup>b</sup> Id. ibid.

<sup>c</sup> URETTA, VINCENT LE BLANC, part ii. c. 11.

(P) To give our readers a more exact idea of each of these weapons, we must inform him, that the spears are of two sorts; the one like our half or short pikes, the other more like a halbert, or partisan. The staves of the former are slender, and the iron narrow, like our pike; the iron of the other is broad and thin: the first is to be darted by dint of strength, and the last to be used in close fight with one hand, whilst the other holds the buckler, which is usually made of buffalo's hide, very thick and strong.

Each common soldier carries two of these spears; the one they dart with such strength and fury, that they will even pierce a coat of mail, or buckler; and the other is kept to continue the fight, as we do here with sword and buckler. Those of a higher rank have likewise their swords, but seldom make use of them in a battle, but rather wear them as a mark of distinction, and chiefly in time of peace, and then they commonly hold them in their hands when they converse with any one;

but, if they walk, they make their servants carry them under their arms. They likewise wear a kind of dagger under their girdle, with the hilt towards the right, and the point towards the left-hand. Some likewise carry a club of some hard wood, very heavy, with a dagger in it: this weapon they call bolota, and commonly use it when they come to close engagement with the enemy, and sometimes dart it against them.

But the sword being chiefly worn as an ornament, they are most curious about, and chuse to have the hilt of gold or silver gilt, and the scabbard of velvet, or rich damask, commonly of a red colour.

The horse are pretty much accoutred and armed like the foot; but those who are allowed to wear the coat of mail do, for the most part, throw aside the buckler as an incumbrance. They are said to be all very good horsemen, mount and sit their horses to admiration; but in other respects, are not better disciplined than the foot (30).

(30) De his, vide Teller, l. i. c. ii. Ludolph, l. i. c. 14. pass. Godign. Lobo, Le Grand, Poncet, & al.

a and those not a few, assigned for that purpose, but likewise escort and attend the sacred utensils that are made use of in it, with great pomp and ceremony, and with vocal and instrumental music : among which, those belonging to the imperial court are carried about with the greatest form and grandeur <sup>1</sup>.

FROM what we have already observed, of the vast dominions and very extensive power of The emperor the Abissinian monarchs, one might be naturally led to conclude them to be immensely rich, <sup>not so opulent as reported.</sup> and their revenue to be answerable to so potent an empire : and yet we much question whether, comparing one with the other, he may not be more rightly deemed poor than opulent ; at least nothing like what he is represented by the two authors above quoted, and some others of no better authority.

- b THE imperial revenue chiefly arises from the four following branches ; viz. from the tribute paid to him by the governors of such provinces and kingdoms as are said to have golden mines, particularly those of Enarea and Gojam, from which he receives a certain weight yearly of that metal ; but whether arising from any mines in those parts, or from their commerce with the Caffres, and other neighbouring nations, we cannot be certain <sup>m</sup>. This is reckoned one of the most considerable branches ; and yet, according to father Almeyda's <sup>1st branch of it.</sup> account, which he assures us he had from the emperor Segued's own mouth, amounts but to about 5 or 6,000 oukeas, or ounces, per ann. one with another, as the reader may see by the computation which that author has given us ; and which may be seen in the following note (Q). The next branch of the imperial revenue arises from the sale of all the great places in the <sup>2d branch.</sup> empire, as lately hinted ; such as the viceroyships, governments of kingdoms and provinces, and other offices and posts of trust, the yearly tribute they pay to him for being continued in them, as likewise for the product of those lands which are in their respective governments : for as all the lands in general appertain to him in chief, these governors do, in some sense, farm them from him, and pay him a yearly proportion of their product ; though, in this respect, they are very far from either cultivating them to the best advantage, or from paying him a due proportion of their income : this plainly appears from those of the two kingdoms of Tigre and Dembea ; the former of which is by far the largest, and hath the greatest number of governments ; and the latter the richest of all ; and yet the former, according to father Almeyda above-mentioned, brings him in no more than about 25,000, and the latter 50,000 <sup>3d branch.</sup> French livres. The third branch consists in a tenth, which he levies every third year, upon all the cattle in the empire. By this last, which it appears was unknown till about the middle of the last century, every man that hath cows is obliged to pay him one out of ten every third year ; and the country breeding vast quantities of them, makes it perhaps by far the most considerable branch of the three. It is, moreover, so well distributed between the

<sup>1</sup> TELLEZ, ALVAR. & al. sup. citat.

<sup>m</sup> See before, p. 175.

(Q) According to that author, the kingdom of Enarea brings in the greatest quantity of gold of any in the empire ; and yet Soltan Segued, who reigned from the year 1563 till 1596, and is said to have received the greatest quantity from it of any of his predecessors, could seldom draw more from thence than to the amount of 1,500 oukeas, or ounces, valued at about 15,000 pieces of eight ; and, in that father's time, only 1,000, one year with another. A poor sum this from such a rich kingdom, especially considering the emperor is obliged to send one of his generals, at the head of an army, to fetch it from thence to him ; it being not only the farthest of all, but the road to it lying through the territories of the plundering Gallas and Caffres. But as we observed in a former section (31), this last is one of the reasons why he receives so little from thence, it being paid to him by that conquered kingdom, rather as a free-will offering than a tribute, seeing he cannot send a sufficient force thither through these territories, to extort a greater from them.

The kingdom of Gojam, according to the same author, brings in yearly about 1,100 oukeas in gold ; but this, we are told, is commonly either lavished among some favourite grandees, or distributed among his sons and brothers ; so that he hath but a small share of it left to himself. He receives likewise from the same kingdom 3,000 pieces of cotton cloth, worth a piece of eight each, besides 200 bezetas, another sort of cotton cloth, thick, and with a shag on one side, valued at about an oukea each. He also received formerly a tribute of 3,000 horses from it, which Soltan Segued hath been obliged to remit, ever since the Gallas have made such inroads and cruel wars into that kingdom, in order to enable the people to defend themselves against them.

For the same reason, the tribute paid by several governors of provinces, equally infested with those wild ravagers, hath been either vastly diminished, or even quite set aside.

The several duties which these monarchs received on the commodities imported or exported, and paid by the two great sea-ports on the Red Sea, are now ceased, or paid to the Turks, who are since become masters of them. Some other duties were paid them by the merchants at certain passes, going from one part of the kingdom, which they have thought proper to bestow on the governors of the province where they are paid, as they have likewise a certain number of loads of corn, and other provisions, which they were obliged to pay to them. Those that came from Dembea, and amounted commonly to 10 or 12,000, they have been obliged to bestow upon such of their soldiers to whom they could not assign lands for their maintenance. Others of the same sort, coming from other provinces, are reserved for charitable uses, either feeding the poor, or in maintaining decayed men and women of quality belonging to their court (32).

(31) See before, p. 175, & seq.

(32) Almeyda ap. Tellez, l. i. c. 11. Ludolph, l. ii. c. 10. pass.

various kingdoms and provinces of the empire, that there is pretty near an equal quantity of a them brought in every year. This tax they call burning, or branding, because the emperor's officers brand those with a particular mark which they set aside for him: but it might much more justly be branded with that name on account of the insolence and cruelty of the officers that are commissioned to levy it, who make no conscience of ruining the poor people by their inhuman extortions <sup>a</sup>.

4th branch.

To this we may add a fourth, though not so considerable, which is laid upon every loom of cotton cloth; and which, if it belongs to a Christian, pays one piece of cloth, and if to a Mohammedan, a piece of eight, per ann. By this duty are gathered, in the kingdom of Dembea, and parts adjacent, about 1,000 of these pieces, and in that of Gojam 3,000; besides about 200 bissetes, which are a thicker and stronger cloth, all shagged on one side. The b same is levied in other kingdoms and provinces of the empire; but is mostly bestowed on, or swallowed up by, their rapacious governors <sup>c</sup>.

The whole inconsiderable; yet sufficient to make the prince rich and powerful enough.

THESE are pretty near the whole of all the so much boasted riches and great revenues of the Abissinian monarchs; of which, though there be no possibility of knowing the exact amount, because, for the most part, it rises and falls, according to the munificence or frugality of the prince, and many other obvious causes, yet plainly appears to come very short of what one may expect from so vast an empire, so great a number of kingdoms and provinces, and such an immense extent of pasture and arable ground, of which he is the sole proprietor and disposer. It will, however, be far from appearing so inconsiderable, if we take an estimate, not so much from the opulence of ours and other kingdoms, as from the poverty of the country, and the extreme indigence of the people; a people inured to indolence and penury, and a country left, for the most part, uncultivated and barren, because the present possessor is not sure how soon its despotic landlord may transfer it to other hands, and whether what he sows or plants in the spring will not fall to the lot of some favourite, who bestowed no labour upon it. In such an arbitrary government as this, a monarch hath cause to think himself rich enough, who hath the lives, lands, and fortunes, of all his subjects at his disposal, and powerful enough to bind them to their allegiance; whilst one part serves him, for fear of losing the lands he hath given them, and another, in hopes of obtaining them from him. This likewise induces the possessors to be more generous in their presents and tribute to him; seeing he generally gets most, according to father Almeyda, who gives d most, and those least who present least <sup>e</sup>.

<sup>a</sup> Id. ub. sup. ub. sup.

<sup>c</sup> ALMEYDA, ap. TELLEZ, LUDOLPH, LOBO, & seq. LODO, LUDOLPH, & seq.

<sup>e</sup> ALMEYDA, ap. TELLEZ,

S E C T. VIII.

Of the religion of the Abissinians, both before and since their conversion to the Christian faith, and the hierarchy of their church.

The Jewish religion brought into Abissinia by the queen of Sheba.

WE have already hinted, that the Abissinians boast themselves to have received the Jewish religion, together with a continued series of monarchs, from Solomon, the great king of Israel, who caused the son whom he had by their celebrated queen to be educated in the Mosaic religion, and sent him back into Abissinia, accompanied by many eminent doctors of the law, and particularly by Azariak the son of Zadoc, the then Jewish high-priest; by whose assistance the Jewish religion was propagated through the whole empire, and continued to be professed in it till their conversion to Christianity <sup>a</sup>.

THE misfortune is, that the only record they have of this remarkable transaction (except a common tradition, which hath been firmly believed by them from time immemorial), is so clogged with difficulties, and mixed with fable, that we cannot much rely on its authority. Neither hath this nation taken any care to preserve any records of the reigns that followed this memorable epocha. What books they have are mostly such as treat of religion; and these they are very shy of shewing to Christians of any other denomination, lest they should furnish them with arguments against their own favourite heresy: so that the whole credit of the memorable event we are speaking of, rests solely on that of the book above-mentioned, and an immemorial tradition, which is no less clogged with difficulties than that. f

WE have formerly endeavoured to reconcile some of them, with relation to the real country of the queen of Sheba <sup>b</sup>; and to that we shall only add, that it is far from improbable that

<sup>a</sup> See before, p. 207, & seq. See also Ant. Hist. vol. vii. p. 206.

<sup>b</sup> Id. ibid.

- a so great a prince should have a son from the Israelitish monarch, who had not only married the daughter of the king of Egypt, but had likewise a multitude of other wives of several nations and religions<sup>c</sup>; much less that that son, and all his successors, should be so ambitious of owning so mighty and opulent a monarch for their progenitor, whom all the world so justly esteemed and revered: their retaining to this day the arms of the tribe of Judah<sup>d</sup>, and of it, as well as of that famous queen introducing the Jewish religion, and worship of the true God, into her own dominions; especially if those, and other proofs, which the patriarch Alphonso Mendez hath brought in confirmation of this point, namely, the great conformity there is between not only the old religion, but likewise between the customs of the Abissinians and the Jews; various instances of which we have already had occasion to remark in the course of this chapter<sup>e</sup>; and many more of which the reader will still find in the sequel of it; insomuch that that learned prelate, who appears to have been very well acquainted with both, makes no difficulty to own, that his becoming conversant with those of the former, did greatly help him to understand a great number of the latter, dispersed in the Old Testament, of which he was before wholly ignorant<sup>f</sup>: to all which proofs, if we add their tenacious observation of the rite of circumcision, even after their conversion to Christianity, their keeping still the sabbath on the Saturday, as the Jews do, and more particularly the instance of the eunuch, or chief treasurer, of Candace queen of Ethiopia going so regularly to Jerusalem, and reading in his solitary return the prophet Isaiab*, we shall be forced to own that all these circumstances cannot but reflect some considerable evidence to the book above-mentioned, so far as relates to these few principal points we are upon, though intermixed with some others which are manifestly fabulous; as the reader will see by the short sketch we shall here subjoin of that so much boasted record, which they give as great credit to as they do to their sacred books<sup>g</sup>. The account it gives of this singular event is as follows.
- “ THAT a great and potent queen, named Azeb, or Maqueda, reigning in Ethiopia, being informed of the great power and wisdom of Solomon, by a merchant, named Tamerin, and being desirous to be an eye and ear witness of it, took a journey to Jerusalem, attended with a vast retinue of the greatest princes and nobles of Ethiopia, and with an immense treasure. There Solomon instructed her in the knowledge of the true God; and upon her return home, at the end of nine months, she was delivered of a son, begotten by Solomon, who was called Menilebeck, and by another name, David. This son went afterwards to Jerusalem, to see his father Solomon, and was magnificently entertained by him, and anointed, and sworn king of Ethiopia, by Zadoc and Joash, the then high-priests; and when he was thoroughly instructed in the law of God, which he was to cause to be observed in his dominions, he assigned him several of the first-born of Israel to attend and serve him in Ethiopia, and furnished him with officers and servants belonging to the house of Judah, together with a high-priest, levites, and doctors in the law of Moses.”
- HITHERTO there is nothing in the whole relation but what we have shewn is extremely probable; but the same book goes on, and tells us, “ That these first-born of Israel, at the instigation of Azariab the son of Zadoc, bound themselves by a mutual oath, to fetch away the ark of the covenant, which they stile the heavenly Sion; and that going by night into the temple, the gates of which, by some singular Providence, they found open, they put the ark upon a cart, and, being attended by abundance of people, and much wealth, and with loud acclamations, they marched off with such haste, that Solomon, who pursued them with no less speed, could not overtake them. With the same surprising expedition they went over the Red Sea, as the children of Israel had formerly done, but with this difference, that whereas the Israelites crossed it on foot, and without being wet, they fled over it in their chariots; so that the waters assisted the one, and the air the other, in their flight.”
- “ WHEN the queen Makeda was informed that her son had been anointed king, and was not only returning with such a grand retinue, but had brought with him the ark of the God of Sion, she went forth with great pomp and solemnity to meet them, and placed the sacred ark in the temple of the land of Makeda, and caused all the people of Ethiopia to receive the knowledge of the true God; so that there were not in the whole world, at that time, any monarchs comparable to king Solomon in Palestine, and to queen Makeda in Ethiopia.” The book farther adds, “ That the queen did afterwards resign her kingdom to her son David, and obliged him, and all the grandees of the empire, to swear by the heavenly Sion, that they would not, from that time forward, ever admit any woman to the throne of Ethiopia, nor any but the male descendants from him<sup>h</sup>.”

Arms of the kings of Abissinia.

Conformity with the Jews.

An ancient record of their queen visiting of king Solomon.

Obtains a son from him.

Some fabulous additions made to it.

Menilebeck and his Jews carry off the ark.

He succeeds his mother. Women excluded from the succession.

<sup>c</sup> 1 Kings xi. 1, & seq.<sup>d</sup> Ethiop. TELLEZ, l. i. c. 13.l. i. LUDOLPH, l. i. c. 2. § 3, & seq.<sup>e</sup> See before, p. 207, & seq.* Acts viii. 27, & seq.<sup>f</sup> See before, p. 211.<sup>g</sup> TELLEZ, ub. sup.<sup>h</sup> ViaggioTELLEZ,

The record inter-persed with fable.

Accounted for.

THIS is the substance of that famous record, and contains many other circumstances, which, though equally uncertain, and some of them too fabulous to deserve farther notice, is in the whole looked upon as of great authority by all the Abissinians. Nor is it any great wonder, that a people, no less fond of such surprising and miraculous peculiarities than the rest of the eastern and southern nations, should, in process of time, interpolate that ancient record with such fabulous stuff, in order to raise a greater veneration for the tabot, or altar-chest, upon which they celebrate the Communion Service; or, as it is vulgarly stiled by the Portuguese missionaries, the mass, and to their great church of Axuma, where that pretended stolen sacred utensil was kept. What other motives might induce them to trump up that absurd story, and how easily they might get it to pass for current, and to be greedily swallowed by their Abissinian converts, may be seen by what we shall subjoin in the margin (A), and yet none of it be sufficient to undermine the credit of the ancient tradition and record, whilst we have so many corroborating arguments to prove the main part of it, that the queen of Sheba was the person who was first instructed in the Jewish religion, and introduced it into her dominions. But we have still one proof more to add, to shew, that if that princess brought it not into Abissinia, at least that the Abissinians received it from the Jews; and we are the more willing to mention it here, because it hath not, that we know of, been taken notice of by any of the writers upon this subject.

(A) If we suppose the first part of this record to be true, that the king of Israel had actually such a son by the Abissinian queen, and that he bred him up to the Jewish religion, in order to convert that whole empire to it, it will be no difficult matter to conceive how this fabulous story of his carrying away the sacred ark came afterwards to be foisted in. Solomon might send him away, with a positive order, that in case his subjects should become profelytes to the true God, he should not presume to erect a temple to him, seeing that of Jerusalem was the only one where he had established his public worship; much less should he permit them to embellish it with any of its sacred ornaments, such as the sacred ark, altars, candlestick, &c. which could have no place any-where but in that in which he had ordained all the sacrifices, and other parts of the divine worship, to be performed according to his direction.

Such a prohibition, we say, could not but be necessary and proper, in order to prevent such a schism in the Jewish church, as was afterwards introduced in Egypt, by Onias, a dissatisfied Jewish high-priest (1), and to keep the Abissinian profelytes in a due dependence on that metropolis and centre of religion. On the other hand, as those injunctions must in all likelihood appear somewhat harsh to the young prince, whose heart could not but be greatly affected at the majestic solemnity with which he saw the divine worship performed in that sacred edifice, and had, in all probability, set his heart upon introducing it in his dominions, and assisting at it in the same splendor and magnificence that his father did: and if this was the case, how natural was it for some of those priests and levites, who were to accompany him, to procure, at least, a model, or resemblance, of the sacred ark, the most significant and most esteemed of all the sacred utensils, to be made privately, and carried with them into Abissinia, in imitation of that of the temple. How natural was it for him, and the queen his mother, to order that holy symbol to be deposited in some of their most sumptuous edifices, such as was then the great temple of the territory of Makeda. And in order to procure it a deeper and more general veneration, how easy was it for them, either then to cause it to be whispered, or in process of time to have it publicly affirmed, to be the very same which the Jewish lawgiver had been directed by God to erect and set up in the tabernacle, and that it was privately stolen, and brought away in that (pretended) miraculous manner: and how easy and natural to have this whole forgery to be tacked together, as of a piece, and of the same authority with the ancient record, and to be as readily believed, and pass for current, considering the vast distance and small commerce there was between the kingdom of Israel and this; for this rendered the cheat more difficult to be known, and more still to be confuted, by either any of the Jewish kings or priests, whilst even those very ones that accompanied the young prince into his country, might easily be induced, by that very consideration, to join in it, as a sure way of securing to themselves, not only the favour of the king, and reverence of the people, but likewise some considerable income and perquisites, as the sole guardians of that sacred depositum.

Accordingly we find, that they gave it the title of tabot, or ark of the covenant, the same which they give to Noah's ark, and, by way of excellence, stiled it Sion; from whence the temple in which it was kept, being, after their conversion to Christianity, dedicated to the Virgin Mary, was called St. Mary of Sion, or Seon, according to their way of pronouncing that name.

It was, moreover, preserved with such veneration, and kept so closely concealed from the vulgar eyes, that even their monarchs were not admitted to the sight of it. Since the Abissinian emperors have taken up the custom of living in tents, this precious relique, no longer confined to a temple, doth always accompany the royal camp, and is carried about with the greatest pomp and ceremony, attended by four prelates in their pontifical habits, and about forty or fifty other priests, who go chanting before and after it, whilst one of them marches backwards before it with a censer in his hands, and incenses it all the way, till it be deposited in the grand pavilion, which serves instead of a church to the imperial court; no priest whatever being permitted to officiate or say mass before it, but he that doth it before the emperor (2).

Their veneration for it was still so great, when the jesuits came thither, that as soon as they perceived that they were likely to succeed, and bring their church under the authority of that of Rome, one of their first cares was, to secure this sacred chest from falling into their hands; and some of the most zealous among their monks conveyed it, with the greatest privacy, to the territory of Bur, near the Red Sea, where they hid it in some close thickets, among vast high mountains, and where, in all probability, it continued concealed till the total expulsion of those missionaries, when it was again restored to its pristine use and veneration (3).

(1) See Ant. Hist. vol. iv. p. 69, & seq. 79, & seq.
World, part 2d. c. 11. Pencet, & al.

(2) Telles ub. sup. Vincent Le Blanc Survey of the

(3) Telles, Ludolph, & al.

- a THE reader may recollect, from what we have already observed of some peculiarities in their way of living, such as their letting their ancient famous cities, palaces, and other structures, to go to ruin, in order to live more at large in their camps and tents; their abstaining from the juice of the grape, even in their celebration of the Lord's Supper; and either wholly neglecting all sort of agriculture, or turning that care over to the nations that live among them, such as Jews, Turks, and Gentiles, to apply themselves more closely to pasturage, and the breeding of numberless flocks, to live chiefly on their milk or their flesh<sup>1</sup>: none of these customs are enjoined, or so much as hinted at, in the Mosaic law; nor are any of them agreeable to the practices of the Jewish nation, but rather quite opposite to them, till we come to the time of Zedekiah king of Judah, who reigned about two hundred and forty years after the death of Solomon; about which time we read of a sect of Jews, who called themselves Rechabites, from their progenitor or founder; and were chiefly famed and distinguished from the rest of their nation, for their observation of all those customs, as having been strictly enjoined them by him<sup>k</sup>.

- FROM a comparison, therefore, of these and the Abissinians, we may justly infer, that the latter not only derived their Judaic rites from the observers of the Mosaic law, but that they borrowed their other customs of abstaining from wine, living in tents, &c. from some of the descendants of Rechab. These, we find, lived at large in tents, till the numerous host of the Babylonish king obliged some of them to take shelter in the city of Jerusalem, contrary to their founder's injunction, and either perished in that siege, with many myriads of other Jews, or were carried away captive by the Babylonians: for at their return from that captivity, we find a branch of the Rechabites that came back with them, and settled in the canton of Jabesh<sup>l</sup>. But it is very probable, that much greater numbers of them, foreseeing the storm coming, wisely withdrew themselves, with their herds, into other countries, before the enemy's approach; and where should they seek for a safer asylum out of the kingdom of Israel, than in this of Abissinia, where the monarchs that reigned in it were the descendants of the great Solomon; and where the whole, or the greatest part of the nation, had so long professed the Jewish religion? Accordingly, a Jewish traveller of the twelfth century acquaints us, that he found them very numerous about these parts, and still strict observers of their old institution. He farther gives us a fine description of their country, princes, government, and other particulars, which, though interspersed after his usual manner with some fabulous circumstances, seem plainly to intimate, either that those Jews we have elsewhere spoken of, who formerly were masters of several parts of the empire, out of which they have been since driven by some of the emperors, and sent to live upon barren and inaccessible mountains*, were of the descendants of the old Rechabites of Judea, or else that he hath, either wilfully or ignorantly, mistaken the Abissinians for Rechabites, from the affinity of their religion, customs, and manner of living†.

- FROM all these observations we would infer, that as it is by no means likely that so opulent and polite a prince as Solomon should have instructed his royal visiter, the queen of Sheba, and her son, in the institutions and customs of such a wandering and uncourtly sect, had it been then in being, which we have formerly shewn to be scarce probable<sup>m</sup>, or that he would have sent any of them with her into Abissinia: we think it much more reasonable to suppose, that some of these last-mentioned, who fled from the conquering sword of Nebuchadnezzar hither for shelter, might introduce their customs among them, and recommend their wandering, active, and abstemious way of life, not so much from religious motives, as because it was the most effectual way to promote health, peace, and long life; by which means, all the large cities, spacious palaces, and other structures, that flourished in that queen's and her son's reign, became by degrees neglected, and fell to decay; and even the celebrated imperial seat of Axum, or Axuma, became a heap of ruins, by being exchanged for an imperial camp<sup>n</sup>.

- f THE next article relating to the Abissinian religion, is their conversion to Christianity; and this great change they firmly believe to have been the work of the famed eunuch, or prime-minister, of their queen Candace, or, as they call her, Handake. The account which the antient record, or book above-mentioned, gives, is, according to father Almeyda, much the same with that which St. Luke gives us of his conversion by Philip<sup>o</sup>, with this addition only, that upon his return into Ethiopia, he gave the queen his mistress a full account of all that had happened unto him, and what had passed between Philip the deacon and him, in his way first edit. l'Empereur 81, &amp; seq.

<sup>1</sup> See before, p. 195, & seq.<sup>k</sup> Vid. Jerem. xxxv. 6, & seq. See Anc. Hist. vol. i. p. 820, & seq.<sup>l</sup> 1 Chron. ii. ult.<sup>m</sup> See before, p. 188, & seq.† BENJ. DE TUDELA, itinerar, p. 75, & seq.

<sup>n</sup> Anc. Hist. vol. i. p. 820 (T).<sup>o</sup> See before, p. 172.

viii. 27, &amp; seq.

<sup>o</sup> Acts

homewards; upon which that princess believed in the gospel of the grace of Jesus Christ <sup>a</sup>. But, besides that the learned are not agreed whether this princess was really queen of this Ethiopia, or Abissinia (B), or of the island of Meroe <sup>q</sup>, we can scarcely date the conversion of that empire from this one instance; that book mentioning only that princess as believing in Christ, without mentioning so much as any of her court. Besides, Philip being neither bishop nor priest, but only a deacon, could have no power to qualify the eunuch for a preacher of the gospel; neither had he time sufficient to instruct him thoroughly in it, or perhaps to give him more than a general idea that Jesus was the Christ, the Redeemer of mankind, and had, by his miracles, death, and resurrection, fully proved himself to be the promised Messiah, and Saviour of the world. We may even question whether he did mention any-thing to him about the abrogation of the law of Moses by the cross: so that both he and his profelytes, <sup>b</sup> if he made any other besides that princess, did, in all probability, continue in the observance of it, as they still do, since their fuller conversion; particularly with regard to the rite of circumcision, and the keeping the seventh day as the Christian sabbath.

When fully converted.

Frumentius ordained bishop of Axuma; who converts
the Abissinians.

It is more probable, therefore, that whatever foundation might be laid by that great profelyte, yet the general conversion of that great empire was not perfected till after the year of Christ 335, when the great Athanasius, patriarch of Alexandria, being informed by Frumentius of the good disposition which the queen and her subjects were in to receive the gospel, ordained him bishop of Axuma, and sent him to propagate it through Ethiopia; an account of which remarkable event we have formerly given out of Rufinus, and to which we shall now refer our readers <sup>r</sup>, to avoid needless repetitions. From this time Christianity began to flourish <sup>c</sup> through the empire, and the true faith was so firmly founded by that zealous and excellent prelate, that when Constantius the emperor came to be informed of it, he tried all the arts and stratagems he could invent to introduce Arianism among them to no effect <sup>s</sup>; though they afterwards fell so unhappily into the errors of Eutychius and Dioscorus, as we shall soon see.

Alexandria
th. ir mother
church.

At the same time the discipline of the church was settled, conformably to that of Alexandria; priests and deacons were every-where ordained; liturgies, articles, and canons, settled and confirmed by the same Alexandrian patriarch; and, among the latter, one by which the Abissinian church acknowledges that of Alexandria as her mother, and herself as wholly subject and dependent upon her, insomuch that it deprives her of the power of chusing her own bishop, or to receive him from any but the patriarchs of Alexandria, in whom alone the power is <sup>d</sup> vested, both to nominate and consecrate them. What is still more remarkable, is, that it excludes the Abissinians from having one of their nation for their abuna, or patriarch; which those of Alexandria have been so strict in the observation of, that they have never suffered an Abissinian over that see; a monstrous subjection this, seeing those men that are nominated to it, being quite strangers to the language of the country, must be altogether unfit, not only to instruct their flock, but even to be proper judges of the fitness and capacity of those whom they ordain priests and preachers over them. Neither, indeed, can he be fit to perform the divine service, which is always in the old Ethiopic, seeing he is as unacquainted with it as he is with the modern <sup>t</sup>. Notwithstanding all which inconveniencies and hardships, the clergy

Abunas very ignorant.

<sup>p</sup> ALMEYDA, ap. TELLEZ, l. i. c. 17.
Hist. vol. vii. p. 217, & seq.

<sup>q</sup> Vid. CODIGN, JARRIC, LUDOLPH, & al. sup. citat.
<sup>r</sup> Ibid. p. 218.

<sup>s</sup> Anc. Hist. vol. vii. p. 217, & seq.
<sup>t</sup> TELLEZ, ubi sup. c. 19. LUDOLPH, l. iii. c. 6 & 7. LOBO, LE GRAND, &c.

(B) What hath occasioned this difference of opinions, is, what Pliny says of the queens of that name (4); that they reigned in the island of Meroe, and that there had been a good number of that name who had already reigned there; whence some have imagined it to be the common name of all the queens of that island. Hence also Mr. Ludolph, and many other authors whom he quotes (5), strongly opposes the opinion of this queen Candace being queen of Abissinia. But if, as we have formerly shewn, the kingdom of Gojam, and not any island formed by the Nile in Egypt, be the Meroe of Strabo and Pliny *, then that objection falls to the ground, and Candace will still have been queen, at least of this part of Abissinia.

Mr. Ludolph further urges, that this is contrary to what is affirmed in the old record of Axuma, lately spoken of, that the queen of Sheba caused her son and nobles to swear, that they would never suffer a woman to ascend the Ethiopian throne. But besides that, he quotes here an authority which he elsewhere flights. How is he sure that that oath was never broke? Sure it is that we meet with a fresh queen of Abissinia of that name, who being herself converted by Frumentius, about three hundred years after, sent him to Alexandria to be ordained bishop by the then patriarch of it, St. Athanasius, in order to have the rest of her dominions instructed in the same faith (6). To all this we would add, that the Abissinian histories are full of the great and good deeds of that pious queen, her eunuch, and all her nobility; of the great spirit of piety, charity, and generosity, which reigned through her dominions, during hers and some of the succeeding reigns; and of the many noble churches, monasteries, and other pious structures, that were erected about that time, both by her and the grandees of her empire (7): all which being so very agreeable to that spirit of religion, piety, and charitable disposition, for which that nation is so justly extolled, cannot be supposed to be all fiction, but must have some foundation in truth, though we shall allow them to be exaggerated beyond the limits of it.

(4) Plin. Hist. l. vi. c. 29. Strabo, l. xvii.
p. 190, & seq. (6) Ibid. p. 217.

(5) Lib. ii. c. 2, 3, 4, 5, 8. * See Ant. Hist. vol. vii.
(7) Almeida, Tellez, Lobo, Relat. ap. Le Grand, p. 65.

and

a and people pay such religious regard to the canon above mentioned, which they deem to be as antient as their conversion, that they would look upon it as a kind of heresy to question its authority, and of apostacy, to act contrary to it. As our reader may be desirous to know the tenor of that antient instrument of their subjection, we shall oblige him with a copy of it in the margin, according to the version of Abraham Ecchellensis, as the clearest of the two; that of Turrenius being in some places scarcely intelligible: for which reason we shall add a remark or two upon that piece, that the reader may know what dependence may be laid upon it (C).

But how small soever it may appear to him, it doth not so with the Abissinian clergy; who, notwithstanding all the inconveniencies we have mentioned above, have been most religious observers of it; never once, that we know, complaining against it, or ever appearing uneasy under such a foreign subjection, or at their being so unjustly and unnaturally, we may add, excluded from the succession to that dignity, though they have so much greater a right, and are naturally so much better qualified for it, than any stranger that could ever be set over them, unless they had been thoroughly acquainted with their language, which, for aught we can find to the contrary, was ever the least of their care". What will appear still more surprising, is, that they have shewed themselves still more strenuous in it when their emperors had the greatest reason to resent the arbitrary proceedings of those prelates, and their frequent presuming to oppose them in civil affairs, which were intirely out of their province to intermeddle with, as we shall see in the sequel of this chapter; till being justly tired with the tyranny of the Alexandrian patriarchs, and their Abissinian substitutes, who grew still more intolerable, after these became subject to, and the mere creatures of, the Ottoman Porte, their professed enemy, they were reduced at length to that strange and dangerous expedient of exchanging an Egyptian for a Romish servitude. This was a very proper time, if they had been as uneasy under the former, as they were apprehensive and averse to the latter, to have proposed a middle way, more reasonable in itself, as well as more advantageous to themselves, and which, in all probability, would not have failed of being readily agreed to by their monarchs, viz. that of chusing a patriarch of their own, and making themselves equally independent on that of Rome, and that of Alexandria. Of how much greater and more universal benefit, both to the clergy and people, as well as ease and safety to their monarchs, such revolution would have proved, than the applying to the pope and the Portuguese, upon such an emergency, could not but be visible to every eye; and the clergy, who would have been the greatest gainers by it, must, one would imagine, have proved the most zealous promoters of it; yet, to one's great surprize, we find them no less strenuous and indefatigable in ascertaining their subjection to the see of Alexandria than they were in opposing the authority of that of Rome, which was going to be introduced amongst them. Neither did they, after they had so wonderfully succeeded in the latter, ever take one step towards obtaining better terms from the former; but have constantly adhered to the strict tenor of the canon above-mentioned, and tamely submitted to such abunas, or patriarchs, as their Alexandrian metropolitan, if not rather the Ottoman Porte, whose vassal he is, hath thought proper to set over them: so that,

Abissinians
strenuous in their subjection to them.

Continue still under the same.

Id. ibid. vid. & CODIGN, GOES, & al. pl.

(C) This singular piece, which is the 42d in Ecchellensis, and the 36th in Turrenius's collection, runs thus, with respect to the points above-mentioned:

Ne patriarcham sibi constituent Aethiopes, ex suis doctoribus, neque propria electione, quia patriarcha ipsorum est constitutus sub Alexandrini potestate, cujus est ipsis ordinare et praeficere catholicum qui inferior patriarchae est, cui praefato in patriarcham constituto, nomine catholici, non licebit metropolitanos constituere, sicut constituunt patriarchae; etenim honor nominis patriarchatus illi defertur tantummodo, non vero potestas. Porro si acciderit ut congregetur synodus in terra Romanorum, et adfuerit iste, sedeat loco octavo post dominum Seleuciae, in qua est Almadajoint, nempe Babylonia Harrac, quoniam isti facta est potestas constituendi episcopos suae provinciae, prohibeturque fuit ne ullus eorum ipsum constituat.

This version differs, in some things, from that of Turrenius; as where he says, if the synod shall meet in Grecia, instead of in terra Romanorum: 2dly, it doth not fix the meaning of the Seleucian see as the other doth: and 3dly, in speaking of the Abissinian patriarch appointing of prelates, concludes with these words: Non licebit illi constituere aliquem ex illis: which words are scarcely intelligible, unless they mean that he shall not chuse any of the Abissinians to that dignity, as Ecchellensis hath rendered it.

We must further observe to our readers, that this collection is neither to be found in the Greek, nor mentioned by any Greek author: we are neither told when, by whom, nor on what occasion, it was made; neither is any Abissinian prelate recorded to have assisted at any synod or council, by which one might know what rank they held in it. And as it is not probable that any rank should have been assigned to them after they fell into the Jacobitish errors, so it is more reasonable to conclude, that this collection was made at Alexandria, before the Arabs made themselves masters of that place; and that the church of Antioch, and afterwards that of Abissinia, received it as they found it (8). This last, in particular, paying almost the same veneration to it as they do to the sacred writings; though, as we observed a little higher, it be so ill calculated for their advantage or edification.

(8) De hac vid. Le Grand, dissert. 9. de convers. Abissin. p. 285, & seq. Vid. & Codign. l. i. c. 21. alib. pass. Jarric, & al sup. citat. Ludolph, l. iii. c. 7, & alib. pass.

upon the whole, the government of the Abissinian church hath continued in the very same form in which their first bishop Frumentius, or, as their books call him, Fremonatos <sup>w</sup>, sent thither by St. Atbanasius, did at first settle it; and it is owing to the great veneration they have for that prelate, to whom they give the title of Saint, and of Abba Salama, or peaceable father, as well as the singular regard they pay to the authority of the canon above-mentioned, which they believe to have been framed either by him, or the patriarch Atbanasius, that they have never since ventured to make any alteration in it to this very day.

The abuna, or patriarch, the only bishop.

THIS patriarchate, therefore, which is the highest ecclesiastical dignity in the Abissinian empire, and wholly subject to that of Alexandria, plainly appears from the tenor of the above-said canon, as well as from the constant practice of that church, to be no more than a mere title without the power. He is by his clergy called abuna, or our father; he may in his letters take the title of patriarch, or catholic, but hath no power to create any metropolitans under him, as other patriarchs and catholics have; neither hath the Abissinian church ever had any more than one at a time, since their proto-patriarch Frumentius; nor any of them ever had any bishop under them: and as none have ever presided in that church, but such as were consecrated and appointed by the Alexandrian patriarchs, except a few that were sent thither by the pope, of whom we shall speak in the sequel, so hath it ever followed the faith and doctrine of its mother church unto this day <sup>x</sup>.

THESE abunas, however, if we may believe the account which the missionary writers give us of them, have, for the most part, been very ignorant, as well as negligent, in their office, whether of instructing the people, or conferring of holy orders. As to the first, it is no wonder, seeing they are strangers to the language of the country; but as to the latter, we are told they will refuse to ordain those that have been twice married, and at the same time will admit the blind, lame, halt, &c. which they do only by the imposition of hands, and repetition of a few words, without administering the holy communion to them: so that those good fathers much question the validity of their ordination, as well as of the baptism, and other sacraments, administered by them.

Strange manner of giving absolution.

THE manner of absolving penitents in public, from their episcopal chair, is still more strange: these stand before the bishop, and confess two or three of their most heinous sins: upon hearing of which he stands up, and in a great passion asks them, how they could do so? whether they did not fear God? and the like. The rest of the absolution is performed by giving them three or four heavy strokes with his pastoral staff; after which he consigns them over to some of his mazares, or officers, that attend him on such occasions, and orders them thirty or forty lashes more with a thong, which these officers carry in their hands to keep off the people. This punishment is the more severe, as they go so thinly clad; but by that time they have received seven or eight strokes, the by-standers commonly interceding for the penitent, he is permitted to go off with his partial absolution, which they think, however, more full and effectual than that which is obtained by private confession <sup>y</sup>. The reader will find an instance of it in the margin, out of the same author (D), which, if not exaggerated on purpose to expose both prelate and people, gives us but a melancholy idea of that church's discipline and government; especially, if to the ignorance and remissness of those patriarchs we add their wicked lives and bad examples; many of them being branded with the worst of

The sad state of the Abissinian church.

<sup>w</sup> Id. ibid. See LE GRAND, dissert. 15 de Hierarch. Abissin. citat. <sup>y</sup> Id. ibid.

<sup>x</sup> ALVAREZ, PAYS, TELLEZ, & al. sup.

(D) One day, we are told, on which the abuna was busy in hearing these public confessions, a fellow, who had stolen a certain number of cows, came to be absolved by him; but fearing to declare his crime publicly, and so expose himself to condign punishment from the hand of justice, begged of him that he might be permitted to whisper it in his ear. Why so? said the prelate: will it not be made public to all the world at the day of judgment? declare it therefore here immediately. The poor man, not daring to disobey, was forced, though against his will, to make public confession of the fact. Unfortunately for him, the owner of the cows was present, and went immediately to accuse him before a judge, who both ordered him to make full restitution, and laid a farther penalty upon him, which proved more grievous to him than the lashes of the abuna's mazares; whereas, had the abuna been contented with a private confession of his crime, he would have come off with a few lashes from them, and been absolved without any restitution. For the private confessors, it seems, never oblige them to any such thing, as those of the church of Rome do; it being a duty, we are told, altogether unknown, and unpractised, all over Ethiopia (9).

We are farther told, that the people only confess their greater sins, which are, murder, adultery, and theft; but as to those of a smaller size, they only confess them in the lump, in such words as these: "We have sinned; we are sinners;" without any farther detail of the particular sins, much less of the manner and circumstances that accompany them; and it was with very great difficulty that the Romish missionaries obliged their new profelytes to descend to such particulars (10).

(9) Tellez, l. i. c. 19. 38. Ludolph, l. i. c. 6. § 52, & seq.

(10) Ibid. ibid.

a crimes, and accused of having lived publicly in the most scandalous manner; and instead of duly visiting their churches, and reforming such abuses as they found in them, suffered still much more grievous ones to be committed by those visitors whom they appointed to perform that office for them, to fleece and oppress the people, instead of instructing and benefiting them.

WHAT is still more deplorable, is, that some of these abunas, that have been sent thither from Alexandria, were so far from being ordained bishops, that they were not so much as in priestly orders, but were mere lay monks. Such was that Alexandrian monk, of whom the patriarch Alphonso Mendez speaks, who was sent thither in his time to succeed abuna Simeon, and had been immediately acknowledged and complimented as such; but who being afterwards b deposed by the emperor Segued, and soon after persuaded by the missionaries to turn to their church, did frankly own that he was no bishop, but a bare lay monk. This man, we are told, married afterwards, and got his living by making of mills, for which he proved much better qualified than for the office of abuna. One can hardly read such things, without suspecting some latent artifice or fraud; and yet, when we observe, that neither Mr. Ludolph, nor his Abissinian abbot, have offered any thing to confute, but rather, in some measure, confirmed them, that very consideration will hardly give us leave to doubt of the truth of them<sup>z</sup>.

THERE remains now only, that we should give a short account of the revenue of these worthless prelates, before we speak of the inferior clergy. One branch of their income, and that no inconsiderable one, when they happen to be worldly men, arises from the grant, or, as we may then more properly term it, the prostitution of dispensations, of which they are the sole disposers, as having no bishops under them to share that privilege, nor any comptroller over them to oblige them to keep close to the tenor of their canons; so that in many instances they extend their power to a shameful degree beyond it<sup>a</sup>. They likewise have the sole privilege of ordaining; and this brings them likewise a considerable income, few or none being received into holy orders, unless they send some equivalent offering before-hand to gain them admittance.

BUT besides these, which we may stile simoniacal perquisites, they have certain lands assigned to them in the kingdoms of Tigre, Gojam, and Dembea, of which they are the sole farmers. The first of these are computed to bring them in about forty or fifty oaks, or ounces, of gold, per ann. or about four or five hundred pieces of eight (E): those of Dembea and Gojam afford them a more than sufficient quantity of provisions for their own table, the remainder of which he disposes of to his own profit: to this we may add a kind of public gathering of salt and cloth, which is yearly made for him through the empire, and amounts to a considerable value<sup>b</sup>; all which put together, makes up a very considerable revenue; and the more so as their lands are free from all taxes to the emperor, and their other perquisites so extensive and arbitrary. Add to this, that they have no particular cathedral, or sumptuous palaces to keep in repair, nor hardly any officers and underlings to pay salaries to; these commonly arising from the nature of their places, which they know full well how to make the most of<sup>c</sup>.

THE next order of ecclesiastics, if not in rank and dignity, yet in vogue and esteem, is that of the Depteras, of whom we have already given some account upon another occasion<sup>d</sup>. These are neither priests nor deacons, but a mongrel kind of Jewish levites, or chanters, who assist at all public offices of the church, and whose head, or superior, called Barca Guyta, hath the care and direction of the sacred pavilions in the imperial camp. As these boast themselves of Jewish extraction, they pretend, by the songs, dances, and beating of their drums and tabors, to imitate the service of the Jewish tabernacle and temple of Jerusalem, and the dancing of king David before the ark; though their noise, and horrid din and gestures, are the very antipodes of what we have formerly observed was performed by the Jewish musicians and chanters<sup>e</sup>, and fitter for a masquerade than a church; yet in such esteem are they here, that even some of the princes and grandees have taken singular pride to beat time to them, or beat upon their tabors<sup>f</sup>. These Depteras always attend at their high masses; for low ones they allow not in Abissinia, nor of above one a day in every church. On their grand festivals they begin their music and dancing long before day, and are able to continue that hard exercise till noon, without appearing in the least tired or hoarse<sup>g</sup>.

<sup>z</sup> Id. ibid.      <sup>a</sup> TELLEZ, LUDOLPH, & al. sup. citat.      <sup>b</sup> Id. ibid.      <sup>c</sup> Id. ibid.      <sup>d</sup> See before, p. 212 (H).      <sup>e</sup> See Anc. Hist. vol. i. p. 714, & seq.      <sup>f</sup> TELLEZ, l. i. c. 19. LUDOLPH, l. iii. c. 7. § 26. LE GRAND dissert. 19, de Hierarch.      <sup>g</sup> Id. ibid.

(E) This branch was once more considerable, but was (on what occasion we are not told) charged with a yearly kind of fine, by the emperor Theodore, of 500 crowns per ann. which is thence called eda abuna, or the abuna's fine, and is sunk into the emperor's coffers (11).

(11) De hoc, vide Le Grand dissert. 15, de Hierarch. Abissin. p. 355.

The priests, and their office, the Komos.

THE priests are the next order to the bishops ; but as they have none of these but the abuna, a they have instead of them those they stile komos, who preside over them. Of this order was Petrus Ethiops, whom Paul Jovius conversed with. Every parochial church hath one of these, who is a kind of hegumenus, or archi-prefbyter, and hath all the inferior priests and deacons, as well as the secular affairs of the parish, under his care and government ; and as they have no bishops over them, they preside in chief at the divine service, and distribute the several offices of the inferior clergy, and compound their disputes ; so that they may be reckoned the highest order next to the abuna (F). The office of the inferior priests is to supply that of the komos in their absence, and, when present, to assist them in the divine service, to baptize, marry, visit the sick, interr, and the like <sup>b</sup>.

Deacons.

THE deacons are the lowest rank of the priesthood, and likewise assist at the divine service, b though in a lower sphere than the priests ; and both have their proper offices and vestments when they officiate. We have already taken notice, that this order is conferred by the abunas on the emperor, princes, grandees, and even on their children ; not that they may have the privilege of officiating as such, but only to assist at the divine service, and receive the communion in the chancel with the clergy, and be separate from the laity, who stand in the body of the church <sup>1</sup>.

Priests and deacons marry, and are numerous and poor.

ALL these orders are allowed to marry, and may even do so after they have been ordained priests. Their sons also are allowed to succeed them in their church benefices ; but as they have, for the most part, very large families, they are commonly very c poor, and forced to supply their wants by labour and industry, but chiefly by farming and pasturage, as the lay farmers do ; all which renders them less respected than they are in other countries, especially as they wear no particular dress, tonsure, or other mark of the priestly office, except a little cross, which they carry in their hand, and bless the people with, and a small round cap, of any colour, which they wear on their heads. Neither have they those immunities which those of other churches enjoy, but are liable to be punished by the lay magistracy, in the same manner as secular persons, for any crime they commit <sup>k</sup>.

Pay a great respect to their churches.

THEY pay a great respect to their churches, and never enter them but bare-foot ; which made them take great offence at the Portuguese missionaries, when they saw them celebrate the mass with their shoes or sandals on their feet. The vestments they use in that divine service are suited to the dignity of the person that officiates, but the best of them are vastly d short of those which the meanest Romish priest wears on such occasions. Instead of the alba, or white linen garment, which is used by the latter, they use a tunic, bought of the Turks, which is commonly old and thread-bare. They use neither girdle, stole, maniple, &c. as those of the Romish church do ; and as to their chasuble, or upper garment, it is much narrower than theirs, and trails behind about half a yard. The divine service consists of a set of prayers, psalms, hymns, &c. suitable to the seasons, and judiciously enough composed ; and, for the most part, performed with great decency and devotion, and without any thing of that pomp and ceremony which is used in the church of Rome. This divine service, which is performed but once a day, begins on Sundays, and great festivals, in the morning, e and ends about noon : on Wednesdays, Fridays, and other fasting days, it begins about three in the afternoon, their usual time of eating ; and at sun-set in Lent ; which, as hath been elsewhere observed, they keep with uncommon strictness and severity <sup>1</sup>.

Priestly vestments.

Divine service, how performed.

The people, how called to church.

THEY have no bells through all Abissinia, but call the people to church by the sound of some wooden hammers, which they strike upon a hollow board or stone ; at the hearing of which, both priests and people repair thither, with a decent gravity and devotion, saying some sort of prayers all the way they go : and, when there, behave with the greatest reverence,

<sup>h</sup> TELLEZ, & al. ubi sup.

<sup>i</sup> See before, p. 213.

<sup>k</sup> Id. ibid. vide & CODIGN. JARRIC, & al.

<sup>1</sup> See before, p. 192. TELLEZ, & al. sup. citat.

(F) According to the canons of the Alexandrian church, on which this of Abissinia depends, their office and dignity are thus defined : Hegumenus ejusdem ordinis est, atque archipapas sacerdotum, seu archipresbyter, atque adeo jus habet pronunciandi orationem absolutionis super sacerdotem celebrantem, ut etiam adolendi incensum post eum & communionem accipiendi post eum ante omnes alios. Quando simul adest episcopus accipit ab eo thuribulum (12). And as that church hath a great number of bishops under its patriarch, there are few, if any, priests raised to the epif-copal dignity, that have not been previously hegumens, or archipriests : but in this of Abissinia, where there are no bishops, a priest, when raised to the komosal, is got to the highest preferment he can arrive at ; there being no other above him but the abunate, from which they are excluded by the canon lately mentioned : and on this account, these komos look upon themselves as an order superior to all the rest of the priesthood, and claim a precedence over them (13).

(12) Hist. patriarch. Alex. p. 585. pass. Tellez, l. i. c. 19, &c.

(13) Le Grand dissert. de Hierarch. p. 356. Ludolph, lib. ii. c. 7.

- a neither suffering themselves to stare about, or on one another, much less to whisper or talk, Their pious behaviour in it.
 cough or spit. The priest and laity are separated from each other; the former in a kind of choir, like that of our cathedrals, and the latter in the body of the church, by a curtain drawn between, which hinders them from seeing, though not from hearing, the divine service, which is performed within it. They have neither pews, benches, nor hassocks, in their churches, but continue standing all the time of divine service; which posture they think the most proper to raise their devotion, and keep up their attention to it; but yet allow the aged, lame, and infirm, to use a kind of folding chairs, which, when the service is done, are left at the church-porch; but if any of them offer to sit down upon the ground through weakness or weariness, he is sure to be soon called upon to rise up, by some one of the deacons, who b often cry out, stand up, ye that sit: and though the greatest part of their churches are now so poor and mean, that they are only covered with a little straw or reeds, they pay such a regard to them, that those who come thither on horseback will alight at a considerable distance from the gates, and enter them, as they all do, with their feet bare. Nor are any men or women, Polluted men and women excluded.
 under any natural pollution, or even after the matrimonial intercourse, permitted to set their feet in them till after due ablution (G).

- In none of these sacred edifices, whether sumptuous or mean, are any statues, or carved images, of any kind, to be seen, or any other figures, except painted ones; any other, tho' but in bas-relief, would be looked upon by them as rank idolatry: much less would they suffer any crucifixes, whether carved or cast in metal, to be seen in them, or to be worn about their
 c necks, representing a naked Saviour hanging on the cross. We are told indeed of a curious small one of that kind, which was presented by Poncet to the emperor Segued, ann. 1700, which that monarch viewed with some admiration, kissed it with great respect, and laid it up among his curiosities<sup>m</sup>. But if we consider, that he professed himself more than half a convert to the Roman church, and was then courting the friendship and assistance of the Portuguese, he could hardly avoid doing so before him; yet he did not dare to wear it about him, for fear of alarming both clergy and people by it. Several of these religious customs may, and have indeed been supposed to have been received from the Jews; but whether so or not, they must be owned to be, toto cælo, opposite to those of the church of Rome, which not only admits all kinds of religious imagery in their churches, but d likewise an inferior kind of worship to be paid to it; and yet pretends, that the Abissinian doctrines and worship bear a greater affinity to theirs than to any other churches, whether Greek or Protestant. But these few we have gone through are far from being the only ones in which they differ, as we shall soon see. Every church here hath a small room behind the east end, in which are repositied the materials for making the communion bread; which is allowed to be a leavened cake, and is consequently contrary to the unleavened wafer used by the Romish church. This cake is not kept till the next day, much less preserved whole weeks and months, as they do their consecrated wafers, which they give to the laity, more particularly that which is vulgarly called the host, and is kept in a particular repository over the altar, in order to be taken out and exposed to the people, and to receive their prayers, incense, and adoration; some of which have been kept so long in the pix, that they have bred e worms, or have been otherwise damaged, and made unfit for use. Well might the Abissinians be offended at it, and wonder that they did not consecrate every day as they do, and order it so among the communicants, that none of it might remain, and be exposed to such indecent and offensive accidents<sup>n</sup>.

- THEY differ no less from them in their ordering and administering of the other part of that sacred rite; and instead of wine, from which they abstain altogether, as hath been already observed*, they keep in this same little room a small quantity of dried raisins, of which they take four or five, more or less, and squeeze and macerate with their fingers, in a quantity of water, greater or less, according to the number of communicants; for they administer the cup
 f also to the laity, and are no less surpris'd at its being withheld from them by that church, <sup>m</sup> PONCET's Voyage into Ethiopia, p. 7.

 LUDOLPH, l. iii. c. 6. pass.

<sup>n</sup> TELLEZ, ubi sup. l. i. c. 19. ALVAREZ, c. 54, & seq.

* See before, p. 196.

(G) They appear to be such strict observers of those Mosaic injunctions, that they not only exclude women in their monthly purgations, and in child-bed; but, with respect to the latter, they extend this interdiction to the same number of days that the law-giver did; viz. forty after the birth of a male, and eighty after that of a female (14). Much the same they observe with regard to those pollutions incident to either sex, such as running sores, boyls, scabs, and other cuticular excretions and defilements; all which we thus particularly mention, to shew whence these observances had their origin; and if they could still continue such strict observers of those legal rites, which were to end as soon as the gospel appeared, can we wonder they should continue so with respect to the observance of the sabbath and circumcision, which were not of Moses, but of the fathers (15)?

(14) Levit. xii. 2, & seq. Vide Tellez, l. i. Ludolph, & al.

(15) John, xxxii.

whilst

whilst they think themselves obliged to administer it to all the laity. They likewise differ in their form of consecration; and instead of this is my body, and this is my blood, they say, this bread is my body, and this cup is my blood. Father Tellez much questions, with many learned casuists of his church, whether this last form be proper and efficacious to transubstantiate the elements into the body and blood of Christ. We shall not enter into the merit of that question, because if their argument against that form be good, it is a sign the Abissinians have no notion of any such transubstantiation of the elements, but believe and receive them, as symbols representing, and chanel conveying unto us, the benefits of Christ's meritorious death. This is the explanation which abbot Gregory gave of his church's belief of that sacred mystery; of which their practice is a standing evidence, seeing they do not pay any adoration to the consecrated elements <sup>a</sup>.

Do not believe transubstan-tiation.

Receive standing.

The laity not admitted into the chancel.

The gospel read out of it to them.

The monasteries and orders of monks.

When first introduced.

Their record concerning it.

AGAIN, they do not admit laymen and women to come up to the altar to receive, but administer it to them at the door of the chapel, or choir. Neither do they oblige them to receive it kneeling, but standing. The priest, in giving the bread, uses these words: The holy flesh of IMMANUEL, our God of truth, which he took of the Lady of us all: to which the communicant answers, Amen, Amen. The deacon comes next, and gives the wine, in a little spoon, and says, this is the blood of JESUS CHRIST, for the life of the flesh and soul, and for everlasting life. After which, a subdeacon pours a small quantity of water into the palm of the communicant's hand, with which he rinses his mouth, and swallows it. To conclude this article of their church-worship and communion, which the missionary writers affect to stile their mass, though, as we have seen, it bears so little analogy to that of the church of Rome, either with regard to their notion of, or the ceremonies that accompany it, we shall only observe farther, that whereas in the latter, or Roman mass, the laity stand in full view of every thing that is performed in it from the beginning to the end, in the former they are excluded from seeing every part of the divine service, excepting only the giving them the communion at the chapel door, and the hearing of the gospel read by the officiating priest, without the chancel, and not at the altar: neither doth what they call the gospel consist of select portions out of the evangelists; but here they divide the four gospels into so many portions, that one of them serves them a whole year, and after that, the next; so that they are four years in going through the whole: they likewise constantly close the lecture of it with an ALLELUJAH, even when the service is performed for the dead <sup>b</sup>; whereas the Roman church never uses that doxology but on their three grand festivals <sup>c</sup>.

HAVING now gone through the different orders and offices of the Abissinian clergy, it is time we should say something of their religious orders, which are here so numerous, and their monasteries stand so thick, that, when they are at their divine service, one cannot hear them chanting their prayers and psalms at one place, without hearing one, or more, doing the same at another; insomuch, that one may see sometimes two, three, or more, standing within the hearing of each other. Their music, indeed, must of course be very loud, not only from the number and loud voices of the singers, but from the number of instruments that are heard with them: these are commonly drums and tabors, of several forms and sizes; to which they add, the stamping with their feet, striking the ground with their long staves, &c. all which increases the noise, and helps to convey the voice still farther. Besides all this, we are told, that almost every one of those monasteries hath two churches or chapels, the one for the men, the other for the women; but when, or whence, this custom was introduced amongst them, is not easy to guess from any of their records, any more than the precise time when the monastic life began, and how, or by whom, it was introduced, and of what orders the first founders of these monasteries were. Such a tedious enquiry, could we strike any probability out of the monkish stories we have left, would be foreign to our purpose <sup>d</sup>. The ancient chronicle of Axuma, often quoted in this chapter, tells us, that in the days of Amiamid, many monks came from Rum, who filled all the empire; nine of whom staid in the kingdom of Tigre, and each of them erected a church of his own name: and the author of the life of Tekla Haymanout adds, that he came to the monastery of Damo, built by Abba Agaravi, one of the nine worthies above-mentioned, who came also from Rum and Egypt in the days of Almida, the son of Salodeba, the predecessor of Tacena, and that these nine, like so many bright stars, filled the world with their brightness. The people afterwards found names, it seems, for the other eight; for which we shall refer the reader to the margin (H), and only observe, that

<sup>a</sup> LUDOLPH, ubi sup. l. v. § 54, & seq. TELLEZ, ibid. JARRIC, CODIGN. & al. plur. <sup>b</sup> Ibid. ibid.
<sup>c</sup> See the Rom. missal & ritual. <sup>d</sup> LOBO, voy. 3. p. 77, & seq. <sup>e</sup> De his, vide ALPHONSO MEN-DEZ, dissert. apud TELLEZ, l. i. c. 16. LUDOLPH, l. ii. c. 4. iii. 3, pass.

(H) These were Abba Pantaleon, Abba Guarima, Abba Aleffi, Abba Sahami, Abba Affe, Abba Licanos, Abba Adimata, Abba Hos, called also Guba, or Swoken; all which we have chosen to set down here, according as they are spelt by father Tellez, out of the above account of the patriarch Mendez, in order to shew our readers, that a one of them, and one only, appears of Greek extract; viz. that of Pantaleon, who became a founder of another monastery. It is therefore very difficult, from these two accounts, to fix, Tellez's account strained, and imperfect. not only the precise time of their arrival, but the true import of the word Rum, whether it means Rome or Greece; and yet the patriarch Alphonso Mendez hath not scrupled to fix it between the former and the year 470 or 480; and the meaning of the latter to Greece, rather than Rome, on the bare evidence of the name of Pantaleon; and to infer from thence, that Rum means no other than New Rome, the name which Constantine the Great gave to the metropolis of his new eastern empire<sup>1</sup>.

THIS short sketch may serve at once to shew the uncertainty of those two records, if they were rightly understood by the interpreter; and the poor shifts here used to fix the time when, and country whence, the monastic life was first propagated through this empire; and all this, for aught appears to the contrary, merely to give the honour of it to some of those enthusiastic founders, of whom we read such incredible wonders in their ascetic legends, such in particular as were their two famed heroes, Paul and Anthony<sup>2</sup>. Neither Mendez, nor any of the Portuguese writers, could be ignorant, that this ascetic life had been several centuries in great vogue and esteem among the Jews, both in Palestine and in Egypt; witness the Essenians in the former, so much celebrated by Josephus<sup>3</sup>; and the Therapeutes in Egypt, amply described by Philo<sup>4</sup>; of both which sects we have given a full account in our Ancient History<sup>5</sup>; both whose lives, rules, retirement, piety, and austerities, were the most perfect patterns and quintessence of the ascetic life; insomuch that many learned men have been induced to believe these latter to have been a Christian order of ascetics, instituted by St. Mark, first patriarch of Alexandria; and that Philo had represented them as a set of Jewish monastics, in compliment to his own nation<sup>6</sup>; though he, being a native of Alexandria, and cotemporary with St. Mark, would hardly have dared to have not only challenged them, but represented them as a fraternity of a much longer standing, if, before that, they had not been in being long before that evangelist. Hence others have supposed, with greater probability, that many of those Therapeutes, being afterwards converted by him to Christianity, separated themselves from their Jewish brethren, and formed themselves into Christian societies under the protection and direction of that patriarch<sup>7</sup>. The Essenians and Therapeutes more probably the first introducers of the monastic life here.

HOWEVER that be, we need not go now so far as Thrace or Constantinople for the meaning of the word Rum, since Rum Misraim means no more than Higher or Upper Egypt, in which these ascetics swarmed. Neither need we descend so low as the fifth century for the first introduction of them into Abissinia, since their neighbourhood to it, the conformity of religion, customs, &c. which we have observed through this and some other chapters, not to mention the boasted pedigree of the Abissinian princes from Solomon, could hardly fail of inviting even the Jewish Therapeutes thither; especially as the country every-where abounds with rocky solitudes, the most adapted to a recluse and ascetic life, and the inhabitants are so naturally inclined to it. And how much more easily may we suppose them to have spread themselves over this empire, soon after its conversion to Christianity, if we admit, as we may with great probability, that many of them became proselytes to the gospel so early as St. Mark's patriarchate, and formed themselves into societies under his rule and government<sup>8</sup>. Much earlier than the fifth century. Since which converted to Christianity, yet retain their old rules of life.

ONE thing we are very sure of, that those monasteries of Abissinia bear no resemblance at all to those of the Roman, Greek, Armenian, and other Christian churches, either with regard to their structure, form, church-service, government, discipline, and way of life; but appear, in all these points, the very transcripts of those of the Essenians and Therapeutes, as described by Josephus and Philo. Instead of being inclosed within stout high walls, they appear only like so many large villages, or parishes, in which every monk hath his hut, or cell, at a distance from each other. Instead of being confined within their walls, and not being permitted to stir out without the superior's leave, these, except at the times of their devotions, may range where they please. Instead of leading an idle life, and living upon the charity and benefactions of the laity, these spend most of their spare time in cultivating each the portion of land which is assigned to him. Instead of eating in common, and having their tables served Quite opposite to all other monks. Laborious life. Great abstinence.

<sup>1</sup> Ubi sup. Contemplat.

<sup>2</sup> Vide int. al. STURMY'S Ascetics, pass.

<sup>3</sup> Bell. Jud. 1. ii. c. 7.

<sup>4</sup> De Vita

<sup>5</sup> See vol. iv. p. 169, & seq. 171, & seq.

<sup>6</sup> Vide EUSEB. Anc. Hist. 1. ii. c. 17. BEL-

LARMIN, BARONIUS, MONTFAUCON, BASNAGE, & al.

<sup>7</sup> Vide DRUS. TRIGLAND, BASNAGE, PRIDEAUX, &

<sup>8</sup> De his, vide EUSEB. & auct. sup. citat.

that even abating the almost unavoidable incorrectness of the orthography in transcribing them out of the Ethiopic into Latin or Portuguese, there is not one, except the first, that doth not plainly appear to be of Hebrew, Syriac, or Chaldean extract, to any man that hath but a moderate knowledge of those tongues; for by this they will be able to judge, how warped that author must be to his own opinion, that will have those nine ascetics to have come from Greece to Thrace, merely because one of them happens to be called by a Greek name, whilst those of the other eight plainly appear to be of a quite opposite extract.

with variety of flesh, fish, fowl, and other dainties, and having a competent portion of wine<sup>a</sup> to help their digestion, these eat their small pittance within their homely cells, which is commonly the product of their own grounds, and of their own rearing; a few herbs, pulse, or roots, without any other condiment than a little salt, and on holidays a little butter; or even any other diluter than plain water. Instead of that delicious variety of lenten dishes, which those are allowed, at least once a day, together with a small collation at night, the most part of these never eat above once every two days, during their whole lenten times, which take up almost one third-part of the year<sup>c</sup>; during which time they live upon unfavoury herbs, not so much as allowing themselves either bread or butter to eat with them; and some there are amongst them, who during all that time will abstain from all manner of sustenance, except on Sundays. Instead of excluding women from their communities, they have, like the Jewish b monastics above-mentioned, some orders among them, which allow them in the married life, to bring up their families in the same way, and distribute their lands, cells, and what other few goods they have, amongst them: but these, as we observed a little higher, do not admit their wives and daughters into their churches, but have particular ones, or chapels, for their use; and to which they repair at all the canonical hours of the day and night, with the same exactness as the men do, and use much the same divine service as them, except the additional music of drums and tabors, which are peculiar to the latter. There are, however, other orders of them, who wholly abstain from all commerce with that sex, and never admit them to live within the limits of their monasteries<sup>d</sup>. We may also mention here a third sort, who prefer the eremitical life, as more adapted for contemplation than those social ones; and, for that c reason, chuse to abide in towers, caves, caverns, or on the top of high rocks, and other lonesome and unfrequented retreats (I); and these are commonly more highly esteemed and revered than the rest, by the bulk of the people.

BUT to return to those of the monastic kind; they likewise differ from those of the Christian churches in many other particulars, which we have no time to dwell upon; such as, in the form and structure of their churches, which we have elsewhere had occasion to describe; and by their roundness, gates, and choir, seem to answer much more to the synagogues of the Essenians and Therapeutes; the ablutions after any accidental defilements, observation of the sabbath, circumcision, and other Jewish rites; and more particularly in the proper choice d of their other works of mortification. They know not the use of the monkish discipline, and other punishments, which, perhaps, rather stimulate than damp the fleshly appetites; instead of which, they will plunge themselves into the coldest rivers, and continue in them, with the water up to their chin, for some hours together, and even whole days, in the coldest weather<sup>e</sup>; the very apprehension of which penance would be enough to throw some of the most mortified monks of Rome and Greece into a quartan ague. We omit some other penances of the like nature, which are still more austere, and almost incredible, but which father Almeyda relates as things of his own knowlege; and which we here mention, not as worthy of a greater degree of praise, but as conformable to those rigorous ones which were so common among these Judaic ascetics, from whom they in all probability adopted them.

<sup>a</sup> See before, p. 192 (D).<sup>d</sup> Vide TELLEZ, l. i. c. 17. LUDOLPH, l. iii. c. 3.<sup>e</sup> Ibid.

(I) Of the first sort was their celebrated Abba Pantaleon, lately mentioned, whose retreat (which is still shewn at some small distance eastward of Axuma, and within a small bow-shot of the church and monastery said to have been built by him, and called from him Beth Pantaleon) is still seen standing; viz. the little tower where he was shut up, and visited by the emperor. Between the church, and the city above-mentioned, is likewise seen the cave to which he frequently retired, which consists of three apartments, hewn by the hand into the rock. One of them, which is the entrance into the rest, and bath its door fronting the west, is fifteen cubits long, and about four in breadth. At the end of it are two other little rooms, in the form of a cross at the entrance, each of which is ten cubits long, and that on the right hand, towards the south, is four cubits wide, and the other, opposite to it, six cubits; and all the ground lying round those caves hath a square wall about it (16).

This place is honoured by the Abissinians, as being that to which the emperor Caleb retired, after he had gained a signal victory over the Jewish king of the Homertites, and betook himself to a recluse life; and his tomb, as well as that of Abba Pantaleon, are still shewn in the church above-mentioned; which, we are told, was laid open by an earthquake, an. 1630, but repaired soon after by the monks (17).

Of the other sort of hermits, was the Abba Hos, surnamed Gubba, or Swollen, who lived on a high barren rock, and built a church upon it. Hence the Abissines (if our author (18) understood them right) surnamed him Swollen, because those that passed by the foot of the mountain used to say, What a high swollen monk is this! But from the affinity of the Ethiopic to the Hebrew, Chaldee, &c. as the occasion of his nick-name, we should rather think, that the epithet Guba (or Geboab, as the Hebrew hath it) meant lofty or stately, alluding to his situation. However that be, all those nine monks are reckoned very great saints and miracle-workers; and, among other wonders of that kind, are recorded to have caused a huge serpent, which used to devour men, children, and cattle, to burst asunder, by the bare virtue of their prayers. Quere, whether they did not give him such a sop, as Daniel is said to have done to the Babylonish dragon (19)?

(16) Alphonf. Mendez, ap. Tellez, l. i. c. 17. of Dan. Hist. of Bel & Drag. ver. 27.(17) Id. ibid.(18) Id. ubi. sup.(19) Apocryph.

- a THIS is the true case of all those so highly extolled monastics; all whose boasted greatness chiefly consists in the number of their religious, and the vast extent of the lands they possess; in every one of which we see nothing but meanness, their very churches and chapels are most of them thatched, and void of all ornaments, except, perhaps, some few ordinary paintings: yet they are well lined with timber on the inside, and have some accommodations for the old and weak to lean their elbows upon, because they chaunt all their service standing. They have neither refectories nor halls, and their cells are of clay, small, low, thatched, and as meanly furnished within as they are adorned without: every thing within them is answerable to their mortified life; their beds a poor mat, lying upon the floor; their chairs and tables of the same, only raised a little higher with earth<sup>f</sup>. Mean way of living.
Churches.
- b THERE are two different orders of them, who are called by the name of their founders, or rather reformers; viz. those of Tekla Haymanout, and of Abba Eustatius; the former a native of Ethiopia, and the latter of Egypt: the order of the former have a kind of general amongst them, whom they call Ikegue, who is chosen by the abbas, or heads of every monastery under him: the others have only a superior, stiled abba, or father, over each monastery, chosen by the majority of the votes of the monks belonging to it; but whether annually, or triennially, we are not told (K). The habit of both is almost the same; or, to speak more properly, differs in each particular: for, except their ashæma, among the abbas or priors, who are the only order that wear it, and which is only a little braid of three thongs of red leather, which they put about their necks, and fasten with an iron or copper hook, every one cloathes himself as he thinks fit, or as he can best afford, but all of them meanly; and the cloth or skin which covers their body is girt about them with a leathern strap. Some of them go bare-headed, like all the laity; others wear a kind of hat; others some sort of caps; and some cover their heads with a piece of cloth. Those who affect a more ascetic life, now-and-then, as their fancy or religion leads them, retire into the deserts, and come out again, distinguish themselves at pleasure; some by a yellow skin, hollowed and worn about their neck; others, by a piece of cloth of the same colour and shape; a third sort, by a black kind of mantle, which they throw over their shirt or cassock; which last is commonly white, and girt with a leathern thong like the rest; but some chuse to have both mantle and cassock of the same black colour, as having a deeper air of gravity. In all these last mentioned particulars, they totally differ from all other monks, whether Roman, Greek, or Armenian; but agree exactly with what we read of them in Philo and Josephus concerning the Therapeutes and Essenians. So that, upon the whole, those nine founders above-mentioned appear to us rather to be reformers, or, to speak more properly, the persons that converted the ancient Abissinian ascetics to christianity. Had they been founders or reformers, they would, in all likelihood, have brought them into a greater conformity of dress, living, &c. with those of Europe and Asia; whereas it appears from what hath been said hitherto, that they made no sensible alteration in any thing but in their faith. In consequence of which, they have all of them, like the rest of the clergy, the privilege of carrying a cross in their hands, and blessing the people with it. Abbas how distinguished.
Monks habit various, but mean.
Carry a cross in their hands.
- c THOSE of the abbots, or superior orders of convents, have them much larger, better shaped, and without a foot to stand on; and these are usually carried before them by some inferior monk, as a token of their dignity, whenever they go abroad. Those monks, who observe celibacy, are commonly in greater esteem than those that marry, and are often, especially their abbots, employed by the emperors in public affairs, negotiations, &c. and it is very likely that they make some kind of vows of chastity at their first admittance into their convents; but in what manner we are not told. The patriarch Alvarez indeed informs us, that The unmarried in greater esteem;

<sup>f</sup> Ibid. ibid.

(K) The Abissines celebrate still their festivals with unusual solemnity, especially that of the former, which is kept on the twenty-fourth of August and the twenty-fourth of December; besides which, they have another, in memory of the translation of his relics, in the month of May. That of the other is only once a year, in the month of July. They relate several wonders of them both.

Tekla Haymanout, they say, had led the ascetic life some considerable time in the desert of Thebais, with such abstinence and mortifications as are almost incredible, till at length coming into Abissinia, with many others of his fellow-hermits, he was chosen to succeed Abba Johanni in the abbaship, who was the third in succession to Abba Argawi, the first abbot in Ethiopia; and, among other institutions which he left among them, one was, that they should have an Ikegue, or general, over the whole order, who should keep his circular visitation through all their monasteries at proper seasons; which dignity became the highest ecclesiastical one next to the Abuna. We omit the miracles, apparitions, writings, and other feats, which are recorded of him in his life, and other of their legends.

The same are related of Eustatius, not worth mentioning; only, among the rules which he gave them, he did not oblige them to chuse a superior, or Ikegue, over them; which they attribute to his going from them into Armenia, and dying there, without naming a successor. For which reason they are contented with an abba to preside in each monastery, who is one of their own chusing (20).

though not the more chaste.

having one day asked the question of the Azaga Tikbo, who had been a monk, but was then a the emperor's secretary, whether they bound themselves to it by any vow? that minister, who was of a gay facetious temper, answered, that their candidates for the monkish habit, being prostrate before the abba, said aloud to him, We bind ourselves to observe the rules of chastity; and softly whispered, as you do; and added, that they made most of their other vows with the same tacit restriction<sup>z</sup>. But we may justly question whether that reply was not rather thrown as a squib at the patriarch, and the Romish clergy, than at the Abissinian; seeing all missionary writers so unanimously agree, that the abstinence and mortification of those monks exceed by far all that is practised in any other Christian monasteries.

The monastries called by Jewish names.

THOSE of Abissinia did not, as with us in Europe, swarm in great cities, even when they had very considerable ones of these; but, answerable to their name and design, were chiefly to be found among the most mountainous and solitary parts of the country; and are therefore called Debras, which, in the Ethiopic tongue, signifies both a mountain and a monastery, and, in the Hebrew, a desert; and whether out of regard to their affinity to the Jews, or, as we supposed a little higher, because they were first introduced hither by Jewish monks, were distinguished either by some of the most remarkable territories in Palestine, such as Debra Libanos, Debra Bezan, or Bashan, Debra Tabor, Debra Sinai, Debra Zayte, &c. or by some religious Hebrew word, as Debra Hallelo, or Hallelujah<sup>n</sup>; names which we cannot suppose either Tekla Haymanout, the Ethiopian, or Eustace, the Egyptian, would ever have thought to have given to those places, unless we suppose them to have been themselves of Jewish extract, or that they had been long before called by them by some more ancient founders, whether of the Essenian or Therapeutic order, and were suffered to retain them by those two new-comers.

Some of the chief ones described;

HITHERTO we have only given our readers a general description of those religious communities; they would not perhaps be displeased, if we here subjoin some farther account of two or three of their most celebrated ones, to enable them to form an idea of the rest. But here it is that we are quite at a loss how to reconcile the pompous account of those ancient communities with the mean and poor condition which they, even the most celebrated of them, appear now in. Such dreadful devastations have the frequent invasions of the Agaus, Gallas, and other barbarous nations, made, by possessing themselves of their lands, destroying their churches and habitations, and forcing them to exchange the ascetic for a vagabond life; neither have their intestine wars contributed less to their decay, and, with regard to a great number of them, to their total inanition: so that one can hardly guess at what they are recorded to have been, by the few sorrowful ruins that are left of them. The chief of those that still make any tolerable figure, are those that follow<sup>i</sup>.

but gone to great decay.

Debra Libanos.

DEBRA LIBANOS, in the kingdom of Xaoa, is still famous on account of the bones of Tekla Haymanout, of whose order that monastery is, being translated into its church; on which account the Abissinian monarchs bestowed great abundance of lands. It was also the residence of the Ikegue, or general; yet the structure of it much exceeds the general description we have given of the rest. It had a church like the others, built on the top of a hill, and round about it were the thatched houses, in which the monks lived; so that it looked more like a country town, or rather village, than a religious community; and till the Gallas, who made themselves masters of a great part of that province, had seized on their vast extensive lands, its chief grandeur consisted more in the great multitude of its religious men than in the beauty or richness of its buildings, or any thing else that can deserve that name. Since that time, there are only some few Christians, who still live among the rocky mountains, called Ambas<sup>k</sup>, and in the monastery not quite forty monks. And yet this place was formerly so considerable, that it contained, including the churches and little monasteries round about, that were subject to it, about 10,000 persons, according to the unanimous reports of the Abissines<sup>l</sup>. Since the time of the invasion of the Gallas, the Ikegue, or general of the order, hath removed his seat into the kingdom of Bagamendra, whither the greatest part of his monks followed him, and where it hath continued ever since.

Resemble towns more than convents.

All mean in and about it.

Debra Bisan.

DEBRA BISAN, or Basan, was likewise built among very high mountains, about a day's journey from Mazowa. It belongs to the order of St. Eustace, and was once very famous; but hath been since much reduced; yet it is still famed for being the burying place of one of their abbats, named Philip, whom they still honour as a saint, and celebrate his festival in the month of July. One of whose most remarkable actions was, that he shewed so much zeal for the sabbath, that he ventured to go and reprove one of their emperors for obliging his subjects to work on that day, and obtained a revocation of that impious edict.

Debra Halle-lujah.

BUT none of their monasteries has suffered such a surprising decay as that called Hallelo, or Hallelujah, belonging to the same order with that of Debra Bisan. It is seated in the king-

<sup>z</sup> Vide LE GRAND, Dissertat. 15. de Hierarch. ubi sup. <sup>k</sup> De his, vide sup. 200, & seq. Dissertat. 15. p. 356.

<sup>n</sup> Id. ibid.

<sup>l</sup> TELLEZ, LUDOLPH, LOBO, &c. TELLEZ, l. i. c. 17. LUDOLPH, l. c. 3. LE GRAND,

- a dom of Tigre, about a day's journey from the antient metropolis of Auxuma, on a very high mountain, and in the heart of a spacious wood. Its noble ruins, still to be seen, shew it to have been one of the most considerable in the whole empire. The river Mareb runs along on the north-east of it, and waters the vallies below it, a little before it loses itself in the ground *. The church was ninety-nine feet in length, and seventy-eight in breadth, and round about it stood the round cells of the monks, very thick. The missionaries often inquired of some of the oldest monks belonging to it, what number of them it might formerly contain; and were answered by some of them, 12,000, and by others, 40,000. The first number is therefore supposed to have included only those that belonged to, and lived near, the church; and the other, those that were scattered at a greater distance, and composed little communities, subject to the great ones; which they confidently affirm to have amounted to ninety; having each a suffragan church, or chapel, depending on the mother church above-mentioned. Here resided the chief abbot of the order, who was so considerable a person, that when he went to court upon any urgent business, he was always attended by 150 of his monks riding upon mules, and distinguished from the rest only by a loose gown, close before, and without sleeves, having only a hole in the top to put their heads through, and which covered the rest of their habit. Of all this vast number of churches, chapels, and cells, all that remains now is so inconsiderable, that one cannot help being amazed how they could undergo such a general ruin, in so rich and fertile a kingdom, that there should hardly be any thing left standing to give us an idea of its pristine grandeur, if we except the ruins of the church, long since fallen. In the midst of which stands now a little one; near which, and about those of the suffragan ones, live about ten or twelve monks, only, as it were, to keep up the memory of that once so famed a community, and its no less celebrated founder, a reputed saint, named Samuel <sup>m</sup>; of whose extraordinary penances and austerities they relate such wonders as exceed all belief. And thus much of the hierarchy of the Abissinian church.

* See before, p. 204.

<sup>m</sup> TELLEZ, ibid. ad fin.

S E C T. VIII.

Of the faith and practice of the Abissinian church, with respect to the other parts of their religion, and the errors into which it has fallen since its conversion to Christianity.

- d THE Abissinians are justly charged with professing a religion mixed with Judaism and Christianity, the Law and the Gospel. We have already had occasion to give a great number of pregnant instances of the former, from which their two zealous defenders, the abbot Gregory and Mr. Ludolph, have in vain tried to exculpate them. Yet we think we should be very unjust to them, if we should charge that church with Judaism, or paying an almost equal regard to the Law of Moses, as they do to the Gospel of Christ, as several of the Portuguese missionaries have done <sup>a</sup>. We hope, therefore, our readers will not be displeased, nor think it out of our province, if we endeavour to set that important point in a more impartial light, whereby they may be enabled to make a more candid judgment concerning their observance of such a variety of Judaic rites, which hath given occasion to that heavy charge.
- e WE, therefore, with regard to the two great articles alleged against them; viz. circumcision and the keeping the sabbath, or seventh day, think it plain, not only by their own confession, but what carries a much stronger evidence, their practice, that they do not look upon either as necessary to salvation by virtue of the Mosaic law, as the Jews do, but as ordained by God, the one from the creation, and the other to Abraham, the father of the faithful; and, consequently, not to be put on the same foot with those other precepts and ceremonies which were to be abrogated at the coming of the Messiah. Neither do they, 2dly, look upon circumcision as a sacrament of the same indispensable obligation as baptism; because though they all in general practise it, yet they only enjoin the latter as such, and leave the other as a matter of choice. For which reason, any old woman may, and among the common people usually do, circumcise the children; whereas none are allowed to baptize them but the priests only; and what is still more remarkable, if a child be first circumcised, he must be afterwards baptized before he can be admitted a member of the Christian church; but, if baptized before circumcision, he is not suffered, much less required, to be circumcised. And this was passed into a canon of the whole church about the close of the twelfth century, at a time when

<sup>a</sup> Vide ALMEYDA's Letters to ALVAREZ, TELLEZ, & al.

Countenanced
by the apostle
St. Paul.

some of their patriarchs had ventured to enjoin it as a matter of obligation and necessity<sup>c</sup>. So a that, in all this, they only followed St. Paul's excellent rule, who, when he wrote to the Galatians, who had never been circumcised, tells them, that if they become so, Christ will profit them nothing<sup>d</sup>. But, when to the Corinthians, explains himself more clearly in these terms<sup>e</sup>: Is any man called being circumcised, let him not become uncircumcised, &c. (A). Let every man abide in the same calling wherein he was called. Can it therefore be wondered at, that a nation, which boasted to have received, with the Jewish religion, this sacred rite from Solomon, and their monarchs to be lineally descended from him, should be easily persuaded to give it up, after so plain a concession from the great apostles to the Gentiles? or could those who converted them to Christianity reasonably enjoin them more than that they should no longer receive it as a sacrament, but as a rite of mere indifference to their salvation? and hath b not their practice ever since plainly shewn how readily they complied with that injunction? Can there be a greater proof of it than that noble opposition which their whole clergy made against those of their Abunas, who would have forced them to believe it of indispensable obligation, and the decree of their national council against it, lately mentioned, and their forbidding any child being circumcised after he had received the baptism? If, therefore, they pay any religious regard to that rite, it can only be on account of its divine origin, and their having received it, together with the knowledge and worship of the true God, from the great king of Israel; now no longer as an obligatory seal of the old covenant, but as a voluntary and thankful memorial of it, and of their having been formerly admitted into it.

Believed to be of mere indifference;

and a political custom.

A preserver of cleanness.

Why they circumcise their females.

BUT this regard to that antient rite is so far from being universally paid to it, that many of c them look upon it as a political one, either to preserve a distinction between them and those nations who either do not, or practise it in a different manner: for the Ishmaelites, Edomites, &c. differ from one another in their manner of performing the operation; and so do the Abissines from the Jews; these last not only circumcising the prepuce, but tearing with their nails the tender skin which sticks round the glans, which the former do not. Or, secondly, in order to promote propagation, to which they think it contributes on several accounts. Or, d thirdly, to preserve those parts from contracting any filth, which they say, if not prevented in time, will create inflammations, cancers, and other inconveniencies equally dangerous<sup>f</sup>. And it cannot doubtless be with any other view that the Abissinians, as well as the antient Egyptians, subjected their female infants to it; there being, as is alleged, a kind of excrescence, or super- d fluous skin, growing over the pudendum, or rather between the labia and the nymphæ, which must be rescinded, in order to preserve those so useful parts clean from the like natural defilements, which are no less dangerous in that sex in those hot climates. As, therefore, St. Paul could not but know that many nations had, from time immemorial, adopted this custom merely with the like indifference, without any other religious views, it was natural for him to censure the pharisaical condemning of its practice, upon any other foot than that of ascribing a sacramental efficacy, which it had not, in order to render it obligatory; and therefore affirms it to be a matter of absolute indifference, in opposition to the whole pharisaic tribe, who insisted upon the necessity of it.

Other pretended Judaic customs vindicated.

THE same charitable and tender caution doth that great apostle observe towards his new con- e verts, with respect to sundry other observances and abstinences; for which, nevertheless, the Portuguese writers scruple not to call the Abissinian a judaizing church. Like many other primitive Christians, whose example is still followed to this day by some of the moderns, they observe the sabbath day, by abstaining from all laborious works, though they admit those of necessity; such as lighting their fires, baking their bread, dressing their victuals, and such like, which are reckoned unlawful by all the Jews<sup>g</sup>. They abstain from blood, things strangled, swine's flesh, hares, rabbits, &c. use some purifications and washings after certain defilements, and other observations of the like nature, in common with the Jews; and, for these, their religion is represented as a mixture of the Jewish law and gospel. Whereas, in

<sup>c</sup> ALVAREZ, TELLEZ, LUDOLPH, LE GRAND's Diff. 8. p. 287. seq. <sup>f</sup> See Ant. Hist. vol. i. p. 427, & seq. & (R), vii. 201.

<sup>d</sup> Galat. v. 2.

<sup>e</sup> Cor. vii. 18, &

<sup>g</sup> See Ant. Hist. vol. i. p. 600, sub not.

(A) It can hardly be supposed, that the apostle could, by those words, have a retrospect to the scandalous method that had been formerly practised by apostate Jews, of erasing the scar or mark of circumcision, of which we have given some account in our Antient History (1). The meaning, therefore, of that expression can be no other than the neglect, setting aside, or abrogating, of that rite. In this sense, a man may be said to become uncircumcised, if, having been circumcised, he neglects to have his children circumcised. The same may be said of a church, which, having once received that rite, doth afterwards abolish the use of it; which is what the apostle seems here to disapprove; and therefore enjoins every man to abide in the same calling wherein he was called, whether he be circumcised or uncircumcised; seeing neither the one nor the other is of any import towards a man's salvation (2).

(1) See Ant. Hist. vol. iv. p. 47.

(2) 1 Cor. vii. 18, 19.

a fact, they all in general allow, that the ceremonial law was absolutely abrogated by Christ; and that no one precept of it is binding, but what had previously received its sanction from God. Thus, the sabbath was ordained from the creation<sup>k</sup>; the abstaining from blood and things strangled was enjoined to Noah, and his posterity<sup>l</sup>; and had been accordingly revived and ratified by the whole college of apostles, in their first synod at Jerusalem*, and afterwards by several general and national councils†. It was therefore in virtue of this and the Mosaic law, that they abstained from them. The same may be said likewise of their observing what some authors stile the law of Levirate, which obliges a man, if his married brother die without issue male, to marry his widow, and raise up seed to keep his name: for though we find it enjoined to the Israelites in the Levitical law, it plainly appears to have been in force long before among the Canaanites, from the instance of the patriarch Judab and his Canaanitish daughter-in-law Tamar‡. The same custom, therefore, might be observed by other nations, and might also be rightly preserved by the Abissinians after their conversion, either on account of its antiquity, or of its fitness to keep up the memory of the dead, without looking upon it as obligatory, as being enjoined by the Mosaic law. But farther,

b As to the eating of swine's flesh, and other unclean creatures, though we find no prohibition against them before the Mosaic law, yet there was certainly a distinction made between the clean and unclean ones, long enough before that<sup>m</sup>. But not to insist further upon this, it is certain the Abissinians were not the only people out of Palestine that not only abstained from the flesh of, but who professed the utmost abhorrence to, that creature, without any regard to the Mosaic prohibition. The Phœnicians never eat any, if we may believe Porphyry<sup>n</sup>, who gives this reason for it, that they, like the Jews, did not breed any among them. And Herodotus assures us<sup>o</sup>, that the Egyptians had such an aversion to them, that if they chanced but to touch them, they immediately went and plunged themselves over head and ears in the next river; and adds, that they shewed the same abhorrence to all swine-herds. The same may be said of the Scenite Arabs, and other nations; among whom that creature was accounted one of the most impure and unwholesome, and its flesh the most apt to create leprosy and other loathsome diseases. Why might not then the Abissines suppose that it was on that account that God had forbid the eating of it to the Israelites, and abhor it for that reason? And may not the same reason incline, nay oblige, them to continue in all the other Jewish institutions relating to cleanness and ablutions, without any regard to the Mosaic law? or was it possible, in this and all other such hot climates, to neglect them, without endangering health and life<sup>p</sup>?

c Thus then we hope, that those missionaries lay their charge too home against the Abissinian church, when they represent it as paying an equal regard to the Law and the Gospel: for all the observances above-mentioned plainly appear not only to be enjoined by it, without any regard to the Mosaic law, but, which is still more, to be countenanced and justified by the same apostle to the Gentiles, in many of his Epistles, and more particularly in that to the Colossians, in these words<sup>q</sup>: Let no man therefore judge you in meat or in drink, or in respect of an holy day or sabbath; which are a shadow of the things to come, but the body is of Christ; or, as these last words might be more properly rendered, but the body (or substance of those shadows) is Christ. They might, therefore, with more justice, have charged that church with ascribing too great merit, and placing too great a confidence in those observances, and a charge which they but too justly deserve; but which would recoil with double force against their own; and is not therefore once mentioned, though by far the heaviest of all that can be laid against it. However, the true cause of all this misunderstanding might be probably enough owing to the Abissinian clergy's refusing, as we are told by all the missionary writers they did, and stiffly declining all manner of conference with them, from a consciousness of their own ignorance and inability of holding an argument with them; otherwise it would have been easy for them to have cleared themselves from the imputation of judaizing, as they have done since in writing. But, instead of it, we are farther told, they sought only how to exasperate the people against them, by calling them Cofas, that is, uncircumcised; a term, it seems, of the greatest reproach among them, and taxing them with eating the flesh of swine, and other unclean creatures<sup>r</sup>. So that, from the odium which the people conceived against them on that account, they too hastily pronounced them to be half Jews and half Christians; if their prejudices and resentment hath not caused them to be beheld in the first sense with the large, and in the last with the small, end of the spying-glass.

d

e

f

Observance of the sabbath.

Abstaining from blood.

Raising seed to a dead brother.

Abstinence from swine's flesh, &amp;c.

observed by other nations.

Countenanced by the apostle, and misrepresented by the missionaries.

as well as the character of their clergy.

<sup>k</sup> Gen. ii. 3.<sup>l</sup> Ibid. ix. 4, & seq.* Acts, xv. 20.† Vide Ant. Hist. vol. i. p. 686 (C).‡ Gen. xxxviii. 7, & seq.<sup>m</sup> Ibid. vii. 2, & seq. & alib. See Ant. Hist. vol. i. p. 105 (†).<sup>n</sup> De abstin.

animal.

<sup>o</sup> Lib. ii. c. 27.<sup>p</sup> See Ant. Hist. vol. i. p. 688.<sup>q</sup> Ch. ii. 16, 17.<sup>r</sup> See LE GRAND, Dissert. viii. p. 281.

Their accounts not to be implicitly believed.

An instance of it.

Their inco-sistency.

The faith of the Abissinian church pure till the time of Dioscorus.

Infected with that heresy.

Condemned by the Chalcedonic council;

which is for that reason rejected by them.

stances, even with themselves. Let any one compare the following character, extracted by a Father Tellez out of all the writers of his fraternity, with what others have said of them<sup>s</sup>, and he will be easily satisfied that we have not inserted it in vain. “ Besides the antiquity of their “ errors,” says that author, “ there is a profound ignorance in Ethiopia; for having neither “ schools nor knowledge of philosophy and divinity, nor any other than some imperfect “ books, with scraps of homilies and councils, very full of mistakes, and their Bible, which “ is no less depraved, they are so very unlearned, though they have good capacities, that “ they can neither argue in form, nor defend their wrong notions syllogistically, but blindly “ adhere to what they have been taught by their forefathers. And though they believe in “ Christ our Lord, it is after their own manner, and with a thousand follies intermixed with “ the mysteries of his life<sup>t</sup>.” We shall conclude this article of their pretended observance b of the Mosaic law, with a transaction which one of their authors, on what authority we are not told, affirms to have happened soon after the total expulsion of the Jesuit missionaries out of the Abissinian empire*; by which our readers will clearly see what a necessity there is to read those authors with their eyes open. After having told his readers, that the Abissinians have such an abhorrence for uncircumcised persons, that they break in pieces all the vessels they have eat or drank out of, and have a form of prayer to purify and bless those they have defiled by the bare touch, he adds: “ But what is the most remarkable of all is, that the Jesuits, “ and with them the catholic religion, were no sooner banished out of Abissinia, than an “ order was published, that all the youth, who had not been circumcised, should forthwith c “ be so; and that if the soldiers met in their way with any one that had not the circumcision-“ mark, they struck the point of their halberds into their privities, to give it them.” We shall not here inquire how this dreadful piece of news was conveyed thence into Europe, after the whole fraternity was expelled out of the country; nor how we can reconcile the above-mentioned abhorrence of the Abissinians to all uncircumcised persons with the profession which they make in several of their letters to the pope, king of Portugal, and other great persons, that they looked upon circumcision as a mere antient custom, and a piece of the same decency and cleanness as paring of their nails, or any other excrescence. How is it consistent with the kind and hospitable reception which all those missionaries tell us they met with d from their monarchs, princes of the blood, grandees, and even from several of their clergy of the first rank, who yet did not, it is very probable, dream any thing of their carrying the scar of circumcision about them<sup>u</sup>? If it be said, that they were already above half-converts to the church of Rome, before they came thither, then may we not justly ask how such stiff, ignorant, irrational, unphilosophical, bookless, people jumped at once, with these small helps they had, into so right a way of thinking and judging in favour of the Roman church? or was it their ignorance that induced them to prefer it to their own? But, lastly, how doth the edict above-mentioned, or the insolence of the soldiers, prove that they paid a religious regard to the rite of circumcision, or any thing but a natural resentment against those who had neglected it, in obedience to the Romish patriarchs and missionaries? But it is now time to give some account of their faith, and their unhappy defection from it.

We have already hinted, that the Abissinian church received the gospel, and their discipline, e from that of Alexandria, and hath continued in subjection to that patriarchate ever since. So that so long as the mother continued orthodox, the daughter followed her example, and persevered in the faith which the first bishop Frumentius had established among them. But no sooner was the former infected with monothelism, or monophysism, by her unworthy patriarch Dioscorus, and his no less worthless abbot Eutychius, the two first broachers of that heresy, about the year of Christ 444, than the poison was communicated to the latter by the abunas sent thither from Egypt, and quickly spread itself through the greatest part of the empire; so that both clergy and laity have been strongly tainted with it ever since<sup>w</sup>.

THIS stupid and unaccountable error (which consisted chiefly in allowing in Christ our Re- f deemer but one nature and one will, though they acknowledged him to be very God, as well as very man, and to be the second person in the adorable Trinity; and had spread itself not only through the churches of Egypt and Abissinia, but over Greece, Armenia, and other parts) was no less warmly opposed by others, especially those of Rome and Constantinople; and was at length condemned by a council of no less than 630 bishops, convened at Chalcedon, as a damnable heresy. Soon after which, their decision was confirmed by pope Leo I. in his letter to Flavianus. This, however, instead of making a due impression upon the Abissinian clergy, served only to excite their hatred and contempt against both. They called that council an assembly of factious and servile madmen, who scrupled not to betray the truth, in

<sup>s</sup> De his vide ROGERS, PONCET, JARRIC, CODIGN. MAILLET, DAVITY, DAPPER, & al. plur. lib. i. c. 17.

* L'E GRAND, ubi sup. p. 280.

<sup>t</sup> TELLEZ, See ALVAREZ, BERMUDEZ, ALMEYDA, MENDEZ,

LEBO, & al. plur.

<sup>w</sup> ALVAREZ, TELLEZ, LOBO, LUDOLPH, CODIGN. & al. sup. citat.

- a order to please the emperor Marcian; and in derision give them the name of Melchites, or Imperialists. The letter of that worthy pontif they brand with no less odious epithets (B); and have had his very name and memory in the greatest abhorrence ever since; whilst they still retain the highest veneration for the arch-heretic Dioscorus, whom they reverence as a very great saint. What is still more surprising is, that they as absolutely disclaim Eutyches, and disown his doctrine as erroneous, though the main difference between them be merely about words; they confessing that the nature of Christ consisted ex duabus, sed non in duabus naturis; that is, composed of two natures, the divine and human; but which being united, became one single nature: whereas Eutyches affirmed the human to be wholly absorbed in the divine*. If we may conjecture at the meaning of this unintelligible distinction from some of their writings<sup>y</sup>, they seem to insist that this compound nature of the divine and human, by this miraculous union, becomes so intirely one, as to partake of all the frailties as well as perfections of both; so that the divine part should become equally passible and sensible of pain and death as the human; which it could not have done, according to their conceit, if the latter had been wholly absorbed in the former: for they do not think that the atonement of Christ, or the Word incarnate, would have been perfect and sufficient, unless both parts, thus inseparably united, had borne their share in his sufferings and death: and for this reason they anathematize both Eutyches, and all that dissent from the doctrine of Dioscorus, whom they extol and reverence above all the saints and martyrs of the church.
- b
- c THIS is the only fundamental error in which they deviate from the catholic faith; in all other cases they join with it; admit of the Nicene, Constantinopolitan, Ephesian, and some other provincial councils: besides which, they have eighty-four other canons in the Arabic language, which had been sent to Jerusalem by the emperor Constantine, about the year 440, and were brought thence to Rome, and translated by Baptista Romanus, a Jesuit, about 1646. This book contains the acts of the synod of the apostles, vulgarly called the apostolical constitutions, said to be written by St. Clement; those of the councils of Ancyra, Cæsarea, Nice, Gangra and Antioch, Laodicea and Sardis, with the acts of 318 fathers, a treatise on the sabbath, with a canon or decree relating to penance; to it is annexed their general liturgy, offices for the communion, holidays, &c. the lives of several saints and martyrs, and hymns in honour of the blessed virgin Mary<sup>z</sup>. They use not the apostle's creed, but only the Ni-
- d cene, which they stile the profession of faith; but, like the Greek church, strike the word filiouque

Great veneration for Dioscorus.
Disclaim the doctrine of Eutyches.

Receive the three first councils.

Use the Nicene creed.

* ALPHONS. MENDEZ, l. i. c. 6. Hist. patriarch. LE GRAND, Dissert. x. LUDOLPH, Comment. TELLEZ, CODIGN, & al. <sup>y</sup> Vid. SANUT. Epist. & MINA's Confess. Fid. in Hist. patriarch. Alexand. p. 360, & seq. Vide LE GRAND, ubi sup. <sup>z</sup> LUDOLPH, lib. iii. c. 47. § 30, & seq.

(B) The reader may see a sketch of the bitterness of those heretics, not only against pope Leo, but against the emperor Marcian, the empress Pulcheria, and the whole Chalcedonic council, and, finally, against all that own its authority, or, like those that convened it, believe that there were two natures in Christ after his incarnation, in the history of the patriarchate of Alexandria; where he will see the following anathemas fulminated against them by spirits pretended to have pronounced them from the sepulchres of the dead.

Maledictus Leo, impius animarum prædator cum impuro tomo suo! Maledictus Marcianus, cum Pulcheria improba, & Chalcedoniensi concilio 630 episcoporum hæreticorum, & quicumque eos suscipit, aut qui in Christo Dei filio duas post unionem naturas agnoscit (3)!

On the other hand, if he would know what exasperated the Alexandrian clergy to that height of resentment, Mr. Ludolph will tell him, that not only that church, but all Ægypt, was miserably divided and torn in pieces by the two factions of Melchites and Jacobites; each of which had a patriarch of their own, who persecuted the opposite side without the least mercy, till at length the latter were obliged to have recourse to the Saracens, who were then invading the country, for protection against the cruelties of the former; who were always too hard for them whilst they were upheld by the Constantinopolitan monarchs. An instance whereof the same author gives us out of an Ethiopic MS. intituled, The Life of the Abbot Samuel; which is as follows:

The emperor had sent 200 men to seize on all the bishops; upon which abbot Paul, who had fled into a desert, was taken by some peasants, and brought back bound. Maxirianus, the officer who was to put the emperor's orders into execution, having caused all the monks to be brought before him by his soldiers, and producing the formulary of faith which he had received from him, laid his commands on them that they should accept it: Credite, says he to them, id quod scriptum est in hoc codice. The formulary, continues the Ethiopic writer, being full of blasphemy, the whole assembly kept such a profound silence as gave the officer cause to think that they would never accept it: upon which, he repeated the same orders a second and a third time, and grew so exasperated at their refusal, that he ordered them to be stripped, and very severely whipped; adding to the rebellious monks, "Do you think that I will spare you, or that I am afraid of shedding your blood? What is the reason that you do not answer me?" At these words, the abba Samuel arose, and, with a noble resolution, becoming a true martyr, spake to him in these terms: "We will neither receive that impure formulary, nor acknowledge the council of Chalcedon; neither do we own any other patriarch than the abba Benjamin for our master." After this, he added, "The Roman emperor is an heretic; and I do here pronounce anathema both against the book you offer to us and the council of Chalcedon, and against all that acknowledge the authority of it." After this, he tore the formulary in pieces, and flung it down at the church door (4).

(3) Hist. patriarch. Alexand. p. 120.

(4) Ludolph, Comment. Hist. Ethiop. p. 462, & seq.

Summary of their faith.

out of the clause which declares the proceſſion of the Holy Ghoſt, as interpolated. But that a which contains the ſummary of all their religion, is that which they call Haymanota Abba, or the faith of the fathers, and eſteem it as of the greateſt authority next to the ſacred books, as being compiled from the homilies of St. Athanaſius, Baſil, John Chryſoſtom, Cyri, Ephre- mius, the four great Gregories, Taumaturgus, Nazianzen, Nyſſen, and Armenius. Tellez adds St. Auſtin; but Mr. Ludolph much doubts whether they know any thing of him or his writings, or of the Latin fathers <sup>a</sup>.

Receive the Old and New Testament, and the apoſtolic conſtitutions.

THEY receive the ſame canonical books, both of the Old and New Teſtament, that we do: the former of them is tranſlated into Ethiopic, from the Greek verſion called the Septuagint <sup>b</sup>; but by whom, or what time, is hard to determine, but moſt probably ſoon after their converſion by Frumentius (C). The latter, or New Teſtament, is likewise tranſlated from the Greek text, but very corruptly, for want of able hands, which they themſelves acknowledge; and allege that as an apology for it (D), and for their faulty editions thereof. They diſpoſe the order of thoſe of the Old Teſtament ſomewhat differently from us, as the reader may ſee in Mr. Ludolph; neither do they make any difference between the canonical and apocryphal, but receive them both alike; only the apocalypſe, or, as they aukwardly ſtile it, the viſion of John Abucalaſe, they looked upon as ſuperadded to the canon. In lieu of which they have the book of apoſtolic conſtitutions lately mentioned, but ſadly mutilated, and, in many reſpects, differing from that we have under that name. Nevertheless, they believe it to be of divine authority, and to have been written by St. Clement, whoſe name they bear. <sup>b</sup>

Hold many ſuperſtitious rites and doctrines.

THE clergy are very little verſed in the ſacred writings, having neither commentators, expoſitors, concordances, nor any other of thoſe helps which are in uſe amongſt us, if we except a few homilies upon ſome ſelect parts of the goſpel, or upon ſome few theological points; and as they never preach nor expound them to the laity, we need not wonder there ſhould reign ſuch a thorough ignorance of them, and ſuch a variety of the groſſeſt ſuperſtition amongſt them both. In theſe they may be juſtly ſaid to come near, if not equal, both the Greek and Roman churches, excepting, as was lately hinted, that they do not admit of any carved images of Chriſt and his ſaints, much leſs of the Deity, in their churches and oratories; adminiſter the communion in both kinds, uſe leavened inſtead of unleavened bread, and believe the real preſence of Chriſt in the ſacrament, without admitting of any tranſubſtantiation of them. In other reſpects they, like them, offer their devotions and prayers to the ſaints, and have proper offices, faſts and feſtivals, in honour, or, as Mr. Ludolph would intimate, in memory of them <sup>d</sup>. But as he owns, that they not only commemorate their virtues, miracles, and other holy actions, particularly their great faſtings and penances, on thoſe days, but offer up fervent prayers to them, pay a religious regard not only to their bones, and other relics, but even their pictures, proſtrate themſelves before, kiſs and rub their foreheads with them, adding ſtill moſt devout ejaculations and other reſpectful geſtures; that nice diſtinction might have been ſpared, and they cannot in any wiſe be ſaid to come behind either of thoſe churches in their dulia, or veneration for the ſaints; and as for that of the virgin Mary, they carry it to ſuch an exceſs as comes little ſhort of a latreia, either in the ſolemn honours they pay to her, the extraordinary attributes they give her, the miracles and unlimited power they aſcribe, the prayers they addreſs to her, or the bloody zeal and fury they

Pray to the ſaints relics.

Highly honour
the Virgin.

<sup>a</sup> Ubi ſup. § 3, & ſeq.
c. 5. § 81.

<sup>b</sup> De hoc, vid. Ant. Hiſt. vol. iv. p. 37 (O). LUDOLPH, ubi ſup.

<sup>d</sup> Lib. iii.

(C) Mr. Ludolph tells us, that he found it aſſerted in one of their martyrologies, that Frumentius himſelf was the tranſlator of thoſe ſacred books; which he yet much queſtions: however, he aſſures us, that it was done from the Alexandrian copy *, which is by far the moſt correct; moſt other copies being very corrupt and faulty. Thoſe of our readers who have not peruſed our antient hiſtory, will be glad to be told that this valuable MS. is now in the king's library, and that the London Polyglot copied it (6).

(D) Thus, at the end of the Acts of the Apoſtles, they add theſe words, Iſta acta apoſtolorum maximâ ſui parte verſa ſunt Romæ à linguâ Romanâ & Græcâ in Ethiopicam, propter defectum archetypi: id quod addidimus aut omiſſimus condonate nobis; vos autem emendate illud (7); that is, Theſe Acts of the Apoſtles were, for the greateſt part, tranſlated out of the Latin and Greek into the Ethiopic tongue, for want of the original. Whatever, therefore, we have added or omitted forgive, and correct with your own hands.

And, under the very title page of the book itſelf, he makes this apology for the incorrectneſs of his Ethiopic impreſſion: "Fathers and brethren, do not paſs too harſh a judgment on the faults of this impreſſion; for thoſe who printed it were as incapable of reading as we were of printing it: ſo that we tried to help one another, as one blind man doth another; and therefore forgive both them and us." This edition, faulty as it is in almoſt every page, the compilers of the Polyglot above-mentioned were obliged to print theirs after, for want of a better.

* Hiſt. Ethiop. l. iii. c. 4. § 2, & ſeq.
§ 11, & ſeq.

(6) Vid. Ant. Hiſt. vol. iv. p. 40.

(7) Ludolph, ubi ſup.

- a display against those who condemn or dislike them for it, calling them the enemies of Mary, and stirring up the people to overwhelm them with stones <sup>c</sup>. If they do not believe a purgatory in the same sense and extent as the Greek and Roman churches do, they nevertheless believe a middle state, in which the departed souls must be purged from their sins, and may be greatly assisted and relieved by the prayers, alms, and penances, of their surviving friends, who seldom fail of performing so charitable, and, as they deem it, meritorious, a duty to them frequently, and with great fervency. And though their priests have no particular office, or, as the Portuguese affect to call it, mass, for the dead, yet they are obliged to make mention of them in their common service, to pray to God to absolve them from their sins, and to make them fit for the joys of heaven. They keep likewise a kind of anniversary of their departure, in which they give plentiful alms, according to their ability, to the priests, monks, and poor, to pray for their souls; and the two former will read over them the whole book of Psalms, from beginning to end, without either doxology or other break, except that they frequently pronounce the word Hallelujah (E). They then recommend those, for whom these alms are given, to the divine mercy; but always take care to join them with all those who have lived and died in the true orthodox faith; without which, they would think it in vain, if not a sin, to pray for them. Thus, though they are much divided in their notions about the true state of the dead, yet they all agree that such prayers, penances, and other charitable duties, will turn greatly to their advantage, if they have not rendered themselves unworthy of it by apostacy or impenitence <sup>f</sup>.
- b Their alms and prayers for the dead.
- c OTHER superstitious ceremonies used at funerals, besides the decent washing of the dead, consist in perfuming the body with incense, and sprinkling it well with holy water; after which, they dress it in a sheet; and if a person of distinction, they cover it with a kind of buff-leather, and lay it on the bier. The bearers then take it, and hurry it away with such surprising swiftness, says abbot Gregory, that the monks and priests, who attend it with their crosses in their hands, and the rest of the retinue, can hardly keep pace with them. When come to the church, or church-yard (for they bury them in either), they again incense it, and throw plenty of holy water upon it. The body is suffered to lie no longer by the side of the grave than whilst the priest reads the fourteen first verses of the gospel of St. John; which done, they do not gently let it down, but shoot it into the ground; the priests all the while repeating some psalms till the body is covered with earth. They go to bewail their dead many days together: their lamentations begin early in the morning, and continue till the evening; the parents, relations, and friends, meeting there every day on the mournful occasion, together with a great number of women mourners, hired to accompany the solemnity with their outcries and lamentations, clapping their hands, smiting their breasts and faces, and uttering the most affecting expressions in a very doleful tone; to all which they add the beat of drums, and such other gestures as they think suitable to the occasion. If the deceased is a person of distinction, his horse, shield, lance, and other accoutrements, are also brought to the place; offerings are made to the church and the clergy, and alms given liberally to the poor, consisting of bread, flesh, and hydromel. This ceremony continues, according to the quality of the person, three, five, seven, twenty, thirty, or even forty days, and is repeated afresh on the anniversary day. During the mournful solemnity, they all pray to God to be merciful to the soul of the person for whose sake all these alms, offerings, and supplications, are made; which plainly shews that they indeed look upon them to be beneficial to the dead, and to procure some rest to them; but by no means proves that they believe a purgatory in the sense in which the church of Rome doth; which, in their doctrine, they absolutely condemn. They express their grief at the news of the death of a friend or relation, and of
- Funeral rites.
- Long mournings and lamentations. Hired mourners.
- <sup>c</sup> TELLEZ, lib. vi. c. 26 & 27. <sup>f</sup> ALVAREZ, TELLEZ, LOBO, LUDOLPH, & al.

(E) Thus, we are told, the whole procession of priests and monks were heard to say at the interment of prince Mark, the emperor Segued's eldest son, not only in the reading of the Psalms, but in other parts of the service; as for instance, Mark is dead, Hallelujah; Dead is Mark, Hallelujah: infomuch that a stranger would be at a loss to guess whether they rejoice or mourn (8), the same words being so often repeated.

In some of their prayers for the dead, one might be induced to think that they had imbibed some of the notions from the Koran concerning the state of the blessed;

as when they pray that God would lead or gather them into his most delicious gardens, where rivers of sweet and living waters flow; that he would introduce them into the delights of the garden of Eden, that they may be ever refreshed with the living waters of paradise; and such-like. But what plainly shews that they borrowed those figurative expressions from the Jews, who not only make use of them at their interments, but cause them to be engraven upon their tomb-stones (9), is, that they seldom fail to add, like them, Let them rest on the bosom of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, &c. (10).

(8) Tellez, l. ii. c. 17. Ludolph, l. iii. c. 6. § 105, & seq. Modena, par. v. c. 8. Munster, & al. Ludolph, ubi sup.

(9) Vide Buxtorf. Synagog. c. 35. Leo de (10) Ibid. Le Grand, Dissert. xiv. p. 345, & seq. Tellez, &

Strange actions at the news of death. their lord, or any of his sons, by such lively tokens as casting themselves on the ground with such violence, that some have beat the breath out of their bodies, others have broke or dislocated some of their bones, or received a considerable injury in some other parts of their bodies: the omission of which would otherwise be interpreted as a mark of disregard or disaffection to the deceased <sup>a</sup>.

The funeral of an emperor. THE funerals of their princes are still more magnificent and solemn, as the reader may judge by that of the emperor Socinius, or, as he is vulgarly called, Segued, and Susneo; a short description of which we shall here subjoin. The body was placed in a square bier, or bed, with steps to ascend to it, which had been made by an Egyptian. It was cloathed in his royal robes, and covered with a pall of rich taffety of several colours, and conveyed from Dancaz, where the imperial camp then was, to the great church called Caneta Jesu, in a town in the kingdom of Gojam. <sup>b</sup> The corpse was preceded by all the imperial standards (F), not inverted as with us in Europe, but upright, and displaying their various colours in the air, but without any arms or devices. On each side of them marched the large kettle-drums, beating in a solemn manner. These were followed by some few of the finest horses which he used to ride upon, with their richest furniture, and attended by the imperial grooms. Next to these came the pages and other servants, carrying the imperial robes, and other ornaments; one his vest, another his sword, and a third his crown; others his sash-beads, javelin, target, &c. These were frequently taken from them by turns, by proper officers, who shewed them to the people, in order to excite their tears: among whom even the empress herself <sup>c</sup> marched a considerable space, wearing his crown upon her head. Both she and her daughters, and other princesses of the blood, with their attendant ladies, rode on mules, with their heads shaved, and a ribband, or slip of white cloth, about two inches broad, tied about them, the ends hanging behind. The remainder of the retinue affected to appear in the most ragged and dirty tatters, as the most expressive marks of real grief and mourning, especially black, and followed in the rear, with their hair likewise cut close.

Burial ceremony. THERE were no candles carried in the procession, nor lighted in the church, as is done in that of the Romish; but much weeping and howling heard in both: at the church-door the corpse was met by six or seven monks, who sung their psalms and hallelujahs till the body was interred. On the next morning, the whole cavalcade returned to Gandaz; and, as soon as they came within sight of the imperial camp, began to marshal themselves in the same order <sup>d</sup> they had gone in the day before, bringing the empty bier with them; by the side of which rode an officer on a mule, clad in the imperial robes, and wearing the imperial crown, an umbrella held over his head, and, in all other respects, representing the deceased emperor. Before him marched another, with that monarch's helmet and javelin, mounted on his best horse and his richest accoutrements. Upon their approaching near Dancaz, they were met by four or five bodies of armed troops, and other persons of rank belonging to the court, who received them with the loudest acclamations of grief, and proceeded with them to the new emperor's pavilion. Here again they renewed their lamentations for the deceased, all the time they were alighting, when some of the first ministers of state, and other noblemen, attended by Diego de Mattos, and father Emanuel de Almeyda, who gives this relation of that ceremony, entered the large tent where Faciludus, the new emperor, was, continued the same mournful lamentations near the space of two hours; which being ended, the whole ceremony was turned into loud acclamations and congratulatory prayers for the new monarch, who was crowned soon after with the usual ceremony, formerly described <sup>e</sup>.

Renew their lamentations before the new emperor, and then congratulate him. IN other respects the same prayers, offerings, alms, anniversaries, and other fundamental rites, are performed to the deceased monarchs, which, we have observed, are done to the rest, only in a much higher degree: but, if we except the pomp and grandeur, the greatest regard is paid to such of their monks as die, as the common phrase is, with the greatest odour of sanctity, either for their uncommon piety and zeal, or more especially for their extraordinary penances and mortifications. To such as these they pay so superstitious a veneration <sup>f</sup> as comes little short of what the Romish church do to their canonized saints, excepting only that they neither rear altars nor statues in honour of them. They visit their sepulchres,

<sup>a</sup> ALVAREZ, TELLEZ, LUDOLPH, & al.

<sup>b</sup> See before, p. 210, & seq. Vide & auct. sup. citat.

(F) These, we are told, are of two sorts; the one, which they call Sandecas, are long poles or staves, beautifully coloured, with a gilt metal ball on the top, under which they wave their little banners, about a foot square; the other are like standards, of white cloth or silk, intermixed with red stripes in the middle, but, in all other respects, quite plain and unornamented either with coats of arms, or any other emblems or devices (11).

(11) Tellez, lib. v. c. 37. Ludolph, lib. iv. c. 4. § 29, & seq.

- a recommend themselves to their prayers, make long pilgrimages, give alms and offerings in honour of them, and translate their bones from one place to another, especially to preserve them from being insulted by any of the Gallas, Agaus, or other barbarous nations that surround them; and even institute festivals in honour of such translations<sup>1</sup>. Translate their bones.

THEY extend their veneration for the angelic hierarchies also to invocation, on account of their guardianship and ministry to the living. Those they divide into nine degrees or orders, viz. angels, archangels, lords, κυριοι, magistrates, ἀρχαι, thrones, princes, powers, cherubim, and seraphim; to which some add a tenth, viz. of those who, for their apostacy, were driven out of heaven, and became devils, and enemies to mankind. But to none of the former do they address any prayers, or pay any other than a great veneration, excepting the angelic, under whose immediate tuition they look upon themselves as more particularly consigned by the Divine Providence<sup>k</sup>. Pray to angels.

THOUGH they hold but two sacraments, properly so called, as necessary to salvation (what-ever some of their writings may intimate of their calling the Trinity, incarnation, &c. by that name) (G), viz. Baptism and the Holy Communion, father Tellez adds three more to the number, viz. ordination, penance, and marriage; but owns, with the author last quoted, that they are very ignorant both of the matter and form of administering them; and that they know nothing of the other two, viz. confirmation and extreme unction. But, for this, both he and his Portuguese brethren have been censured, as dunces of more zeal than knowledge, by some French authors of the same fraternity, with no less warmth, and with as little reason, as the reader may see by what hath been said in the last note, and what has been said in the foregoing chapter, in speaking of the rites of the Coptic church<sup>l</sup>. Hold only two sacraments.

THEY hold baptism to be necessary to salvation; that it ought to be administered by a priest, and performed by a threefold immersion, if the infant is capable of bearing it without danger of its life; if not, the threefold aspersion of water over the whole naked body is reckoned sufficient. The first immersion is made only of one-third of the body, in the name of the Father; the second of two-thirds of the body, or up to the breast, in the name of the Son; and the last is of the whole body, over head and ears, in the name of the Holy Ghost. If the child is only sprinkled, it is done in the same form and order. Thus far they follow the antient rule; but they have since added some other superstitious ceremonies, unknown to the primitive church; as, first, the anointing the whole body, especially every joint of it Baptism how conferred.
Sacred unction and communion given at the same time.

<sup>1</sup> See LUDOLPH's Calendar of their Saints, lib. iii. c. 6. § 96, & seq.

<sup>l</sup> See before, p. 44, & seq.

<sup>k</sup> Id. ibid. c. 5. § 85, & seq.

(G) When the physician Poncet was sent ambassador into Abissinia by the court of France, he was charged, we are told *, to make the strictest enquiry he could into the religion of that country; and how far, and in what essential points, the Coptic differed from the Roman church. And this, he himself tells us, he had frequent opportunities to do, by often conversing with the emperor, the abbots, and others of the clergy (13). Soon after this, that monarch, who was then courting the French king's friendship, sent him a letter, in which, among other things, he gives him a long account of the Abissinian faith. And speaking of their five sacraments, or, as he styles them, according to the true meaning of the Greek word, mysteries, he says, the first of them is the description of the most holy Trinity, the second that of the incarnation of the Son of God, the third baptism, the fourth the holy eucharist, and the fifth the resurrection of the dead.

This letter, which the reader will find published among the Dissertations of Mr. Le Grand, printed at Paris 1728 (14), as a confession of that monarch's faith, whether genuine or counterfeited, as it is supposed by many, from the strangeness of its theology, the lame manner in which the mysteries of Christianity are handled and explained, and the badness of the French translation, doth however give us a moral assurance, that the Abissinians do not hold the same seven sacraments that the church of Rome doth, and as a late French Jesuit hath endeavoured to maintain, in plain opposition to all the Portuguese missionaries (15); and, 2. That they have a quite different notion of that word, and a very imperfect one of what the schools call the matter and form of a sacrament; which is what all the Portuguese fathers justly charge them with. Should we suppose that missive letter forged, and falsely ascribed to the monarch, for some private ends, yet it is natural to think that the contrivers would take care to be well informed of the faith and practice of this church; seeing any mistake or deviation, especially so great a one as this, would soon destroy the credit of the letter, and lay the forgery open to the world.—Whereas there is hardly any material article in that piece, but what we find confirmed by one or more of the Portuguese writers, from their own knowledge.

The truth is, the French Jesuit, above quoted, who, by his long abode in Egypt, might be thoroughly informed of the faith and practice of the Coptic church, opposes the relations of the Abissinian missionaries, only because they are contrary to what he had observed to be practised among the Copts in Egypt, supposing that there was a perfect uniformity between them;—whereas, in fact, there is, in many cases, a manifest difference between them, as will be seen in the sequel: so that nothing can be justly urged from the practice of the one against that of the other.

* Vide La Croze Hist. du Christianisme d'Ethiopie, p. 85.

(14) Lettre missive, p. 451, & seq.

p. 313, & seq.

(15) Poncet, Engl. edit. p. 74, & seq.

(15) Du Bernat. Lettre ad Fleurian, ap. Le Grand, Dissertat. xi.

from head to foot, with the holy chryfma, or, as they call it, Meyron (H), which is a most costly mixture of sweet oil, balm, and other odoriferous drugs and gums, made and blessed in a most solemn manner by the patriarch himself, and by him dispersed among the bishops and clergy, to be used immediately after the third immersion; without which they do not think the baptism perfect or valid. The next thing they do is the administering the holy communion to the child, in both kinds; which is done by dipping a bit of the consecrated bread into the wine, and applying it to the child's lips; though some priests content themselves with dipping the tip of their finger into the cup, and putting it into its mouth. And as they keep no consecrated elements by them, if the child chance to be baptized in the afternoon, the mother, or, if she is not able to be present, her deputy, must stay with it in the church till next morning, when new ones are consecrated; for this they likewise believe to be of the same importance with the unction, to render the baptism effectual <sup>m</sup>.

Other rites relating to it.

THEY admit of godfathers; but whether under the notion of sponsors, or only to present them at the font and at the communion-table, which is one part of their office, we are not told. Some other superstitious rites they observe, such as lighting of candles, exorcisms, blessing of the water, throwing salt, meyron, and holy oil, into it, and intermixing prayers suitable to each, reading of the gospels, and some others not worth dwelling upon; especially as we find such various accounts of them among our authors, that unless we admit, that one part of the Coptic, or even of the Abissinian, church differs from another, and as probably, perhaps, one age from another, we shall hardly know which of them to believe before the other (I).

<sup>m</sup> ALVAREZ, TELLEZ, LOBO, CODIGN. LUDOLPH, & al.

(H) They use two sorts of unctions; the one with this Meyron, Μυρον, which is so costly, and made with such solemnity, that our author tells us that ceremony had not been performed for twenty years, when the Alexandrian patriarch renewed it, anno 1703, during his abode there; at which were present a great number of bishops, abbots, priests, and deacons, who were all chanting the prayers, psalms, and other portions of Scripture, whilst the prelate was mixing the several ingredients, which took up almost the whole day. Their emperors, at their coronation, are anointed with it, and so is every one that is baptized according to the rite of the Coptic church. Our author adds, that it cost the person who defrayed the charge of the last composition above 1,000 crowns.

The other unction is made only with holy oil, with which the vessels which held the old Meyron have been rinsed, or into which a few drops are poured by the patriarch, and is therefore less costly; and, when spent, every priest hath power to consecrate a new supply of it for his own use; whereas the former can only be consecrated by the patriarch of the church. This inferior sort, which they call Galileum, is likewise used in baptism, and in much greater quantity, as they make but six unctions with the first, and thirty-six with the latter. Both are accompanied with proper prayers and other exorcisms (17), which we need not dwell upon, as we have good reason to question whether the Abissine church is so exact and punctilious in these matters as that of Egypt; about which see the following note.

(I) Thus, for instance, Alvarez tells us, that in his time there were hardly any fonts or baptisteries, nor any immersions, used in the baptism of infants; but that their godfathers held their naked bodies a little reclined, whilst the priest poured the water over it three times, with the usual form of, I baptize thee, &c. Whilst others give us a long detail of the immersion, and affirm it to be universally practised, as well as the unction, communion, and other ceremonies attending it (18).

Again, we are told, that many priests, either through ignorance, or in compliance to some old illicit custom, made use of a different form of baptism than that prescribed by Christ and the primitive church; and, instead of, I baptize thee in the name of the Father, &c. said, I baptize thee in the waters of Jordan (19).

But this dissonance is not confined to the Portuguese and French writers; we find it no less frequent among the Abissinians themselves; against whom the judicious jesuit Codignus, among many other authors who have made the same complaint, adds this severe, though just, reflection:

Scio Teklum Mariam Abassinum monachum, de quo dicam infra, in recensendis suorum erroribus, sic à Zagazabo, adeo discrepasse, adcoque in hac re malè inter se convenire Abassinos, qui apud nos sunt, ut Thomas à Jesu, in thesauro suo, de Abassinis, agens eorumque ex variis autoribus ritus referens, merito dicat difficile esse de his rebus certum aliquid definire. Idem ego jure possem dicere nisi hæc quæ hic propono ex ipsis patrum nostrorum qui in Abassia degunt, omniaque habent perspecta cognovissem literis (20).

Another author tells us, with relation to baptism, that the Abassins have been unjustly charged with repeating their baptism, because they all go and wash themselves in ponds and rivers on Epiphany day, in memory of our Saviour's baptism, repeating certain prayers; the priests also assisting at the ceremony: and Poncet, who saw the same performed, adds, that the emperor had caused a spacious basin to be made for that purpose, for his own and household's use, and represents it only as an ablution in memory of our Saviour's baptism, and by which they hope to be washed from their sins (21).—Notwithstanding which, this innocent custom hath been strongly urged as a plain proof of their reiterating the sacrament of baptism, because they have done so upon some occasions of a quite different nature (22). From all which instances, our readers may see how difficult it is to come at any certainty concerning these momentous points of their faith and practice, either from their own accounts, or from those of foreign writers.

(17) Vide Bernat, Letter to Father Fleurian. Vide & Le Grand, Dissert. xi. p. 313, & seq. apud Tellez, ubi supra.

(19) Vide Le Grand, Dissert. xi. de baptis. p. 317.

(18) Itinerar.

(20) Codign. l. i. c. 35.

(21) Uretta, ap. eund. Poncet, Engl. p. 69. Vide Le Grand, ubi sup.

(22) Alfons. Mendez, l. ii. c. 33. n. 4. Codign. ubi sup. & al.

- a HOWEVER that be, the fathers missionaries, after they had gained the emperor Segued's favour, and brought him over to their church, found so many faults, whether real or not, in the manner and form of the Abissinian priests administering that sacrament, that they easily persuaded him to order it to be reiterated; and accordingly great numbers came, and were re-baptized by them, to the great scandal of the whole people, both clergy and laity, though the ceremony was performed conditionally; that is, with these words, If thou art not baptized (that is, regularly and effectually so), I baptize thee, &c. for the very calling the validity of their baptism in question, so exasperated the nation, that it hastened their total expulsion; and the new emperor Facilidas, or Basilides, made that bold affronting step a matter of heavy complaint and reproach against the then Roman patriarch, Alphonso Mendez, in his decree for their expulsion; accusing them to have rebaptized his subjects, as if they had been heathens and publicans, notwithstanding the small difference there was between their two churches<sup>a</sup>. Which expressions we may reasonably suppose, with Mr. Ludolph, that monarch would hardly have urged against them, if the Abissinian church had been guilty of that other error with which they brand it; viz. the reiterating of baptism; a charge founded merely on the ceremony mentioned in the last note, of a general washing on the feast of Epiphany, in honour of our Saviour's baptism. But here it will not be amiss to repeat what the good father Alvarez says of it, and upon it; because it will at once convince our readers of the great advantage they made of the emperor Segued's weakness and compliance to them. His words are these:
- b "ON the 4th of January 1521, the Presbyter John, that is, the emperor, ordered us to transport our tents to a place where he had caused a large pond or basin of water to be made, to be baptized, according to custom, on the ensuing Epiphany. As soon as we were come thither, we were asked whether we would not be baptized? To which I answered, We have been so already, and cannot be so again. The ambassador, however, and some of his retinue added, that they would do as the king pleased: upon which I was again invited to do so; but answered as I had done before. They then asked, whether any water should be brought into our tents, since we cared not to go into the pond; which the ambassador agreed to, expecting to have seen some great sight; but was disappointed; nothing that was done there being either pleasing or decent.
- d "THE Abissinian priests repaired thither in great numbers, on the eve, and sang the whole night. To bless the pond, they threw holy water into it; and the king, arriving about midnight, was the first that was baptized, with his queen, and the abuna Mark. On the next morning, the Portuguese were invited to come nearer the water, that they might have a fuller view of the whole ceremony. Alvarez came and placed himself over-against the king. The pond was square, surrounded with planks, and covered with waxen cotton cloth, and one went into the water by six steps. The water was conveyed into it by a pipe, strained through a sack that was tied to the mouth of it. The croud was very great; and an old man, who had been his majesty's preceptor, stood in the water up to his shoulders, and plunged the heads of every one that came to him, using these words, I baptize thee in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. They were all stark naked, without any the least covering; and those of a middle size went down but four or five steps. The king called the Portuguese to him, and asked Alvarez what he thought of that ceremony; who readily answered, that it could neither be rectified nor justified by any thing but a good intention; seeing the council of Nice, which was equally acknowledged by the Abissine and Roman churches, allowed but of one baptism. But what must be done with returning apostates, replied the king, in order to reconcile them to the church? He that believes, and is baptized, answered our Portuguese, shall be saved; and he that believeth not, shall be damned. We ought to instruct and pray for these apostates, and, if they will not return, burn them alive: but if any of them comes full of grief and shame for his apostacy, and begs for mercy and pardon, the abuna ought to absolve him, and impose a suitable penance at the same time, unless he think it much better to turn him over to the pope, in whom alone is lodged the whole power of the church. He added, that if they refused to be converted, they ought to be committed to the flames, as is practised by the whole Roman church."
- e THIS whole discourse, it seems, highly pleased the king; who, in excuse for that ceremony, told Alvarez, that his grandfather had instituted it, by the advice of some of his most able and learned divines, in order to prevent so many souls, who had fallen from God, from being utterly lost. From this account, allowing it to be as genuine as it is lame and imperfect with regard to what it is brought in to prove, viz. a reiteration of baptism, we would beg leave to observe, that it was, at the most, but a modern institution, and of no

Reiterated, at the persuasion of the jesuits.

Ill consequences of that step.

Washing on Epiphany day, whether a reiteration of baptism.

Alvarez's account of it.

The emperor and the court assist at it.

An old man baptizes those that come.

Alvarez's opinion of it.

The emperor's reply to it.

This custom no reiteration of baptism, but a Jewish ablution.

<sup>a</sup> Id. ibid, LE GRAND, Dissert. xi.

<sup>b</sup> ALVAREZ, Itinerar. LE GRAND, Dissert. xi. TELLEZ, LUDOLPH.

longer standing than two or three generations, and not the practice of the antient Abissinian a church. 2. That the dipping of the penitents that offer themselves, and the form of words, I baptize thee, &c. is no-where else, that we can find by other authors, practised in the whole empire, but in this place; they every-where else going indifferently into the next river, pond, &c. men and women, without regard to decency, and only washing themselves, and uttering a few prayers, and, if we will believe their own confession, only in memory of our Saviour's baptism in the river Jordan <sup>p</sup>. 3. That, even from the king's own words, it was only instituted in the behalf of such as had apostatized from the faith: for, among those vast crouds that went into the king's pond or bason, we do not find that the good old man baptized any but such as offered themselves to him; and those might be of the apostate kind: and who knows how many of them might not be of the number of those who had gone over b to the church of Rome, and, having repented of their defection, came to reap the benefits of this new-invented expedient? For it is not said, neither can it be supposed, that the old man could perform the ceremony on those vast multitudes that went into the water, in so short a time as twelve hours; for it began at midnight, and ended at noon. 4. We have elsewhere observed, that the Abissinians observed a great number of Jewish rites <sup>q</sup>; one of which, among the latter, was this of washing and immersion, upon every kind of defilement, whether natural or accidental: all of which might be properly called, in a large sense, so many baptisms, according to the true meaning of the word. It is, therefore, far from being improbable that the Abissinian church might have instituted this general one with the same view at first, and deemed it the more efficacious towards the washing away all such pol- c lutions, by its being ordered to be performed on the day on which Christ's baptism was commemorated; and all this without once dreaming of its ever being misinterpreted as a reiteration of the baptismal sacrament. And if the repetition of the form was afterwards enjoined in favour of returning apostates in Segued's grandfather's reign, it can only be looked upon as an innovation introduced, perhaps, in imitation of some antient churches and fathers, who thought that such apostates could not be reconciled to the church without being rebaptized; for we find accordingly, that, after the total expulsion of the missionaries out of the empire, an order was issued out for a general rebaptization, to wash away all the sins and defilements which had been contracted by the late defection to the church of Rome, during the preceding reign *. But this, whether we stile it an ablution or a baptism, is no more the d true antient practice of the Abissinian church, than those marks which are branded with a red-hot iron on the foreheads and noses of the Abissinians are of their being baptized with fire (K); with which practice, nevertheless, that church hath been unjustly taxed, but fully cleared since by several learned authors <sup>r</sup>; that being only a custom common to Mohammedans and heathens, as well as Ethiopians, and designed as a caustic, to prevent their children being troubled with catarrhs, and other defluxions on the eyes, and in no sense an act of religion. Thus much may suffice with respect to this article of baptism; on which if we have dwelt somewhat longer, we hope the reader will not be displeased at it; seeing there was no other way of setting it in a true light, from the different accounts which so many writers have given us of it, and much less from the misrepresentations and calumnies which have been c raised against the Abassine church, on account of their pretended reiteration, and other abuses, of that sacred rite.

In favour of apostates, falsely supposed to be annual.

Baptism by fire.

No confirmation joined with baptism.

WE have already shewn from father Tellez, Mr. Ludolph, and others <sup>s</sup>, that the Abissinians neither allow of confirmation nor extreme unction; yet such is the partiality of some of the Romish, especially the French writers, that, in order to find out their seven sacraments among them, they have, with much subtlety, endeavoured to blind the world with the notion, that the unction which they use in their baptism, viz. that of the chrysm or meyron, is in lieu, or rather is that very sacrament <sup>t</sup>; the fallacy of which must appear to all unbiassed persons, on the following considerations. 1. That the church of Rome uses the same unction by their chrysm in their baptism of infants, without looking upon it as any part of confirmation. f 2. It enjoins the latter to be administered to adult persons, who are able to give an account of their faith, and to take these baptismal engagements upon themselves; whereas the Abissinians bestow the unction on infants, who are incapable of either. 3. The form and prayers used in

<sup>p</sup> See PONCET, p. 89. LUDOLPH, & al.

c. 33 § 4.

fid. tom. iv. c. 84. ALVAREZ, ubi sup. & al.

<sup>t</sup> Vide BERNAT's Letter to Fleurian, LE GRAND, Dissert. xi. & al.

<sup>q</sup> See before, p. 218, & seq.

* ALF. MENDEZ, l. ii.

<sup>r</sup> Vide int. al. CODIGN. l. i. c. 35. LUDOLPH, l. iii. c. 6. n. 41, 42. RENAUDOT, perpetuit.

<sup>s</sup> Vide & CODIGN. ALZEVADO, ALF. MENDEZ, & al. mult.

(K) Reperi, says Codignus, apud antiquos historicos ex veterum imperatorum instituto apud hanc gentem positum in more baptisati pueruli in fronte quædam inurere stigmata: id vero adeo stricte observari, ut si quis absque illo signo deprehendatur, libertatem amittat, fiatque imperatoris mancipium (23).

(23) Codign. de reb. Abassin. lib. i. c. 35, p. 213.

a the unction, which the curious reader may see in the margin (L), plainly shew it to be the same, and performed with the same view as that which the Roman priests use it, and is by both churches enjoined as a constituent part of baptism.—To all these if we add, that neither the Abissinian rituals nor catechisms mention any thing of confirmation, much less have any set form for performing it, we shall easily perceive how vain it is to seek for any such thing as the Romish confirmation in Abissinia, or for what Father Bernat so peremptorily affirms, that confirmation immediately follows baptism in their church, any more than it doth in his own<sup>u</sup>.

WE have already mentioned their manner of confessing and receiving penance and absolution from their priests, or the Abuna<sup>w</sup>; but though they allow the necessity of both, than which nothing can be a more plain proof than the multitudes and frequency of penitents attending at the church-doors, and the bundles of olive rods that are constantly set there for that use, yet it doth not appear, that they have ever given that rite the title of a sacrament, or look upon it any otherwise than as a preparatory qualification for that of the holy communion. Neither are they over-hasty in obliging young people to come to either, seeing they look upon all the sins they commit before they are arrived at twenty years of age little more or less than slips of youth, for which they will not be called to an account<sup>x</sup>. And herein, again, it is plain, that they do not follow the canons of the Coptic church, which obliges them to come to confession and communion, at, or soon after, the age of ten, from which time they begin to observe the fasts of the church<sup>y</sup>; but are much more remiss in their discipline; which is no wonder, considering the ignorance and corruption of manners which we have observed to reign through the whole empire, from the Abuna down to the very lowest of the clergy<sup>z</sup>. It is therefore impertinent in our late French Jesuits<sup>a</sup>, to be ever objecting the canons and rituals of the Coptic church, and to infer from thence, that the faith and practice of that of Abissinia must be, in every age, conformable to it, when almost every thing we read of them in the Portuguese Fathers, who were most of them eye-witnesses of what they wrote, and cannot be suspected of want of zeal for their church, convinces us of the contrary (M).

Penance no sacrament.

Confessions begin very late.

The Abissinian church is not in all things conformable to the Coptic.

WE

<sup>u</sup> LE GRAND, ubi sup. p. 321.

<sup>w</sup> See before, p. 224.

<sup>x</sup> TELLEZ, LUDOLPH, l. iii. c. 6. §.

57. <sup>y</sup> RENAUDOT, Perpetuit. Fid. BERNAT, ubi sup. PONCET, p. 85.

<sup>z</sup> See before, p. 225, &

alib. pass. <sup>a</sup> DE BERNAT, ubi sup. LE GRAND, Dissert. xii.

(L) In this ceremony, the child being held naked before the priest who baptizes it, he takes, with the tip of his finger, a small quantity of the mevron, or holy chrysm, and begins with anointing the forehead cross-wise, with these words, "The chrysm of grace and of the Holy Ghost;" the mouth and nose next, whilst he says, "The chrysm, pledge of the kingdom of heaven." To that of the ears he says, "The chrysm of fellowship and eternal and immortal life." At the unction of the in and outside of the hands, he says, "The holy unction of Christ our God, and indelible character." On the breast he says, "The perfection of grace of the Holy Ghost, and shield of the true faith." To the knees and elbows he says, "I anoint you with holy chrysm, in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost." And concludes every period with Amen.

Now this being almost the very same form and manner in which this unction is performed at the baptism of infants in the Romish church, with this only difference, that in this last the priest anoints the child a second time with his spittle, and hath his clerk attending to say the Amen for him, how could it enter into any man's head to affirm it to be only a part of baptism in the one, and confirmation in the other? or what is there in the form of words of the ceremony, that hath the least resemblance to the Romish confirmation, as is pretended by those French authors (23)?

Add to this, that the long prayer, which he afterwards repeats by way of conclusion, the giving them the holy communion, setting the crown on their head, and the blessing he gives to them and the bystanders, are all alike parts of the baptismal office, and so set down in their rituals and liturgy, without any mention of confirmation (24).

(M) We have such pregnant instances of this remissness, not only on the side of the Abissinian, but of the Alexandrian church, with regard to this article of penance and confession, as plainly shew that their practice was far enough from keeping pace with their canons; in-somuch that, partly through the abuses that had crept into the latter, and partly through the unreasonable penances that were frequently imposed on the laity, three of their patriarchs used their most strenuous endeavours to abolish that rite, one after another. These were John, the son of Abulfeta, Mark, the son of Zabru, and John the son of Abulgateb, who had so far gained their point, that it was brought into an almost total disuse; when Mark, the son of Alkombari, a prelate no less zealous for it than they were against it, set up for a strenuous advocate for it; and though, in other respects, a person far from being irreprehensible in his conduct, brought a good number of people back again to it (25).

By this time, they had fallen into a strange expedient for supplying that defect: so that, instead of the usual confession, the priest went with his censer round the church, and fumigated the whole congregation, who, on their part, cried out with one consent, "I have sinned," whilst he, on his, went about uttering some prayers for their pardon; and this served instead of confession, penance, and absolution.

This was not the worst; for, in many countries, the people had even disused this ceremony, and had substituted another in lieu of it, no less ridiculous, and confessed and absolved themselves at home, by fumigating themselves with incense and other odoriferous gums, thrown into a pan of coals, and uttering their confession over the smoke of it (26). We need not here observe to our readers, how opposite that practice is to the pretence

(23) Renaudot, perpetuit. fid. tom. v. p. 65, & seq. Bernat, Letter to Father Fleuri, Le Grand, Dissert. xi. de baptism. & confirmat. Abissin. p. 273, & seq. (24) Vide Ritual. & offic. Baptism. Ethiop. Latin. edit. Rom. Co-dign. l. i. c. 35, & alibi. Tellez, Ludolph, & al. sup. citat. (25) Hist. Patriarch. Alexandr. (26) Le Grand, Dissert. xii. de Eucharist. et Penit. p. 329, et seq.

Consecration of the holy chrysm.

The people join the priest with more devotion.

The holy communion not given out of the church.

WE have already taken notice of their belief concerning the other sacrament, that of the Lord's Supper, and of their manner of celebrating and administering it to the people.—The two Jesuits above-mentioned have furnished us with several clauses of that office out of the Coptic liturgy, which plainly intimate not only a real presence, but a real change of the sacred elements into the body and blood of Christ; from which they would infer, that they believe their doctrine of transubstantiation in fact, though not in terminis<sup>b</sup>: and though we have already shewn, that their profession and practice are quite opposite to such a belief<sup>c</sup>, yet we think our English readers will not be displeased to see some of the principal prayers made use of in their form of consecration, subjoined in the margin (N), as will enable them at once to judge of their belief concerning this important point, and, at the same time, shew them the excellency of the Coptic liturgy, and manner of celebration of this divine office, above that of the church of Rome. In the former, he will hear the officiating prelate, or priest, exhorting the congregation with a loud voice, and in a language well understood by them, to join their prayers with his through the whole ceremony, and them, in the same loud tone, professing their readiness to do so; when he declares to them, that the bread he hath blessed is Christ's body, broken for the remission of sins, they immediately answer, Amen, Amen, Amen, and confessing their belief of its being really so, and blessing God for it; and so on through the rest of the office<sup>d</sup>. Whereas, at the Roman mass, whether high or low, sung or said, the whole office of consecration is celebrated by the priest alone, and with such a low voice as not to be heard, much less joined in, or answered, by the people, who are perhaps running over their beads, or praying to some favourite saint, during the whole solemn ceremony: so that the main difference between the Abissinians and Romanists, with regard to the celebration of those holy mysteries, chiefly consists in this, that, among the former, none but priests and deacons are admitted into the choir or chancel, and consequently do not see how the service is performed, but hear and understand every prayer and thanksgiving that is sung or chaunted in it, and answer to each in their turn: whereas, among the latter, the laity sees every thing that is done at the altar, but neither hear what is said, nor for the most part, rightly understand what is meant by any part of that office. Both may have been designed to excite a deeper regard in the laity for that solemn rite; but it will require no depth of thought to judge which of the two is most likely to do so in the most rational way. All that we shall add, with respect to the holy communion, is, that it never is to be celebrated any-where but at church; not even the emperor himself having the privilege to have the consecrated elements brought to him, upon any emergency or pretence, much less to have them consecrated at home, or any-where but in the choir or chancel of the church: neither have they any stated times for the administration of it to the clergy or people; they being left at liberty to receive it oftener or seldomer, as best suits with their devotion, provided the office be performed once a day in every church by a priest, assisted by a subpresbyter, deacon, subdeacon, and one or two inferior attendants or servants<sup>e</sup>.

<sup>b</sup> Id. ibid. p. 326, & seq.

<sup>c</sup> See before, p. 227, & seq.

<sup>d</sup> Vid. Liturg. Copt. vers. Rom. Ludolph, l. iii. c. 5, & 6, pass. Le Grand, ubi sup. Dissert. xii. p. 326, & seq.

<sup>e</sup> Id. ibid.

of their looking upon that rite as a sacrament; but this we cannot forbear observing upon the whole, that neither the patriarch above-mentioned, nor any of those that strove to revive it, either in Egypt or Abissinia, ever did, that we can find, insist upon its being one, in order to reduce the people to the practice of it; but, on the contrary, when the Portuguese missionaries came first into these parts, they all unanimously complained of this abuse still existing among the clergy and laity, and of the great difficulty they found to bring their proselytes into their opinion concerning it (27).

(N) According to the Coptic ritual, the priest in office hath no sooner pronounced aloud the words of consecration, "This bread is my body, which is broken for you," &c. than the whole congregation express their assent with three loud Amens, and add, in the same high tone, "We believe it, we are sure of it, and praise thee for it, and verily believe that this is thy body."—In like manner, to the words of consecration of the wine, "This cup is my blood," &c. they unanimously answer "Amen, it is verily thy blood, and we believe it to be so." The priest goes on, "Do this in remembrance of me," and they answer, "Lord, we shew forth thy death, we believe thy resurrection and ascension, and

"expect thy second coming." After he hath finished the prayer of consecration and breaking of the bread, the subdeacon and people answer, "The hosts of angels stand up before the Saviour of the world, and round about the body and blood of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ; let us draw near with faith before the face of our Lord, and worship him."

In giving the bread to the communicants, which he doth after he hath received it himself, he says, "This is the bread of life which came down from heaven, and is verily the body of Emanuel, our God, Amen." To which the receiver says Amen. "This is the cup of salvation (or of life) which came down from heaven, and is the precious blood of Christ, Amen." To which the receiver answers Amen, Amen. The same they do at the end of the public prayer, thanksgiving, and blessing, which conclude the holy action. From this short sketch of the Coptic communion-office, compared with that of the Roman mass, our reader will easily perceive to which of the two the preference ought to be given, either with regard to public edification, or nearest approach to the practice of the primitive church. The reader may see the remainder of that holy office in the Coptic ritual; and in the authors quoted below (28).

(27) Alvarez, Tellez, Codign. Ludolph, & al. de Eucharist. p. 326, & seq.

(28) Ludolph, l. iii. c. 5, & 6. pass. Le Grand, Diss. xii.

- a THE Coptic church hath had, from time immemorial, a rite for anointing the sick, with a particular oil, different from the Meyron and Galilaum, formerly mentioned, but blessed with great solemnity by the priest; which rite is observed also in Abissinia, in conformity to the precept in the Gospel<sup>f</sup>; pursuant to which, they interpret the term sick, as including all the diseases of the body, mind, and soul, even down to madmen and demoniacs. It is, however administered, as in the church of Rome, at the last extremity, and when the patient is past all hopes of recovery; upon which account it is called extreme unction: nor is it conveyed to them in their houses, when they lie in the last agonies in their beds, but only in their churches; to which they must either repair or be carried, before it can be administered to them. They have added sundry superstitious ceremonies to that antient rite; such as having seven priests to assist at it, lighting a lamp with seven wicks, whose oil being blessed by holy water, signs of the cross, prayers, incense, and processioning, is made fit for anointing the person with, who is to walk or be carried from the church-doors, where the ceremony begins, to the altar, where the unction and blessing conclude it. From all which circumstances, and many others less worth taking notice of, it plainly appears to be a quite different rite from the Romish extreme unction; and much more so, when we are told by the Portuguese missionaries<sup>g</sup>, that they never saw any thing like this performed in Abissinia. So that we shall give ourselves no further trouble in confuting those French Jesuits, who, with more sophistry than truth, have endeavoured to make it appear not only one and the same rite, but to be held both by the Coptic and Abissinian church as one of the pretended seven sacraments they have in common with the Romish church<sup>h</sup>. As to the other two, ordination and marriage, which the same authors have crowded amongst them, to make their number complete, we shall refer our readers to what hath been said already upon those two heads<sup>i</sup>.
- b We have now gone through the most material branches of the Abissinian religion, not only with regard to their faith and practice, but likewise to the most remarkable errors and superstitions. We might indeed have dwelt much longer on the last of these articles, had it been worth our readers while to be acquainted with all the various branches into which they are reported to have sunk, partly through the ignorance of their clergy, and partly from their own natural proneness to it, above all Christian churches, if we may credit all that hath been written and urged against them, particularly with regard to the great number of superstitious customs which they have imbibed from the Jews, and still retain to this day. Neither shall we need to wonder much at it, considering the ignorance in which both clergy and laity are brought up, and the little benefit they have from schools and books of divinity, when we compare them with the many heathenish ones that have, from less excusable motives, been introduced into other churches, which yet abounded with all those great helps, of which they are unhappily deprived. We cannot therefore close this section more fitly, than by giving our reader some short account of the manner in which they educate and instruct their youth. It may well be wondered, that so vast an empire as that of Abissinia, in which Christianity had been planted so many centuries, if not from the earliest times of the apostles<sup>k</sup>, and which swarms with such numbers of monks and priests, should have been so negligent of the instruction of youth, as to have neither universities nor even public schools to breed them up, if not in other kinds of learning, at least in the fundamentals of religion. And one would be rather inclined to credit the fabulous account of the Dominican friar, who gives us the most pompous detail of their noble academies, learned libraries, and public schools, founded in every city and town by the old Abissinian monarchs and nobles for that very intent (O), and still flourishing in his time, did not the concurrent testimony of so many eye-witnesses
- c
- d
- e

<sup>f</sup> MARK vi. 7—13. JAMES v. 14. <sup>g</sup> De hoc, vide CODIGN. l. i. c. 35. TELLEZ, l. i. c. 31. ALF. MEND. & al. Vide LUDOLPH, Comment. p. 267, & alib. <sup>h</sup> BERNAT & LE GRAND, ubi sub. Diss. xiii.

<sup>i</sup> See before, p. 241, & seq.

<sup>k</sup> See before, p. 221, & seq.

(O) Among other romantic fables, which that monkish trifler so confidently reports, the description of the imperial library, and treasury of the Holy Cross, may well pass for one of the greatest pieces of forgery that is to be met with among all his fellow writers. His words are to this effect (29):

“The library and treasury of the emperor are two rare pieces, whereon wonder may justly fix her eye; neither of which are to be matched in all the world. The library of Constantinople, which contained 120,000 volumes, or that of Pergamos of 200,000, or that of Alexandria, wherein Aulus Gellius reckoned 700,000, were they still remaining, would come vastly short of this we speak of. The number of books contained in it is almost inconceivable, and their price inestimable. The queen of Sheba, they report, procured them hither from all parts, besides those many which Solomon presented her with; and, from that time to this, the Abissinian monarchs have imitated her in the like care and diligence. There are three spacious halls, each above 200 paces long, stored with books in all sciences, written on fine parchment, embellished with golden letters, and other costly work both of writing, binding, and covering; some even with the floor, and others on shelves one above another.

(29) Uretta, Hist. d'Ethiop. l. i. c. 9.

No academics or schools for youth.

witnesses contradict, in every instance, all that he hath so confidently advanced on that subject<sup>m</sup>; insomuch that there neither remain any footsteps or remembrance of such academies, or places for public instruction, having ever existed among them, if their language hath any proper name for them.

They learn their religion at church or at home.

THE construction and situation of their most noted monasteries<sup>n</sup>, among the wildest rocks and deserts, and at a distance from places of resort, plainly shew they never were founded for any such design. Though their clergy are numerous and diligent enough to undertake so laudable a province, were there proper places and salaries appointed for them, especially as their priestly function takes up so little of their time; yet we do not find, from our Portuguese and other writers, that any of them are ever employed in that useful work any-where but at church: so that all that their own and the children of the laity learn of their religion<sup>b</sup> must be from them there, or from their parents at home. In the former, from those short portions of Scripture that are read there<sup>o</sup>, and a few homilies and expositions that follow the lectures, and perhaps from their catechists, who, in all probability, have some set seasons for instructing the young people in the fundamentals of their religion, particularly in their short catechism, of which we shall subjoin the substance, as the abbot Gregory gave it to Mr. Ludolph. Whatever else they learn beside, must be at home from their own parents, and that cannot be considerable, seeing they can teach them no more than they know themselves; and that is found very little, not only in the laity, but even in the most learned of their clergy, from all the accounts we have of them. This universal ignorance in both, whether encouraged by the emperors upon any particular views, which we cannot find out, or by their Abunas and Alexandrian patriarchs, in order to confirm them the more in their subjection to that see, is so much the more deplorable, as we are assured by so many hands, that the Abissinian youth are, for the generality, endowed with great vivacity of parts, quick understanding, and a natural disposition for a much better education: and on this account it was, that the Portuguese missionaries made it one of their first and chief cares to supply that defect, by setting up as many schools and seminaries as they could, where-ever they were settled. Such an one was that we read of, in which were educated sixty boys, partly Abissinians, and partly Portuguese; the latter designed to draw in the former. These boys having been taught,

Schools set up by the missionaries.

<sup>m</sup> Vide, inter al. CODIGN. l. c. 17.

<sup>n</sup> See before, p. 228, & seq.

<sup>o</sup> See before, p. 226, & seq.

other. Few of them are of paper, that being of late invention."

"There are the writings of Enoch, transcribed from the stones on which they were engraven, which treat of philosophy, the heavens, and elements. Others, which go under the name of Noah, treat of cosmography, mathematics, religious ceremonies, and prayers. Some of those composed by Abraham, when he dwelt in the valley of Mamre, where he read public lectures on philosophy and mathematics. There are a great number said to have been written by Solomon, others by Job, after he was restored to his former prosperity. Many others of Ezra, the prophets, and Jewish high priests; and besides the four canonical Gospels, several others attributed to St. Bartholomew, Thomas, Andrew, and other apostles. Many others of the Sibyls, in prose and verse; the works of queen Candace, those of all the Greek, Latin, Syrian, Egyptian, &c. fathers, translated; the Talmud, and all the old Hebrew writers, Roman and Greek historians, philosophers, poets, and a vast variety of others, too tedious to mention. When Jerusalem was destroyed by Titus, and when the Saracens over-ran the Christian world, many of their books were conveyed thence into Ethiopia; and when Ferdinand and Isabella expelled the Jews out of Spain, many of them entered Ethiopia, and enriched this library with their books; and when Charles V. restored the Muleasses to their country, Prefter John, hearing of the famed library of Tunis, sent and bought above 3000 volumes more, in all arts and sciences."

"There are above two hundred monks appointed to take care of this library, and each has the charge of such books as are written in the languages he is master of; and the abbot, who is set over them, is strictly charged with the care of the whole library by the emperor, who esteems it much more than his treasury."

And yet this treasury, according to the same author's pompous account, is a sea into which innumerable rivulets have been pouring their yearly tribute of gold, and all precious gems, in such plenty, ever since the time of the queen of Sheba, and without ever taking one penny out of it, that it is affirmed to be rich enough to buy one half of the world (30).

The same description he gives us, in another place, of their colleges or seminaries, of which, he says, every city hath two, one for the boys, the other for the girls; the one within the walls of the town, and the other at some small distance without. Each seminary is divided into three cloisters, the one for noblemen and gentlemen's children, the 2d for citizens, and the 3d for those of the meanest rank. Each class of them hath its several proper teachers, and neither they nor the children converse with those of the other. The boys are taught religion, arts, and sciences, according to their rank, and are allowed to go out on holidays, and visit relations. The girls are taught every thing proper for their sex and rank; but are not allowed to go out. The boys are kept in theirs from 10 to 16, and the girls from 9 to 16. The emperor himself is obliged to send his children to receive their education in these academies. All which, and other particulars relating to them, as well as all the rest of that author's romantic fustian, hath been fully answered by the learned Jesuit Codignus (31); and is plainly confuted by the different accounts which all the Portuguese writers give us of that empire. But we shall take a proper occasion to give our readers a short abstract of this monstrous romance in the close of this history; and this more especially, as his fraternity have taken such care to destroy all the copies they could get into their hands, that it is become exceedingly scarce, and difficult to be met with in the original; much more in our English tongue, in which we have only a short epitome or abstract of it, in the end of Dr. Geddes's history of the Ethiopian church; which book is now no less scarce than curious and useful.

(30) Id. ibid. & Purchas Pilgr. l. vii. c. v. §. 2.

(31) De Abissin. reb. l. i. c. 17, & al. pass.

among

- a among other things, to act some dramatic pieces after the European manner, their parents, and other natives, were admitted to see them. In one of which, we are told, they chanced, as the plot required it, to introduce some demons upon the stage; at sight of which the Abissinians, who took them for real spirits, were so affrighted, that they all ran out with the utmost speed, crying out, Away, away, they have brought devils hither with them <sup>p</sup>.

THE substance of the Abissinian catechism, according to abbot Gregory above-mentioned, runs thus.

*Substance of the Abissinian
catechism.*

- Q. What God do you believe in?
A. In the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, three persons, and one God.
- Q. Of these three persons, which is the first, and which is the last; which is the greatest, and which is the least?
A. None is first, nor none is last, none greater, nor none less, but they are in all respects equal.
- Q. How many persons are there?
A. Three.
- Q. How many Gods?
A. One.
- Q. How many Deities?
A. One.
- Q. How many kingdoms?
A. One.
- Q. How many Powers?
A. One.
- Q. How many Creators?
A. One.
- Q. How many Wills?
A. One.
- Q. Is there any time in God?
A. None; for he is from all eternity, and will be to all eternity.
- Q. Where is God?
A. Every-where, and in every thing.
- Q. Is the Father God?
A. He is most certainly.
- Q. Is the Son God?
A. He is.
- Q. Is the Holy Ghost God?
A. He is.
- Q. Then there are three Gods?
A. I do not say there are three Gods, but three persons, and one God only.
- Q. Who begat the Son?
A. God the Father; and the Holy Ghost proceedeth from the Father, and receiveth of the Son.
- Q. Shew me some kind of similitude to illustrate the three persons in one Godhead?
A. The Sun, although he be identically one, is nevertheless endowed with three properties, viz. rotundity, light, and heat: in like manner, we believe in one God, and that in him exist three persons, viz. Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, who are in all respects equal.
- Q. Which of those three persons was born for our redemption?
A. The Second, who is the Son of God, and our Lord Jesus Christ.
- Q. How many nativities belong to him?
A. Two; the first is from his Father, without mother, and without time; and the second from our Lady the Virgin Mary, without father, and in time, she continuing still in her virginity.
- Q. Is our Lord Jesus Christ man or God?
A. He is both God and man in one person, without distinction or change, without confusion or mixture.

IN the like manner, the Abissinians believe and teach all the other articles of faith concerning him, viz. his baptism, fasting, temptations, sufferings, death, resurrection, ascension into heaven, and his mission of the Holy Ghost on the apostles: that he shall come again in glory to judge the quick and the dead: that he is really present at the sacrament of the Eucharist: that the dead shall rise again at the last day: that the just shall inherit the kingdom of heaven; and that sinners shall be sent into hell. They likewise believe a catholic church, as expressed in the Nicene creed, compiled by the orthodox council of Nice, anno 318<sup>a</sup>. This is all that can with any certainty be affirmed concerning the Abissinian faith, until the Divine Providence shall be pleased to furnish us with means of being better acquainted with their authentic writings on that subject, or have their faith and practice transmitted to us by less partial hands than, it is to be feared, we have hitherto had them<sup>r</sup>.

General belief.

<sup>p</sup> LUDOLPH, l. iii. c. 11. §. 38.

We have had no certain intelligence from thence since the expulsion of the missionaries.

Wansleb sent thither by the elector of Saxony.

Cannot get into the country; turns monk.

WE may safely say, that, since the coming away of the patriarch Alphonso Mendez (and it is plain neither he nor any of the rest of the missionaries were curious, or troubled themselves much, in collecting or bringing what books they could from thence), we have received very little intelligence from that country. And it is no small matter of regret, that Mr. Wansleb, who was sent thither by the elector of Saxony, and had learned the Ethiopic tongue under Mr. Ludolph, met with such insurmountable obstacles and dangers in his attempt to penetrate into that empire, in order to bring from thence all the liturgies and other writings that money could procure; as he was a very good judge of them, and was supplied by that prince with sufficient sums for that purpose: so that finding it impossible to get admittance into Abissinia, he contented himself with buying as many as he could get in Egypt, and other parts. Some discontents, which happened to him afterwards, or, as he expresses it, the perusing of these liturgies, made such an impression upon his mind, that, being quite dissatisfied with his own religion, he renounced Lutheranism, and took the Dominican habit at Rome. From that time, he became a zealous proselyte to that church (P), to the great regret and mortification of the duke his benefactor, and of all his friends<sup>s</sup>, who expected greater things from him; and an end was put, on that side, to all future endeavours of getting either books or any other intelligence from those parts. And as for the missionaries, they have been forced to draw all their accounts concerning what happened there since their expulsion, from Cairo in Egypt, and from such hands as can give the reader but little satisfaction; there being still a much wider difference between them; and, what is much worse, the contests are risen to such a height, and so much been written by both parties, and with such confidence and animosity, as leaves one scarcely room to guess on which side the truth or the slander lies<sup>t</sup>.

<sup>r</sup> Abba GREGOR. apud Ludolph. —94. LONO, Relat. de l'Abiss. p. 157, 196.

<sup>s</sup> See before, p. 161, & seq.

<sup>t</sup> LUDOLPH, Proem. i. c. 90,

<sup>u</sup> See before, p. 161—166. and the close of the next Section.

(P) Michael Wansleb was a native of Ertfurt, vulgarly called Erfort, a city in the electorate of Mentz; but, since it embraced the Ausburg confession, under the protection of the dukes of Saxony. He had been brought up under Mr. Ludolph, and was a master of the oriental languages; and, as such, recommended to that prince as a proper person for that commission (32). Soon after his ill success, and turning monk at Rome, he was again recommended to the great Mr. Colbert, who sent him into the Levant upon the same errand; where he accordingly purchased above 500 MSS. which were afterwards conveyed to Paris, and placed in the king's library; but finding all his fresh attempts to get entrance into Abissinia frustrated, he returned into France, anno 1676, and died there some years after.—Before that time, he had caused the liturgy of Dioscorus, the heretic patriarch of Alexandria, to be printed at London, anno 1661; and, before he went upon his second enterprize, he published a list of the works which he designed to have printed in the Ethiopic tongue, together with an account of the present state of Egypt, in Italian. These two appeared, anno 1671; and, upon his return, he published a fresh relation of his voyage into Egypt, annis 1672 and 1673.

Soon after which followed his history of the Alexandrian church.

He left likewise a catalogue of all the Abissinian MSS. which he had either seen, purchased, or copied, during his stay there, together with an imperfect manuscript account of the then state of Abissinia. Lastly, there appeared a book in English, printed at London by Jonathan Edwin, intitled, A short account of the rebellions and bloodshed, occasioned by the Jesuits and other popish emissaries in the empire of Abissinia, collected out of a MS. history written in Latin by John Michael Wansleben, a learned papist: De rebellione & turbis tempore patrum societatis in Habassia excitatis. Which book was compiled from that author's writing, as Mr. Ludolph believes it to be; yet must be supposed to have been very much mutilated, and blended with a great deal of fabulous trash by the compiler. However that be, Mr. Wansleb's proceedings have too far impaired his character, not only in the opinion of the Protestants (33), but in that also of the Romish fathers, to be depended on (34), whatever these may say to extenuate them, in order to prop up the credit of his writings.

(32) Vide Ludolph, Comm. Proem. I. p. 20. & in lib. iii. c. 14. § 135. Le Grand, Relat. d'Abissin. p. 157, & 196, & alibi.

(33) Ludolph, ubi sup.

(34) Le Grand, ubi sup.

S E C T. IX.

The chronology, succession, and series, of the Abissinian monarchs; and their history from the time of the Portuguese coming thither, to that of their expulsion from thence.

<sup>a</sup> WE have had frequent occasion, as well in our Antient <sup>a</sup> as this Modern history of Abissinia, to observe how imperfect, maimed, and uncertain, all the records and histories of that antient and potent empire are. We shall find them still more deficient in point of their chronology, in the settling of their various epochs, the numbering the years of their monarchs reigns, and other material transactions; and, lastly, we shall, even in those few scraps, as we may justly call them, which they have preserved upon their most important events, or, at least, in those which the Portuguese missionaries have been able to procure from thence <sup>b</sup>, observe some material differences, which they themselves could not reconcile. — They were taken from two manuscripts, which, besides that they vary with each other in many particulars, reckon only one hundred emperors from Menilebeck, the son of Solomon and Makkeda queen of Sheba, down to their great friend and patron, Soltan Jassok-Adyan-Sagged, or Segued; but without mentioning either the times in which they flourished, or the length of their reigns. One of them reckons 24 of them before Christ, and from thence to the time of his writing, that is, in the time of Faciladas, or Basilides, the son and successor of Segued above-mentioned, about the year 1659, only 68; yet makes the sum total, if it be not an error of the press, 99; whereas 24 and 68 make in all but 92; unless we will suppose the other seven to have been of the Zaguean family, who usurped the Abissinian throne during the space of 340 years, and are, for that reason, struck out of the list of the true descendants of the Solomonic race. This last will appear the less improbable, if we consider that those lists take no notice even of the women of the Solomonic line, as were the queen of Sheba, queen Candace, and the empress Helene; which is rightly supposed to have been in conformity to the Jewish custom, which, as St. Jerom observes, excluded the females out of their genealogies; and if so, much more would they such a list of usurpers. Conformably to which, we have heretofore shewn, that those Israelitish kings, which are omitted by St. Matthew, in his genealogy of Jesus Christ, were excluded out of it on that very account, that is, for want of a legal title <sup>c</sup>; which doth perfectly account for the difference between his and that of St. Luke, and of the Chronicles. Add to this, with respect to what we are upon, that those seven Zaguean reigns, if we may guess at their duration from two of them, viz. those of Lalibela and his son, each of whom are said to have reigned 40 years, they will come pretty near the 340 years of their usurpation above-mentioned; of which we shall give a further account in the sequel.

<sup>d</sup> FROM those two imperfect records, the one of which was taken from that often mentioned, which is kept in the great church of Axuma, and the other from a book, then in the possession of the emperor Segued, by Father Emanuel d'Almeyda, the only material transactions belonging to the Ancient as well as Modern History, which can be reduced into a chronological order, are these that follow (A).

THE queen of Sheba came into Judea in or about the year before Christ 992, and of the world

SHE reigned 25 years after her return, and was succeeded by her son Menilebeck

Queen of 3012 Sheba.

3037

<sup>a</sup> Vol. vii. p. 205, & seq. <sup>b</sup> De his, vide ALMEYDA, TELLEZ, lib. i. c. 27. LUDOLPH, lib. ii. c. 2, & seq. <sup>c</sup> See Ancient Hist. vol. iv. p. 156, & seq. in the notes.

(A) Before we go further, it will not be improper to apprise our readers of two things, with respect to the Abissinian computation of time; the one, that they begin their year at the autumnal equinox, in which season they believe the world to have been created; the other, that they compute the numbers of years from the creation to the birth of Christ to be 5500, which is eight years short of the Septuagint reckoning, which the Greek, Armenian, and some other churches follow. This error is also crept into their computation of the Christian æra; so that whoever will rightly understand it, must be sure to add always those eight years to it. How this defect came to be introduced among them, is variously conjectured, and hardly worth our farther inquiry (1). In other cases, they make use of the old Egyptian year, consisting of twelve months, of 30 days each, with the proper intercalary ones, to reduce it to the true solar.

(1) De hoc, vide Gregor. apud Ludolph, lib. iii. c. 6. §. 97, et seq.

MENILEHECK

Menilehech.

MENILEHECH reigned 29 years, and was cotemporary with his father, and 18 years more with his son Rheboboam, and died.

FROM Sadgur, the son of Menilehech, proceeded, in a lineal descent, 24 princes; the length of whose reigns is not set down; but, in the eighth year of which last, whom the chronicle calls Pbecen, was our Saviour born, ————— 4004

FROM this æra of our Saviour's birth to the joint reigns of the two brothers Abra and Abza, or, as the commemoration made for the rest of their souls hath it, Remember, Lord, the Ethiopian monarchs, Abrehe and Atzbahe, reckoned 13 emperors more, whose names, and the years of whose reigns, are also omitted, elapsed 327 years; in the last of which, Fruementius was sent by St. Athanasius into Ethiopia, where he converted the Abissinians to the Christian faith <sup>d</sup>.

Atzfa, Atzfed, and Amay.

THE chronicles go on, and give a strange account of three other brothers, who agreed to reign jointly and amicably over the whole empire. Their names are Atzfa, Atzfed, and Amay, who, we are told, to prevent all discord and interfering between them, bethought themselves of an odd expedient; which was to divide the day into three parts, and to hold the reins alternately each his third part, or eight hours. A strange way of government this! but which, if we will believe the Abissine legends, succeeded to a miracle; for if, at any time, one of the brothers differed or fell out with another, the third was ready to interpose, and act as umpire between them <sup>e</sup>.

Arado, Aladoba, and Alamid.

Tacena

Caleb, who conquers the Homerites.

THOSE, of whose lives and reigns we have no farther account, were succeeded by Arado, Aladoba, and Alamid, or, as Tellez calls him, Amiamid, in whose reigns vast numbers of monks and anchorites came out of Egypt hither, with a view of propagating Christianity, and the monastic life. Alamid was succeeded by Tacena, and he by Caleb; about which time, new colonies of monks and ascetics came from Rum, and settled in the kingdom of Tigre; that is, about the time of the emperor Justinian, near the year of Christ 521, or 522. Caleb, having subdued the Sabeen or Homerite kingdom, by the defeat and death of the Jewish king Dunavas (B), is said to have sent his crown to Jerusalem, to be there suspended in the great church of St. Sepulchre, in memory of his signal success against that bitter enemy and persecutor of the Christians <sup>f</sup>.

Gebra Mesket.

Constantine, Frezena described.

HE was succeeded by Gebra Mesket, whose name imports the servant of the cross, a wise and peaceable prince; who, we are told, made an alliance with the emperor Justinian above-named <sup>g</sup>. His two next successors were Constantine and Frezena; and, after them, were fifteen more, all of the same Solomonic line: the last of whom was named Del-Noad, who reigned till about the year 960, when the succession passed into the Zagean family; and the usurpation began, which lasted 340 years, and of which we are now going to give the best account we can find out of those imperfect memoirs we have of it, not so much from any authentic records, as from what the Abissinians call an undoubted tradition, which is as follows.

The Zagean usurpation begun by Tredda Gab-z, who dethrones the Solomonic race.

Four of the usurpers good princes.

TREDDA GABEZ, a woman, who, for her impiety, cruelty, lewdness, and other enormous vices, was surnamed Effat, or fire-brand, found means, about this time (960), to destroy not only Del-Noad, the emperor on the throne, but the whole imperial family, in order to raise a son of hers, whom she had by the governor of Bugna, to the Ethiopian throne; so that not one of the unhappy family escaped, except one, who fled for shelter into the kingdom of Shewa, or Xaoa, where his posterity was preserved with the utmost privacy by the Xaoan viceroys, who were all faithfully attached to the line of Solomon, during the 340 years of the Zagean usurpation. The Abissinians, however, who, as we observed a little higher, never acknowledged that new race as their princes, but only as so many usur-

<sup>d</sup> De his, vide Ant. Hist. vol. vii. p. 218, & sup. p. 222.
c. iv. §. 19, & seq.
Perf. lib. i. c. 9.

<sup>e</sup> TELLEZ, lib. iv. c. 29. LUDOLPH, l. ii.
<sup>f</sup> See the Abissine Poet, apud LUDOLPH, lib. ii. c. 4. §. 59.
<sup>g</sup> PROCOPIUS, Bell.

(B) This Caleb, who was nephew to Amiamid above-mentioned, is the same whom some Greek and Latin writers call Elefbaan (2), which might probably be his Ethiopic Christian name, or, with the Arabic article el, El-etzbaha; it being very common for the Abissinian emperors to have two or more names. Both the Romans and Abissinians have ranked him among the saints, on account of the two great victories which he gained over a Jewish prince, named Dunavas, then king of the Homerites, and a great persecutor of the Christians.

Elefbaan was prevailed upon by the Alexandrian patriarch to undertake that war against him; in which he proved so successful, that he slew him in the second battle, and seized upon his whole kingdom, which put an end to that of the Homerites, or Sabeans, as well as to their horrid persecutions of the Christians: in one of which, 340, with the martyr Aretas at their head, were burnt alive all together in one day in the city of Nagran, or Najran. This new kingdom was afterwards divided, and one part of it was given to the son of the martyr Aretas, together with the city of Nagran, which became the place of his residence. The other was made tributary to Elefbaan, and continued so 72 years, that is, till about anno 578, when Said Ebn Jazan, having made an alliance with the Persians, shook off the yoke, as we have shewn in our Antient History (3),

(2) De hoc, vide Niceph. Callist. l. xvii. Baron. Ann. ad ann. 522. Ludolph. lib. ii. c. 4. §. 23, & seq. (3) Id. ibid. See also Ant. Hist. vol. vii. p. 219, & seq.

- a pers, have obliterated their names; so that we should perhaps have never heard of them, had not two or three of them taken care to eternize themselves by some glorious deeds, particularly the great Lalibela, formerly mentioned, who left many indelible monuments of his piety and magnificence, by the ten noble churches which he caused to be hewn out of the solid rock <sup>b</sup>, and by other famous actions, for which, in spite of all their aversion to his family, they have not scrupled to number him among their saints. This is indeed by far the most illustrious of all; but yet we have the names of two or three more, who still bear a very great character among them, viz. Degna Michael, Newaja Chritos, and Naacu Luabo: the last of whom they extol as a peaceable, magnanimous, and beneficent prince, and highly beloved of God <sup>i</sup>. Who, how many, and what kind of princes they were that filled the throne during the rest of these 340 years, we are not told; nor by what means the crown returned to the descendants of Solomon; but only that, about the year 1300, the Zagean family being driven from the throne, Icon Amlac, or, as others call him, Igunu Amlac, whose predecessors had been preserved in the kingdom of Xaoa, during the whole time of the usurpation, recovered the Abissinian throne: from which period it hath continued in the Solomonic line to this time. Icon, or Aikun Amlac, whom they reckon the 66th monarch from Menilebech, reigned 15 years; and from him to the emperor Zar-a Jaacob, who reigned about the year 1437, they reckon fifteen more; whose names, as they are still found either in their liturgies, or some other of their writings, are as follow, according to the order they stand in the imperial list <sup>k</sup>.
- c 66. Igbunu, or Icon Amlac. 67. Jagbea Tzejon, or Agbascon. 68. Babarjarda, or Babar Azgued. 69. Esbraad. 70. Cadem Saghed. 71. Zenzagued. 72. Udimrad. 73. Amdet-zion. 74. Scifaarad. 75. Udmaasfan. 76. David. 77. Theodore. 78. Isaac. 79. An-drea. 80. Hesbinaan. 81. Amde Jesus, whose successor was the Zar-a Jaacob above-mentioned, whom they reckoned their 82d emperor.
- ZAR-A JAACOB* began his reign, as has been observed, A. C. 1437, in which the Florentine council sat, to which, being a prince of learning and great penetration, he sent his ambassadors, with a letter to Pope Eugenius IV. as we shall see in the sequel. He was succeeded by,
83. BOEDA MARIAM, about an. 1465, who died after a ten years reign, and left the government to his widow, the empress Helena. His successor was,
- d 84. ALEXANDER, or Escander, who reigned fifteen years and six months; that is, from 1475 to 1491. In whose reign, Peter Covillan came into the empire of Abissinia, he being the first Portuguese that ever penetrated so far into it. He was succeeded by his son,
85. AMDA IZGON, or Amdscon, who died six months after without male issue, and left Amda Izgon. the crown to his uncle,
86. NAOD, the son of Boeda Mariam, who was called to the crown from his confinement on the rock Guexen <sup>l</sup>, to which Alexander had confined him. He reigned thirteen years and nine months, and died about an. 1507. To him succeeded,
- e 87. ETANA-DENGHEL, or Lebna-Denghel; more commonly known by the names of Onag-Segued and David; which last he took upon his accession to the crown. He reigned from an. 1507 to an. 1540: and it was to this prince that the king of Portugal sent that embassy, of which Francisco Alvarez was appointed chaplain, and of which he gave the public so curious a relation.
88. His son, and successor, was Claudius Segued, or Aznaf-Segued; who had but a very unfortunate reign; being harrassed on all sides with grievous wars against the Gallas and Mohammedans, who would quickly have swallowed up his whole empire, had not Providence sent to his assistance the brave Don Christopher de Gama, of whose success we shall speak more fully in the sequel. Segued, however, lost his life in a fight against the Gallas, in March, an. 1559, after a tedious reign of a little above eighteen years; and leaving no male issue behind, was succeeded by his brother's son,
- f 89. MENAS, surnamed at his coronation Adama Segued, who had reigned little more than four years before he was murdered by his own soldiers, in a fight against Isaac, one of the revolted Babr-nagash's, or governors of the maritime provinces, in April, 1562. He was succeeded by his son,
90. MALAK SEGUED, who reigned some months above thirty-three years; and having no sons by his queen, had brought up a natural one of his, named Jaacob, whom he gued.

<sup>b</sup> De his vide sup. p. 205, & seq.
ALVAREZ, LUDOLPH, & al. supra citat.

<sup>i</sup> LUDOLPH, l. ii. c. 5. §. 13.
<sup>l</sup> De hoc, vid. sup. p. 209.

<sup>k</sup> ALF. MENDEZ, TELLEZ,

designed for his successor; but repenting of it a little before his death, left the crown to a son <sup>a</sup> of his brother Locanaxos, named,

Za-denghil, conspired against, and killed.

91. ZA-DENGHIL, an. 1565, which proved the fatal cause of a most bloody civil war; many of the grandeos taking Jaacob's part against him, on account of his too great propensity to the Roman church; though in other respects a brave and noble prince <sup>m</sup>. Peter, the then Abuna, was the leader of that rebellion; and having absolved the Abissinians from their oath of allegiance, they took arms against him, whilst he, with the few forces he had left, and a small number of Portuguese, venturing to give them battle, was defeated and killed, October 15, 1604, after a short and troublesome reign of nine years. Upon his death, his competitor was again invited to the throne; but had not enjoyed it long, before he saw himself strenuously opposed by the great-grandson of Etana Denghel, al. <sup>b</sup> Onag Segued, whose name was Susneus, or Socinius, a young prince, no less artful than brave. The contest lasted somewhat above two years, but was at length decided by an obstinate fight, March 10, 1607; in which Jaacob and the Abuna Peter were killed on the spot.

Susneus introduces the Pope's power.

SUSNEUS, the 92<sup>d</sup> monarch, having gained the day, and regained the crown, made no scruple of betraying the same inclination for the church of Rome, though it had cost his predecessor so dear; and gave such encouragement to the popish missionaries, that great numbers flocked thither during his reign, who would, in all likelihood, have established the Pope's authority in that empire, had not a stop been put to their progress by the unexpected death of that monarch, who died in November, an. 1632; and by the accession of his son <sup>c</sup> Faciladas, or Basilides, to the crown, who proved as great an enemy, as his father had been a friend and patron, to them.

The missionaries expelled by Faciladas.

Thus far we have brought down the list of the ninety-two Abissinian monarchs, in the best chronological order we could, from the few records which the Portuguese writers have been able to procure, down to the time in which they wrote. But our readers will not be dissatisfied, if, to them, we add the names and reigns of those few more, which are come to our knowledge by other hands, since the total expulsion of the missionaries and Roman-catholics out of the empire, as they have been since transmitted into Europe, and have been collected by a late French author, and printed at Paris, an. 1728 <sup>n</sup>. They are these that follow. <sup>d</sup>

93. BASILIDES took the name of Adyam Segued, and is the prince who issued out that decree against the Roman-catholics; for which he is represented as a favourer of Mohammedism, though an enemy to them. Several letters passed between him and the patriarch Alphonso Mendez, of which we shall have occasion to speak in the sequel. He died about the year 1664, aged sixty-five, and was succeeded by his fourth son, John.

94. JOHN, who, on his accession, took the name of Aclaf Segued, and died, an. 1680.

Jawso.

95. His son Jawso, or Adyam Segued al. Ayasous, succeeded him; and is the prince to whom the physician Poncet was sent, by Mr. Maillet, the French consul at Alexandria. He was afterwards dethroned by his son, Taklimanoth.

96. TAKLIMANOTH, al. Tekla Haymanoth, an. 1706; and Taklimanoth was, for his per- <sup>e</sup> fidy, massacred by his own troops, an. 1709: and,

Teflis.

Destroys the usurper.

97. His brother Teflis sat upon the throne. His reign was much of the same short duration as that of his predecessor; his prime minister, named Oustas, the son of a sister of Jawso Adyam Segued, having dethroned him in the third year of his reign, and seized on the crown: the Abissinians, however, did not suffer him to usurp the imperial dignity longer than till they could raise prince David, another son of that monarch above-mentioned, to the throne; which was not done without a dreadful slaughter and massacre of both parties, as we are informed by some letters from Moka, dated June, 1718; from which it is concluded, that he was acknowledged emperor about the beginning of the year 1714 <sup>o</sup>.

The Abissinian records maimed and imperfect, since the restoration of the Solomonic line;

FROM this maimed and imperfect scantling we have given of the Abissinian chronology <sup>f</sup> and history, which is all that the missionary fathers have been able to collect from their books and traditionary records, our readers will easily perceive what a barren field we are got into, and how little is to be found or said upon that subject, till we come to the time of the Portuguese arrival in that empire. One might indeed have expected, that after the effectual abolition of the Zagean usurpation, lately mentioned, and the happy restoration of the Solomonic race to the crown, an. 1300, under Icon, or Iqbun Amlak, they would have been more careful to preserve a faithful account of all the ensuing reigns, and of all the material occurrences that happened under each of them from that time downwards, at least to the coming of the Portu-

<sup>m</sup> Id. ibid. vid. & LOBO, relat. pass. LE GRAND, dissert. v. p. 250. ix. p. 297, & seq. GRAND, dissertat. v. p. 247, & seq.

<sup>o</sup> See LE GRAND, dissertat. v. p. 251, & 473.

<sup>n</sup> See LE

a guesse; especially as that epocha appears in general to have been very remarkable, for the many wars which those princes had with the Agaus, Gallas, Turks, and other nations; the dismembering of so many large and noble provinces from the empire, and the dreadful devastations that were made in others, till it was reduced within the narrow bounds, and to that desolate condition in which those new comers found it at their arrival, and was the occasion of their being so well received there.

But whether the confusion or calamities that raged during those invasions and destructive wars occasioned this neglect of transmitting some account of them to posterity, or whatever may have proved the cause of it, we can only say, that the memory of the far greater part of them hath been hardly preserved among the inhabitants, by any other records, than by those devastations and dire monuments which those savage enemies have left behind them, or in the many kingdoms and vast territories they have continued in the possession of ever since: for it is hardly to be supposed, if any of those transactions had been committed to writing, or regularly kept in the imperial archives, the jesuits, and other missionaries, whilst in such high favour with those monarchs, would not have obtained a sight of them, and transmitted an account to their fraternity, both at Rome and in Portugal. Had any such records been preserved in any part of the empire, and afterwards carried off, or been destroyed by any of those barbarian invaders, or perished by fire, or any other accident, the remembrance of such a remarkable disaster could never have so far perished with them, within so short a space of time as a century or two at most, as that there should be no traces, no memorial left of them, when the Portuguese made their first appearance in it. So that upon the whole we cannot account for that obscurity which reigns through the history of those latter ages, to any thing but the same neglect and natural indolence of the Abissinians, which had suffered the most signal occurrences of the more remote ones, such as, more particularly, that of their first conversion to Christianity, and the history of their church from that time downwards, to be buried in such impenetrable darkness, above any other Christian nation. It is therefore high time now to come to that remarkable period, which reaches from the first arrival of the Portuguese into those dominions, down to their final expulsion out of them. This epoch, which is fraught with the most important transactions, and transmitted by so many able pens, will, in some measure, make amends for the barrenness and obscurity of the former; especially if they be read with that caution, which we have ventured to hint, more than once, through the course of this chapter, with respect to that partiality with which they must be reasonably supposed to have been penned, in a case wherein the credit and interest of the Roman church is so deeply concerned, and the writers are such professed, staunch, and indefatigable promoters of it <sup>p</sup>.

How this empire was at first discovered by Peter Covillan and Michael Payva, in their wild search after the famed and much sought-for one of Prester John, we have already seen <sup>q</sup>. 1490.
The next attempt in quest of it was about seven years after, when Vasco de Gama first ventured to sail round the cape and coasts of Africa, and thence to the East-Indies <sup>r</sup>. 1497.
Seven years after, Alphonso d'Albuquerque, following the same track, was the first European that sailed through the streights of Babel-mandel, and spread the Portuguese name among the Ethiopians, by confirming all that Covillan, who was still alive, and had been detained there ever since his first arrival, had told them concerning their naval power, new discoveries and settlements in Afric, India, &c. This proved so much the more favourable a juncture for them, as the empire of Abissinia was at that time reduced to the lowest ebb, both by foreign wars and intestine broils, and governed by king David, a minor monarch, under the empress Helena his grandmother; who, though in all respects a person of a most excellent character, yet was now altogether incapable of holding the reins of government, under so many and almost insurmountable difficulties, without some powerful assistance from abroad: so that she no sooner heard of the prowess, valour, and success of the Portuguese, than she resolved to apply to their king Don Emanuel for succour, and to enter into a treaty, strict alliance, and friendship, with that prince: and that she might succeed the better in it, she made choice of an Armenian merchant, named Matthew, a person every way qualified for such a commission, to be sent on an embassy to the court of Portugal. To oblige that prince the more to her interest, she presented him with a piece of the holy cross, as a token of her Christian profession; which was soon after deposited in a gold box, which Alphonso d'Albuquerque caused to be made for that purpose. Matthew was likewise received by him with particular honour, and dispatched to Lisbon, where he likewise met with a most gracious reception from Don Emanuel and his whole court, who began to look on this embassy, and desired alliance, as an earnest of some singular advantage that would accrue both to him and the church of Rome from it; and was accordingly accepted with the utmost readiness.

<sup>p</sup> See before, p. 161, & seq.

<sup>q</sup> See before, p. 171, & seq.

<sup>r</sup> See before, vol. iv. pass.

BUT

Well received by king Emanuel.

Covillan kept in Abissinia; and much valued by the emperor.

Helena's works of charity.

The empire attacked within and without.

Matthew sent ambassador to Portugal.

Galvan sent ambassador by king Emanuel

BUT before we enter into a farther detail of this transaction, which laid the foundation of a that friendship and alliance between the Portuguese and Abissinian courts, and proved the cause of so many strange accidents and revolutions in the latter, it will not be amiss to resume the thread of it a little higher, in order to give some farther light into this part of their history. We have already hinted, that Covillan had been detained by the emperor Alexander ever since his arrival thither, according to the usual policy of those princes, not to suffer a stranger to stir again out of their dominions; but though detained a prisoner, yet he was not used in other respects like one: that prince, who is said to have been a second Alexander in generosity, having conceived a great value for him, as a person of valour and experience, and one who might be very serviceable to him both by his council and his courage. Nahod, his successor, treated him in the same manner all the thirteen years of his reign, and willingly heard b him speak of the bravery, strength, and extensive commerce of his nation, and gladly consulted him on all occasions. This prince dying, left the government and tuition of his son, Lebna Dengbel, since called David, then an infant, to his mother, the empress Magueza, and to the empress Helena his grandmother, who was the widow of Boeda Mariam, and a princess justly esteemed by all for her extraordinary wisdom and piety; and who, in all likelihood, was advised by her Portuguese prisoner to take the step she did, of inviting the king of Portugal to her assistance.

SHE was moreover immensely rich, and enjoyed vast fertile territories in the kingdom of Gojam; and having neither son nor daughter, bestowed the greatest part of her income in works of charity, and particularly in building stately churches, and endowing them with a c munificence truly royal (Q): and as these were built quite in a different manner from those of Abissinia, it is not unlikely that the same Portuguese gentleman was the chief architect and conductor of those noble structures, which being so much nearer to those of Portugal, might serve to give that princess a still greater idea of his nation. However that be, whilst she was thus employing her time and her wealth in such magnificent works, she saw the empire attacked by the Mohammedans without, and her government sadly disturbed by parties and factions within: so that, not knowing which way to turn herself, we need not wonder at her being so easily prevailed upon, by the politic Covillan, to send to Portugal for succour; a thing quite opposite to the common practice of all her predecessors; which, in the end, plainly shewed the remedy to have been worse than the disease. But to return to her am- d bassador:

HE not only met with the utmost compliance from the Portuguese king, but as such an alliance appeared to be of the utmost consequence both to him and the church of Rome, he made no delay to send the empress a solemn embassy in return to hers, and nominated to it the famous Edward Galvan, a man of excellent capacity and great experience; who, after having served his two predecessors in the quality of secretary of state, had been afterwards sent ambassador into Germany, France, and Rome, and was every way qualified for such an * ALMEYDA, TELLEZ, LOBO, &c.

(Q) Our readers will not perhaps be displeased, if we give them a sketch of one of those noble structures, which that pious empress caused to be erected in the middle of the kingdom of Gojam, where the greatest part of her lands lay, and where she kept her usual residence. It was built on a beautiful eminence, in the territory of Nebassa, which is watered by the river Nile; and to have it completed in the most sumptuous manner, she sent for a considerable number of the best architects and workmen out of Egypt, at a vast expence. At the foot of the hill on which it stands was built a large square inclosure of stone and clay, each of the sides 200 fathoms long, and the wall full two yards thick, and about five in height; the whole so closely cemented together, that it could not be broke asunder without the greatest difficulty and labour (1).

In the centre of that precinct stands the church, all of square stones; the structure not of a round, as other churches of Abissinia are, but of a square figure, as well as the choir, or chancel, within. The walls are 104 feet in length, and the chapel about 60: the stones polished very smooth, with roses, pinks, lilies, and other flowers, curiously carved upon them, in such variety, and with such beautiful delicacy, as could hardly be outdone by the pencil, or on wax, or any fine metal. Those flowers, we are farther told, were covered with gold and silver; the workmanship of which vastly exceeded the value of the metal (2).

The arc, or little altar (3), chalices, plates, and other sacred utensils, were no less rich and magnificent; and our author tells us, that he saw two of these altars in the time of Sultan Segued all of solid gold; one of which weighed 800, and the other 500, ouquas, or ounces (4).

This fine edifice had, however, two considerable faults, in common with all those of the empire; the one that they are much too dark; which, according to the notion of the Abissinians, adds something of solemn grandeur to them; especially, as all the divine service is performed in them by candlelight, whether by day or night. The other is, that they are all thatched with straw; which, considering the number of candles that are burning in them, exposes them to be frequently set on fire.

This noble structure had hardly stood twenty years, before its rich utensils inticed one Granbe, a Mohammedan general, to come and plunder it of all its wealth, and set fire to the rest, which was all (except the stones still standing) reduced to ashes.

(1) Almeyda, ap. Tellez, l. i. ubi sup. Ludolph, Lobo, &c.

(2) Id. ibid.

(3) De his, vid. sup. p. 219.

(4) Almeyd.

important

- a important commission, had not his extreme old-age made him unfit for so long and dangerous a journey. He set out, however, with a suitable retinue, and a numerous fleet, commanded by Lopez Alvarez, and laden with magnificent presents for the young Abissinian emperor, and his excellent protectress and grandmother, the empress Helena. Francis Alvarez, probably a Alvarez sent by Mr. Ludolph, for his too great credulity, and his indiscrete relating of many monstrous absurdities upon mere hearsay, but in other respects a man of candor and piety, was appointed chaplain to this grand embassy, which met with a quick and easy voyage into the Red Sea; but was soon after disconcerted by the unexpected death of the ambassador Galvan, at the island of Cumaran, in the 71st year of his age; by which unforeseen accident, a stop of near four years was put to the designs of the Portuguese monarch, and the great expectations of the empress Helena.

- THE matter, however, was thought of too great importance to be set aside; and the arrival of Don Lopez de Seguira (who was then entering into his government of India) at the island of Mazowa, then belonging to the Abissinian emperors, though since taken by the Turks, offered him a fresh encouragement to renew it. He was then bringing back the Armenian merchant from Lisbon, and was to land him at that island; where, observing with what joy and eagerness he was received by the Babrnagash, or governor, by the monks of Bizan, and to go on that embassy, with the said Matthew, to the Abissinian court. Unfortunately, the person he pitched upon for that commission was Rodriguez de Lima, a person of a quite opposite character to his predecessor Galvan, a passionate humourful young gentleman, and quite unfit for such an office. Father Alvarez was ordered to accompany him as his chaplain, and a numerous retinue was ordered to attend them: their journey proved very long and troublesome, through the heat of the climate, and badness of the roads; notwithstanding which, they all arrived safe at the Abissinian court on the 20th of April, where they met with an affectionate and pompous reception. As for Matthew the Armenian, he fell sick at their first setting out, and died in a village belonging to the monks of Bizan, and was buried in the church of that monastery.

- THE emperor David, now Soltan Segued, received the ambassador with great marks of joy and esteem, and admitted them as soon as possible, though with great ceremony and formality at the first audience, they being obliged to make frequent long halts at every stage, as they drew nearer to the imperial pavilion, according to the stately grandeur of that court. He caused them to be entertained with all possible magnificence during their tedious stay, which was six whole years; for so long did he detain them before they could obtain their dismissal; though Rodriguez, naturally hot and impatient at the affected delays of that monarch, pressed him to it with the utmost importunity, and much more so, after he received the news of the death of the king Emanuel, and of the accession of John III. to the throne. One thing in deed that contributed much to the retarding of their return, we are told, was the want of shipping to convey the ambassador away; for if any vessels chanced to come from India, it was at a time when they were at a great distance from the sea*. At length, with great difficulty, they obtained their audience of leave, and set out for the Red-Sea, charged with a letter to the new king of Portugal; to whom he likewise sent his crown of gold and silver<sup>w</sup> as a present. The letter may be seen at large in the history which Alvarez hath given of this embassy<sup>x</sup> and empire. He likewise made choice of a learned monk, named Zagaza Ab, to go ambassador to the king of Portugal, whom he charged with a letter to Pope Clement VII. and earnestly entreated Francis Alvarez to accompany him on his embassy to Rome, which he readily promised to do (R). At the same time, Rodriguez was desired to leave John Bermudez, his physician, x Chap. 136.

* ALVAREZ, & al. sup. citat. 160.

u Id. ibid.

• TELLEZ, l. ii. c. 5.

w See before, p.

(R) These letters, which are full of fulsome flattery, both to the Pope and king of Portugal, and acknowledge the former to be the true and only vicar of Christ, and the head of his church on earth, in the plainest and strongest terms, were afterwards translated into Latin by Paul Jovius, and procured Alvarez, who was appointed to carry them to Rome, a most gracious reception from that pontif and his court (5), whilst his colleague Zagaza-Ab was detained at Lisbon for some politic reasons, as we shall see in the next note.

The misfortune was, that both these letters, and the purport of this embassy, were afterwards absolutely disowned by his successor in the next reign, disclaimed and condemned as so many contrivances and forgeries, set on foot by the Portuguese missionaries, in order to introduce the Pope's authority into that empire, and to promote some other political views of that pontif, and of the king of Portugal. The truth is, there is nothing in the contents, diction, style, manner, &c. of them, that can incline an unbiassed reader to believe them the genuine and real scripture of that monarch. Nor, on the other hand, can any one well conceive, if they were forged, and the embassy been only a contrivance of those politic fathers, how the one could be indited, and the other carried on,

(5) Tellez, lib. ii. De Conto's decad. 4. l. i. c. 10. Job. de Barros, decad. 4. c. 4. Alvarez, Lobos, & al.

physician, behind with him, and a painter of his retinue, to which he consented; and this Bermudez is the very person who was made, soon after, Latin patriarch of Abissinia, and wrote a short history of that empire, of which we have given an account in a former section <sup>r</sup>, and out of which we shall extract most of the transactions which happened during his stay in that country.

1527.
Arrival at Lisbon.

IN the mean time, Rodriguez and his retinue arrived safe at Goa, and sailed from thence in the month of January, and the year following for Lisbon; where, upon their arrival, on the 25th of July following, they were prevented from landing, on account of the plague raging very furiously; so that they were forced to sail up higher as far as Sanbarin, a sea-port, about twelve leagues north of that capital; whence they were conducted by the marquis of Villareal to Coimbra, where the court then was, and where the Abissinian ambassadors were presented <sup>b</sup> to the king, and met with a most courteous reception. The result of this notable embassy being in some measure foreign to our history of the empire, and yet interesting enough to excite a reader's curiosity, we shall subjoin in a marginal note (S), and return now to our account of the Abissinian affairs, after the departure of the Portuguese ambassador.

David gains some victories over the Moors.

THE emperor David, soon after his taking upon him the reins of government, having gained several successful battles against, and recovered some large territories from, his Moorish neighbours, did not a little alarm their fears, by his detaining the Portuguese ambassador so long in his dominions. They had their spies at his court, who soon apprised them that he had made a league offensive and defensive with the king of Portugal, who had engaged to assist him to

The king of Adel sends Granbe
against him.

drive all the Mohammedans out of their new conquests. The king of Adel, amongst the rest, <sup>c</sup> whose territories were contiguous to Abissinia, and who was himself a Mohammedan, and a professed enemy to all Christians, was one of the first who took up arms against him, and sent a small body of troops into his frontiers, commanded by the valiant Moor Achmed, surnamed Granbe, or left-handed, whom David had lately stripped of some considerable lands: in revenge of which, he marched his troops with such swiftness and fury into his dominions, that he quickly over ran the kingdom of Fategar, destroyed churches, towns, villages, and all that came in his way, and made vast numbers of prisoners, before any thing could be attempted to oppose him; inasmuch that, encouraged by his vast successes, he began to form a design of making himself master of the whole Abissinian empire <sup>2</sup>. The emperor, alarmed at these devastations, made all the speed he could to stop his progress; and coming against him with a <sup>d</sup> body of 3000 horse, and a numerous body of foot, easily over-threw his small army, as it consisted only of 300 horse, and an inferior number of foot, and carried off many of the latter prisoners. Two years after this, he came again at the head of a more numerous army,

His success and ravages.

<sup>r</sup> See before, p. 160.
LOBO, LE GRAND, & al.

<sup>2</sup> BERMUDEZ, chap. 1. TELLEZ, ubi sup. l. ii. LUDOLPH, l. ii. c. 16.

in a manner so contrary to their usual conduct and foresight, and which so plainly carries with it the marks of an artful, yet ill-concerted design. The reader may see both letters at length in Mr. Le Grand's relation, often quoted in this chapter (6), together with some other anecdotes relating to this, and some other transactions of the like kind, from which he may perhaps form a more satisfactory judgment of them.

(S) The sequel of this embassy, so far as it relates to our present subject, was this:

Fr. Alvarez, who was burning with a holy zeal to go and throw himself at his holiness's feet, and to kiss his slipper, in the name of his Abissinian majesty, could hardly brook the delay which he met with at the court of Portugal. On the one hand, it was thought fit that his colleague, Zagaza-Ab, should tarry some time there, to be carefully examined about the faith and practice of the Abissinian church, and to that end was turned over to the famed historian John de Barros, and Amien de Goex, to be carefully sifted in every point, whose answers they immediately committed to writing.

On the other, the king of Portugal, who designed to send likewise an embassy of his own to Rome, hesitated a good while before he could fix upon a proper person; but at length nominated his own nephew Don Martin to it, and ordered him a suitable equipage and retinue. But Zagaza-Ab, not having given his two inquisitors the satisfaction they expected from him, but having been frequently caught prevaricating with them, was not deemed fit to be sent with them, but was still detained in Lisbon, where he wrote a treatise of the Abissinian faith; which was afterwards translated into Latin by Amien de Goex, and published in the Spania Illustrata, among the affairs that related to Portugal; but which hath gained but little credit among the learned, as may be seen by the account which the judicious Codignus hath given, both of it and its author (7).

Whilst he was thus employed at Lisbon, his colleague Alvarez, and Don Martin, set out thence for their embassy, and arrived at Bolonia in the month of January 1533, where Charles V. was to be crowned emperor by the Roman pontif, in the view of a vast concourse of people, of all ranks, who flocked thither from all parts, to see that grand solemnity. And here it was that Alvarez appeared in the character of his Abissinian majesty's ambassador, paid homage to, and harangued his holiness on the occasion, and delivered into his hands the emperor's letter, whether genuine or counterfeit, and was received with all the joy and affection imaginable by that pontif (8); whilst his Abissinian colleague, the learned Zagaza-Ab, was shamefully detained and discredited in Portugal, till the year 1539, for no other reason, perhaps, than because he would not concur with the accounts which the jesuits had given of the Abissinian faith, nor father all the errors which they had laid to his church's charge. How he was rewarded for it, we shall see in the sequel, (6) Pag. 451, & seq. & alib. pass.

warex, Hist. Ethiop. Tellez, l. ii. Ludolph, l. ii. c. 16. n. 11, & seq.

(7) Codign. de Reb. Abissin. p. 2, et seq. 214, et alib.

(8) Al-

and

a and gave him a second defeat; but all this did not hinder him from going on with his conquests and ravages, inasmuch that, from this time to that of that monarch's death, which happened twelve years after, he ceased not making new conquests and devastations, plundering and burning where-ever he came, till he had reduced the greater part of the empire to the utmost extremity. What increased the general disaster still more, was, that many of the nobles and grandees went over to the Moorish general, and sided with him; the greatest part of whom, as well as of the Abissinians, whom he had taken prisoners, made no scruple to turn Mohammedans; which we need the less wonder at, if what we formerly observed out of Alvarez be true, that they believe that rebaptization will wash away all the stain and guilt of their apostacy, as soon as they think proper to apply to it, and return to their church and faith<sup>a</sup>.

b THIS was the dismal state to which the empire was reduced, by the irresistible forces of the Adelian king, under his successful Moorish general, who, like an impetuous torrent, carried all before him, when the unfortunate emperor bethought himself of applying afresh to the Portuguese for aid. The person he made choice of to negotiate that important affair, was the Portuguese physician, John Bermudez, whom Don Roderiguez de Lima had left behind with him. In order therefore to procure him and himself the greater credit at the courts of Rome and Lisbon, where he was to appear in the character of his ambassador, he caused him to be installed Abuna of Ethiopia; for as he was known to be a staunch catholic, it could not but give an evident proof of that monarch's affection to that church, and interest those two courts in his favour, and give a success to the negotiation. And it was probably the great distress which the emperor and his dominions were in, that prevailed upon the old Abuna, who was then alive, to nominate him his successor, and consecrate him in that dignity, rather than any inclination he can be supposed to have had towards the church of Rome.

c HOWEVER that may be, Bermudez, to make the greater dispatch, crossed over the Red Sea and went through Palestine, as not only the quickest, but likewise the safest, way to get to Rome, which he did not however reach till after the death of Pope Clement VII. to whom his credentials, and the emperor's letter, were directed. But this did not hinder his being received by his successor, Paul III. with the honours due to his double character: and we may add, that no embassy from that empire met with greater and more speedy success than this. The Pope immediately ordered his bulls to be dispatched, by which he created him patriarch, not only of Abissinia, but likewise of Alexandria; and with these, and a letter of recommendation to the king of Portugal, he set sail for Lisbon, where he met with the same kind reception and dispatch.

d By this time so many complaints had been made against his colleague Zagaza Ab, at the Abissinian court, that he had received orders from the emperor to arrest him and clap him in irons, for his pretended neglect and ill conduct, which was accordingly done by Bermudez; but at the request of the king of Portugal, his double irons were taken off some days after. He was however continued in his imprisonment, stripped of his ambassadorial dignity, and forced to resign himself up wholly to his custody, in order to be brought back by him into Abissinia, and give there an account of his ill success, or, as they were pleased to stile it, his ill conduct, during his long stay at that court. This strange transaction Bermudez himself hath not scrupled to give us at full length, in the very beginning of his history; though a judicious and impartial reader will discover much more of Romish policy in it, than either of neglect or guilt in his unhappy prisoner.

e HOWEVER that be, John III. glad of such an opportunity of sending so many of his subjects into Abissinia, ordered him to be furnished with 450 musketeers from India, and charged the viceroy of Goa to receive him with the honour due to his character, and to dispatch the forces above-mentioned into Abissinia, with all possible speed.

f BERMUDEZ sailed away accordingly on the next year for Goa, and met with the wished-for readiness in the governor, Don Garcia de Noronha, to give all possible dispatch to the king's orders; but unfortunately died before he could fully complete them. He was succeeded by Don Stephen de Gama, who quickly finished what was still wanting, and conveyed the whole succour, together with the patriarch Bermudez, into Abissinia, with all convenient speed. And great need there was of such dispatch; for, during Bermudez's absence, the emperor's affairs had gone still from bad to worse; inasmuch, that he had been reduced by the Moorish general to seek for shelter among some of the inaccessible mountains; from which he had been again forced to retire, to the top of that of Damo; where, with some few of his bravest men, he endeavoured to defend himself for some time, hardly now able to bear the name, much less to support the dignity, of a monarch. But in this invincible fortress, he was forced to yield his crown and life to that more infallible conqueror death, in the forty-second year of his age, and thirty-third of his reign; the first twenty of which had been as happy and prosperous, as

<sup>a</sup> See before, p. 242.

1540. and distracted condition.

the thirteen last proved distracted and unfortunate <sup>c</sup>. This was the sad catastrophe of the emperor David, or, as he is styled in his supposed letters above-mentioned, Soltan Segued, in the flower of his age; but quite exhausted by cares, and the most affecting distresses; abandoned, and even hated by most of his subjects; surrounded by a victorious and implacable enemy; confined on a barren and inaccessible rock, with a handful of men; his empire above half conquered, depopulated, and laid waste, and in the possession of Mohammedans, the most inveterate enemies of Christianity; one of his sons, named Menas, an unhappy prisoner amongst them; besides many thousands of his other subjects, who, to lighten the weight of their chains, had shamefully apostatized from their religion, and undergone the scandalous and indelible stigma of circumcision; all which dreadful disasters he could not but be deeply sensible were chiefly owing to his unhappy and indiscrete propensity to, and zeal for, the church of Rome, and the Pope's supremacy, which had alienated the hearts of his best subjects from him, and rendered the whole Abissinian clergy his most irreconcilable enemies. No wonder then if such a load of complicated misfortunes crushed him thus immaturely into his grave, and before he could receive the comfortable news of the succours that were hastening to him from Goa <sup>d</sup>.

Succeeded by his son Claudios, or Claudius.

His excellent character, and learning.

He was succeeded by his eldest son Claudios, or Claudius, then in the eighteenth year of his age, and under the regency of his mother Cabelo Oanguel (T). This prince, who took then the surname of Asnaf Segued, was a prince of singular wisdom and excellent qualities, even by the confession of the jesuit missionaries, who were not otherwise greatly affected to him, as we shall soon see. His person was graceful, tall, and majestic; his disposition truly generous; his learning greatly exceeded not only most of his predecessors, but even that of his whole clergy. He was perfectly acquainted with the antiquities and constitutions of the Abissinian church; and in his disputations, often nonplussed those learned fathers, and with great zeal and warmth repelled the calumnies of that church, particularly with relation to circumcision, rebaptization, confession, holy communion <sup>e</sup>, &c. In a word, he was a wise and excellent prince; and every way worthy not only of the empire, but likewise of a longer and more prosperous reign than he enjoyed.

Takes a different course
from his father.

UPON his first accession to the throne, as he could not but have observed how fatal his father's propensity to the church of Rome, and ill-timed regard for the missionaries, had been to him, he wisely resolved to regain the alienated hearts of his subjects, by a quite opposite conduct to his; and though he was continually intangled in wars with the king of Adel, and other neighbours, and chiefly depended upon the succours which were sending to him from Portugal, without which he might plainly see that it was impossible for him to save his empire from being totally over-run by them; yet did not this deter him from publicly declaring his utter dislike to the church of Rome; disowning his father's letters to the Pope and king of Portugal, his confession of faith, and submission to the Pope; and condemning the whole as a forgery and politic contrivance of the missionaries, in order to bring the Abissinian church and empire under a foreign yoke. And though he did not deprive those fathers, and their converts, from the free exercise of their religion, yet he took care so to discountenance and discourage their zeal for making new converts amongst his subjects, that many of the old ones made no scruple to return to their mother church <sup>f</sup>.

Missionaries discouraged.

Raises an army.
Various successes.

1541.

Don Christopher de Gama's arrival.

As he was no less valiant than prudent, his next care was to levy a sufficient number of troops to oppose those of the king of Adel and other invading Moors; and signalized the beginning of his reign, by the total overthrow which he gave to the Moor Amirozman. He was, however, soon after, so over-powered by him, that he was forced to flee into the kingdom of Xaoa, with only about seventy or eighty of his men, and to spend the whole winter there, in expectation of the Portuguese succours, which came accordingly soon after, and just time enough to save the empire from being wholly swallowed up by the Mohammedans, by the very next year. Don Stephen de Gama, then governor of the Indies, having entered the Red Sea, at the head of a considerable fleet, through the straits of Babel-mandel, had, by this time, done some great services to the emperor, by the ravages he had committed along the Arabian coasts, and sufficiently scattered those infidels, when he came to anchor at the island of Mazowa; from which he sent a reinforcement of four hundred men to the assistance of the Abissinian emperor, under the command of his own brother, the brave Don Christopher de Gama. These immediately took their route through those sandy deserts and uncouth mountains, having at their head the new patriarch Bermudez, who had been appointed chief of this

<sup>c</sup> Id. ibid.
ubi sup.

<sup>d</sup> Id. ibid.

<sup>e</sup> TELLEZ, c. 27.

<sup>f</sup> TELLEZ, LOBO, LUDOLPH, & al.

(T) Soltan Segued left four sons; the eldest of whom, named Vistor, died before him. Claudius was next in succession, and mounted the throne accordingly. The third was called Menas, and had been taken prisoner by Granbe, the Moorish general; but by some means, which we are not told, had regained his liberty, and afterwards succeeded his brother. After him came the fourth son, named Tastarus, as we shall see in the sequel (9).

(9) Tellez, lib. ii. c. 27. Ludolph, l. ii. c. 6, n. 17, et seq.

expedition,

- a expedition, and, out of regard to the governor, Stephen de Gama, had given the command of the four hundred forces to his brother Christopher. The reader may easily judge, from the description we have elsewhere given of this country <sup>z</sup>, what difficulties they must have met with through such mountainous passes and defiles, through which they were forced to march with their unweildy equipage, and especially with their artillery: for as they had no proper carriage for that purpose, they found themselves obliged to get some timber to make them muskets as they had with them. As they proceeded farther into the country, they were met by shoals of people, who welcomed them as their deliverers; upon which, Bermudez deputed some of them to give notice of their coming to the empress Cabelo Oanguel, who made all the dispatch she could to come to meet them. The princess had been forced, for some time, to take refuge, for safety, on the top of mount Damo; which is of such difficult access, that there is no other way to get up to it, but by being hoisted up in baskets; but was now come down to meet them at the town of Dewarowa. The Portuguese, on their side, went about a league out of it to meet her majesty in battle array, with trumpets sounding and colours flying, and attended with the artillery. At their head was the patriarch Bermudez, whose blessing she first asked; after which she complimented Don Christopher, and the rest of the captains, and was conducted by them to the town above-mentioned <sup>h</sup>.
- TOWARDS the end of the year they left Dewarowa, and marched with that princess to go and join the king her son, who was then in a distant part of the empire, and posted on another mountain as inaccessible as that of Damo; and in their way they were met by a messenger, who was sent by Granbe the Moor, to enquire who they were, and what their business was in those parts? Don Christopher answered, that they were Portuguese; and that they were sent by their king to restore the emperor Claudius to his dominions, which the king of Adel had unjustly seized upon. After which he sent the messenger back, with a present of a few trinkets for his master, but with a much more considerable one to him (U). Granbe did not fail to resent the affront and answer; and though he was then advantageously posted on an eminence, yet was easily brought down to attack them, as he had with him 1000 horse and 5000 foot, besides 50 Turkish musketeers, and the same number of archers. Both sides came soon within reach of each other, whilst the empress, at the sight of the enemy, was in the utmost consternation, though the Portuguese had taken care to place her and her women in the centre, and well surrounded with the baggage. The Moorish general appeared, mounted on a stately horse, with his standard by his side; but was quickly dismounted, by a shot from a Portuguese gentleman, which killed his horse, and wounded him in the thigh; upon which he was carried off by his men. Don Christopher was likewise wounded in the leg; notwithstanding which, Bermudez ordered the empress's tent to be reared up in token of victory; which so disheartened the Moors, that they immediately retired, with their general, to his old post. Soon after which came a renegado, and first cousin to the Bahr-nagash, to compliment the Portuguese on their happy escape, occasioned by the wound given to Granbe; who, but for that, would have cut them all to pieces. And as their little camp was in great want of provisions, it being now the time of Lent, he promised to bring them a sufficient supply of them in a very few days; which he accordingly did: for being, as he said, governor of that whole territory, which of right belonged to the Abissinian emperor, he promised for the future to pay the tribute of it to him, instead of the king of Adel, who had forced him to pay it to him <sup>i</sup>.

- LENT was no sooner over, than Don Christopher, who was cured of his wound, received a fresh message from Granbe, with a promise that he would soon pay him a second visit; which he accordingly did; but with a more numerous force, both of horse and foot, than before, which threw the empress and her ladies into a fresh consternation. Don Christopher was ordering his troops to the best advantage to receive him by the very next morning, when the frightened empress gave Bermudez such a dreadful account of the enemy, as quite disheartened him from staying to see the upshot; so that she found no difficulty to persuade him to accompany her in her flight. They were, however, recalled by Don Christopher, not without some severe reproaches. Immediately after which, he desired him to bestow his blessing a upon him and his little army, together with a general absolution, as is the Portuguese custom upon such occasions ; which the patriarch not only granted, but superadded a plenary indulgence to them, pursuant to the commission he had received from the pope. On the next morning, Gives him another defeat. by the break of day, both armies engaged ; but that of the Moors was so terribly annoyed, not only by the Portuguese artillery, small arms, hand-grenadoes, and other fire, but chiefly by the quantity of gunpowder with which they had strewed all that ground, and set on fire as fast as they advanced, that the Turkish infantry began to retire with all the speed they could, whilst the cavalry, which was posted at some distance, seeing the havock which was made of them, stood motionless, not daring to move one step forward to assist them. The whole Moorish army soon betook themselves to a hasty flight, leaving in their camp abundance of b provision and rich plunder. Presently after which, great numbers of Abissinians, who had gone over to the Moors, came back, some on horseback, others on foot, and joined the Portuguese, to the great joy of the desponding empress, who ordered them to be rebaptized, probably on account of their apostacy (W).

<sup>z</sup> See before, p. 200, & seq. <sup>h</sup> BERMUDEZ, ubi sup. TELLEZ, LUDOLPH, LOBO, & al. ibid. <sup>i</sup> Id.

(U) The former of these presents consisted only of a small looking-glass, a silver egg wrought in the Peguan fashion, and a pair of hair-pincers; which was rather designed as an affront than a compliment; whilst those he gave to the messenger were two gold bracelets, a rich furniture trimmed with gold, a piece of Bengal gawse, and a Turkish cassock and vest; all which the empress had, by the patriarch's advice, furnished him with for that purpose (10).

Rele. ses a great number of captives.

Granbe applies to the Turks for succour.

Don Christopher gains an advantageous post.

THE desertion of that Moorish army obliged Granbe to apply to the Turkish basha, who resided in that neighbourhood, for fresh assistance, without which, he told him, it would be impossible for him to preserve that rich province to the Soltan his master, in whose name he had made himself master of it, and to whom he sent, in token of his fidelity, 100,000 ounges or ounces of gold, 20,000 of which were to be for the basha. Don Christopher, being apprised of this negotiation, was obliged to secure himself and his little army on the top c of a craggy high rock, and to cut a way up to it into the rock, by the assistance of his Abissinian troops ; which was nevertheless so streight, that they were forced to carry their cannon upon their shoulders. Not thinking himself secure enough there, he resolved to remove to a much higher rock, inhabited by Jews, but in the possession of the Moors, and guarded by a captain, and a garrison of 150 horse. He soon reached the place by the help of his Abissinian guides, and attacked the captain with such haste and bravery, that he killed sixty of his men, took thirty of their horses, and, by the assistance of the Jewish inhabitants, easily put the rest to flight, pursued, and killed several of the fugitives, and amongst them the captain ; and got a considerable plunder, and a good number of their wives ; particularly that of the commander, a woman of such beauty, that Don Christopher became enamoured of her, and reserved her for himself, and grew so jealous of her, that he cashiered d two brave captains for no other fault than looking, as he thought, upon her with too amorous an eye *.

Proudly rejects to surprize the Moors.

His standard-bearer slain, and he wounded.

WHILST this passed on the Jewish mountain, Granbe appeared at the head of 600 Turks, which the basha had sent him, and made their way up towards that where the empress and the rest of the Portuguese were posted ; which obliged them to send with the utmost dispatch for Don Christopher ; and, upon his return, proposed to him to surprize and attack the enemy in the night, on both sides, as the surest way to defeat them : but our proud Portuguese scornfully rejected the proposal as cowardly and dishonourable, and resolved to fight them in the broad day ; to which they were obliged to agree, though much against their will. Accordingly, as e soon as it was light, he prepared himself to give them the attack ; but one of his horses breaking loose, and running towards the Moorish camp, a scuffle immediately began between the two armies, which, unhappily, brought on the onset before they could put themselves in order. The fight was obstinately sustained on both sides ; a considerable number of Moors and Turks were slain ; and on the Portuguese side several brave cavaliers ; particularly Don Sebastian his standard-bearer, who maintained his post till he was quite spent with weariness and wounds, and was slain by the surrounding Moors. Don Christopher likewise received a grievous wound in his arm, yet continued fighting, till, abandoned by most of his men, he was forced to retire, with the few that stood with him, to a neighbouring eminence ; upon which the patriarch immediately advised the empress to withdraw with him thither ; whilst f she, unwilling to leave the rest of her women behind, absolutely refused to go, till he forced her, and the greatest part of the rest, before him.

* Id. ibid.

(W) We have elsewhere spoke of this ceremony of rebaptizing apostates (11) ; and it is very likely these had turned Mohammedans whilst they were under their government : for Granbe had seized this whole province for the Grand Signior, not only on account of its fertility, but much more likely because it belonged to the abuna, independently of the emperor, and brought him a yearly revenue of 3000 ounces of gold. This rich spot, we are told (12), is called the province of Nazareth ; and had been yielded by a former monarch, named Thedrus, to the patriarch, by way of reparation for some injury he had done to him.

(11) See before, p. 243.

(12) Bermud. relat. ubi sup. c. 2.

- a AMONG those that staid behind for want of horses was the empress's nurse, a virtuous and brave woman, with two of her daughters, and some other women of her retinue; and who, to avoid falling into the hands of the merciless Moors, set fire to a small barrel of powder, which she found in the tent, and put an end to all their lives and fears<sup>1</sup>. Her example was followed by about fifty or sixty soldiers, who, disabled by their wounds from providing for their safety, had recourse to the same violent remedy, and killed themselves on the spot (X). The empress, who had gained a place of safety by her flight, was glad to see the patriarch make towards her with her young daughter behind him, whom she supposed to have been left behind and blown up with her nurse; but was no less anxious about Don Christopher, whom she supposed to be either slain or taken prisoner. He appeared at length with his arm in a sling, and full of pain, but less sensible of his wound, than of his rashness and shameful defeat; the loss of so many brave men, and especially of his standard, drove him into a kind of despair, which nothing could assuage. It was with great difficulty that the patriarch prevailed upon him to mount, and accompany him and the empress, with the dismal residue of their forces, to some place of safety. In their flight they were obliged to ford through two deep rivers; and when they came to a third, over which was a draw-bridge, he stiffly refused to go farther, protesting that he would shoot himself if they offered to force him to it. The patriarch was obliged to comply with him, though with great regret; and, at his request, having heard his confession, and given him some balm to dress his wounds, took a sorrowful leave of him, and the few attendants that staid with him: these were his valet de chambre, his secretary, and three inferior Portuguese. The empress, being told of Don Christopher's strange resolution, could hardly be prevailed upon to go farther, till they heard the noise of some Moorish troops at a distance; which obliged her to make all the haste she could over the bridge, and to draw it up as soon as the rest were got over, in order to get out of the reach of the enemy, from whose hands they now began to fear it was impossible for Don Christopher to escape.
- b
- c BERMUDEZ and the empress continued their flight through mountains, wild deserts, and dangerous passes, for some days, and got at length over a large river, where they began to think themselves out of all danger, and where the governor of the country supplied them with plenty of provisions, which were the more welcome to them, as they had been forced to feed upon tamarinds, and other fruits, a great part of the way. Here the patriarch reviewed his remaining forces, amounting now scarcely to 300; and as he despaired of ever seeing Don Christopher any more, he nominated Don Alphonso de Caldeyra, a prudent and warlike commander, to succeed him. Soon after this arrived John Gonzales and Denis Alvarez, whom they had left with Don Christopher, who gave the following account of him to the empress:
- d THAT a woman, pursued by some Moors, being entered into the cavern where he lay concealed, they had followed her thither; and, as soon as they had spied him, asked who he was; to whom he made himself known with such readiness, that they could scarcely believe him, till an eunuch, who knew him perfectly well, assured them, that he was indeed Don Christopher de Gama; upon which they gladly conveyed him to Granbe, who was no less overjoyed to have him in his power; and, after several previous questions, assured him, that, if he would turn Mohammedan, and abandon the Abissinian emperor, he would load him with honours and favours. To this he answered, with a smile, that, being a servant of Jesus Christ, he scorned to exchange his religion for that of an impostor; which so exasperated Granbe, that he ordered him to be buffeted, and the hair of his beard to be pulled off. Being cooled again, he tried once more to persuade him, by the largest promises, to order his Portuguese troops to
- e

A lady blows herself and family up.

Don Christopher in great despair, refuses to follow the empress.

The patriarch and empress get safe away.

Don Christopher taken in cave.

Insulted by Granbe.

<sup>1</sup> BERMUD. ubi sup.

(X) Father Telles, who hath greatly embellished this whole action in favour of Don Christopher, and the rest of his brave Portuguese, says, that these wounded men, whom he only makes to amount to forty, were barbarously massacred by the Moors. He likewise swelled his account with several gallant exploits performed by that general and his brave officers, of which the patriarch Bermudez takes no notice at all, tho' he was an eye-witness of all that passed, and was himself a chief actor in every other part but that of fighting.

Father Lobo hath still farther illustrated the relation of his victories, last overthrow, and heroic death; with many rhetorical flowers; and new circumstances, which raise him to the highest degree of a hero, with regard to the first, and of a martyr of the first magnitude; with respect to the latter; and all this, on the bare authority of an old Abissinian, a pretended eye witness of the greatest part of them; particularly that of his martyrdom; when on the place where his head fell, there sprang up a miraculous fountain, whose waters cured all, even the most incurable diseases, and retained their virtue a considerable time (13).

We have, therefore, chosen to follow the plain and artless account of the good patriarch Bermudez, than whom none could be better acquainted with every transaction; nor, from the unaffected simplicity of his relation, can challenge a greater credit and regard, where-ever he asserts any thing from his own knowledge; though, in other respects, he is justly blamed for his too great credulity; even by those, who with equal justice commend him for his honest simplicity (14).

(13) Lobo, apud Le Grand, relat. de L'Abissin. p. 91, & seq. Bermud. Telles, &c. Etiop. l. ii. c. 20.

(14) Telles hist. de

His constancy and policy.

leave Abissinia, and retire; which he immediately set about: but observing the eunuch, lately mentioned, to be set at his elbow, in order to watch every stroke of his pen, he found himself obliged to write what Granbe dictated to him, instead of what he himself intended to have done. However, to prevent any misapprehension of his true meaning, he took care to cross his name with two strokes, like two thorns, to intimate to his men to be very cautious in what they did. This letter, which was forthwith dispatched to them by two Moors, greatly alarmed the empress; who, taking it in the sense it was wrote in, could not forbear breaking out into bitter complaints against the writer, in whom she had placed her whole confidence; so that she was not less delighted at his artifice, when the meaning of the cross thorns was explained to her. The new general Alfonso de Cadeyra having undertaken to answer the letter in the name of the rest, with the same precaution sent him word, that he might applaud himself in the favour of Granbe; but that, as for himself and his men, they neither wanted nor sought it; being all resolved to complete, like true Christians, the work for which the king their master had sent them thither; which was to destroy Granbe, and deliver the empire from his tyranny.

Outwits the Moorish general.

THIS answer was no sooner delivered into Don Christopher's hands, than he carried it to Granbe; who, not suspecting the artifice, made him no reproaches about it, but only asked him how he came to be so soon healed of his wounds: to which he answered, that it was by means of an extraordinary composition which he had about him, which never failed of making a speedy cure. Here Granbe desired him to make the same use of it on his captain-general. Lobo<sup>m</sup> adds, that he was his uncle, who had been grievously wounded in a late encounter (Y); instead of which, he dressed his wound with such corrosives as killed him in less than three days; and, being taxed with it, answered, that he came to destroy, not to cure, the enemies of Christ. This bold answer so exasperated the Moorish general, that he caused him to be severely cudgelled, and even threatened him with immediate death: to whom Don Christopher calmly answered, You can only kill my body, but my soul is Christ's, who will receive it into eternal life. Upon which he ordered him to be immediately conveyed to the place where the other wounded Portuguese had been massacred, and to be there beheaded<sup>n</sup>. Tellez and Lobo say, that Granbe fell into such a rage at his answer, that he struck off his head with his own hand<sup>o</sup>. However that be, Bermudez confirms the legend of the miraculous fountain; and of the great cures it performed; and adds several other particulars relating to this martyr, which we shall not trouble our readers with; except that his head was sent to the basha of Kairo, one of his quarters to the province of Judab, another to that of Adel, and one of his legs to Zebid, the Turkish basha, who had sent him the reinforcement we lately mentioned: all which plainly shew how much he valued himself upon the advantage he had gained over a few Portuguese troops. Tellez<sup>p</sup> adds, that the basha Zebid, and his Turks, severely threatened him for having presumed to put him to death, instead of having sent him to Constantinople, as they designed to have done; which was the reason of his sending his head to Kairo, in order to be thence conveyed to the Porte. Four hundred of the six hundred Turks, whom Zebid had sent him, were ordered back, and only two hundred staid with him, to secure the tribute he had engaged to pay to the Grand Signior. These last particulars were brought to the new Portuguese general, we are told, by one of their men, who had been taken by the Turks, but had since made his escape<sup>q</sup>. As for the remains of Don Christopher's body, they were left, we are told, by the patriarch on the spot where he had been executed; whence some Abissine monks afterwards conveyed them to their convent, where they were preserved with great veneration; and as the relicks of a faint and martyr, on account of the supernatural fragrancy they still retained, and the many miracles that were wrought by them<sup>r</sup>.

His intrepid behaviour, occasions his death.

His head and limbs sent away.

Esteemed a miraculous martyr.

<sup>m</sup> Relation de l'Abissin. ap. LE GRAND, p. 93.
ibid. <sup>q</sup> Ubi sup. <sup>r</sup> BERMUD. & al. ubi sup.

<sup>n</sup> LOBO, & al. ubi sup.

<sup>o</sup> Ubi sup.

<sup>p</sup> Ibid.

(Y) This was, according to the same author, in defending a strong important pass, which he had intrusted him with, and from which, in spite of his valour and stout opposition, they had forced him by their continual fire. He adds, by way of embellishment, that Granbe, tho' his nephew, could not forbear treating him with opprobrious language at his return: to which the old general could only answer, that the Portuguese were not men, but devils, who spit fire out of their mouths. Upon which account, he had, it seems, endeavoured since to dissuade his nephew from attacking them afresh; but he, flushed with his former victories, despised his advice; alleging to him, that mountains never flinch. It happened soon after, that the old general caught his nephew flying from the enemy, and asked him, "whether mountains fled?" To which he replied, "No; but neither run they into the fire; for there is a deal of that in the place whence I come." Which answer is since become a kind of proverb among the Abissines, who, when they want to express the difficulty and danger of an enterprize, commonly cry out, The mountains do not run into the fire; and there is a deal of it in that (15).

- a superior enemy in the night ; by which he not only lost a fair opportunity of cutting them all in pieces, and, in all likelihood, of putting an effectual stop to all future hostilities from them ; the Moors being known to be so far from daring to fight in the night, that they dare not even stir out their tents ; but occasioned the loss of a great number of his men, and threw the rest of them, as well as the empress and her retinue, into that dreadful danger and distress in which we saw them. Neither is it likely, that both she, the patriarch, and his own commanders, in the confusion they were then in, could forbear upbraiding him with it in the strongest terms. And this was, questionless, the motive that induced him, against all their united efforts and persuasions to the contrary, to stay behind, and throw himself into the enemy's hands, in order to retrieve his character by a glorious and resolute martyrdom.
- b BUT it is time to return now to his little flying army, whom we left in a place of plenty and safety, where they were soon after, to their inexpressible joy, joined by a reinforcement The empress reinforced. of 150 horse and 1000 foot, with Asmache de Douro, and Asmache de Guidini, at their head. These were, it seems, subjects of the young emperor Claudius, and were presently introduced to the empress, to whom they gave the same account of Don Christopher's death, which she had received before ; adding, that they had fled from Granbe's camp immediately after his late victory, whilst he, they told her, flushed with his success, was advancing, by large strides, towards the lake Dembea, with a full design to attack the young emperor, who was then encamped with his army in the neighbourhood of it. The empress gave them a gracious They all march to the Jewish mountains. reception ; soon after which, they all marched together towards the frontiers of the Jewish mountain, where their chief met them with a fresh supply of provisions and refreshments, and invited the empress to retire into that mountainous territory, where she would be in all imaginable safety ; there being but one entrance into it, which could be easily defended against the enemy, if he should attempt to force it. They accepted his offer ; and, as soon as they were entered into the mountain, he begged that he might be admitted to baptism ; which was readily complied with by the patriarch, and Don Caldeyra stood his godfather.
- WHILST they continued in this mountain, the young emperor arrived at the foot of it, attended by a few of his men, in a sorry plight. The Portuguese went down to receive him, Where the young emperor joins them. with whom he condoled for the loss of their general with some seeming regret ; but bid them not to be too much discouraged, or think themselves in a strange country, but to look upon it now as their own, where they would be speedily furnished with cloaths, tents, mules, servants, and all other necessaries. In answer to which, after suitable thanks, they assured his majesty, that, since they had lost their old commander, they would now accept of no other but him ; after which they accompanied him to the tent of the patriarch. Here, again, he was not a little pleased to see the patriarch come to the door to receive him, looking upon it as a piece of great condescension, because the abuna is as much respected there as a pope is at Rome, and alighted from his horse to receive his blessing. From thence he passed into the empress's mother's tent, and, after a little stay, was conducted to his own, which had been reared in the centre of their camp. During his abode there, which was about two months, he got together most of his forces, amounting to about 500 horse and 8000 foot, deemed sufficient by Stays with them two months. the Portuguese, when joined by theirs, to attack the Moors ; which they begged his majesty to do, and revenge the death of their late noble general. The young prince appeared somewhat diffident of his strength ; but being told, that Granbe had but 200 of the 600 Turks, which their basha had sent him, he readily consented.
- BUT before they came to be thus unanimous, the young emperor had been obliged to put up with a great deal of insolence from Bermudez and them, before they would consent to fight Grievous contest between him and the patriarch. for him, or even stay longer in his dominions. This circumstance Tellez seems to have carefully avoided mentioning in his history, as reflecting some dishonour on the patriarch and Portuguese chief ; though he himself hath made no scruple to give the world a full account of it, and in such terms as shew that he valued himself not a little for it, as it discovered how resolutely they were bent to take advantage of his present situation, to oblige him to establish the pope's authority in his dominions. But as it doth not so strictly relate to the political as to the ecclesiastical state of the empire, though, in other respects, well worth a curious reader's notice, we shall give the substance of it in the margin (Z), that we may the more closely stick to the main part of our history.

<sup>s</sup> BERMUD. ibid. & al.

<sup>t</sup> BERMUD. TELLEZ, LOBO, &c. ubi sup.

SOON

(Z) The good patriarch, as himself informs us (16), having prepared his Portuguese troops, in a set speech he made to them, to assist him in the rooting all schism and heresy out of the country, by reducing both king and clergy to the pope's obedience, went and addressed himself to the young monarch in the same pathetic style, calling him his dearest son (he was, it seems, his godfather), and telling him, that, if he designed to shew himself a worthy successor of his late father, of pious memory, he must resolve to follow his steps, and send a proper ambassador to Rome, to assure the sovereign bishop of all bishops of his sincere and dutiful obedience to him ; and, to assure him that his father had done so before him, he shewed him his letter to that pontif, in

(16) Bermud. relat. c. 3.

MOD. HIST. VOL. VI.

Y y y

which

Arias Diz
chosen general.

The young emperor tries to give them the slip.

Engage Gran-
he as a frisk.

The young emperor's strange behaviour.

Soon after matters had been accommodated between the young emperor and the patriarch, and every thing was preparing to attack the enemy, the new Portuguese general Don Alfonso being dead by a fall from his horse, one Arias Diz, a gentleman who had been in Ethiopia ever since the year 1520, and had been intrusted by the former monarchs with some considerable commissions, was nominated in his room, at the desire of the young prince, who had put a great confidence in him. But young Claudius had still another view in it; for being quite dissatisfied with the patriarch's tyrannic behaviour to him, he had formed a design to give him the slip; to which end, he desired of him to permit the new general, and his Portuguese soldiers, to go with him on a secret expedition, that would turn to the glory of God. Bermudez, though he suspected his design, nevertheless consented, relying on Diz's fidelity. Accordingly, as soon as he had got the rest of his army ready, and had reached the mountain where Granbe and his forces were posted, he sent an express to Diz, to join him with all speed, and to bring the young emperor with him. Upon their arrival, they left the empress in a place of safety, and marched on through very craggy passes and narrow defiles, where, in their way, they met with a Moorish commander, at the head of 300 horse and 2000 foot, in the province of Ogara, and attacked them by break of day with such suddenness, and loud shoutings, as made all the mountains echo with their voices. Fifty Portuguese horse, who led the van, slew the commander with most of his men, and took many others prisoners, who informed them, that Granbe was at a place not far off, named Daraskea, in the kingdom of Dembea, near the place where the Nile crosses the lake of that name, and where his wife and children, who had been from him a long while, were come to join him soon after Don Christopher's defeat.

THIS good success was soon followed by the death of the Abissine general, who, having ventured too far on a skirmish, was surrounded by another party of the Moors, who quickly covered him with wounds, and, after their brutish manner, cut off his privities; the news of which so afflicted the young emperor, that he shed a flood of tears for him, tore his hair, and cast his crown to the ground, and shewed the most excessive tokens of grief and despair. This affliction was soon after followed by the news, that Granbe was in full march against him; which threw him into such a panic, that he resolved to save himself by flight; and would actually have done so, had not a Babrnagash apprised the patriarch of it, who immediately came out of which he made a full acknowledgement of his plenary authority over the church of Christ.

This speech was made to him in the presence of his mother, who was then in his tent; but the young Claudius, like a rash youth, who little minds what he says (these are the patriarch's own words), plainly told him, that he did neither own him for his father nor his patriarch; and that he was the abuna of the Franks, and an Arian, who believed in four Gods. Whereupon, Bermudez as bluntly told him, that he lied in saying that he worshipped four Gods; but, added, he, "since you refuse to obey the holy father, I shall only look upon you as an excommunicated and accursed person, and will concern myself no more about you;" and, so saying, rose off his seat to be gone; and did so, without receiving any other answer from the young prince than this, "You are the excommunicated person, and not I."

The next step the patriarch took, after having acquainted his Portuguese with what had passed, was to forbid them all, under pain of death and excommunication, to assist the young monarch, or, in any case, to regard his commands. To this they answered, that, as neither they nor their ancestors had ever been disloyal to the pope or their prince, so neither would they now to him. A little while after, one of the emperor's officers being sent to distribute 3000 ounces of gold among them, and to make their general some valuable present, they all unanimously excused themselves, and sent him word, that the breach he had made with their patriarch would not permit them to accept of any thing from him, or to do him any further service.

This answer obliged the young monarch immediately to hold a council, in which it was resolved that the empress should go to the patriarch, accompanied with an archbishop of his ordaining, to beg pardon of him for her son, and to promise, in his name, that he would do every thing he should enjoin him, with respect to the pope. She came accordingly, and, in the humblest terms, delivered her message to the patriarch, who, instead of being softened by her tears and intreaties, insolently told her, that he had now nothing left to do but to retire with his troops into Portugal with all possible speed. This rough speech brought the afflicted princess upon her knees, and made her renew her intreaties to him with such vehemence and such floods of tears, that, being at length overcome by them, he accompanied her to her son's tent. At their arrival, the young monarch came out to receive him, and, in the humblest manner, took hold of his hand, and kissed it, and begged pardon for what had passed.

Here they all three sat down, and the young prince began the discourse, with assuring him of his readiness to obey the prince of bishops; but asked the patriarch, whether the homage paid to him by his father might not be sufficient, without his being obliged to send a fresh embassy to him? "No," answered the prelate, "you must send one in your name, which is no more than what every prince in Europe is obliged to do as soon as he comes to the crown: and since you have not done it hitherto, you must now perform it to me, who am commissioned by his holiness to receive it from you. Besides which," continued he, "you must give me an ample testimony in writing, signed with your own hand, and sealed with your own seal, and in the name of all your kingdoms and provinces, in which you shall make public acknowledgement, that God hath no more than one church, and one vicar of Jesus Christ, in all the world, from whom all the power and rights of all Christian princes and prelates immediately flow." He insisted further, that this public act should be read, with an audible voice, on some eminent place, and in the hearing of all the people, by one of the chief officers of the realm. To all which the young emperor was glad to submit; and the act, concludes the author, was accordingly read with the utmost pomp and solemnity, and with the sound of the trumpet (17).

- a the monastery, where he had retired to pray with the rest of the monks, or perhaps rather to be out of harm's way, whilst his troops were preparing to encounter with the Moorish army, and, with difficulty, prevailed upon the pusillanimous prince to stay, and encourage his forces by his presence against the approaching enemy<sup>a</sup>.

ALL this while, Granbe was advancing at the head of 13,000 horse and foot, and his 200 Turkish musqueteers. He was mounted on a stately white horse, and had a Turk on each side. Several bloody skirmishes happened; in one of which an Abissine general, having been treacherously drawn into a pretended parley with the enemy, was murdered by them; which so discouraged the rest of the Abissine forces, that the emperor, to prevent a desertion, consented they should engage next morning by break of day. Accordingly the Portuguese, leading the van with 200 Ethiopian horse and 350 foot, set forward with great eagerness, whilst the emperor, who brought up the rear with 250 horse more, and 4,500 foot, stood with them posted on an eminence, to see them begin the onset. Granbe made no less haste to meet his enemy, and advanced in two lines; one of which he led himself, which consisted of the 200 Turks above-mentioned, 600 Moorish horse, and 7000 foot: the other consisted of 600 horse and 6000 foot, and was commanded by another general. The onset, according to Tellez, and other Portuguese writers, was very fierce and furious for some time on both sides, except on that of the Abissinians, who were easily thrown into disorder by the Turks, and, with some difficulty, were rallied by the Portuguese. In the height of the engagement, Granbe appearing on his white horse, with his Turks on each side, to support his own men, and venturing too near the enemy, a Portuguese, named Peter Lion, a man of low stature, but an excellent marksman, seeing him to be within gun-shot, let fly at him with such dexterity, that he quickly brought him sprawling on the ground. The two Turks fell dead on each side of him by some other shot, before they could carry his body off; which being observed by the rest of his troops, they immediately turned their backs without striking another stroke. The other Turkish general did indeed maintain the fight some time longer with great bravery, and, whilst the emperor's forces were in pursuit of the flying Moors, made a stout defence against the Portuguese, till all the 200 Turkish musqueteers were slain, except 14, who fled to Granbe's wife, and acquainted her with their defeat, and her husband's death. Upon the news of which, she immediately rode away with 250 horse, that were left to guard her, and all the treasure that Granbe had been hoarding up during the war. All this time the Portuguese were busy in slaying all that fell in their way, and plundering the camp, in which they found, besides a considerable spoil, a prodigious quantity of provisions, and a great number of Abissinian captives, whom they released, to their no small joy; some meeting with their parents, others with their children, wives, relations, and friends; so that they could not but express the liveliest gratitude to their brave deliverers; and the young emperor failed not to give them the greatest marks of his esteem for their signal bravery, and for so effectual a victory, which paved the way to the recovery of a great part of his dominions: and, among other tokens of his thankfulness to God for it, ordered a noble monastery to be built on the field of battle, in honour of our Lord Jesus Christ<sup>w</sup> (A).

<sup>a</sup> Ibid. ibid.<sup>w</sup> BERMUD. ubi sup. TELLEZ, ex ALMEYDA, LOBO, & al.

(A) Bermudez, however, adds a singular circumstance, which reflects no small discredit on the Abissinian gratitude, especially with regard to the young monarch. It is as follows: One of his officers having observed Granbe to fall off his horse, took an opportunity to cut off his head; which, as soon as the fight was over, he came and laid at his majesty's feet, and took upon him the honour of being the person who had slain him, and of course, of being the chief instrument of that complete victory. The young emperor, glad at heart to hear that he owed so signal a service to one of his subjects, not only thanked him very affectionately for it, but made him captain-general of all his forces.

Unluckily for the Abissinian boaster, the general Arias Dix, who was thoroughly acquainted with the affair, begged of his majesty to examine how many ears were on that head; which he did, and found that one of them had been lately cut off: upon which, he took the liberty to tell him, that that ear wanting was in the possession of a person of much superior valour to the braggadocio;

one who had actually shot the Moorish king, and cut off that ear, whilst his Abissinian forces were viewing the engagement from a distant eminence, where they stood posted; and, for a confirmation of what he said, ordered Peter Lion to be brought, who immediately produced the ear; which was found to match the other so exactly as to put the matter out of all doubt.

Lion, however, desired the bragging officer to shew him the weapon with which he had given Granbe his death-wound: to which he giving no answer, the Portuguese told his majesty, that, if they examined the dead body, they would find that he had been killed by a musket-ball; a weapon, added he, which he knows not how to use. This circumstance, upon examination, being likewise verified, the young monarch was covered with confusion, and ordered his officer to be cashiered and disgraced (18): for this brave soldier had, it seems, formerly belonged to Don Christopher de Gama, and had done that action merely to revenge his death.

(18) Bermudez, cap. 3. Tellez, ex Almeyda.

Some of them conduct his mother to him.

Granbe's head carried about the empire.

They all submit, and are pardoned.

The Portuguese fall out with the emperor.

The patriarch irritates him
by his proud demands; and obliges him to yield.

The king of Adel marches against them.

Is defeated, and killed.

His queen taken prisoner, and given in marriage to Arias Diz.

THE king and his army descending from the high grounds of Oynadaga, came and in-camped on the banks of the Dembean lake, where they tarried two whole months; in which time, forty Portuguese, who had formerly fled from the slaughter, when Don Christopher was defeated, and had taken the way to Mazowa, with a design to embark for Portugal, hearing of Granbe's overthrow and death, returned back, and, taking the empress with them, came and joined the imperial camp. All this while, the head of Granbe, which had been shewed first to that princess, was conveyed and shewed through all the other parts of the empire, together with the news of his total overthrow, occasioned such universal rejoicings among all the people, that the Moors, who were posted in garisons in several kingdoms and provinces, by which means they held them in subjection, hearing of this grand defeat, thought fit to abandon all those strong-holds, and those countries were glad to return to their obedience; and even those who had been most forward in going over to them, and had changed their religion, in order to obtain better terms from them, were, upon their re-submission, all pardoned, and received into favour. Great rejoicings were likewise made at the arrival of the empress, whose son went to meet her about a league off his camp, yet without acquainting the patriarch with it; which shewed that he still retained his former resentment;
so that that princess was not a little surpris'd at his not being of the company, and no less displeased when he acquainted her with the reason of it.

BUT this was not the only instance, in which the young prince mortified both him and the Portuguese that were with him. Among those governors of provinces, that had been pardoned for going over to the Mohammedans, and shewing an irreconcilable hatred to them, there was one of them, who, by his defection, had occasioned Don Christopher's defeat; against whom, therefore, they made strong remonstrances to the emperor, but in vain; his majesty telling them, that as he had given his word to pardon him, he could not go back from it. Which behaviour so exasperated the vindictive Portuguese, that they at once rushed into the traitor's tent, and stabbed him to death with their daggers *.

THIS piece of insolence, which the young monarch was obliged to let go unpunished, on account of their great services, did, however, give him to understand what tyrannic lords he was likely to fall under, if he did not take some proper means to suppress them. On the other hand, the haughty patriarch was daily soliciting him, in the strongest terms, to perform the engagements he had forced from him, to make a public abjuration of the Abissinian heresy, and submit to the pope and church of Rome. He proceeded so far as to threaten him with excommunication, and the withdrawing his Portuguese forces; the worst of it was, that he had, about this time, received a haughty message from the exasperated king of Adel, on account of his ill-treatment of the late vanquished Granbe, and causing his head to be carried through all his dominions. He threatened him, that he should soon find a second and more formidable Granbe in him, and be once more stripped by him of all his newly-recovered dominions. The young emperor saw himself obliged to manage the prelate and his Portuguese, till he, by their assistance, had got the better of his powerful foe; and only begged time till then to perform his promises to them. He intreated him to stay behind with the empress his mother, whilst he and his forces marched with the Portuguese against the enemy †. After a long and tedious march, they came to a broad but shallow river, on the other side of which the Adelian monarch and his forces were incamped, and which the horse crossed over with ease, and the foot were ferried over on rafters covered with hides. All this was done in the night, without being perceived by the enemy; so that they came suddenly upon them, and plied their fire-arms so successfully against them, before they could put themselves in order of battle, that they made a great slaughter among them. Several Christians were likewise killed and wounded; and, among the latter, the young emperor, but not dangerously. At length, the king of Adel was slain; at the sight of which, his dastardly Moors betook themselves to a speedy flight; but were pursued with great slaughter, and a much greater number were taken prisoners, and, amongst them, the Adelian queen. The young emperor failed not to express his thankfulness to the Portuguese for this fresh victory; and, as a token of his gratitude, presented them with all the vast and rich plunder of the enemy's camp, to be equally divided amongst them: reserving only to himself the horse and scymitar of the slain king, and the person of the queen, whom he afterwards bestowed on Arias Diz, their general, together with the kingdoms of Doar and Belwa, in order to raise him to an equal degree with her, as well as to prevail upon her to become a Christian and his wife ‡.

THIS was indeed a master-piece of policy in that young monarch, and such as was likely to have disconcerted all the patriarch's measures, as we shall soon see, and rendered all his haughty threatenings vain and abortive, could any princely policy be an equal match with that of a selfish prelate, intrusted with such a plenary power both from the pope

* Iid. ibid.

† BERMUD. ubi sup. & al. sup. citat.

‡ BERMUD. in fin.

- a and king of Portugal over a set of slaves and bigots to their authority. The overthrow of Bermudez the Moorish army had no sooner restored peace and tranquillity to the empire; and the prince, with his victorious army, reached the kingdom of Dembea, than the flushed patriarch renewed his former instances with more boldness than ever; by which he became daily more irksome and odious both to him and his court. Arias Diz, the Portuguese general, gained and overcame by his late liberality, and raised to the royal dignity, had privately renounced the church of Rome, and been baptized into that of the country, and taken the name of Mark. The consequence of which was, that the young emperor, thinking himself sure of his interest, began to treat the patriarch with greater coldness and contempt, whenever he came into his presence. He now no more rose from his seat to receive his blessing, nor suffered him to sit any longer before him, or to remind him of his old promises. This strange behaviour soon raised in Bermudez all his pride and resentment, inasmuch that he scrupled not to tell him one day, renounces his instances to the emperor. that he was not only a shameful ingrate to the king of Portugal, by whose favours and victorious arms he was restored to his lost empire, but, which was still worse, a rebel to Jesus Christ, in violating that respect which was due to him as his representative; adding, that he would be accursed, rejected, and excommunicated, if ever he relapsed into the errors of the Alexandrian church, which God had suffered to fall under the tyranny of the Turks for its defection from the apostolic see of Rome. This speech, which rather exasperated than frightened the young monarch, was only answered with recriminations against the Romish church; after which, he bluntly told him, that if it was not out of consideration of his being his godfather, he would not scruple to have him drawn and quartered; upon which, he immediately withdrew to his own tent. Treats him with severity and scorn.
- b
- c

Not long after he received express prohibition to send any further orders to the Portuguese forces, who were now under the command of Marco, his captain-general, and should no longer obey any but him. To which he answered, that they, being subjects of the king of Portugal, were now no longer under any obligation to obey one who had proved a traitor to his king and religion; and that since his majesty still persisted in his refusal of submitting to the pope, contrary to his former promise, he was resolved to withdraw his forces and himself out of his empire; but was soon given to understand, that he was absolute master in his dominions, and expected them to pay obedience to his general, and to none else; the upshot of which was, that all, as one man, resolved to die sword in hand, in opposition to such ungrateful tyranny; and went about immediately to fortify their camp against him. The Portuguese fortify themselves against him.

The emperor, who interpreted this last step as bidding him open defiance, ordered them to be attacked with all speed; but with such ill success, that his cuirassiers, who were the foremost in the van, where either burnt to death, or forced to fly half burnt, by the fire which they set to a quantity of gunpowder scattered about in an ambush, into which they had drawn them by a feigned flight. This threw the king into a new fit of despair; upon which, the apostate Arias, now Marco, told him, that, since the Portuguese could not be vanquished by open force, he ought to try to do it by treachery. Pursuant to which advice, they were sent for by Claudius, who appeared extremely sorrowful for his too frequent breach of promise, and desirous again to make all possible satisfaction both to the patriarch and to them (B); but, in fact, meaning the very reverse; for Marco the traitor, whose counsel the young monarch followed in every thing, soon put him in a way to elude all their demands, by a double piece of fresh perfidy. viz. first, by forbidding all his subjects furnishing them with any kind of sustenance, and the other, by stopping their mouths with a timely donative of a considerable quantity of gold and fresh provisions, and a very valuable present to the patriarch, whilst the most proper means were taking for dispersing and confining their chiefs in several distant provinces of the empire, beyond the possibility of their ever re-uniting again. Repel the emperor's forces.

The Portuguese, however, were soon apprised of this treachery, as well as of his having obtained a new Abuna from the patriarch of Alexandria, who was coming to him with all the speed he could. Bermudez was forced to come afresh to expostulate with him; but, instead of fair promises, as formerly, had the mortification to hear it all owned and excused with his own mouth. The reason which he gave for the one was, that he chose thus to separate them to prevent their raising new troubles during his absence, he being just on the point of marching against the Gallas: "and as to you, my father," added he, "you must be content Marco betrays them by his counsel.

a BERMUD. ibid. c. 4.

(B) That is, as we are told, to the former, to give him leave, on the ensuing Christmas, to make a public ordination, over and above his making a public acknowledgment of his submission to the pope and church of Rome; and to the others, to bestow on them one third-part of the territories they had recovered for him. For these two additional conditions these incroachers had, it seems, extorted from him, since the former, in the time of his great distress (20).

(20) Bermudez, c. 4. Tellez, lib. ii. c. 3. Lobo, Le Grand, p. 295, & al.

MOD. HIST. VOL. VI.

Z Z Z

" to

" to stay in the territory of the Gaffates, where you will have nothing to do but to pray for " me, till my return. There you will be respected, and have that canton allotted to you " for your maintenance. I found it sufficient for myself and my few troops, during my late
 " stay in it, and doubt not but it will be so for you and yours." Marco coming in just then to desire the emperor to send to Alexandria for the new patriarch, was answered, " God bleſs
 " my dear Marco! My dear friend, the thing is already done <sup>b</sup>."

Bermudez

sent among the Gaffates.

Returns.

Marco's

death, and pompous funeral.The emperor's ingratitude to Bermudez.Prevented by Don Souza from being imprisoned.New stratagem of the emperor against the Portuguese.

BERMUDEZ was accordingly obliged to depart with his retinue, and some field-pieces, for the mountainous territory above-mentioned, under a strong guard, and arrived there after eight days difficult march; and, at his arrival, the captain ordered the heads of the people to pay him the revenue which they did to the emperor; which was done accordingly. About seven months after, hearing that the monarch was returned from his unsuccessful war against the Gallas, he resolved to return to him; and, to prevent the captain's opposing him, caused him, on some pretence, to be tied hands and feet, and severely cudgelled, some of his field pieces to be fired at random among his men, two of whom were killed by the shot; which threw the rest into such consternation, that they were glad to let him go unmolested, and even to intreat him to do so: which he the more readily did, as he was since told that the traitor Mark was dead, and had been buried with the utmost pomp by the emperor, and with as real grief as if he had been a brother, or some dear relation. Bermudez met, in his way to court, one of his Portuguese, who was taking possession of some lands which that monarch had assigned him, and who told him, that he had divided his Portuguese troops into two squadrons, and given the command of one of them to Lopez de Almanza, and that of the other to Gaspar de Souza, with a design that they should be always near his person; but that the Portuguese had rejected the first, as being a stranger, and one of the late Marco's partisans: so that the whole command of them was given to the latter. This news was the more welcome to the patriarch, as Souza was his nephew, and much attached to him.

He was accordingly joyfully received by those of his nation, and, in outward appearance, by the emperor; who sent him his compliments on his safe arrival, with a present of 500 ounces of gold; but was obliged to keep him at a distance, on account of his being then expecting the new Abuna from Alexandria. During his stay in the camp, he was given to understand, by an officer of distinction, under the most solemn promises of secrecy, that the emperor so highly resented his behaviour to him, especially his obliging him to acknowledge the Romish pontif, that he ran the greatest risk, if he did not quickly and privately withdraw himself. But as he still insisted on seeing and speaking to his majesty, he ordered two of his officers to seize and convey him to one of their ambas, or craggy high rocks, already described <sup>c</sup>, to prevent his ever getting out of his dominions. He was, however, soon rescued out of their hands by his brave nephew; who, when blamed for it by the emperor, made no scruple to tell him, that he had done nothing unworthy of his character, in rescuing their patriarch out of the hands of a tyrant, who knew only to return evil for good; and that he must not expect that he, or his Portuguese, should ever suffer a prelate of theirs, who had done him such signal services, to be cowardly given up to his resentment. Claudius, finding them so resolute in his defence, vouchsafed to invite him again to his presence, loaded him with fulsome caresses, and appointed him an income of 20,000 crowns per annum, as patriarch to them; whilst Joseph, now arrived in his dominions, was declared Abuna of the Abissines. To prevent their making any resistance to this establishment, he bethought himself of sending them into some distant province, on the frontiers of the Gallas, and of the kingdom of Adel, where he was sensible they would meet with but a cold welcome from the inhabitants, and be continually harassed by their neighbours (C).

ACCORDINGLY they were scarcely settled there, before the governor of that territory began to lay his treacherous design for cutting them all off; and would effectually have done it, had they not been constantly upon their guard, and had recourse at length to a stratagem, which they had often tried with success, and which would, at one lucky stroke, rid them of a foe so much superior to them in number <sup>d</sup>: for, in other respects, they were such pusillanimous dastards, that they refused to attack them as soon as they found themselves observed by the

<sup>b</sup> BERMUD. ubi sup. TELLEZ, ubi sup. LOBO, ib. LE GRAND, p. 93.

<sup>d</sup> See the last note.

<sup>c</sup> See before, p. 200, & seq.

(C) He made choice of the two small kingdoms of Dowaro and Bale, which he had lately bestowed on his favourite Marco, upon his marriage with the widow of the king of Adel, as has been already hinted; and, after that traitor's death, had given the government of it to one Calido, whom he knew to hate the Portuguese, and would be still a more inveterate enemy to them, as they were to be maintained out of the revenue of these provinces, and thereby greatly diminish his own. To crush them more effectually, the king immediately raised 7000 horse 6000 foot, and 600 archers, against their little squadron, which, our author tells us, hardly consisted now of 150 men (21).

(21) Bermud. ubi sup.

a enemy, till Calido himself appeared, and obliged them to move forward; little dreaming of the imminent danger he was in: for as he was easily known by his dress, he was no sooner come within reach of their musket-shot, than seven of their best marksmen, who had been posted in the front, let fly at him at once, even before the onset had begun; so that the rest, seeing their commander dead before them, immediately laid down their arms, and readily promised to submit, and pay their tribute to them; which they accordingly did. This lucky hit procured them four months respite; and the emperor, who always looked upon Calido with a jealous eye, was no less agreeably surpris'd at the news of his death, and sent a messenger to congratulate them upon their success.

The governor of Dowaro slain by them. The rest submit to them.

At the end of the four months, they received a fresh message from him, to acquaint them, that the Gallas would soon pour in their numerous forces upon their little camp; as they accordingly did, and made several attempts upon the eminence on which they were then advantageously posted during the space of ten or twelve days. The Portuguese, who dared not come out of their camp, killed great numbers of them with their fire-arms, as long as their powder lasted: but that being now wanting, and they being in expectation of the emperor's arrival, they set themselves about making it, the country abounding with saltpetre and wood, till he brought them a fresh supply. Upon his arrival, and seeing so great a part of these two kingdoms almost depopulated by those barbarians, he not only swooned away, and continued senseless a considerable time, but was in danger of losing his reason, through excess of grief. They took that opportunity to induce him to be again reconciled to the church of Rome, and to her patriarch, and to give him hopes, that if he did, providence would not fail of proving more favourable to him. He lent a deaf ear to them, and ordered them to follow him; which they did through several of his provinces, some of which had refused their tribute, and others were ready to follow their example; and by their help, reduced the one to their duty, and over-awed the rest.

1555:
A new irruption of the Gallas against them.

Their brave defence.

The emperor's excessive grief on his arrival.

Takes a progress with them through some of his provinces.

The patriarch closely watched.

THIS expedition being ended, about winter they desired to return to the province of Beth Miriam, where he had allotted them lands to live on. Bermudez followed them thither; but Don Gaspar de Souza, who was their commander, had strict orders to prevent his making his escape; whilst others of his Abissines were enjoined to have a watchful eye over him, and even to kill him, if he attempted it. To prevent, therefore, his design being discovered (for he was resolved at all hazards to try to give that untractable monarch the slip), he pretended to be laid up with the gout, and to want a change of air; and during his nephew's absence, told the principals of the province, that he was going, for the recovery of his health, to the monastery of Debarowa; and hoped that the prayers of the good monks there would contribute to it. By this artifice, he found means to cross the kingdom of Tigre with only eight faithful servants; and, after many windings and stratagems, had the good fortune to reach it, without being stopped or suspected. Here he met with an affectionate reception from the monks, and other Portuguese; but was forced to keep himself concealed, or rather confined, near two whole years (D), before he could find an opportunity to get to the island of Mazowa, on the Red Sea, where he was to embark for Goa, in a ship which was likewise to take in an Abissinian ambassador, whom the emperor was sending thither to the viceroy. He arrived safe at that island, after a variety of difficulties and dangers, in the year 1556: and was likely to meet with fresh obstruction from the ambassador, who, surpris'd to find him there, whom he thought to have been closely confined within some strong amba of the empire, refused to go on board,

Makes his escape to Mazowa.

<sup>c</sup> BERMUD. ubi sup. TELLEZ, & LOBO, pass.

<sup>f</sup> TELLEZ.

(D) That this last was his case, appears from some further particulars which he himself gives of his stay there, and deserve to be here subjoined. Soon after his arrival, the Bahr nagash of that country, a well-wisher to him, came with no small joy to welcome him, and earnestly to intreat him not to offer to run away, but to return to the emperor; which last he absolutely refused; but, to conceal his design from him, told him, that he only desired to spend the rest of his days in a neighbouring hermitage, dedicated to the Virgin Mary. The Bahr-nagash then begged of him, that he would repeal the dreadful sentence of excommunication, which he had fulminated against the emperor and his subjects; promising, on that condition, to obtain his majesty's permission for his retiring to the hermitage; and accordingly sent an express to him about it. The messenger being returned in a few days, brought word, that his majesty was irreconcilable to him, for having branded him with the names of heretic and excommunicate; that if it had not been out of regard to the Portuguese, he would have long ago put him to death. He added, that he was a traitor, a forsworn wretch, who had violated the oath he had taken to him, not to stir out of his dominions without his leave; and concluded with an express charge to that officer to have him narrowly watched, and to take particular care of him.

Not long after, whilst the Bahr-nagash was gone to court, Bermudez received the news of Don Antonio Peixoto's arrival with his two galleys at the island of Mazowa; a few days after which, the church of Our Lady at Debarowa being by some accident burnt down to the ground, he made that a pretence for going over to that island, in order to beg some money of those Portuguese towards the rebuilding of it; and, by that artifice, over-reached the Bahr-nagash and the Abissines, who had the charge of him, and embarked in one of the galleys for Goa (22).

if the patriarch was suffered to go with him. The captain of the gallies, whose name was Don Antonio Peixoto, however, paid so much regard to the prelate, that he readily took him on board his own vessel: upon which, the envoy went back as soon as he saw him on board, rightly judging that he should meet but with an indifferent welcome from the viceroy of Goa, if Bermudez failed thither with him, and perhaps a much worse from the emperor at his return.

Sails for Goa and Lisbon. As to what happened to the patriarch after his arrival at Goa, it being beside our present subject, we shall only add, that, after several fresh dangers and disasters, he happily arrived at Lisbon, where he met with a gracious reception from king Stephen, who had by that time succeeded John III. and obtained a handsome maintenance from him during the rest of his life.

His plain account worthy of credit. Thus ended the patriarch-commission, after a residence, or rather troublesome confinement of above thirty years in the Abissinian dominions. Upon which account, his plain relation to us appears the more authentic, as he had an opportunity of seeing many places in it, to which the Jesuits, ever suspected in those parts, were denied access, and consequently of being thoroughly acquainted with a much greater number of transactions than they, who were kept at a great distance from the court, and other scenes of action. Those that have written any thing concerning that empire, since their expulsion out of it, plainly appear to have affected, from motives of resentment, to extenuate the power and grandeur of its monarchs; and Tellez himself hath not scrupled to represent that, which is in the frontispiece of his book, as a negro half naked, quite contrary to the description which Bermudez, Poncet, and Gregory the Abissinian abbot, have given us of them. We shall conclude his relation with some observations with which he closes his own, to the prince to whom he dedicates it; and which, in his plain, yet zealous, way of expressing, give us a much clearer insight into the ends and views of the pope and king of Portugal, in sending the Abissinian emperors such a seasonable aid, than we could ever get from the writings of all his other cautious brethren. They are to this effect:

“ WE have been looked upon, and given over, in this country, as altogether lost beyond recovery; and it is wholly owing to the little care that hath been taken of us, that our expedition hath proved of so small advantage; and your highness will permit me to assure you, that our affairs were brought to such a state, that, if we had been duly supplied with fresh recruits, we should have proved so strong, and gained such authority over the emperor, that he must, whether he would or no, have submitted to the church; and the people, by our preaching and commerce with them, must have abjured the errors of the Alexandrian church. The conversion of the Abissinians would have proved so much the easier, as they have no proud and arrogant men amongst them, but are pious, humble, and sincerely zealous for the service of God, and readily yield themselves up to conviction.”

“ AND as to the temporal advantage, it might have proved such as neither Peru, with all its gold, nor the Indies, with their vast commerce, would have been able to outweigh. There is a much greater quantity of gold to be found in the kingdom of Damot, and some others that border upon it, than in the whole continent of Peru, and much more easy to be come at, without that vast expence, and those continual wars, which attend the procuring it from the latter (E).”

CLAU-

§ Ibid. ad fin.

(E) We have elsewhere taken notice of the great quantities of that metal which is brought into the empire from the kingdom of Narea (23), which is contiguous to that of Damot. This author elsewhere mentions another province in that neighbourhood, inhabited by Gentiles, whose lord is tributary to the Abissinian monarchs (24). This province the emperor Claudius took in his way, in the last progress he made with the Portuguese through the remote parts of his empire, because the lord of it had revolted, and was then at war with the kingdom of Damot. and sent Bermudez to him to reduce him by fair persuasion; which he accordingly did, and waited on his majesty with a vast quantity of gold. The reception he met with proved so obliging to him, that, as an acknowledgment of it, he invited him and his Portuguese to come into his territories, where he would shew him what prodigious quantities of gold they produced. The way to it is across a large river, without either bridge or ferry-boat; and those who are permitted to go over it to fetch that metal, make use of buffaloes brought up to it, who draw them across by their tails, and pay a certain duty to the lord. The land on the other side appears of a reddish brown hue, and the dust that is brought from thence yields two parts of gold to one of earth (25).

The emperor having fully satisfied himself of the truth of this by the men he sent over that river, and the essay which was made of the ore, advised the lord or owner of it to become a Christian; which he readily complied with, and was baptized by an Abissinian prelate of Debra Libanos. He then complained to that monarch of some very bad neighbours he had about him, who committed cruel ravages in his dominions, and begged the assistance of the Portuguese against them; who with his permission went, and put whole provinces of them to fire and sword, and returned laden with the richest spoil, particularly gold and precious stones, besides a good number of slaves.

Thus it appears very plain what this mission and succours from Portugal aimed at; and what indeed must have

(23) See before, p. 174.

(24) Bermud. ubi sup.

(25) Id. ibid. Vide & Tellez & al. sup. citat.

- a CLAUDIUS, though vexed at the escape of the patriarch, who, without all question, would now use his utmost efforts at the courts of Rome and Lisbon for fresh supplies both of troops and missionaries, to carry on their politic views against his church and empire, took all possible care, during the short remainder of his reign, to prevent their entrance into his dominions, and at the same time shewed himself very generous, in all respects, to those that remained, by giving them fertile lands to live on, and to enjoy their rich plunder in peace; not doubting but that they would become now more tractable and submissive to him, their zealous patriarch being got so far from them. He had not, however, long enjoyed this pleasing prospect, before he saw it unexpectedly troubled by the arrival of a new patriarch from Goa, who quickly revived the old claim of his predecessor with as great assiduity and vehemence: for those two courts were so far from dreaming of the ill-success of the old one, that they thought of nothing less than to see themselves, in a short time, masters of the whole empire; and the famous Ignatius Loyola was taking all proper measures to introduce and settle some of his newly-founded fraternity in it, and would willingly have gone thither himself, if the pope had not declared against it<sup>h</sup>.
- b For the greater magnificence of this new mission, it was agreed that the king of Portugal should send Don Ferdinand de Sousa as his ambassador to the Abissinian court, along with Don Nunez de Barreto, the new patriarch. These, accompanied by Don Andreas de Oviedo, with the title of bishop of Nicæa, and father Gonzalo de Sylveira, with that of bishop of Hierapolis, and some others, embarked for Goa on the 15th of March, and arrived there on the 13th of September following, anno 1556. Here they were quickly apprised of the different state of that empire from what they expected, and therefore resolved not to expose either the patriarch or ambassador to the resentment of the emperor, but to send thither first Don Andreas de Oviedo, with some of his companions; who accordingly sailed thence in four small vessels, and arrived at Arkico about the end of March, the ensuing year, and thence travelled by land to the monastery of Debarowa, where the Bahr-nagash Isaac resided. This was the same who had formerly introduced Don Christopher de Gama into Abissinia; and as he had some private views in favouring the Portuguese, and was not without great hopes, by their means, of making himself master of the kingdom of Tigre, one of the largest and richest in the whole empire, received them with great pomp and courteousness. This happened to be at a time when the Mohammedan Moors had made some considerable conquests on that side, and were marching still nearer to Debarowa; so that not thinking it safe to continue long there, he dispatched a messenger with a letter to acquaint the emperor of his arrival, and the occasion of it, and to beg to be admitted to an audience as soon as possible. The emperor readily consented to it, and the bishop and his company, who made a most gallant shew in their march, met with a very gracious reception from him. Oviedo being introduced into his presence by the Bahr-nagash with great solemnity, immediately acquainted him with his commission; and that the pope and king of Portugal expected no less from him than an effectual and speedy performance of his former engagements to them.
- c He delivered it in such a manner, that the emperor could not prevent his dislike and resentment from appearing in his looks. At length recollecting himself, he represented to him the difficulty there would be to persuade his subjects, who had always acknowledged the Alexandrian patriarch as head of their church, to consent now to such a change; however, he promised that he would advise with his council, and his learned men, about it; and accordingly consented that the matter should be fairly debated between him and them. Oviedo justly looked upon all this as a pretence to gain time, especially as the emperor, who often assisted at their meetings, made use of such strong arguments as they could hardly withstand; and therefore chose to write against all their errors; and when he thought that he had mastered and sufficiently confuted them all, he delivered them to his majesty; who, on his side, did not fail to answer him in the same way, and in such a manner, as, if it did not convince him, yet gave him sufficient cause to think that he would never be prevailed upon to submit to the pope or Roman church (F).
- f This

Claudius's kindness to the other Portuguese.

Ignatius Loyola promotes a new mission.

A new patriarch and embassy sent into Ethiopia.

Oviedo well received by the politic Bahr-nagash.

His audience at court.

Letter to the emperor.

TELLEZ, CODIGN, LOBO, LUDOLPH, & al. ubi sup.

have been the fate of the Abissine monarchs, and their vast dominions, if those few Portuguese had been constantly supplied with fresh recruits, arms, and ammunition, from Europe. Nothing less than a double slavery must have been the consequence of that expedition, a spiritual one to the pope and church of Rome, and a temporal one to the Portuguese monarchs; either of which was too heavy for them to bear, and much more so when joined and closely linked together.

(F) what is somewhat surprising in that generous monarch's behaviour towards this prelate, is, that he neither offered to detain him prisoner, as he had done the patriarch Bermudez, nor suffered any of the Abissines to shew him any disrespect; on the contrary, he even seemed touched with a sense of his danger, in withdrawing himself at a time when his way to the Red Sea was beset with Mohammedan Moors, who would shew him no mercy if he had the misfortune to fall into their hands; insomuch that his fear and concern for him is said (26) to have made him cry out, Alas! what will

(26) Eman. Fernandez's Letter to F. Jac. Laynez, 1562. Tellez, ubi sup. lib. ii. c. 27. & al. sup. citat.

MOD. HIST. VOL. VI.

Excommunicatory letter and retirement.

This intercourse lasted till the latter end of December 1558, when the bishop thought fit to a withdraw himself from court, which he did in February following, and only left a circular, as Tellez calls it, but was rather an insolent, letter behind him, addressed to his Portuguese, and their converts, and cautioning them against conversing with schismatics; concluding with an earnest exhortation to the Abissines to forsake their errors, and submit to the Roman church.

Noor, a Moorish general, invades
Ethiopia.

ALL this while the emperor was making great preparations to go and oppose the progress of the forces of the king of Adel, who had invaded his eastern dominions with a powerful army, commanded by an experienced general, called Noor, or Nour, a man who then burned with impatience to revenge his father's death, who had been killed, with the Moor Granbe, at the battle of Ogara, lately mentioned; and had watched all opportunities to make himself thoroughly acquainted with the strength and state of the empire. Being at length informed b that Claudius's forces were neither very numerous, nor well disciplined enough to make head against his own, which had been long inured to the invading trade, he entered his dominions with a great army of foot, and 1700 horse, putting all to fire and sword where-ever he came, till his progress was stopped by the Abissine forces, which came to meet him, with all the speed they could, with their monarch at their head <sup>b</sup>.

The Abissines
put to flight.

THEY met accordingly in a spacious plain, fit for the purpose, and the two armies engaged with the greatest eagerness on both sides; but the Abissines, who were quite undisciplined, no sooner felt the fury of the first onset, than they threw down their arms, and fled with their usual speed, and left their sovereign in the greatest danger and extremity. The Portuguese, who had been called on this occasion, but were now dwindled to less than 150, behaved with their usual c

The emperor's brave defence, and death.

bravery, as long as they were able; whilst he, like a wise and intrepid warrior, still struck terror among the infidels, and slew many of them with his own hand. At length being himself quite overpowered by numbers, forsaken by his dastardly troops, and, with only eighteen Portuguese, left to defend himself, he rushed with them, with more fury than prudence, upon the enemy, by whom he was soon pierced with wounds, and ended his life and reign by an 1559.

honourable death, in the month of March 1558, or, according to others, 1559. The Moors, now become victors, and masters of the field of battle, pursued their advantage with their usual greediness, slew great numbers of the fugitives, took a great many of them prisoners, and plundered the Abissine camp of an immense wealth. Noor, the Adelian general, having gained so complete a victory, immediately returned to Adel, laden with spoils and laurels, d

Noor's singular humility.

and was every where received with acclamations of joy, but more especially in his master's capital, into which he chose to make his entry, mounted on an ass; alleging, that as God alone, for whom he fought, had given him the victory, so all the glory of it was due to him only. A wonderful instance of moderation in an infidel, says our author, and fit to confound the Christians, who are generally puffed up with vanity upon every small success <sup>1</sup>.

The emperor's memory justly blasted.

THIS was the unfortunate end of the wise and brave emperor Claudius, or Asnaf Segued, (which last name he took at his accession to the crown) in the flower of his age, and in the eighteenth, or, according to Ludolph, nineteenth of his reign; during all which, even in his minority, he still strenuously opposed the incroachments of the patriarch Bermudez, his godfather, and of his missionaries, in consequence of the great concessions which his father had e made to them: so that he never gave them any hopes of his submitting to the church of Rome, but when he was on the brink of losing his empire; but the danger over, he found means to evade the execution of his most solemn promises. And it is to this his frequent breach of his word, and stiff refusal to comply with their demands, that those good fathers ascribe all his ill success and untimely end, as well as all the disasters that happened in the empire after his death: as if it was indeed a more heinous crime in him to elude the per-become of the poor bishop, if I should chance to be killed!

<sup>b</sup> TELLEZ, LOBO, LUDOLPH, &c.

<sup>1</sup> TELLEZ, l. ii. c. 27. LOBO, LUDOLPH, & al.

It was, however, far otherwise with the empress his mother, who, tho' once so great a friend to the patriarch and his Portuguese, and had taken such pains to reconcile her son to them and to the church of Rome, was now become one of their most inveterate enemies, and the most strenuous opposer of the re-union of the Abissinian church with that of Rome. But it is not unlikely, that their insolent and tyrannic behaviour, of which we have given many pregnant instances, was the occasion of this change (27). Neither will the good bishop Owiedo's circulatory, or, to speak more properly, excommunicatory letter, give them or us a more favourable proof of his pastoral charity. It was to this purport: "We do, by this our sentence, decree

" and declare all the people of Ethiopia, who refuse " to submit to the holy Roman church, the mother " of all churches, excommunicate, &c. For which " reason, we charge all our spiritual children to sepa" rate themselves wholly from them. And as to the " Ethiopians, we turn them over to the sentence of " the church, to be punished by it either in their " persons or goods, either publicly or privately, and " to be treated with mercy or severity, according as " their amendment doth more or less deserve. Given " at our church of Dolomo, February 2d, 1559. Signed
" Andreas, bishop of Hierapolis (28)."

(27) Tellez, & al. ubi sup. La Croze, Hist. du Christianisme d'Ethiopie, 1697.
seq. Vide & Goddes's Church Hist. of Ethiopia, lib. iii.

(28) Id. ibid. p. 276, &

- a formance of such promises, which had been extorted from him in his extreme danger, and contrary to his conscience, and the declaration and learned defence he had caused to be published of his faith, than it was for them to extort and insist on those promises, knowing them to be such: for how much soever they have thought fit to blacken and tarnish his memory, on that account, yet he always acted towards them with frankness, and an open profession of his faith, not only in those disputes which he allowed them to have with his clergy, and wherein he often assisted, and repelled their arguments with such strength and reason, as sursum and substance of which the reader may see in the margin (G): for what was this but an open and sincere appeal to God and the world, against their tyrannic compelling him to apostatise from a church he could so well defend; and from no worthier inducement, than that of a reluctant promise forced from him by them in his greatest extremity.

He died without children, and was succeeded by his brother Minas; who, as we formerly hinted, had been detained a prisoner of war among the Mohammedan Moors; and, if we may believe the Portuguese writers, had there acquired such cruel savageness in his temper, that his reign proved a very tyrannical one, during the short time it lasted, and especially against the jesuits, missionaries, and all the favourers of the church of Rome. This those good fathers ascribe in a greater measure to the height of libertinism and immorality, which had by this time spread itself among the Portuguese, than to his education among the Turks. But though

His confession of faith.

Is succeeded by Minas.

A cruel prince and an enemy to the missionaries.

* FERNAND. letter to F. Laynez. TELLEZ, ubi sup. p. 178. LOBO, ap. LeGrand, p. 294, & seq. LUDOLPH, & al.

(G) The confession of faith of Claudius king of Ethiopia.

In the name of the Father, Son and Holy Ghost, one only God.

This is my faith, and the faith of my ancestors, kings of the Israelites; and the faith of my flock, which is within the inclosure of my kingdom.

We believe in one God, and in his only SON JESUS CHRIST, who is his Word, Power, Wisdom, and counsel; who was with him before the world was created; and in the latter days came down unto us, though he left not the throne of his Divine Majesty, and was made man by the power of the Holy Ghost, and born of the holy Virgin Mary. He was baptized in the river Jordan in the 30th year of his age, and was hanged on the tree of the cross in the days of Pontius Pilate; suffered, died, and was buried, and rose again on the third day. And after forty days he gloriously ascended into heaven, and sitteth on the right-hand of his Father; and shall thence again come down to judge the quick and dead; whose kingdom shall have no end.

And we believe in the Holy Ghost, the Lord, the giver of life, who proceedeth from the Father.

And we believe one baptism for the remission of sins; we hope for a resurrection of the dead, and a future eternal life. Amen.

We do, in this, walk in the plain and true highway, neither turning to the right or left hand, from the doctrine of the fathers, the twelve apostles, of Paul, the fountain of wisdom, of the seventy-two disciples, of the three hundred and eighteen orthodox fathers of the council of Nice, the hundred and fifty of that of Constantinople, and the two hundred of that of Ephesus. And thus I believe and teach; even I, Claudius, king of Ethiopia, and according to the name of my kingdom, Asnaf Segued, the son of Vanag Segued, the son of Naod.

As to our observation of the sabbath, or seventh day, we do not do it like the Jews, who crucified our Lord, and cried out, His blood be upon us and upon our children; and who neither draw water, nor kindle fire, nor dress victuals, nor bake bread, nor stir out from house to house: but we celebrate it by receiving the holy communion, and assisting at our Agapæ, or feasts of charity, as they were enjoined by the apostles, in their constitutions. We do not celebrate it as we do the first day, which is a new day, of which David speaks; this is the day which the Lord hath made, let us rejoice and be glad in it: because on that day our Lord Jesus Christ arose, and the Holy Ghost descended on the apostles, in the house, or parlour, (Cenaculum) of Zion; and on the same day Christ was incarnate in the womb of his ever immaculate virgin mother; and shall come again, to reward the just, and punish the wicked.

As to our rite of circumcision, we do not receive it as the Jews do, well remembering the words of St. Paul, the fountain of wisdom, that neither circumcision availeth anything, nor uncircumcision, but a new creature, through faith in our Lord Jesus Christ. The same apostle saying likewise to the Corinthians, Is any man circumcised, let him not become uncircumcised. The same doctrine he teaches in all his epistles. But circumcision is deemed among us as a typical custom, like the scar in the face in Nubia, and the boring the ears among the Indians; and therefore is used by us, not out of regard to the Mosaic law, but as a custom merely human. The same we say with regard to our abstaining from eating swine's flesh; we neither do condemn those that eat it, nor command or forbid the eating of it, but follow the apostle's prescription to the Romans, Let not him that eateth not, despise him that eateth, &c. For the kingdom of God consisteth not in meats and drink. To the clean all things are clean, but he sinneth who by his eating gives offence to his brother. The same is also said in St. Matthew's gospel, Not that which enters into a man, but that which cometh out of him, defileth him; which utterly overturns the Jewish doctrine which was given to them by Moses.

My religion therefore, and the religion of my priests and doctors, who teach by my authority, and within the circuit of my empire, is not to deviate, or recede in the least, from the rules of the gospel, or the doctrine of our holy father St. Paul, either to the right-hand or the left. We read in the book called Zarich, that the emperor Constantine ordered all the Jews that were baptized into the Christian church to eat swine's flesh on the day of our Lord's resurrection; but with us, every man may either eat or abstain from it, as seems best to him: some like fish, others fowl, and some abstain from mutton; every one according as he likes best. But as to the eating of the flesh of any living creatures, we find neither law nor canon against it in the New Testament. To the pure all things are clean. And he who believeth, (saith St. Paul, Rom. xiv. 2.) may eat any thing.

This is what I intended to write to you, in order to inform you what my religion is.

Given in the kingdom of Damot, on the 23d of the month of June, in the year of our Lord's nativity 1555 (29).

(29) De hac, vid. Ludolph comment.

we do not deny but their loose morals might draw such a severe judgment upon them, yet it is plain enough to be seen, even by the writings of those fathers, that much more of that ill treatment which they met with from that emperor, was owing to their treachery to him, and their constant caballing with the old Bahr-nagash Isaac; who, as hath been lately hinted, had hatched some treasonable designs in the kingdom of Tigre, and was no farther a friend to them, than he found them so to his private views.

Who give into the views of the Bahrnagash.

1560.

MINAS, upon his accession to the crown, took upon him the surname of Adamas Segued; and, whether apprised of their intrigues with that ambitious governor, or on some other account, he began very soon to disclose his hatred against all the Portuguese. Father Emanuel Fernandez, chief of the mission, being then in great expectation of a fresh reinforcement from Goa, which had been promised to him on his departure from thence for this kingdom, wrote very pressingly for it, though to no purpose, which threw him into the greatest difficulties; because, on the one hand, the Bahr-nagash had put his chief hopes in that succour; and on the other, the emperor had not only deprived the few Portuguese that were left of the first expedition, of all the lands which his brother Claudius had given them; but likewise denied them the free exercise of their religion, and punished some of their converts, and others of their faith, with great severity. Their only refuge therefore was in the Bahr-nagash; but as no succour came from Goa, as that father had made him expect, they could hardly hope that he would undertake any thing in their favour, especially as they could give him so little assistance in their present distress.

Tazcaro set up against the emperor.

THE emperor, however, had so far disoblinded his own subjects by his tyranny and cruelties, that the greatest men in the empire rebelled against him, and set up a bastard son of an elder brother deceased, upon the throne. This young prince, whose name was Habitacum Tazcaro<sup>1</sup>, was soon joined by the prime officers of Ethiopia, and by the captain of the Portuguese, with about thirty of his men, the rest being then at too great a distance. Whether the Bahr-nagash Isaac was in the conspiracy or no, we are not sure; only thus much we know, that he was the first against whom the emperor Minas bent all his force. Isaac was then busy on the sea coast, and executing some orders he had received from Tazcaro, and being a martial man, marched out against him, and repulsed him at the first encounter, but was defeated and forced to fly. This victory gave that monarch an opportunity to march against his competitor Tazcaro, whom he reached about the beginning of July of the next year, and after a sharp engagement, overthrew him and took him prisoner<sup>m</sup>.

Isaac defeated by Minas.

1561.

IN the interim, the Bahr-nagash, who had with some difficulty escaped to the sea-side, was there waiting still in expectation of receiving the long wished for supplies from Goa; but his hopes being at length quite frustrated, and being no less afraid of a surprise from the emperor, found no other to provide for his safety, than by concluding a league with the neighbouring Mohammedans; by whose assistance he set up another bastard brother in the room of Tazcaro, whom Minas had put to death. Minas lost no time, but marched against him and his Moorish allies at the head of a numerous army. Both sides engaged at first with equal bravery and eagerness, on the 20th of April of the year following; but the fire which the 1562.

The Abissinians put to flight.
Some jesuits taken prisoners.

Turkish artillery made against the emperor's forces, threw them into such panic and confusion, that they immediately betook themselves to flight without striking a blow, and left the enemy masters of their camp. They likewise made a great number of prisoners; among whom was Emanuel Fernandez, and some others of his fraternity, whom the emperor had caused to be detained in his camp as hostages, and to be closely watched, as well as severely treated. They might have fared still much worse now in the hands of the Turks, their most bitter enemies, had not the Bahr-nagash taken pity of them, and procured them their liberty, together with some chalices, and other church utensils, which they had been stripped of. The reader may guess at their distressed condition, by the conclusion of one of their letters to their general, which we have subjoined in the margin (H). As for the Bahr-nagash and his Portuguese, who had

<sup>1</sup> De hoc, vid. LUDOLPH, l. ii. c. 6. §. 27. & seq. TELLEZ, & al. sup. citat.

<sup>m</sup> LUDOLPH, ubi sup. & auct.

(H) We were, says the writer of the letter, made prisoners by the Turks and Abissinians that fought against the emperor; and God saved our lives by means of the Portuguese that were there. We had been robbed four times before, and were now reduced to the last extremity; only the Bahr-nagash gave us our chalice, and some small things; the rest we ransomed as well as we could. You may, reverend father, judge of the miserable condition we now are in, being forty in family, and forced to relieve, when we are able, the Portuguese widows and orphans, and nobody to ask an alms of; for the Portuguese have more occasion to beg than give, and the natives more inclined to steal than to impart any thing. For our table, we have scarcely a bellyful of parched barley. The bishop (Oviedo) is not fit to be seen. We beg your blessing, and the prayers of our society; and having no other way left to write to your reverence, may take this, if it comes to your hands, for the last. Ethiopia, July 29, 1562.

*Emanuel Fernandez, Francis Lopez,
Antony Fernandez, Gonzalez Cardozo (30).*

a consented to his having recourse to the Mohammedans against the emperor, their name became so odious to all the Abissinians, especially to their monarchs, that they would never suffer any of them to be in their army from that time. What became of the king is variously reported; Mina's death. some saying, that seeing his country ruined by the Turks, and his chief sea-ports in their hands, he once more tried his fortune against them, and was defeated and killed; others, that he was forced to flee into some high mountains, where he led a wandering miserable life, till death put an end to it the year after his defeat<sup>n</sup>.

By this time, however, the viceroy of Goa, Constantine de Braganza, at the earnest and repeated instances of the patriarch Nunez Barretto, had made some attempts, in vain, to get intelligence from Abissinia, the Turks having blocked up all entrance into it, and guarding the sea coast with their ships, to prevent any being brought to the Portuguese that were in it; inasmuch, that of the three vessels that were sent thither by that governor, in February, an. 1560, one of them was taken, whilst the other escaped with great difficulty. In the first of them, father Fulgentius being taken prisoner, and very much wounded, continued a slave at Kairo some years, till he was redeemed by order of Pope Paul IV. and sent back to Portugal. Those jesuits that were still in the empire, and were no less desirous to transmit an account to Goa of their dismal situation, had no better luck in their attempt to send some of their society thither. The person they pitched upon was father Gualdares, and another Portuguese; who being come to Mazway, understood that there was a ship there ready to sail for the Indies; upon which they bribed a Moor with a considerable reward, to go privately and desire the captain to take them in; but the treacherous Moor went immediately and betrayed them to the bascha of that island, who caused the jesuit to be seized that very night, and to be cut in pieces<sup>o</sup>.

THIS was the sad situation of the missionaries in Ethiopia, when Adamas Segued died, and his son Forza Dangbil succeeded him, who then took the surname of Malac, or Melchi Segued, and was crowned with the usual solemnity at the church of Axuma. He was a wise and valiant prince, and was blessed with a long, and, for the most part, successful reign, though hardly ever free from wars, either against some of his revolted subjects, or against his now powerful and inveterate enemies the Gallas and Mohammedan Moors; so that he had no time, nor perhaps any inclination, to revive the persecution which his father had raised against the missionaries and their converts, but let them go on in their usual way, without any molestation, or betraying the least favour or friendship towards them.

In the mean time, the Pope's patriarch, John Nunez Barretto, died at Goa, in the sixth year after his arrival there, that is, an. 1562, without having ever been able to come into his patriarchate; so that according to the tenor of the Pope's bull, he was to be succeeded in it by Andrew d'Oviedo, who, as we hinted in the last note, was now reduced to such a miserable condition, that his new dignity was of very little service to him, being in a manner abandoned by his people, having scarce food enough to keep life and soul together, or clothes to cover his nakedness; being now with a very few friends and proselytes retired into the monastery of Fremona, a small town not far from the Red Sea, and without any forces to support his authority, or the credit of his missionaries; for well doth father Tellez observe, from his own experience, that this Ethiopian mission never could thrive longer than the preachers were supported by a sufficient number of forces<sup>p</sup>, of which they were now almost wholly destitute; and which was still worse, had not the least hopes of ever receiving any more, either from Portugal or Goa.

FOR by this time it was sufficiently known in both those countries, how dreadfully retrograde their affairs had gone during the two last reigns, and how small dependence could be had on the most flattering promises of the jesuits, of what they might do, if they could but receive a new reinforcement from either<sup>q</sup>. Among the rest, prince Henry, who now governed Portugal, during the minority of king Sebastian, saw so far through the artifice, that he made no difficulty to write to Pope Pius V. to desire him to recall his patriarch and all his missionaries out of Ethiopia, and to send them to preach in China, Japan, or any other country, and set aside all further thoughts of gaining any ground in the Abissinian dominions, at least till time offered some better prospect of success. The pontif, who was no less apprised of the misfortunes that had attended the mission, readily agreed to his request, and ordered a bull to be expedited for the recall of Oviedo and the rest of the jesuits; which was accordingly sent to him in the year 1566. Oviedo, who received it the year following, answered his holiness, that he was very willing to obey his orders, and to go and preach in India, or any other country where he should please to send him; but at the same time humbly represented to him the difficulty and danger of getting out of Ethiopia, as well as his inexpressible regret for abandoning a country where so great and glorious a harvest of souls might be still reasonably hoped for, if the missionaries could but be supported by five or six hundred Portuguese; alleging

<sup>n</sup> Conf. TELLEZ, LOBO, & al. ubi sup. & LE GRAND, p. 295.

& al. <sup>p</sup> Ubi sup. p. 184.

<sup>q</sup> TELLEZ, CODIGN. & al. ubi sup.

<sup>o</sup> TELLEZ, CODIGN. LOBO, LUDOLPH,

the good disposition he had observed in many of the Abissinians to embrace the catholic faith, and their being only deterred from it through the fear of the punishment. He added, that there were moreover great multitudes of heathens, which might be easily brought over to the pale of the church; that many of them, he was credibly informed, had begged that favour of the late emperors, who had, for worldly interest, denied their request (I).

Begs for fresh troops.

THE question indeed was, how such a considerable reinforcement, had the king of Portugal been inclined to send it, could have found admittance into any part of the empire, now all the sea-ports and sea-coasts were in the hands of the Turks? And if they had, whether the known insolence of those troops would not rather have obstructed, than promoted, the conversion, either of the Abissinians or heathens; or at best have been justly looked upon as a kind of dragooning, rather than an evangelical mission? But the good patriarch was so zealously bent upon subjecting the Abissinian church to that of Rome, and the temporality of the empire to the king of Portugal, that he had not time to consider how far he over-acted the part of an apostle of the meek and gentle Jesus, whom he pretended to represent; and therefore left no stone unturned, nor motive un urged, to obtain the so much wished-for succour; and, among other things, represented the present emperor as a weak and indolent prince, quite unfit to hold the reins of such an empire, which would soon be swallowed up by the Turks, and utterly lost to Europe, and to the Roman see, unless an effectual stop was put to their progress, by the timely arrival of the Portuguese forces. The Pope, however, and the king of Portugal, lent a deaf ear to all his specious pleas; so that he was left to die there in the greatest poverty and misery, in the year 1577, after he had resided near twenty years in that country. His death was soon followed by that of the few jesuits that were left with him.

Dies miserably.

His other missionaries die soon after.

Antony Fernandez, whom he had appointed chief of this first mission, expired soon after in the same miserable condition; Gonzalez Cardoso was assassinated in a wood by some banditti; Andrew Gualdarez was massacred by the Turks, as we lately hinted; Emanuel Fernandez, the oldest of all the four, died next; Francis Lobo, the last of them, was the only one who survived them, till the year 1596. This was the sad catastrophe of that first mission,

The sad end of the mission.

after it had lasted forty years; that is, from 1557 to 1597, when father Lobo, or Lopez, died; and which might probably have succeeded much better, had not the Portuguese insolently insisted upon one third part of the empire, as a reward for their timely assistance, and the Pope's patriarch as strenuously exacted a total submission of the emperor, and all his subjects, to the church of Rome (K).

The jesuits revive the mission.

ALL these multiplied disasters, which made the princes of Europe look upon this enterprize as wholly set aside and impracticable, did only whet the zeal of the jesuitical society to pursue their solicitations at the courts of Rome and Madrid, for reviving of it with greater vigour; to which they were encouraged by the great number of Portuguese, which were still left in Abissinia, as well as by the hopes they had conceived of Philip II. who, as shall be shewn in the sequel, had now got possession of the kingdom of Portugal; and as they rightly imagined, would gladly embrace any opportunity of renewing correspondence and commerce with that empire, especially as Malac Segued, who was still involved in wars, both against his rebellious

* TELLEZ, ubi sup. p. 194, & seq. CODIGN. l. iii. c. 13, & seq. LOBO, LUDOLPH, & al. ubi supra * Ibidem ibid.

(I) Among these were the inhabitants of the large kingdom of Damot, and of the rich canton called Sinaxi, which produces great quantities of gold. Against these last, a kinsman of the late emperor had been making war; upon which they offered to become tributary, and to embrace Christianity, if he would desist; which he absolutely refused. Of those Gentiles, especially of Damot, the Moorish merchants, which are very numerous in this empire (31), buy vast multitudes, whom they drive to the Red Sea, and sell them to the Turks and Moors at a great price, who afterwards force them to turn Mohammedans, and breed them up for soldiers; so that they become in time very hurtful to the Christians (32).

It might, therefore, be justly questioned, whether these worldly ends, as the good patriarch stiles them, were not rather very impolitic, and whether the tribute which those merchants paid the Abissinian monarchs for every slave they carried out of those countries, could counterbalance the great harm those very slaves, when brought up under a military discipline, might do afterwards to their dominions.

(K) This last is reported to have foretold, as he was dying, to his distressed flock, that they should have the comfort, before a year was expired, to see some new missionaries arrive; which was verified by the coming of father Belchior de Sylva, by birth an Indian, and a Brachman, whom Don Alexis de Meneses, archbishop of Goa, who had converted him to Christianity, sent thither for that end (33). Sylva accordingly arrived before the year was out, and continued his mission in those parts till the year 1602, though with no great success that we can learn, through the difficulty of those times, says our author (34); but we may add, through the irreconcilable hatred which the Abissinians had justly conceived against all the Portuguese, whether missionaries or otherwise.

We are told likewise, by the jesuit Guerrero (35), that the patriarch Oviedo foretold that the monastery of Fremona, the residence of the Roman patriarch and his fraternity, should subsist as long as the world; but the event shews that he was no true prophet, as we shall see in the sequel.

(31) De his, vid. sup. p. 189, & seq.
 Codign. de Rel. Abass. l. iii. c. ult. ad fin.
 Annal. doc. annos 1607, & seq. fol. vers. 42.

(32) Tellez, ubi sup. Lobo, Ludolph, & al.
 (34) Le Grand, Relat. d'Abassin. p. 297.
 La Croze, ubi sup. l. iii. p. 284, & seq.

(33) Vide
 (35) Relacam

subjects,

- a subjects, and his Mohammedan neighbours, might, on that account, be glad enough to accept Malac of some assistance from him. He had indeed been very successful against them, and gained several considerable victories over both of them; and over and above that, had subdued the rich kingdom of Enarea<sup>1</sup>, and caused the inhabitants to be converted to the Abissinian faith. But whilst he was employed with his army in one part of the empire, he was still plagued with some invasion or insurrection in another; and this encouraged king Philip to send him an obliging letter and message, in order to renew the alliance between the two crowns, and, if possible, to introduce some of his forces once more into that empire. The person he chose for that purpose was one Lewis de Mendoza, who was then settled at Diu, and well acquainted with the commerce of the Red Sea. Segued's success in Ethiopia. Conquers Enarea. Philip II. of Spain sends a letter to him.
- b He was to be accompanied by an Italian bishop, named John Baptista, to give an air of grandeur to the message; but he died in the way thither, and Mendoza found means to penetrate into Ethiopia, and delivered the letter to the emperor, who expressed a great satisfaction at it, as appears by the answer which he caused to be sent back by the same messenger. It was written in Ethiopic, in an elegant style, and full of expressions of friendship and good wishes; mentions the Italian bishop's death, and some epistolary correspondence that had passed between the viceroy of Goa and himself, wherein he had desired him to send him some able workmen, to cast cannon and other fire-arms, make gunpowder, swords, and other military weapons, and renews the same request to the king his master; but says not one word about sending him any auxiliary forces. The letter is dated February 9, 1589, according to the Roman style, and is kept among the archives of the escurial; a copy of which was sent from thence to Mr. Ludolph, by a Swedish gentleman, named Sparwerfeld, a person of note and learning; and afterwards translated into Latin by Mr. Ludolph, and published among many others of the Abissinian monarchs in his commentary<sup>2</sup>, with his remarks upon it (L). The emperor's answer to it.
- c MENDOZA having so well succeeded in his first expedition, was easily persuaded by the jesuits to undertake a second, and to introduce thither with him two of that fraternity that had been pitched upon by Don Emanuel de Souza Continho, the new governor of Goa, from a good number of others whom their provincial presented to him: these were, Antonio de Montferrato, a Catalonian, and Peter Pays a Spaniard, whom he was to embark in some of the Indian vessels, commonly called Banicans, which frequently trade to Mazwa. They had accordingly failed from Goa in February, an. 1588, for Diu, the place where Mendoza resided; but had been driven by a storm into the gulph of Babaos, whence he fetched them privately in the night, and conveyed them into Diu, in the habit of Armenians, to prevent their being discovered. They staid a considerable time there before any of those ships would venture to take them in, because their discovery would have been followed by a confiscation of the whole cargo, that being the penalty of carrying white men on board without proper passes; so that it was not till December following that they went on board one of those Banicans, which designed to land them at Zeyla; but being shattered by a storm, was forced to put into one of the islands called Curia Maria, where they were discovered, and stripped, and made slaves and Pays attempt to get into Abissinia.
- d slavery, however, proved of singular benefit to father Pays, who became by that time a perfect master of the Arabic tongue, which was afterwards of great service to him upon his coming into Ethiopia. Taken prisoner.
- e WHEN the news of their captivity had reached Goa, it was immediately resolved, that two others of the same fraternity should be sent thither in their stead, there being now none of them left alive there but father Lobo, mentioned a little higher, and he extremely aged and worn-out. One of the persons they chose was father Abraham de Georgiis, by nation a Maronite, and by profession a jesuit; a man of great learning and courage, and a thorough master of all the eastern languages, and was then professor of the Syriac at Malabar, where he probably introduced the pronunciation of the western Syrians, which was afterwards followed in the Abraham, a Maronite Jesuit, sent into Ethiopia.

<sup>1</sup> De hoc, vide sup. p. 174.<sup>2</sup> P. 483, & seq.

(L) This transaction is omitted by Father Telles, though he makes mention of Mendoza upon another account, as we shall see in the sequel. What induced him to pass it over, we know not; unless it be that king Philip's making choice of an Italian bishop, instead of one of his own fraternity, might be looked upon as a slight upon his order, of whom there were enough that would gladly have accepted of that commission: however, both the message and letters, and the sending of that prelate, are facts too well known to admit of a doubt; and are accordingly taken notice of in the relation of Alexis de Mendoza's expedition (36). And as to the emperor's letter, it bears all the marks of a genuine one to a much greater degree than some others from the same monarchs, which neither their editors, nor any of the Portuguese missionaries, ever looked upon otherwise than authentic (37).

(36) Lib. i. c. 4. p. 23. La Croze, Christian. Abissin, p. 286. p. 485, & seq. Le Grand, Relat. p. 451, & seq. 465, & seq. 470, & seq. & alibi pass.

(37) De his, vide Ludolph, Comment.

pretended

pretended inscription of Si-ngan-fu <sup>w</sup>; of which an account hath been given in a former a volume <sup>x</sup>. This great man set out accordingly from Malabar, and arrived at Diu, and thence at Mazowa, in a Banican vessel, anno 1595. But here being asked by the basha, whether he was a Mohammedan or a Christian, and he having made an open confession of his faith, and absolutely refusing to save his life by apostasy, was ordered by him to be beheaded. The next that was sent from Goa was Father Sylva, or, as some call him, Sylvius, whom we have mentioned in a former note <sup>y</sup>; and who having embarked at Goa, arrived at Mazowa in the habit of a seaman, and passed thence to Fremona, where he succeeded Father Lobo, who died there the year before <sup>z</sup>.

WE return now to the affairs of Abissinia, which continued still in a bad plight. The Turks, having got footing into the empire ever since the year 1572, were still possessing themselves of some new territories, whilst the Gallas, who were ravaging whole provinces in some distant parts, prevented the emperor's driving them out, as he had often attempted to do. He was no less unfortunate in his marriage, his empress bringing him none but daughters, whilst he had several sons by his concubines; but, upon that account, excluded from succeeding him; so that he had, for some time, cast his eye upon a brother's son, named Za-Dengbil, to be his successor; but, a little before his death, having set his affections upon one of his bastard sons, named Jaacob, then a minor, he bequeathed the crown to him, with the consent and approbation of all his nobles, though from no better motive than the hopes of governing that young prince, instead of being governed by his nephew, who was of age, and every way qualified to hold the reins of the empire, in such a perilous crisis. He was, however, no sooner returned from his wars against the Gallas of Bachilo, but finding his health decay, and repenting of his former choice, he assembled his nobles and chief officers, and declared to them, that though he had, from a fondness to his own offspring, thought fit to appoint his young son Jaacob for his successor; yet now finding himself drawing so near to his end, his love, care, and concern, for his country, obliged him to alter his mind, and to ratify the preference he had formerly given to his nephew Za-Dengbil, as a person, at this juncture, much fitter to mount the throne, both on account of his age, his bravery, and other princely qualities, which rendered him altogether worthy of it. He expired very soon after, about the middle of August <sup>a</sup>; but his rapacious courtiers, instead of complying with his choice, or consulting the laudable inducements which led him to it, stiffly and unanimously adhered to his former declaration in favour of Jaacob, and refused to acknowledge any other monarch but him.

IN consequence of this resolution, they sent two bodies of armed men, the one to seize on Za-Dengbil, and the other on Susneus, or, as the Portuguese writers, call him, Socinius, another grandson of the emperor David, before either of them were apprised of the emperor's death, or of the person he had made choice of for his successor. Za-Dengbil was accordingly seized, and carried away to the lake of Dembea, where he was kept close prisoner in one of the islands of it formerly described <sup>b</sup>, and from thence sent some time afterwards upon one of their strong mountains: but Susneus, having got intelligence of their design, had the good fortune to make a timely escape to the frontiers of the empire, where, with a small army, he kept himself safe, till he was raised to the throne. This did not prevent the nobles proclaiming the young Jaacob, then about seven years of age, and engrossing the government into their hands, in conjunction with the empress Mariam-Sma, who readily sided with them; and had two of her sons-in-law for her associates, the one called Rus Albaneus, and the other Casluade, then viceroy of Tigre; so that young Jaacob had only the bare name of emperor, during his minority: but when he had attained to his 14th year, and began to shew a desire of sharing the government with them, the alarmed empress, and her two sons-in-law, conscious of their tyrannical conduct, immediately altered their behaviour towards him; and, under pretence of remorse for having deprived Za-Dengbil of his right, ordered him to be fetched out of his confinement, and proclaimed him emperor even in the very camp where Jaacob still was; who thereupon made his escape with all the haste he could, and with only eight of his servants, towards the high mountains of Semen, where he might have been safe enough had he not been betrayed by one of his own retinue. This traitor took an opportunity, whilst the young prince was taking a little rest, to go and alarm a neighbouring town, with the news of Za-Dengbil being proclaimed emperor, and that Jaacob was fled thither for refuge; threatening them, at the same time, with the new emperor's displeasure, if they did not apprehend and carry him prisoner to the imperial camp. He was accordingly seized, and conveyed thither; and, when brought before Za-Dengbil, his nobles proposed that his nose and ears should be cut off, in order to disqualify him for the government; but the more generous emperor con-

<sup>w</sup> See LA CROZE, Christianisme des Indes.

<sup>z</sup> TELLEZ, LOBO, CODIGN. LUDOLPH, & al.
§ 49, & seq. LE GRAND, & al.

<sup>x</sup> See before, vol. iii. p. 547.

<sup>y</sup> See before, note (K).
<sup>a</sup> TELLEZ, l. iii. c. 14. LOBO, LUDOLPH, l. ii. c. 6.

<sup>b</sup> See before, p. 174.

<sup>a</sup> tented himself with sending him close prisoner to the distant kingdom of Enarea, where he was strictly watched by the governor of it, till he found an opportunity of remounting the throne<sup>c</sup>.

DURING these transactions, the famed Jesuit Father Pays had found means to penetrate into the borders of Abissinia, and had met with a joyful reception at the convent of Fremona, where he had spent some time in composing and distributing a catechism among their profelytes, whilst he was waiting for an answer to a letter he had sent to the young emperor Jaacob, then on the throne. Za Denghil, upon his accession to it, was soon apprised of his being at Fremona, and of his character, as a learned man, a great traveller, politician, and zealous catechist; and, being naturally curious and affable, sent him a pressing invitation to come to his court, by an obliging letter, which, for its singularity, we thought worthy of being inserted in the margin (M). The father gladly accepted the favour; but the viceroy of Tigre, who was to conduct him to court, was obliged to delay his departure, on account of an irruption which the Gallas had lately made into three different parts of the empire; against the most considerable of which the emperor was obliged to march in person, whilst his viceroys had orders to stop the progress of the other two. The first of these was made into the kingdom of Gojam; the viceroy of which had orders from him not to attack the numerous barbarians, till he had joined him; but he, willing to put a stop to their cruel ravages, and venturing to fall upon them contrary to his instructions, was totally defeated; which obliged the emperor to double his speed to go and attack them. By that time he was come within their reach, his forces were so fatigued with their march, as well as discouraged by the late defeat, that they would willingly have deferred fighting; but seeing themselves attacked by the enemy in three different bodies, with their usual fury, the right and left wing were quickly put to the route, and betook themselves to flight; which as soon as the main body perceived, the chief officers came to persuade the emperor to retire, before he was surrounded by the enemy; but were not a little surpris'd, when they beheld that undaunted young prince, instead of clapping spurs to his horse, alight from him; and taking his shield in one hand, and his sword in the other, told them, with an intrepid look, Here I am resolved to die; you may indeed escape the enemy's sword, but never can the infamy of abandoning the emperor you have so lately proclaimed. These words had such a sudden effect upon his troops, that one would have thought he had at once transformed them from sheep into lions: they gathered themselves up with the utmost speed, and fell with such desperate fury upon the enemy, that they forced them to turn their backs, and run with all the legs they had, whilst the other two wings, observing their flight, pursued them with such fresh vigour, that they did not give over killing till night obliged them to desist<sup>d</sup>.

Father Pays's invitation and arrival at court.

The emperor defeats the Gallas with great slaughter.

Returns victorious to his camp.

Father Pays is brought to court.

His grand reception there.

ON the next morning, the emperor leaving the field of battle all over strewed with their dead bodies, marched immediately over craggy and high mountains to find out their second army, whom his troops, now flushed with victory, charged with such success, that they defeated them with a fresh slaughter of the greater part. The news of which so alarmed the third body, that they all betook themselves to a hasty flight, excepting 400, who were posted on a high mountain to guard some of their booty. These likewise the emperor caused to be attacked by some of his best climbers, which was executed with the same valour and success; the Gallas, after a stout defence, being for the most part cut in peices. After which the emperor led his victorious army to his usual residence; being no less beloved by his subjects, than dreaded by his enemies, for his singular valour and extraordinary success.

IT was not long, however, before he quite forfeited the affections of the former, by the arrival of Father Pays in the imperial camp, and the surprising ascendant which that politic and intriguing Jesuit gained over him: for no sooner had the Tigrean viceroy received the news of his victorious return, than he accompanied him, as he was ordered, to Ondegere, near the Dembean lake, where the court was, and where he was quickly admitted into the royal presence with great solemnity; and, after having had the honour to kiss his majesty's

<sup>c</sup> TELLEZ, LOBO, LUDOLPH, & al.

<sup>d</sup> TELLEZ, ubi sup. LUDOLPH, LOBO, &c.

(M) The letter of the emperor Za-Denghil, alias Aznaf Segued, to Father Pays.

" May the letter of the emperor Aznaf Segued come to the hands of the worthy father, who is master of the Portuguese. How is your health? Hear what follows, and the good things which our Lord God hath done for us. We were seven years in prison, and endured innumerable hardships: but our Lord God, taking compassion on our misery, brought us

" out of it, and hath given us the empire, and hath made us head of all; even as David says, The stone which the builders rejected, is become the head corner stone. Now may the same Lord end that well which he hath begun. Hear farther, that we are very desirous that you should come speedily to us, and that you bring the books of justice of the kings of Portugal, if you have them, for we shall be glad to see them (38)."

(38) Apud Tellez, ubi sup. l. iii.

hand, was immediately ordered to sit down on the highest step on which his couch or throne stood, where they both conversed a considerable time, without any regard to the rest of the company; after which, the emperor ordered him to be handsomely entertained, and gave him leave to withdraw <sup>c</sup> (N).

Holds a conference about religion.

The emperor favours the church of Rome.

Letters to the pope and king of Spain.

Sends for fresh missionaries and forces.

WHAT the subject of their conference was, Tellez leaves us to guess; which is no hard matter to do, since he sent for him again on the next day, to hold a public dispute with the Abissinian monks, and other persons of note; and among them, the viceroy of Tigre, who begged of the emperor, that, having heard the matter, he would also his scholars, who were brought thither for that purpose; and, with whose answers to their catechism, the prince was so highly pleased, that he begged a copy of it; which was immediately presented to him. On the next Sunday, he sent for the father to say mass, and preach before him; and profited so well under his new instructor, that he forthwith issued out a proclamation against observing the sabbath, and went on so fast in other respects, that the good father was forced to advise him to go more gently on. It is indeed very likely that all this pretended warmth was rather owing to the expectation he was in of receiving some considerable reinforcement from Goa, which that father made him hope for, than to any conviction in favour of the Roman church. This made him write two letters, the one to pope Clement VIII. and the other to Philip II. of Spain, filled with the greatest expressions of zeal for their church and persons. That, in particular, to the pontif, contained the strongest promises and engagements of universal obedience to his see, and the deepest sentiments of gratitude to his holiness, whose zeal, he was given to understand by Father Pays, for the salvation of souls was such, that he was labouring at it even to the effusion of his blood. He therefore desires him, as the true vicar of Christ, and the successor of St. Peter and St. Paul, to promote the alliance and friendship he was then negotiating with the king of Spain, and to prevail on him to dispatch a sufficient number of forces into Abissinia, to assist him in suppressing the barbarous Gallas, and, at the same time, to send him some fathers to instruct his subjects in the true faith. He concludes with these words, Let those fathers you send us be virtuous and learned, that they may teach us what is requisite for the good of our souls. Few words to the wise<sup>f</sup>.

THESE letters Mr. Ludolph very much suspects of being forged, and the reader may see his reasons for his thinking them such<sup>e</sup>: however that be, Father Pays sent them into Europe, as delivered to him by the emperor's own hand, who calls himself in them Aznaf Segued, the name he had taken at his coronation. He adds, that he ordered him at the same time to write more explicitly to the pope, and to acquaint him, that the succours which he asked for were to secure him against such of his subjects as should oppose his establishing the Roman faith in Ethiopia; and that he only mentioned them as designed against the Gallas, in order to amuse his secretary, as he himself dared not write it with his own hand, lest, if it should be intercepted, his own subjects should rise up and murder him. The letter is dated June 26, 1604, and may be seen intire in Tellez<sup>b</sup>. The other, which was written to the king of Spain, was much in the same strain; and, besides the above-mentioned supply of forces, desired him to send one of his daughters to give in marriage to his son. Father Pays was moreover presented with 300 ounces of gold, which he absolutely refused, begging only of him the liberty of building a church; which being readily granted, he went in quest of some proper person to send his letters by.

A rebellion raised against him:

Abandoned by his forces;

and interdicted by the Abuna.

THESE open proceedings soon alarmed the great officers of the empire; the Abuna Peter himself declared against them, and absolved all the people from their allegiance to the emperor. At the same time, a turbulent fellow, named Za-Salasse, whom that prince had recalled from his banishment in the kingdom of Enarea, during the reign of young Jaacob, put himself at the head of the revolted; who, perceiving the danger of their church, were now rising up in arms in defence of it, and had resolved to restore the crown to young Jaacob, then close prisoner in Enarea. He was joined in this design by some of the greatest officers in Abissinia, and particularly by Ras Athenæus, one of the empress's sons-in-law; so that the conspiracy was soon brought to too great a head, under those great commanders, to be suppressed by Za Denghil, especially as the Abuna's interdict had caused such a defection among his troops,

<sup>e</sup> TELLEZ, ubi sup. c. 18, & seq. LOBO, LUDOLPH. sup. See also GUERREICO. CODIGN. & al.

<sup>f</sup> Ibidem ibid.

<sup>g</sup> Lib. iii. c. 10.

<sup>h</sup> Ubi

(N) The reader may not perhaps be displeased with the description of this prince, which father Pays hath been pleased to give us of him. He seemed to be about twenty-six years of age, tall, manly; and well-shaped; his eyes large and beautiful, his nose sharp, and his lips thin; his complexion was somewhat tawny, and, were it not that that colour is reckoned in Europe less becoming, he would not have been inferior to the finest men among us: in a word, adds that father, his person was worthy of the empire he held, and the majesty he represented (39).

(39) Apud Tellez, ubi sup. l. iii. c. 18, & seq.

a that he had hardly any left to support him, or that he could confide in, except his Portuguese, about 200 in number, with their brave commander John Gabriel at their head. To these, and to Father Pays, he addressed himself in words to this effect: "This revolt is raised against me, because I was desirous to bring my subjects into the true faith, and to deliver them from the oppression of tyrants;" meaning those who held the reins during Jaacob's minority. To which they replied, that he would do well to delay engaging the rebel army, which was so superior in number, till he could so far increase his own as to be able to make head against them, which advice was so much the more reasonable, as he had, in his march, augmented his own forces to about 10,000 men, and new ones came daily still to him.

THEY came at length to the large plain of Varcha, almost in the very heart of the kingdom of Dembea, where they were soon alarmed with the noise of the enemy's trumpets and kettle drums, who lay incamped at a small distance from them. The traitor Za-Salasse no sooner heard of their arrival, than he was for attacking them immediately, before any of his men had time to go over to the emperor: and, for the same reason, the Portuguese general was for declining the battle for a while; but Za-Denghil, who could not bear to be braved by the rebels, confiding perhaps too much in the justice of his cause, ordered his army to be ranged in battle array. He placed his 200 Portuguese, with some of his own men, on the right, whilst he commanded the left himself. The Portuguese fell immediately on the rebels with their usual fury, and soon put them to flight, whilst Za-Denghil, on his side, fought with no less eagerness and intrepidity; but being by degrees abandoned by the greatest part of his pusillanimous troops, and supported only by a small number of his faithful and bravest friends, one Humardin, a Moor, who served under the rebels, observing the confusion they were in, made up directly towards the emperor, and with his lance gave him such a desperate wound on the neck, that he brought him to the ground. He quickly started up, and with his sword defended himself for some time, till the traitor Za-Salasse came riding full-speed, with his lance couched against him, and wounded him in the face; upon which the rest soon put an end to his life with their swords. Attacks the rebels too soon.

Thus fell that noble emperor a sacrifice to his untimely zeal, who might, in all probability, have reigned long and happily over his subjects, if he had not exasperated them by his too open affection for a church, against which they professed an irreconcilable dislike. The battle was fought on 13th of October of the year succeeding that of his coronation, after a short reign of fifteen months. His death put an end to the rebellion, which had been chiefly raised in opposition to his too violent measures in favour of the church of Rome; whilst the disorders that followed soon after gave Susneus, the next competitor for the crown, a fair opportunity of making a successful attempt upon it. Defeated and killed.

WE have already taken notice how this prince, whom the Portuguese writers commonly call Socinius, made his escape into the distant frontier kingdom of Ambara, to escape the snares of the ministers and partisans of young Jaacob; and here, it seems, he maintained himself, though in great distress, yet with resolution and bravery worthy the son of the great Basilides, or Faciladas, who lost his life in fighting against the Gallas, and the grandson of the noble emperor David. As soon, therefore, as he understood that the throne was become vacant by the death of his cousin Za-Denghil, and that the deposed bastard Jaacob was detained close prisoner in the furthest parts of the empire, he sent immediately one of his faithful friends, named Bella Christos, to Ras Athenæus and Za-Salasse, the two chief leading men in the empire, to assist him in his rightful pretensions to the crown: to which the former consented, after some hesitation, and soon after joined him with his forces; at the head of whom he was proclaimed emperor, by the title of Soltan Segued. The same messenger came next to Za-Salasse, who answered, that though he thought the crown belonged to Jaacob, as he had been already crowned, yet if he did not come by June next he would acknowledge Susneus. This answer not satisfying him, he sent another nobleman, and a monk, with a letter, importing, "that, as he was now proclaimed emperor, he would never resign his title to Jaacob, nor even to his own father, if he was to rise from the dead." Upon which, Za-Salasse, having secured the messenger, he marched with his whole army against him, resolving to deliver his own answer to him with sword in hand; which obliged him to retire again to Ambara, he being then sick: but when he perceived that the summer was almost spent, and Jaacob not yet come out of Enarea, he was easily persuaded to make his submission to the new emperor before he forced him to it. Upon which, Susneus sent a monk to administer the oath of allegiance to them, and they proclaimed him emperor. Immediately after which, Za-Salasse sent ten of his chief officers to compliment and pay homage to him in his name, with an additional protestation, that he would stand by him against all opposers, and even Jaacob by name, should he now come from Enarea. Susneus receives his pretensions. Proclaimed by Athenæus, and Za-Salasse's message to the emperor.

<sup>1</sup> TELLEZ, LOBO, LUDOLPH, LE GRAND, &c.

<sup>2</sup> Ibidem ibid.

They prove treacherous to him.

Jaacob's offers rejected by Susneus.

Za-Salasse surprized, and defeated.

Susneus
amuses Jaacob and his army.

Engages and defeats them with great slaughter.

Clemency to them.

THESE were no sooner come to the kingdom of Bagemder, or Begamder, where Susneus a was already arrived, and where he was receiving them with feasting and other tokens of joy, than news was brought to Za-Salasse, that Jaacob was got near Dembea, and sent orders to come and join him: upon which, without the least hesitation at the oath he had taken to Susneus, he immediately complied, and led his army to him; sending, at the same time, a private message to the ten officers he had sent to Susneus, to hasten away and come to him. This obliged the emperor to withdraw once more to Ambara, as he was not in a condition to make head against them, whilst Jaacob was received with all demonstrations of joy; who immediately created the traitor general of all his forces. Ras Athenæus came next with all his troops, to pay his homage to him, and met with a no less gracious reception: but their treachery proved a serious warning to him against putting too great a confidence in them; b so that, unwilling to depend on the instability of fortune, he chose rather to come to a composition with his rival, and sent him accordingly an offer of the kingdoms Ambara, Olear, and Xaoo, with all the rich lands his father had in the kingdom of Gojam, provided he quitted his title to the empire to him. To this Susneus answered, that he had a just claim to the throne, and would have all or none: upon which, Jaacob, finding himself strong enough, marched directly against him, and incamped so near, that he was forced again to withdraw, and wait for a more favourable opportunity.

FORTUNE soon offered him an advantageous one: for whilst Jaacob marched in pursuit of him, Za-Salasse, instead of following him, took a quite different road with his own army, without giving any reason for his so doing; the news of which being brought to Susneus by c his spies, he went and posted himself in an ambush, at a pass called Montor Daffar, where he suddenly fell upon and totally routed him. The traitor, with some difficulty, escaped to Jaacob, and left his army, camp, and treasure, at the mercy of the conqueror; so that he met with but a very cold reception from Jaacob at his arrival. This slight exasperated him the more against him, and made him abandon his party to go over to Susneus. Jaacob, not less vexed at his treachery, marched directly against his competitor; fully resolved to give him battle. He removed his camp from place to place, whilst the more politic Susneus, like another Fabius Cunctator, kept himself on the more elevated grounds, watching for a proper time to fall on him. At length, as he was decamping on Saturday the 10th of March, the enemy, who were thirty to one, believing that he fled, pursued him with loud shoutings, so d that he was, against his inclination, obliged to engage them; and having animated his handful of men with great promises of reward, he led them down the hill with such impetuous bravery that, to use the words of the Ethiopic historian Tino, the enemy fell down before him like autumn leaves before the wind. Jaacob himself was borne down in the hurly-burly, yet no man could boast that he had killed him. The Abuna Peter, who was of the same side, was slain likewise; which Susneus no sooner heard, than he put a stop to the pursuit, in order to spare the rest; but they were all seized with such a panic, that there was no possibility of stopping them; insomuch that, night overtaking them in their flight, a much greater number perished by their falling down the rocks and precipices, than by the sword. Next morning they found e above 600 horses dashed in pieces at the foot of a rock an hundred yards high, and the ground covered with the dead bodies of their riders. Ras Athenæus, who had likewise gone over to Jaacob's side, escaped, and took refuge in the monastery of Duna, and was afterwards pardoned by Zela Ebristos, Susneus's brother. Thus ended Jaacob's life and reign, after having been twice raised to the throne, from thence sent the first time into banishment, and the second into another world.<sup>m</sup>

SUSNEUS, or Soltan Segued, by this unexpected victory, secured to himself the crown, and freely forgave all the revolvers that had escaped, excepting only the Moorish officer Mabardin, or, as some call him, Humardin, who had formerly given the first wound to Za-Dengbil, and whose head he caused to be struck off: so that he gained as great reputation by his clemency f as he had for his valour (O), upon this occasion. He spent three whole days in distributing

<sup>l</sup> Iidem ibid.

<sup>m</sup> TELLEZ, LUDOLPH, & al. ubi sup.

(O) Susneus was about thirty-three years of age when he gained this noble victory. He is described to us as a well-shaped genteel person, his visage long, but well-proportioned; his head of hair well-spread, his eyes of a fine hazel-colour, very sparkling and amiable, seemingly obliging to all men by his looks: his nose was sharp, his lips thin, his beard black, but broad, his stature above the middle size, well-set, and brawny; and, in all respects, much like an European, except the brownness of his complexion.

He was moreover, an excellent horseman, bold, brave, and resolute, and well-read in the Ethiopian books. He was discrete, courteous, bountiful, and warlike, inured to martial hardship, as having been ten years successively in arms, without one day's intermission (40).

- a the spoil of the enemy among his foldiers, and with a singular generosity rewarded those who were most deserving: after which, he marched with them to Coga, a place situated between Dembea and Bagameder, where the late Jaacob usually kept his court. As for the traitor Za-Za-Salasse's Generosity to his own men. he soon drew upon himself, by his indiscretion, the punishment which he had deserved folly, and final punishment. so often by his treachery: for being one day heard to brag, that some wise men had foretold him that he would be the death of three monarchs, and that he had destroyed two of them already; the words were immediately carried to Susneus, who caused him to be sent to the strong mountain of Guzman, in the kingdom of Gojam, of which he had been lately made viceroy by Jaacob. He thence made his escape, after a year's confinement, and put himself at the head of a gang of banditti, in the province of Oleca, where the inhabitants, having caught him
- b in an ambush, cut off his head, and sent it stuck upon a spear to the emperor, who caused it to be set up before his own palace. Athenæus, or Atbanateus, fared not much better; for that prince caused him to be stripped of his ill-gotten lands, and soon after, his wife, according to Athenæus's sad catastrophe. the custom of the Abissinian princesses, formerly taken notice of <sup>a</sup>, abandoned him: so that he was reduced to the meanest condition, after having been formerly the first man in the empire, next to the emperor. Susneus likewise caused the grants of lands formerly settled upon the Jesuits to be confirmed to them for ever <sup>o</sup>; the publication of which was performed by proper officers, with the usual ceremony, which the reader will find described in the margin (P). So fond was that monarch of the company of those fathers, that finding upon his arrival at Coga, that they were retired to their monastery at Fremona, he sent immediately for them; Jesuits called to court.
- c and, as it was then in the winter season, ordered them to come by the way of the Dembean lake; which they readily complied with, notwithstanding the risk they ran from the lightness of their tancons, or small rush-boats, and the sea-horses which infest that lake; being no less ready to answer the summons of so kind a friend than he was to have them near him, to consult them on every exigence, and especially about getting, if not some fresh forces, at least a supply of workmen, to cast him some new guns, bombs, &c. make gunpowder, and other necessary utensils of war.
- BUT whilst they were thus hatching their new projects, a strange report was spread about, which failed not to surprize and alarm them all: it was, that the emperor Jaacob, whom they had supposed to have been slain in the late fight, was still alive, and had gained a considerable number of partisans in the kingdom of Tigre. There had been, in fact, a bold youth, 1608. An impostor sets up for the emperor Jaacob. whether the real Jaacob, or an upstart impostor, who assumed the title, appeared in and about the monastery of Bizan, a proper place for his purpose, on account of its vicinity to the port of Mazwa, especially as those monks, who were of the order of St. Eustacius, were very numerous, and dispersed through great part of that kingdom, where they served as curates, and bore a great sway among the populace, who came flocking about him accordingly, as to their emperor, whom God had miraculously preserved, and sent to them. The better to disguise the unlikeness there was between the countenance of that prince and his own, he wore a scarf over his head, which, in the coming down below his chin, covered the greater part of his face; pretending that he had received a stroke of a spear in the late battle, which had broke
- d out his teeth, and sadly disfigured him; all which was believed without any farther examination: infomuch that all, either out of pity to his misfortune, or in hopes of being amply rewarded, Followed by the monks and people. accommodated him with horses, mules, arms, and what other things they could spare to him. Many more, who lived by robbing, came over to him, in hopes of plunder; and he saw himself, in a short time, at the head of a powerful army, with whom he descended into the low lands, and committed the most cruel outrages and robberies. Having plundered a caravan of Ravages the low lands. some gold, he caused it to be flatted, and made into the shape of the Abissinian crown, elsewhere described.

HE was at length grown so powerful and formidable, that the emperor was obliged to send his brother Sella Christos with an army against him, composed of what forces he had, though

<sup>a</sup> See before, p. 193, & seq.

<sup>o</sup> TELLEZ, & al. ubi sup.

(P) This ceremony is usually performed by an azagge, or lord, or a haumar, who is a kind of magistrate or judge, and takes a circuit round the border of the lands contained in the grant. He is generally accompanied by the emperor's musicians, with their trumpets, kettle-drums, &c. which summon all the people of the neighbourhood to come and see the land-marks placed and fixed. They likewise sometimes kill here and there a goat, and bury the head of it, to serve for another kind of land-mark; and the removing of any of either sort is punished with great severity.

The lands thus granted enjoy considerable immunities, and are as perpetual as any thing of that kind can be in a country where the government is liable to such frequent changes and revolutions (41).

(41) Tellez, ubi sup. Ludolph, & al.

New revolts in other provinces.

The sham Jaacob defeated.

The emperor crowned.

Jaacob hides himself in a cave.

Two revoltors defeated and killed.

Jaacob appears again.

A plot to murder the viceroy defeated.

Jaacob beheaded.

much inferior in number, whilst Ala Christos was ordered to march with another body into Baga- a meder. However, the imperial forces being better disciplined, easily routed those of the sham Jaacob, and forced him to fly back to the mountains beyond Debarowa more than once. But whilst the emperor thought of putting a stop to one evil, he brought a much greater one upon himself; for the restless Gallas, whom Sella Christos's presence deterred from committing any hostility in his government, no sooner heard of his being marched far enough off, than they entered the province with such a numerous train, that Susneus was obliged to collect what forces he had, and to march against them; and being vastly inferior in number, was twice defeated by them. The news of this disaster rendering the counterfeit Jaacob more daring and insolent, and Sella Christos less able to make head against him, an express was sent to the emperor by the latter, desiring him to march with all possible speed with his whole army to Axuma, in order to b be crowned there, as usual; to which he the more readily consented, as he had now taken his revenge on the Gallas, and gained a complete victory over them.

WHILST he was upon his march, the impostor, who had heard only of his two defeats, but not of his victory, was the more encouraged to come down from his high mountains, as a report had been, perhaps designedly, spread among his men, that Sella Christos was fled, and had left all his tents behind. He was, however, soon undeceived, when the viceroy came suddenly upon him, and, after an obstinate fight on both sides, routed him with great slaughter, and drove him afresh to his old shelter among the rocks, but without being able either to kill or take him; the king still continuing his march over the high mountains of Lamalmon, formerly c described, and arrived safe at the head of his army in the neighbourhood of Axuma; and was soon after crowned with the usual solemnity in that metropolis, by the abuna, on Sunday the 23d of March; his brother Sella Christos and Father Pays assisting at the ceremony.

As soon as the coronation was over, the king marched directly in search of the impostor among the mountains of Debarowa; of which he having notice, dismissed his men, and with only four servants and a few goats, hid himself so closely, that the emperor could not get scent of him all the time he staid in that neighbourhood. In the mean time, as one revolt is no sooner quelled in one province than a new one is raised in another, a slave of the late emperor Malec Segued, named Melchizedech, came from the mountains of Ambara, and joined himself to one Arfoo, said to have been a brother of the late Za-Dengbil, and marched with him d into the kingdom of Dembea. Against these he sent his brother with a good force, who came time enough to stop their progress. The head rebels thinking themselves strong enough to engage him, the slave was slain in the fight, and Arfoo taken prisoner, and sent to the emperor, who ordered him to be beheaded. Susneus, before his departure from these parts, was pleased to visit the monastery of Fremona, and made a present to the Jesuits of 300 pieces of eight, leaving the abuna Simeon there to be instructed by them in the Romish faith; after which he began his march homeward, accompanied by the viceroy Sella Christos, and left Ampfala Christos, a brave and prudent nobleman, governor of the kingdom of Tigre.

ALL this time Jaacob had continued in his cave, he and his four servants being only supported with the milk of a few goats; but being now informed of the emperor's departure, he e ventured himself out again, whilst the governor Ampfala, whom that monarch had left with a strict charge to ferret him out, had tried all the ways he could think of, though all in vain, and now lay sick at Getopel, near Fremona, with only a handful of men. This encouraged a couple of banditti to join themselves with Jaacob, in hopes to surprise and murder the sick governor.
They had 1500 men with them, and would infallibly have succeeded in their attempt, had not one of them, by taking a shorter cut, brought him timely notice of it. The viceroy, sick as he was, would have gone to meet them; but a Portuguese advised him to conceal a few of his musketeers in some convenient pass, who should fire upon them as soon as they approached. The plot succeeded to their wish, and the villains, at the first firing, fell flat upon their faces; then starting up, betook themselves to flight, and were pursued with great slaughter; seventeen of them being taken prisoners. Jaacob escaped once more; but was at length taken by two Abissine officers, f who beheaded him, and sent his head to the emperor (Q). This was the end of that impostor, who

* See before, p. 201.

† TELLEZ, LOBO, & al. ubi sup.

(Q) These were called Ambara Georgis and Zarab Jainez, two relations of the late emperor Jaacob, who, believing this impostor to be the same person, had engaged to stand by him with their lives and fortunes:
but coming to him to be satisfied about it, they being well acquainted with the true one, the cheat was soon found out, though he shewed them but a small part of his face; and they resolved to secure him. He was, however, aware of their design, and timely gave them the slip, with his 600 men; which put them to the trouble of searching afresh among those high and rocky places where he usually skulked.

They caught him at last, and, upon pulling his mus-fler off, found that he had not the least scar upon his face; upon which they took care to have him publicly exposed, to take off all suspicion of his being the real Jaacob;

- a who had caused so much mischief and bloodshed in the empire ; and yet there wanted not partisans, who, either out of dislike to the emperor and his Jesuits, or for some other views, gave out that he was escaped, and fled into India ; insomuch that it was afterwards strongly reported that there was a man in the kingdom of Decan so very like him, that he was believed to be the very same person <sup>u</sup>.

HITHERTO we have only dwelt on matters of state ; and it is probable enough that the disasters we have been speaking of hindered Soltan Segued's applying himself so closely to those of religion, as he was otherwise inclined to do ; at the same time that they took off the eyes of the people from seeing the progress which the Roman missionaries made in several parts of the empire. One may say, their affairs had never been in so hopeful a condition as now ; and the pope and king of Spain, though they seemed quite forgetful of the emperor's request, with respect to either forces or workmen, yet took care to send him fresh supplies of preachers, who were sure to meet with a gracious reception from him, especially as they came fraught with fresh promises with regard to the other two articles ; though, in all likelihood, no such thing was designed.

- THE following year, the court being removed from the old station to Deghana, a place on the north side of the Dembean lake, and in the neighbourhood of Gorgora, where the fathers resided, gave them frequent opportunities of conversing and disputing with Sella Christos, the emperor's brother, during that and the following year. He is represented as a wise, learned, and affable prince ; and whether really convinced in his mind, as they affirm, or out of a servile complaisance to his brother, we will not take upon us to say ; but it appears from their account, that, about the same time that he made public profession of his conversion to the church of Rome, which was the very next year, the emperor removed his imperial camp from thence into the kingdom of Gojam, and created him viceroy of it ; which was almost equivalent to the making him king of it, as he gave him the whole revenue of that country, and as he was to be obeyed in it like the emperor himself. From that time Sella Christos became not only a zealous profelyte, and main support to the Roman church, both during the life and after the death of that monarch, but drew great numbers of the grandees and nobles of the empire, by his example and interest, into the same creed. He next caused a church and monastery to be built for the use and residence of the Jesuits, which was the first they ever had in the kingdom of Gojam, and the third they now possessed in Abissinia ; the first being at Fremona, in the kingdom of Tigre, and the second that of Gorgora, near the lake of Dembea <sup>w</sup>. But this new one was moreover endowed with large revenues, and extensive territories, by that viceroy, for the maintenance not only of the Jesuits, but for the Portuguese widows and orphans, which were dispersed through the empire, and in great want of such a charitable provision. The emperor on his part, who had not yet sent an answer to the obliging letter which Father Pays had brought him about five years before from Philip II. of Spain, was now more at leisure to do it with more grandeur ; and, to that end, made choice of one of his court, named Takor, or Tagur Egzye, a person of great prudence and experience, and a very great zealot for the Romish church, to go thither on an embassy from him, accompanied by Father Anthony Fernandez ; who, instead of going, as usual, to Mazowa, were, for their greater safety, to make the best of their way through the kingdom of Enarea to the coast of Melinda. This road, which was contrived by Sella Christos, in order to avoid the Turks, proved no less difficult and dangerous from another quarter, which he had not foreseen. They set out of Dembea about the beginning of March, the following year, attended by ten Portuguese, four of whom engaged to attend them to India, and the other six only to the frontiers of Enarea ; and, when they came to the kingdom of Gojam, the viceroy furnished them with an escorte of Gallas and Xates, whom he had hired to conduct them, because the way lay through both their territories. They set out again from Ombrana, where the viceroy's camp was, for the kingdom of Enarea, on the 15th of April, attended by forty men, armed with darts and targets. It would be too tedious here to tell our readers the many difficulties they met with in their crossing the Nile,

<sup>u</sup> TELLEZ, LUDOLPH, & al. ubi sup. Vide & LE GRAND, Dissert. ix. p. 300, & seq.

<sup>w</sup> Ibidem ibid.

Jaacob ; after which they caused his head to be struck off, and sent to the emperor, who ordered it to be carried about through the whole kingdom of Tigre, that they might be satisfied of their having been deluded. This soon allayed the confusion he had thrown the kingdom into, and all readily submitted to the emperor, who punished only some few of the ringleaders, but spared the rest. Ambara Georgis and Zarah Jaunez threw themselves on the mercy of that monarch, and pleaded their having seized and dispatched the impostor as soon as they had discovered him to be such, as a motive for their siding with the true Jaacob ; which was the more readily granted, as their request was backed by Father Pays, who was sent with them to court by the viceroy to be their intercessor (42).

(42) Tellez, ubi sup. Ludolph, lib. ii. c. 7 n. 48, & seq. Le Grand Relat. Abissin. Dissert. ix. p. 300, & seq.

and vast ridges of mountains, and through some of the territories of the barbarous Gallas, Cafres, &c. before they reached the kingdom of Enarea, the last territory belonging to the Abissinian empire *. It will be sufficient to say, that even the Abissines themselves were so dissatisfied with this expedition, which they looked upon, though disguised under various false colours, as calculated to introduce the Portuguese, in order to bring their nation under their power, and their church under that of the pope, that they did all they could to render their journey more difficult and dangerous. This was more plainly perceived by the cold reception which the ambassador met with from the suspicious viceroy of Enarea, and from the various stratagems he used to find out the design of the embassy, which they were, on their part, as careful to conceal from him. He discovered enough, however, to convince him, and the great men of his court, whom he consulted upon it, that it was by no means expedient to let them continue the route that had been chalked out to them; seeing that was indeed the most safe and expeditious into India, and with which, if the Portuguese were once acquainted, it would be easy for them to pour in their forces upon them, and subdue them both to their king and religion: wherefore they resolved to send them a great and difficult way about, through the kingdom of Balii; to which the fathers, after much contesting, were obliged to submit. Upon which, having presented them with thirty ounces of gold, to defray their charges, and ordered proper officers to conduct them on their way through the kingdom of Gingiro, along with an ambassador from that kingdom, who was then at his court, to whose care he committed the fathers, he gave them leave to depart.

WE shall follow them no farther, but observe, upon the whole, than an Abissinian, named Manker, who was dispatched, as may be justly supposed, by some of those grandees of Susneus's court, who were averse to this embassy, to put a stop to its going further, betrayed their whole design to the governor of Amelmal, in the kingdom of Camale, and, at the same time, incensed all the people against them; upon which, the governor caused them to be arrested, till he had sent to the Abissinian court for further instructions. Three months elapsed before an answer returned, with one Babare, a man well known in these parts, with express orders to that governor, accompanied with rich presents, both for him and for the Moorish prince Alico, to help them forward on their journey, and to furnish them with all they wanted. It was in the month of June next year before these orders came; so that they had spent already fourteen months from their first setting out. The governor complied with the emperor's orders; but Alico, being instigated by Manker, caused them to be stopped afresh, and imprisoned, when they came into his territories. A strict search was made into all their cloaths and baggage, in order to find out the emperor's letters, which the father had providentially tied about the brawny part of his arm; so that they escaped a discovery. The father, who was confined apart from the rest, apprehending the danger of a second search might prove more fatal, resolved at any rate to prevent it; and calling for some fire, and a pipe of tobacco, found means to burn the letters undiscovered; which put an effectual end to all their fears and dangers. Alico, having detained them for ten days in that confinement, released them without farther harm, though Manker was very pressing to have them put to death; only, at his instigation, he kept three of his four Portuguese prisoners, and, to prevent the governor of Amelmal's assisting the ambassador to proceed on his journey by some other way, ordered him to return to the Abissine court by another route; where, after many fatigues and dangers, he at last safely arrived, with Father Fernandez, though not without great regret for their disappointment, and the loss of their three companions that were left behind †.

THE emperor was no less vexed at their return, and the account they gave of their journey; from all which he could not but clearly perceive how odious all his measures were become to most of his subjects, and what a difficult task he was like to have to bring about his designs. To remove one of the main obstacles to it, he bethought himself of ordering fundry conferences and disputations to be held between the Portuguese and the Abissines on the controverted points between them ‡: the result of which was, that, becoming impatient at the obstinacy of the latter, he issued out a proclamation, forbidding, under the severest penalties, any of his subjects maintaining that there was but one nature in Christ. This, and some others which followed in favour of the church of Rome, failed not of putting the whole empire, and especially the clergy, into a grievous ferment. The abuna Simeon, who was then absent, immediately came to court, and threatened to excommunicate all that adhered to the Romish doctrine; and being supported by Emana Cbristos, another of Susneus's uterine brothers, ventured so far as to do so, and to have his excommunication affixed on the gates of one of the churches of the imperial camp. In revenge of it, the emperor immediately caused another proclamation to come out, giving leave to all his subjects to embrace the faith which the Portuguese fathers preached, and a had so learnedly defended in their late disputations against the Abissine doctors. This was soon followed by a fresh anathema from the abuna, who, taking advantage of the emperor's being absent, and forced to winter in the kingdom, to suppress the revolted Agaus<sup>a</sup>, wrote circular letters to all his clergy, in defence of the old Abissinian faith, and condemning all that opposed it.

* De hoc, vide supra, p. 174.

† TELLEZ, LUD. &amp; al. ubi supra.

‡ Ubi supra, p. 142, &amp; seq.

This last augmenting the general discontent against the Roman missionaries, a young nobleman, named Julius, or Ælius, or, as the Abissinians pronounce it, Eulos, son-in-law to the emperor, at that time viceroy of the kingdom of Tigre, and a great enemy of Sella Christos, ventured to take up arms in defence of the old religion, and to persecute the Romish fathers at Fremona, and all their converts throughout his government, women as well as men. The b emperor was soon apprised of it, who forthwith sent orders to the abuna, and father Pays, to repair to the imperial camp, that the scruples of the one might be removed by the arguments of the other (R). They both readily obeyed; but the former came attended with such a multitude of monks and nuns, that they out-numbered the army; and all of them protested, that they would sooner die than forsake the antient faith, and, on their knees, begged of him that he would not persist in his innovations. The manner in which that monarch rejected their request was such as put them out of all hopes of prevailing; whilst Ælius his son-in-law, Emana Christos his brother, and one Casto, who was his high steward, being grown out of all patience at his unnatural inflexibility, began to hatch a conspiracy both against him and his brother Ras Sella Christos, into which old Simeon the abuna was easily drawn.

c THE better to pave the way to it, they agreed that the latter should thunder out a fresh excommunication against all who maintained the two natures of Christ; at which the emperor was so provoked, that he forthwith ordered him to take it off, or else he would order his head to be struck off. The pusillanimous prelate was obliged to obey; and the other three, finding no other way to compass their end, marched directly to the new palace built by Father Pays, where the emperor then was, and, leaving their men at the door, went up-stairs directly to him, with a full resolution to dispatch him. Susneus, who was just before apprised of their design by a kinswoman of his, named Ileamata, saw them enter the chamber with their swords in the scabbard in their hands, as is the custom at that court, without betraying either fear or mistrust; but rising from his seat, as it were to walk, laid his hand, in a familiar manner, on Ælius's sword, and went with them to the stair-case that led to the top of the house. The others followed him, thinking that a more proper place to execute their design; but, as we formerly observed, the door being purposely contrived by that Jesuit to shut with a spring-lock<sup>b</sup>, the king pulling it after him, left them on the outside, and disappointed their treacherous intent, without noise or disturbance; which reminded him of what Pays had formerly told him, that the door might prove of singular service to him<sup>c</sup>.

ÆLIUS was, however, so far from being discouraged by this disappointment, or from pursuing his former views, that he issued out an edict, enjoining all the Portuguese and their adherents, to depart out of the kingdom of Tigre, and all those who wished well to the Alexandrian church to follow him. At the same time the abuna published another, in which he communicated all the opposers of the Abissine church, and poured out showers of blessings on the defenders of it, and more especially on Ælius, who had taken up arms in its defence. This last it was, in all probability, which so highly encouraged that young and rash nobleman to

<sup>a</sup> De his, vide supra, p. 190. DOLPH, lib. iii. c. 10. n. 54.

<sup>b</sup> See before, p. 206.

<sup>c</sup> Pays apud TELLEZ, lib. iv. c. 14. LU-

(R) It may not here be amiss to observe, that Father Pays, and others of his society, had been very busy in translating and publishing several polemic treatises of their own church in the Ethiopic tongue, for the use of their converts, and more particularly such as they thought entered most into the controversy between the Abissines and them. Among these were Maldonat's Comment on the Gospels, Toledo on the Epistle to the Romans, Reibera on that to the Hebrews, and some others of the like stamp. All which were liked by some, but more generally disliked by the rest, on account of the many Amharic words and idioms that were intermixed with the Ethiopic, and were looked upon as so many ungrammatical barbarisms.

What still more confounded them was, that in these books, they had written the Lord's Prayer and Ave Maria in the Ethiopic character, but had left them untranslated from the Latin tongue; so that they look upon them with horror, and as on some pieces of conjuration (43). In the same absurd manner the congregation de propaganda fide, at Rome, caused the Pater Noster, and Ave Maria to be printed in the vulgate Latin, but in the Ethiopic character (44): which plainly shewed, that they did not design to allow them to perform the Divine Service in their own tongue, and could not but add to the other prejudices they had justly conceived against their church.

(43) Tellez, lib. iv. c. 14. Ludolph, lib. iii. c. 10, n. 56, & seq. capit. p. 17.

(44) Idem ibid. in indic.

attack the emperor, who was returning to Dembea, at the head of a powerful army, and, in a spite of all the earnest prayers and tears of his wife, to run the risk of a battle rather than be reconciled to him.

Marches against the emperor.

HE was, indeed, strongly prepossessed by those of his party, that, if he bent his whole force against his father-in-law, he could hardly fail of gaining the victory, because part of his commanders, who disliked all his measures, would be easily induced to abandon him. Flushed with these hopes, and impatient to put an end to the war, he rode up directly towards the emperor, accompanied with only six or seven volunteers, and, marching sternly through the ranks, asked aloud, Where is the emperor? In this manner did he pass through them unmolested quite to the emperor's tent, near which stood posted a battalion of troops, who knew nothing of his design; between whom and him a scuffle arose, in which he was knocked on the head with a stone; soon after which, another soldier came and run him through, and, b having cut off his head, carried it to the emperor. His few followers were immediately cut in pieces; at the sight of which his army betook themselves to flight, but were pursued with great slaughter, till the emperor commanded a retreat. The old abuna, who had beheld these transactions from an eminence, stood like one thunder-struck, and either had not power to fly, or hoped that his character would have proved a safeguard to him. It did so accordingly for some time, and the imperialists passed by him without any notice or insult, till at length bum valente catholico, a valiant catholic, as one of their authors styles him, laid him prostrate on the ground with a stroke of his lance; after which, he was soon dispatched by his followers, his head cut off, and brought to the emperor. Some others of the revolted underwent the same fate, particularly the eunuch Caslo, whose head, with those of Ælius and the abuna, were c exposed to public view; which put an effectual end to the rebellion, and gave Susneus a breathing-time to resume his religious projects in favour of the church of Rome <sup>c</sup>.

Slain with a stone.

His army dispersed.

The abuna murdered.

*The Agaus
converted.*

*The Turkish
Basha bribed.*

Two Jesuits arrive.

A proclamation against the Abissines.

Jonael raises a revolt.

The emperor's severity complained against.

THEY were at this time in great expectation of the patriarch from Rome, whom that monarch had desired the pope to send to him, to assist him to complete the good work, which he looked upon now as more likely than ever to succeed to both their wishes. He had by this time suppressed the Agaus, and reconciled them so far to Christianity, that they had agreed that Father Pays, who had done them some signal services, and obtained for them some better terms from the emperor than they could otherwise have hoped for, should come among and instruct them: but as that father was more usefully employed at court, they accepted of Father Fr. Antony de Angelis in his stead. The emperor had likewise taken care to secure an easy entrance to the d Jesuits that should come from Europe, and more particularly for the promised patriarch, by obliging the basha of Swakem, with dint of presents, to let them go to and from Fremona unmolested. Accordingly there arrived two of them from Goa, who came, as it were, as fore-runners of the patriarch Mendez; but, by reason of the badness of the roads and great rains, were obliged to winter at the monastery of Fremona. Their names were James de Mattos, a Portuguese, and Antony Bruno, a Sicilian; the former of whom met with a gracious reception at court the summer following, and the other staid there to supply the place of Father Laurence, who died about that time. The emperor growing still more zealous against the Abissinian rites, issued out a proclamation against the observance of the sabbath, or seventh day, which caused a fresh ferment, and some severe expostulations to be conveyed to him by an anonymous hand. e Notwithstanding which, he ordered it to be followed by a second; by which he obliged his subjects to work on Saturdays, under the small forfeiture of a piece of cloth, worth a crown, for the first, and confiscation of all for the second offence; and this last occasioned a new revolt, which was like to have had fatal consequences, and to have unhinged all his projects <sup>d</sup>.

IT was raised by Jonael, viceroy of Bagameder, and one of the greatest men in the empire, and who had published that proclamation, not so much out of obedience to the emperor, as with a view of stirring up the people to a general rebellion: so that, by the latter end of the same year, he found himself at the head of a considerable body, who followed him to some of the high mountains on the frontiers, where he was to be joined by the Gallas, whom he had engaged to come to his assistance. The emperor, perplexed and exasperated at the many obsta- f cles laid in his way, and to find so many traitors, as he called them, about him, resolved to have recourse to severe means, and caused some to be beheaded, others hanged, and others banished; which, however, rather heightened than allayed the general discontent; insomuch that many noble persons of both sexes, some of them his near relations, besought him in tears, "that he would not expose his empire to the danger of a general revolt, but rather take pity " of those multitudes of his subjects, who offended more through ignorance than wilfulness, " than to drive them by his rigour into despair." He grew so much the warmer at their intreaties, as he found so great a number of them in the same mind. To give them, there-

<sup>c</sup> TELLEZ, & al. ubi supra.

<sup>d</sup> TELLEZ, lib. iv. c. 20. LUDOLPH, lib. iii. c. 10. n. 65, & seq.

- fore, such an answer as should, he thought, at once confirm the unsteady, and deter the
- a obstinate, he convened the chiefs of his council and army, and such other learned priests and monks as followed the court, and, in a set and determinate speech, upbraided them with having deprived the late Za-Denghil of his life and crown, for having forsaken the Alexandrian faith, and embraced that of the Portuguese: notwithstanding which, when he himself came to the crown, after the defeat of the late Jaacob, instead of using any severity against them, he had forgiven them all; in return for which lenity he had met with nothing but seditions and revolts, under pretence of his introducing innovations into the Abissinian church, when, in fact, he was only reforming it; seeing he affirmed no more than they all did, that CHRIST OUR LORD WAS PERFECT GOD AND PERFECT MAN; which he could not be, unless he was invested with the human as well as with the divine nature; which two natures being distinct from each other, it necessarily
- b followed, that they both must be hypostatically united in him; which, he said, was not a forsaking, but professing, the true religion. And as to his forbidding the observance of the seventh day, he had done it, because he judged it unbecoming a Christian to observe the Jewish sabbath: that these he firmly believed, not out of regard to the Portuguese, but because they were the genuine decrees of the Chalcedonian council, and were confirmed by the practice of all Christian churches from the time of the apostles; for which, he added, he was ready to lay down his life, if there was occasion; but hoped that would rather prove the fate of his opposers.
- He had scarce done speaking, when a letter was brought to him from the revolted Jonael; in which, we are told, that viceroy insisted upon very high terms, and particularly on the total expulsion of the Jesuits. The emperor was not long debating about it; but, resolving to
- c answer him sword in hand, marched at the head of his choicest troops towards him; but finding the mountains, on which he was posted, too difficult of access, he encamped about the foot of them, not doubting but some of the revolters would come quickly down to him, as they actually did, and in such numbers, that Jonael, finding himself in a great measure abandoned, fled to the Gallas, his confederates, where, instead of a refuge, he met with his death; they having been bribed by the emperor to dispatch him. Gets him murdered by the Gallas.
- In the same year, another such revolt was quelled in the frontiers of the kingdom of Gojam, which had been raised on the same account at the instigation of the monks and Batavis, a kind of hermits, of the kingdom of Damot. These Ras Sella Christos at first endeavoured to reduce
- d by fair means; but, upon their answering him that they would not submit, unless he delivered to them the books translated by the Latin fathers to be committed to the flames, and the writers to be hanged, he attacked them with such fury, that above 3000 of them were cut in pieces, and, amongst them, 188 out of 400 of those monks, after a most desperate defence. All this while Father Pays had been employed in building a sumptuous church of square
- e stone, after the European manner, near the lake of Dembea. This structure had a very stately arch over the high altar, supported by curious columns, whilst six others of the Ionic order supported the frontispiece; over which was a high steeple for the bells. A winding stair-case led to the top, which was flat, and fenced by a parapet; whence one had a delightful prospect over the lake and adjacent plains. The building being now finished, the emperor went two days journey to view it, and entered it bare-footed; and, at his departure, left a considerable
- present to it.
- HAVING by this time quelled the most considerable revolts, though not the ferment that
- f still reigned in the hearts of his subjects, he thought fit, the following year, to make a most public profession of his religion; an act which he had still delayed, partly on account of those frequent seditions, and partly through the reluctance he found to cast off all his wives and concubines, except his empress; a great number of whom he had taken, and had children by; and without which the fathers refused to admit him into their church. He was at length prevailed upon to comply; which done, he publicly abjured the Alexandrian church, made a general confession of his sins, in the Romish form, at the feet of Father Pays, and afterwards made a public profession of his faith in terms to this effect: "That he renounced all obedience and communion with the Alexandrian see, and acknowledged that of Rome alone; the pope of which was the only true successor of St. Peter, the chief of the apostles; to whose authority he intirely submitted, being fully persuaded that he is incapable of erring in any points, either of faith or practice." This confession and submission was afterwards published at full length through most parts of the empire, and concluded with an exhortation to his good subjects to follow his example, and with some severe censures against the errors of the Alexandrian church and patriarchs; as may be seen at full length in the authors quoted in the margin, as well as
- Susneus abjures the Abissinian, and embraces the Roman church.*
- A stately church built by Father Pays.*
- Another revolt quelled in Gojam.*
- Publishes his confession thro' the empire.*

<sup>c</sup> TELLEZ, lib. iv. c. 22. LUDOLPH, ubi supra, p. 71, & seq. c. 27, & seq. LUDOLPH, ubi supra, & Comment. p. 509, & seq. LE GRAND, ibid. p. 309, 498, & alib.

<sup>f</sup> TELLEZ, ubi sup.

<sup>g</sup> Ibid.

ALVAREZ, c. 59. LOBO, Relat. i. p. 14, &

Leaves the abunas vices.

their annual letters of 1624. We shall only add, that he doth not spare in it the abunas, especially the later ones, whose vices and ill conduct are by him painted in the vilest colours, and with such a zealous warmth, as, he imagined, would not fail of recommending him to the patriarch Mendez, who was daily expected, as well as to his two principals at Rome and Madrid. And this was the prevailing motive which hastened this his recantation, and induced him, tho' much against his will, to discard all his wives and concubines, together with their children; not doubting but that his example would excite many of his nobles and courtiers to follow it, whom nothing but that strong tie of nature deterred from so doing.

A new revolt raised.

BUT though some of them actually did so, yet they were but few in comparison of those who dared still shew a public dislike against all his measures. Accordingly a new insurrection was raised much about the same time by the son of Gabrael; which was, however, soon

Quelled by his brother Sella Christos.

quelled by the artful Sella Christos, who immediately marched against him, and forced him to retire into the most inaccessible mountains of the kingdom of Sheva, or Xaoa; where, unable to follow him, he quickly bribed some of the Gallas, under pretence of siding with him, to apprehend and send him either alive or dead to him. They chose the latter, and dispatched him with such zeal and fury with their clubs, that they could only send his jaw-bone and beard, which was all that remained of him unbroken. Ras Sella Christos, however, ventured over the mountains with some of his expert climbers, and there found the treasure which had belonged to the revolters, which he distributed among his troops, reserving to himself only some rich utensils, of which they had plundered a church, with a design to restore them to it. The misfortune was, that some of his enemies had by this time so far misrepresented him to the emperor, that, when the news of this defeat was brought to him, instead of rewarding or commending him for it, he stripped him of his viceroyship of Gojam; and though he quickly after restored him to it, yet his jealousy of him still increased, and proved the occasion of farther disasters, as the sequel will soon shew <sup>b</sup>.

*The emperor
grows jealous of him.*

*Father Pays
dies.*

IN this year Father Pays, who had the greatest hand in bringing the emperor over to the Roman church, ended his days in the monastery of Gorgorra, after having spent nineteen years in that mission, besides his seven years captivity in Arabia lately mentioned <sup>1</sup>. He was soon after followed by another of his society, named Antony de Angelis, who had been sent in his stead to convert the Agaus, as was likewise hinted above, and was famous for his skill in the Ambaran, or court-language. We mention them both more particularly, as they had lived so long, and travelled through so great a part of the empire; and as it is from the relations they have left behind of the Abissinian affairs, that Father Tellez hath taken the greatest part of the transactions of this epocha.

Succeeded by four other Jesuits.

1623.

1624.

THESE were soon after succeeded by four others, among whom was Father Emanuel d'Almeyda, often quoted through this history, who was the chief of them. The other three were called Emanuel Barradas, Lewis Cardeyra, and Francis Carvalho; all of whom had embarked at Goa in an Indian vessel, and in the month of November the same year, after many difficulties and hazards, arrived at Suakem on the 4th of December the year following, where their rich presents procured them a kind reception from the Turkish basha. From thence they departed for Fremona, and arrived there about the beginning of next February, accompanied by some others of that society, who had joined them in the way. There they staid till they received orders from the emperor to proceed to Dembea, where the court then was; to which they were soon after conveyed by a very good escorte, and where they met with a most gracious reception from that monarch.

Alphonso Mendez sent patriarch into Abissinia.

IN the mean while, the news of the emperor's abjuration, profession, and extraordinary zeal, had long ere now reached the courts of Rome and Madrid, and encouraged them to send the patriarch which he had so earnestly requested of them in his former letters, though the two first, Bermudez and Oviedo, had been so severely treated by his predecessors. The person pitched upon was Alphonso Mendez, a Jesuit, and doctor of divinity, and a person every way qualified for such an expedition: to supply whose place, in case of death (a thing so common in those long and dangerous voyages) as well as for the greater grandeur and pomp, they appointed him two successors; the first of whom was Father James Seco, with the title of bishop of Nice, and the other Father John de Rocha, with that of bishop of Hierapolis. All three having been consecrated for that purpose the foregoing year, in the cathedral of Lisbon, set sail immediately for Goa, with seventeen others of the same society. We shall not enter into a detail of their voyage thither, and from thence to Fremona, but only observe, that they lost the bishop of Nice, who died on the way, whilst the patriarch and his retinue continued appointed his successors.*

*Two Jesuits

<sup>b</sup> TELLEZ, ubi supra, c. 31. LUDOLPH, & al. ubi sup.

<sup>1</sup> See before, p. 279, & seq.

a their route through the kingdom of Dancali, joining to the frontiers of that of Angot, and, The rest arrive after a tedious and fatiguing journey, arrived safely, with his company, at the monastery of in safety.
Fremona, on the 21st of June of the current year 1724 <sup>1</sup>.

WE have already observed that the winter, in that country, begins on that day of this month, and ends on the same day in September <sup>m</sup>; so that he was obliged to stay there till October following, on account of the dangerous travelling through Tigre and Dembea at that season, occasioned by the corruption of the air, and noxious vapours, which are frequently fatal to the inhabitants, and much more so to strangers. He set out in October for the new monastery at Gorgorra, on the lake of Dembea, and, during his short stay there, ordained conditionally about twenty monkish converts, who had been so before by the abuna, and allowed b such of them as had wives to keep them still, to prevent the want of curates. Mendez ordains 20 new converts.

WHEN he went to wait upon the emperor for the first time, which he did in his pontifical habit, he was met about half a league from the imperial camp by the grandees and nobles of the court, at the head of 15 or 16,000 armed men, of horse and foot, officers and soldiers, in their best attire, the horses richly caparisoned, and the whole procession making a magnificent show. The horsemen first coming up to the patriarch, made him a low bow; then, opening to the right and left, received him in their centre, with sound of trumpets, kettle-drums, and other warlike instruments, and with loud shouts and acclamations, where a grand pavilion was reared for him to go and put on his cope, mitre, and pontifical ornaments. At his coming out he was mounted on a stately pyed horse, richly covered and trapped, which had been c sent to him from the emperor; a sumptuous canopy was held up over him by six viceroys; Ras Sella Christos leading his horse by the bridle, and variety of vocal and instrumental music marching before him. At his entrance into the church, he was saluted by the discharge of some cannon, and all the small arms of the horse and foot. The emperor was seated on his throne in the chancel, magnificently cloathed, with the crown on his head: a hymn, called the Benedictus, or song of Zachary, was sung by the best voices; the patriarch was conducted to the emperor, who tenderly embraced him; after which he went up to the altar, and made a short speech, with which his majesty was mightily pleased; and then they all withdrew in the same grand manner <sup>n</sup>.

d AT his first audience with the emperor, in which he was seated on a chair equal with the throne, they appointed the day on which that monarch and all his nobles, clergy, and laity, were to make their public submission, and take the solemn oaths of obedience to the church and see of Rome, which was to be on the eleventh of February the following year. The day being come, the palace magnificently adorned, and the emperor, his eldest son Basilides, his brothers, relations, viceroys, governors, and officers, cloathed in the richest apparel, the patriarch, in his pontificals, entered the grand hall, and being seated, as at his first audience, on his chair at the emperor's left hand, began the ceremony with an elaborate discourse on the supremacy of the church and pontif of Rome, intermixed with severe reflections on the past ages, in which the Abissinian monarchs had revolted from their allegiance to him: but now the time e was come, he said, in which they were again to be reduced and re-united to their great and only pastor and fold, and make amends for the defection of their ancestors. This speech was, by the emperor's orders, answered by Melcha Christos, his cousin and lord high steward, with great encomiums on the Portuguese, and with a declaration that it was his present majesty's sincere intention to perform all his promises and obligations to the pope of Rome. The king now-and-then prompting him what to say next, and observing, among other things, that this was not the first time that he had promised obedience to the pope, seeing he had done it once before, in the presence of one of the fathers of the Society of Jesus. To this the patriarch having given a f short reply, by way of assent, ordered the holy gospel to be delivered to him; upon which, falling upon his knees, he took the oath of supremacy to the pope, in words to this effect <sup>o</sup>; "We, Emperor swears submission to the pope.
" Soltan Segued, emperor of Ethiopia, acknowledge and confess, that St. Peter, the chief of the apostles, hath been appointed by our Lord Jesus Christ head of the whole Christian church; the purport of the oath.
" and that he gave him plenary power and authority over the whole world; when he said to him, THOU ART PETER, AND UPON THIS ROCK WILL I BUILD MY CHURCH, AND I WILL " GIVE THEE THE KEYS OF THE KINGDOM OF HEAVEN, &c. and when, on another occasion, he commanded him TO FEED HIS SHEEP. And we likewise believe that the pope of Rome, duly elected, is the true successor of St. Peter, and is invested with the same dignity and

<sup>1</sup> TELLEZ, ubi supra, c. 35, & seq. LUDOLPH, ubi supra, c. 11. LOBO, Relat. i. p. 27, & seq. LE GRANDE, & al. <sup>m</sup> See before, p. 181, & seq. <sup>n</sup> TELLEZ, ubi supra, lib. v. c. 2, & seq. LUDOLPH, lib. iii. c. 11. n. 17, & seq. <sup>o</sup> Id. ibid.

“ power over the whole Christian church. Wherefore we do here promise and swear to our “ lord and holy father Urban VIII. and to his successors, a true and sincere obedience, “ most humbly laying our person and empire at his feet. So help us God and his holy “ gospels <sup>p</sup>. ”

*Taken by his heir, nobles,
 &c.*

His example was followed by prince Basilides, his eldest son, and by all the other princes of the blood, as well as all the other viceroys and grandees, and the whole clergy and laity of the empire ; at the end of which the ceremony was closed with a speech by Ras Sella Christos, which he pronounced with his drawn sword in his hand, to this effect : What is past, is past ; as for those who shall be deficient in their duty, let this (sword) be their punishment. Which words were thought to have been meant to intimidate those who had joined Gabrael's son in the late revolt. After this, they all took the oaths to prince Basilides, as the immediate heir to the crown ; upon which occasion, the same Ras Sella Christos, like a true son of the Roman church, to use Father Tellez's own words, tacked to his oath a condition worthy of his noble heart and zeal for Christianity, in words to this effect : I swear and promise to acknowledge him (the prince Basilides) as the lawful heir and successor of his present majesty, and to obey him like a faithful subject, as long as he shall protect, favour, and maintain, the true catholic faith ; otherwise to become his first and most irreconcilable enemy <sup>a</sup>.

Ras Sella Christos's bold declaration.

THIS bold declaration, which neither the emperor nor his presumptive heir thought proper to take notice of at present, was so far from inspiring that monarch with a more favourable opinion of him, that it rather inflamed his jealousy, and much more that of young Basilides ; so that, instead of proving of any advantage to the Roman church and her missionaries, it rather accelerated their ruin and subversion, as the sequel will soon shew <sup>c</sup>.

Aproclamation for re-ordination.

THIS grand ceremony was immediately followed by a proclamation, expressly forbidding any of the Abissine clergy, monks, and priests, to perform any priestly functions, till they were previously examined and approved by the patriarch : there being some reason to doubt whether they had been lawfully examined (S). What was still more insupportable, was another edict, which was issued out quickly after, expressly enjoining all the subjects of the empire to embrace the Roman faith under pain of death, and to conform in all the injunctions of that church, with respect to the keeping of Lent, Easter, &c. By this last, all the ladies of the court were likewise obliged to go and take the same oaths of supremacy above-mentioned ; which they actually complied with : so that there seemed now to be nothing wanting to complete the wishes of the prince and his missionaries, and bring the whole empire under the obedience of the pope. They found, however, a greater obstacle to it than they imagined from the clergy and laity, and especially the monks, whom neither threats nor punishments could deter, nor fair promises and caresses induce into a compliance with the edict, but rather drove them away into the mountainous parts for refuge ; where they were, nevertheless, punished with the utmost severity when caught.

To oblige all to turn papists.

*The emperor settles great revenues on
 the patriarch.*

WHILST the patriarch and his agents were carrying on these forced conversions with a high hand, the emperor was no less solicitous to settle them at their ease. He built him a good house, and gave him large lands for his maintenance, on the borders of Dembea and Ba-gameder, and added to it a seminary for sixty Abissinian and Portuguese youths, to be instructed in both languages, and in the Roman faith. Besides these, he caused other houses to be built in several parts of the empire, for the residence of the missionaries, and another edifice near the camp of Dancas, where he resided usually in the winter, that the patriarch might be always nigh his person, and preach to him every Sunday, on such topics as were most likely to reconcile his subjects to the Romish church. Yet all these pains and

<sup>p</sup> TELLEZ, lib. v. c. 3, & seq. LUDOLPH, ubi supra. ibid.

<sup>a</sup> TELLEZ, & al. ubi supra.

<sup>c</sup> Idem

(S) If Tellez and his brethren may be believed, there was more occasion for such an examination than a reader would at first imagine ; witness what we have had occasion to observe on that subject in a foregoing section (44) : for, besides that they did not confer any of the lesser orders, the ordination of deacons consisted, it seems, only in anointing their heads, and shaving some parts thereof ; and that of the priests, in taking a loaf of bread off the church window with their own hand :

infomuch that, on a certain time, almost 3000 resorting to the abuna of Alexandria to be ordained, he not being at leisure to perform the ceremony, bid them all go and take what orders they would, and go about their business (45). But there is something so improbable in this account, that one would wish for a more impartial authority than those writers, before he can give credit to it (46).

(44) See before, p. 225, & seq. Differt. de Ordinac. p. 342, & seq.

(45) Alvarez, Tellez, ubi supra.

(46) Vide Le Grande,

- a precautions brought as few sincere profelytes into it as their other severities. Still the people found something to dislike and complain against in their worship; such as kneeling at church, fixed altars, crucifixes, auricular confessions, and many other such; particularly the structure of their churches, one of which was built at Gorgoras, of lime and stone, with a stately roof, and a great deal of carving in it and in the choir and vestry, all which appeared strange and irregular to them. It was, however, dedicated this year, with great solemnity, after the Romish manner, which pleased them no better than the building. About the same time two missionaries, who had made a great number of converts in the province of Cegued, in the extreme parts of the kingdom of Tigre, were massacred by that people: soon after which, that kingdom was visited with a plague of locusts, (such as we have elsewhere observed is very common in that empire<sup>a</sup>), which did such damage to it, that above 5000 families were obliged to seek for sustenance in other provinces. This judgment was, according to their natural superstition, attributed by the Portuguese to the murder of the two missionaries above-mentioned; and by the Abissinians to the persecutions raised against them by the Romanists.

The people dislike the popish worship.

1626.

Kill two of their priests.

The locusts ravage in Tigre.

- ON the next year the kingdom of Gojam was over-run with the neighbouring Gallas, where, among other cruelties and ravages, they surpris'd the viceroy at Buco, and murdered him. They would probably have done more mischief, had not Ras Sella Christos come upon them suddenly, and oblig'd them to re-cross the Nile in the dead of the night, and return to their own mountains. The next year, in which five more Jesuits, with some difficulty, arrived at Fremona, a new sedition was hatched by one of the emperor's sons-in-law, named Tekla Guergis, or Georgios, then viceroy of Tigre, in which he was joined by two famous nobles, Gebra Marjam, and John Acayo. These immediately declared for the Alexandrian church, in opposition to that of Rome; and, to shew they were in earnest, he ordered some crucifixes, rosaries, beads, and other popish trinkets, to be thrown into the fire; and one of the new ordained priests, whom the Jesuits had recommended to be his chaplain, to be stripped of his priestly dress, and strangled. Against him the emperor sent Kebaxos, al. Keba Christos, who had lately been viceroy of that kingdom, at the head of 500 targeteers, 100 horse, and 1000 men, whom he drew out of that of Gojam, and with whom he march'd against the revolvers with such swiftness, that though they were above a hundred leagues from them, he overtook and defeated them, and put an end to the rebellion in less than a month. Tekla Guergis, the ringleader of it, being taken, and sent prisoner to the imperial court, was condemn'd by the emperor, though he was doubly his son-in-law, as having married two of his daughters, one after the other, not only to lose his life, but to be hanged like a common malefactor, at the head of his camp. What must appear still more rigorous, he order'd a sister of his to undergo the same shameful death, for having, as he pretended, favour'd that revolt under-hand: and this, in spite of all the prayers and intreaties of his court, of both sexes, in her behalf; it being, till then, an unheard-of thing in Ethiopia to condemn a woman, much more a lady of rank, to such a death. No wonder if the whole court was seiz'd with dread and horror at such an unusual instance of inflexibility<sup>c</sup>.

1627.

The Gallas over-run Gojam.

1628.

Tekla Guergis raises a revolt.

Is taken and hanged with his own sister.

- e By this time the Romish religion seem'd to have reach'd the highest pitch of success that it ever had in this country. They had, besides nineteen Jesuits, many natives who had been ordained by the patriarch, and a prodigious number of converts. They were now laying the foundation for a new cathedral; other churches were beautified and ornamented in the Romish way. The proud patriarch had got such an ascendant over the monarch, that he was above paying any regard to the laws and customs of the country, assuming to himself an authority vastly superior to what any of their abunas had ever pretended, or dared to have aimed at: he thunder'd out the most dreadful excommunications, for the least offences, even against some of the chief officers of the court, and could hardly be prevail'd upon by the sovereign to recall them. An Iegee, or chief of the monks, a man of great sanctity, dying in the Abissinian faith, had been buried at the foot of the altar of their church: of which Mendez being apprised, he order'd his body to be taken up and thrown on a dunghill; which was accordingly done; infomuch that the Abissinians could not forbear complaining aloud, that the Portuguese exercis'd their cruelties and resentment, not only against the living, but against the dead<sup>d</sup>.

A new cathedral built by the patriarch.

- f BUT whilst every thing seem'd to go according to their wishes, the seeds of all the disasters that befel them soon after, had been for some time sowing underhand by Melcha Christos, a rank schismatic, as Tellez styles him; but, in good truth, an enemy to all Roman innovations, and their authors and favourers: and one who plainly foresaw how impossible it would be to stop a their surprising progress, as long as two such powerful friends as the emperor and his brother Ras Sella Christos, went so unanimously hand in hand to support them: so that there could be no other means found to stop the career of the former, but by sowing the seeds of jealousy between the latter (T). We have already taken notice of the one being deprived of his viceroyship of Gojam, the best and richest in the whole empire, by the other; and this it was that laid the foundation for all the disturbances and revolts which we are now going to relate.

<sup>a</sup> See before, p. 187, & seq. & al.

<sup>c</sup> Iid. ubi sup.

<sup>d</sup> TELLEZ, ubi supra, c. 14, & seq. LUDOLPH,

1629. ONE of the first of these seditions was raised in the next year among the Agaus of Bagameder, whose dwelling is amongst some of the highest mountains in the empire; against whom the emperor marched at the head of 25,000 foot and 2000 horse; but attacking them too indiscreetly among their high rocks, was repulsed with great loss. He next ordered his brother Ras Sella Christos to lead another army against them; who, though lately stripped of his government and rich territories, readily obeyed; and, falling upon such of them as had ventured down from the mountains, prevented the rest from doing any more mischief. He was soon after obliged to march into the kingdom of Ambara, where another revolt had been raised by one Lacu Mariam, when he came so suddenly upon them, that the greatest part were either slain, or perished in their flight, by their fall into those deep precipices. This was no sooner quelled than another began on the mountains of Lasta; against whom the emperor dispatched Keba Christos, viceroy of Tigre; who, venturing too far with his small force, was slain by those mountaineers, and his men put to the route. About the same time the Gallas made a fresh irruption into the kingdom of Gojam, whom Zegur Egzi, lieutenant to Ras Sella Christos, venturing to oppose with too small a force, was himself slain, and his troops utterly defeated. By the death of these two last commanders, the Romish religion lost two of its most principal props, next to the emperor and his brother: and these two last coming at length to an open rupture, soon occasioned an extraordinary change; and those who disapproved of that monarch's measures in favour of it, ceased not filling his mind with fears and jealousies, both against him and the Portuguese; so that matters quickly put on a different face; and those who had, for fear of punishment, complied with his edict, and embraced his new religion, only conceived the greater dislike to it, and missed no opportunity of shewing it<sup>w</sup>, whilst the patriarch was still giving them fresh occasions for it.

For besides his excommunications, and other violent measures and proceedings already mentioned, he had lately taken it into his head to have a woman arrested for a witch; which he soon found gave universal disgust to the people, who abhor the supposition of any such contract between men and devils, as implying, in their opinion, two Gods, or first causes, one of good the other of evil. In this they seem much more judicious than the Portuguese and Spaniards, who greedily swallow every absurd story of witchcrafts, possessions, and diabolical works: and when these have urged the Scriptures against them in favour of wizards, witches, &c. their answer was, if there ever were any in other countries, they never had any in Ethiopia. But it is not unlikely that the patriarch intended to introduce the inquisition, with other innovations, among them; witches and wizards commonly affording a plentiful, as well as gainful, exercise, to the greedy inquisitors; as one may judge by their attos de fe: and it is the more probable that this woman was pitched upon to lead the dance, as Tellez himself says, that she had been convicted of, and had herself confessed, the crime. However that be, the patriarch was obliged to let her go unpunished.

<sup>w</sup> TELLEZ, ibid. c. 15, & seq. LUDOLPH, & al. ubi sup,

(T) This was done, it seems, by inspiring the emperor with a strong suspicion that there was a private understanding between the Portuguese and Ras Sella Christos; and that, notwithstanding the specious pretences of gratitude and zeal for him and his successor, they had united their interests with no other view than to deprive him and Basilides of the crown; and, by their assistance, to seize upon the empire. To this end, they assured his majesty, that the patriarch and his missionaries had sent pressing instances into Europe, for a fresh supply of forces and artillery from thence, and that they only waited for their arrival before they ventured to declare for that false brother of his: who, on his part, had engaged to make them such large concessions, as he well knew could not fail of engaging that haughty and ambitious nation to his interest (47). This was a double piece of Machiavilian policy, and raised an equal jealousy in that monarch against Ras Sella Christos, and the whole Portuguese tribe. We shall soon see how well it succeeded.

(47) Tellez, Ludolph, & al. sup. citat.

- a He behaved, indeed, much more becoming his character with regard to one of the emperor's daughters, a light princess, (as most of that rank are said to be*) who had two husbands living, yet cohabited with a third in open adultery, and was desirous to be married to him. She solicited the patriarch for some time in the most pressing manner, to consent to; and to grant her a dispensation for it; which he as strenuously refusing, it exasperated her to that degree, that, to be revenged on him, she set all the men over whom she had any influence, against him. Thus, by one means or other, both he and his church became daily more odious to the people; and the emperor, who in this last case acted so much below the character of a pious prince, as he would have been thought, with respect to his lewd daughter, lost daily more the love and esteem of his subjects, and gave them new occasion and encouragement for fresh revolts.

b ACCORDINGLY, on the next year, the revolters in the kingdom of Ambara took up their arms again; and having made choice of a new chief, to whom they gave the title of viceroy, sent him, at the head of a powerful force, to possess himself of the kingdom of Tigre. Unfortunately for him, he kept himself so little upon his guard, that he was surprised by the viceroy of that province, as he was carousing on a Saturday (which they still observed as the sabbath) and intirely defeated, with the loss of 4000 men and 32 pair of kettle-drums. About the same time another party of the Agaus was intirely cut off on the mountains by Ras Sella Christos; yet did not this, nor his other late services, diminish in the least the suspicion which the emperor entertained against him. Towards the latter end of the year arrived a new bishop of Nice from Goa, and last from Suakem, in the room of James Seco, who, as was hinted a little higher, died at sea, in his way hither. This new prelate was called Don Apollinaris d'Almeyda; and arriving at Fremona about the middle of August, (their winter) could not come to court till that season was over: but upon his reaching the imperial camp on the 16th of December, he met with a most gracious reception there; and, after a fortnight's stay, retired to the patriarch's palace at Depsau, four leagues distant from Dancaz.

- c ON the next year, the emperor having sent the new viceroy of Gojam, named Serca Christos, with a small army, to convoy the tribute of gold that was coming from the kingdom of Enarea (V) against the Gaffates; as soon as he entered the territories of those free-booters, and saw them covered with multitudes of large cattle, he set aside the thoughts of escorting the tribute, of which he knew he had no share, and seized upon such a large number of their cows, as he judged would yield him a much richer booty; and accordingly was driving near 100,000 of them towards Dancaz. The emperor, highly indignant at this insult, sent him express orders to restore the cattle to the owners, and to surrender himself prisoner; but he, instead of obeying, issued out a proclamation, declaring prince Basilides emperor; and commanding all that embraced the Romish faith to abjure it out of hand, and return to that of Alexandria. This was done without the young prince's consent, or even knowledge; and did no less exasperate him against him, than it did his father; and having obtained his leave, he marched directly against him at the head of his army. The rebel was no sooner apprised of his approach, than he sent an express to a young prince of the race of some of the antient emperors, inviting him to come and accept of the crown, and assist him in restoring the old Abissinian church, and driving all the jesuits and Portuguese out of the empire; assuring him, that he could not fail of being supported in it by all the monks, and the far greater part of the grandees and people.
- d THIS prince, whose name was Melcha Christos, readily accepted the offer; and raised what forces he could get, in order, if possible, to join those of Serca Christos. In the mean time he caused a manifesto to be published, importing, that he did not take up arms with any intent of seizing on the sovereign power, but only to extirpate the Roman religion, and restore the old Alexandrian faith through the empire. This declaration failed not to draw great numbers of monks, and other people who had retired into the mountains, to his

* See before, p. 193.

† Vide LUDOLPH, l. iii. c. 14. & al. sup. citat.

(V) We have elsewhere observed, that this new-conquered kingdom paid rather a free-will offering, than a tribute, to the Abissinian monarchs; they being in no condition to oblige them to it, by reason of their vast distance, and the country of the Gaffates lying for the most part between them. For this reason, though it consisted only of 1000 ounces of gold, or about 10,000 crowns, yet such was the indigence of those monarchs, that they were glad to send a caravan, under a strong convoy, to fetch it from thence, and to prevent its being intercepted by those free-booters (48).

These Gaffates spread themselves along the banks of the Nile, on the south side of the empire, between the kingdoms of Gojam and Damot; and their country so abounds with grass, that they breed an innumerable multitude of black cattle; which being of a large size, and very fat and fleshy, bear a great price thro' all the neighbouring kingdoms and provinces: so that we need not wonder at the preference which this revolted viceroy gave to 100,000 of them, before 1000 ounces of gold (49).

(48) See before, p. 175.
MOD. HIST. VOL. VI.

(49) Tellez, Ludolph, Lobo, et al. sup. citat.
4 G

party. But upon information that young Basilides was advancing towards Serca Christos,<sup>a</sup> he thought it more expedient to fortify himself among those almost inaccessible rocks, and wait for a more favourable opportunity. On the other hand, the emperor, seeing himself threatened by those two revolts in different parts of his dominions, was obliged to send for his brother again, and to be reconciled to him, in order to advise with him what course to steer against them: whereupon Ras Sella Christos counselled him to send a new reinforcement to his son, together with express orders to go and attack the rebel Serca Christos: of which he acquitted himself with such diligence and success, that he was forced to retire with all speed over the Nile; whither still closely pursuing him, he obliged him to come to a sharp engagement, in which his foes were totally routed: upon which he fled to the neighbouring mountains; but before three days were over, he surrendered himself to the prince; by whom he was sent prisoner to the imperial camp, and there bastinadoed to death.<sup>b</sup> Seven of his companions being likewise conducted thither in chains, had their heads cut off. One of his chief officers, who was of the number, and had the boldness to vent his dire blasphemies, as Tellez styles them<sup>c</sup>, against the church of Rome, as he hung suspended on a hook, had his tongue cut out; and, towards night, was dispatched by a volley of darts<sup>d</sup>.

Serca Christos defeated by Basilides:

cudgelled to death; and seven of his accomplices beheaded.

The emperor's success against the revoltors.

Forced to sink back with shame.

The patriarch and bishop hold their visitation.

Representations made to the emperor:

who relaxes his severe edicts:

and is severely censured by the patriarch.

This success encouraged the emperor to march at the head of his whole army against the other revoltors, who lay encamped on the high mountains of Lasta: for by this time he was relapsed into his old suspicions against his brother, and obliged him to retire to his own house. He therefore divided his army into three bodies, in order to enter those mountains by as many ways; and had the good luck at first to surprise and kill some of the revoltors: but one of his bodies having met with a more warm reception, and been repulsed with great loss, he thought fit to withdraw with more haste than honour, before the rebels had stopped his way through those passes, which would have cut off his provisions, and reduced his army by famine, as well as prevented his retreat: and he had the good fortune to time it so well, that he gained the imperial camp at Dancaz, without any farther damage than the dishonour of leaving the kingdom of Begameder exposed to the fury and resentment of the revoltors: the consequence of which ill-concerted expedition was, that it greatly tarnished his fame, and disheartened his friends, at the same time that it raised the spirits of his enemies<sup>e</sup>. The patriarch was very diligent in making his visitations in the kingdom of Dembea, and others about it; whilst the new bishop of Nice did the same in other parts; and the jesuits, in their respective cantons; and all of them successfully enough, by their own accounts, to make daily a great number of proselytes. But notwithstanding all these boasted conversions, the Alexandrians gained so much ground at court, that they now made no scruple to tell the emperor, That all these disasters were wholly owing to the change of religion he had occasioned in his dominions, and that neither he nor the people must expect peace or tranquility, as long as he upheld and promoted the Romish religion; which, how right soever it might be, could never appear so to his subjects, as long as it condemned that in which they had been brought up: that it was next to impossible ever to persuade them that circumcision, or the observance of the sabbath, could be offensive to God; or that the Alexandrian liturgy, and calendar of fasts and festivals, ought to give place to those of Rome. That it would therefore be more safe if he would relax his severity in those points, which did in no-wise attain the essentials of Christianity, and grant them a full liberty to go on in their antient rites and customs, seeing all the efforts of Ras Sella Christos, and his partisans, to the contrary, were chiefly levelled against his and his kingdom's safety<sup>d</sup>.

THESE representations, joined to the danger he was in from the revoltors in Lasta, lately mentioned, made such an impression on the emperor, that he communicated them to the patriarch; who, on his part, though very loth to relax, yet at such a juncture, being glad to lower his sails, and rather remit a little, than lose all, consented that some small concessions should be made to the people, provided they were not repugnant to the Roman faith. Accordingly, before he went afresh against the revoltors, he issued out a proclamation in his army, 1. That they should be allowed the use of their old books and rites in the divine service, provided they were revised by the patriarch. 2dly, That they should observe all their festivals according to the old Alexandrian calendar, except that of Easter, and those that immediately depended upon it. And, 3dly, That those who cared not to fast on Saturday, should do it on Wednesday. These were indeed very trifling concessions at the best, and consequently such as neither could satisfy the Abissinian clergy nor laity. But what more surprised the emperor, was, that they highly displeased the patriarch himself; who thereupon took the liberty to expostulate with him in very unbecoming terms; telling him, that he might as well have given them free liberty to return to their old Alexandrian faith, seeing they

<sup>a</sup> Ubi sup. c. 25.
& seq. LUDOLPH, ubi sup.

<sup>b</sup> Id. ibid. LUDOLPH, l. iii. c. 11. p. 70, & seq.
<sup>d</sup> TELLEZ, c. 28. LUDOLPH, ubi sup.

<sup>c</sup> TELLEZ, ibid. c. 26,

a would of course take his proclamation in that sense. Yea, he went so far as to remind him of the fate of the Jewish king Uzziab<sup>c</sup>, who was smitten by God with a leprosy, for having presumed to infringe on the priestly office: intimating thereby, that it belonged solely to the Pope, and to himself, his vicar, to grant such licences; and that he had in that usurped a power which did not belong to him. 1631.

THIS bold epistle could not but nettle the emperor to a great degree, and could not fail of making him sensible how much too generous he had been in his vast concessions to those pretended successors of St. Peter, and what advantage they took now of his too great weakness. Nevertheless, as he was now going on such a dangerous expedition, he contented himself with sending him a suitable answer; in which, among other things, he reminds him, That when the Romish religion first began in his dominions, it did not owe its establishment to the preaching of the jesuits, nor to any miracles they wrought in confirmation of it, nor to the good-liking of his subjects, but merely to his own approbation and free good-will; inasmuch as we found that the doctrines of our (Alexandrian) books were quite conformable to it: and consequently could not see that he had given the patriarch any occasion of complaint. We shall beg leave here to subjoin a remark or two upon this answer: the one is, that the Abissinians, whom the Portuguese writers represent as ignorant, illiterate, and untractable, were yet able enough to perceive, that the dispute about the incarnation was founded on mere words, ill understood and explained: and, 2dly, that all the miracles which are related by those writers, particularly by father Guerreiro, are no better than mere invented fables; seeing that monarch, though so zealous for their religion, did not know of any such having been wrought. All this did not put an end to the contention between him and the haughty patriarch, whose savage behaviour on this occasion is justly blamed, even by those of his own Portuguese out of that empire, and likewise of that of the irreconcilable hatred which the whole Abissinian nation hath borne ever since, and doth to this day, not only to the Portuguese, but to all the Franks or Europeans. His just answer to him. Two remarks upon it.

BUT it is time now to come to the emperor's new expedition against the Lastan revolt, in which he once more thought fit to recall his brother Ras Sella Christos to take the command; and, in spite of all his remonstrances, obliged him to go and attack them with only 3000 men. Whether this was done with a design to sacrifice him to his still corroding jealousy or not, we are not told, neither will pretend to affirm; but that brave general was presently beset with 20,000 rebels, and though he defended himself with the utmost bravery, as well as did at the same time Keba Christos, viceroy of Begameder, who lay at a small distance with his forces, yet being abandoned at length by their men, in the night, they were both forced to save themselves by flight. This disaster so alarmed the emperor, that he retired to the kingdom of Gojam, whilst the elated revolted were taking their measures to go and make themselves masters of Dancaz, the usual place of his residence; and a great part of his forces were plotting to go over to them. The fear he was in lest if the rebels seized on his court, the rest of the empire should declare for them, obliged him to try his fortune once more; so that leaving his baggage behind him, he marched directly towards them, all night, at the head of 20,000 men<sup>f</sup>; in which attempt he succeeded much better than ever he had done. The emperor marches against the rebels. Ras Sella Christos put to flight by them.

HE was then encamped advantageously for the season, which was the beginning of winter, when on the 27th of June news was brought to him by his scouts that the enemy was advancing towards him with 25,000 men, but most of them ill disciplined and armed. They arrived accordingly about noon within sight of his camp, upon which, the imperial horse leading the van; the emperor himself clapping spurs to his horse, and being followed by the rest of his cavalry, they charged the rebels with such fury, that they fled at the very first onset like so many sheep before the wolf, and yielded them a complete victory. Night coming on, many of these mountaineers endeavouring to save themselves by flight during the darkness, dashed themselves in pieces among the rocks; the others were either slain or taken by the pursuing imperialists; insomuch that, by the next day, the slain were found to amount to 8000: the rest endeavoured to regain their high recesses, and abandoned their camp to the victors. 1632. Sufneus engages and defeats them.

THIS signal defeat, which filled the Portuguese with joy and triumph, and made them imagine now that none would be so bold as to oppose the progress of their religion, had, however, a quite contrary effect, as it drove both the Alexandrians and imperialists into the utmost consternation. The chief officers of the court, in particular, accompanied the emperor in a mournful guise to the field of battle, and there addressed themselves to him in words to this effect<sup>g</sup>. "You see here, Sir, many thousands of your subjects slain be- His officers pathetic remonstrance to him;

<sup>c</sup> TELLEZ, ub. sup. c. 19. p. 482, & seq.

<sup>f</sup> TELLEZ, LUDOLPH, &c. ibid. c. 32. p. 488, & seq. LUDOLPH, l. iii. c. 12. n. 13, & seq.

<sup>g</sup> TELLEZ, ibid.

“ fore your eyes, and by your arms; they were neither Mohammedans, nor Gentiles, nor “ enemies of the Christian name, but unhappy vassals of yours, and our relations, and our “ own flesh and blood; so that whether you conquer, or be conquered, you still are sure “ to sheath your sword into your own bowels. Those who took up arms against you, did “ not do it out of any dislike to your person or government, but in defence of their ancient “ religion, which you would force them to renounce, and exchange for one to which they “ can by no means be persuaded to conform. What a deal of blood-shed hath this un“ happy change already caused, and what a deal more is it likely to cause, unless you will “ suffer them to continue in that old way of worship, which they received from their an“ cestors? Without this, we shall never enjoy any rest, and you will find yourself shortly “ without empire or subjects. Add to this, that our worst enemies, the Gallas and Turks, “ against whom your arms might have been more successfully and gloriously employed, do “ hate and despise us still the more, and brand us with the name of renegadoes, for hav“ ing thus deviated from our ancient faith (U).”

backed by his son, empress, and court.

THIS pathetic remonstrance made so much the deeper impression on the emperor's mind, as he was by this time much worn with age, fatigues, frequent wars, and revels, to say nothing of his suspicions against his brother and all the Portuguese: but what helped to sink it still deeper, was, that the prince, his son, the empress, and all the great ones of the court, were daily making pressing instances to him to restore the old religion, inso- much that he fell into a deep melancholy, and took to his bed; during which time the courtiers took that opportunity to publish an edict as from him, that the people might all return to the ancient faith, or embrace which church they liked best. The patriarch failed not, according to custom, to censure this conduct in the severest terms, and to exhort him to make a better advantage of the victory which God had granted to him, and to finish what he had so nobly begun. The emperor answered, that he had done all that was in his power, till he saw himself on the brink of being abandoned by all his subjects; and so without any further regard to his censures, or the solicitations of the bishop and his jesuits, suffered the proclamation to come out; which was to this effect: “ Hear ye, hear: “ we gave you this faith because we believed it good; but as innumerable have lost their “ lives on account of it, among which were Elus (Ælius, or Julius) Gabrael, Tekla, Gerguis, “ Secra Christos, and now lately the Lastan mountaineers, we do now restore to you the faith “ of your forefathers. The former clergy may return to their churches, perform the divine “ service after their ancient ritual, restore their tabots (small portable altars) and other “ branches of their function. Farewell, and do ye rejoice.”

Issues out a proclamation for liberty of conscience:

THIS edict (which Tellez scruples not to style impious, sacriligious, and the source of many dangerous errors, which crept in, in consequence of it, through the perverseness of the Abissinian clergy<sup>h</sup>) caused an inexpressible joy among not only all the monks and priests, but among the army and laity. These last expressed it more particularly by flinging the beads, and other popish trinkets which the missionaries had given them, into the fire. The clergy began to perform their functions as usual, to administer the communion in both kinds: the ceremony of circumcision, together with that of the general ablution on the festival of epiphany, and by the Portuguese falsely styled rebaptization<sup>i</sup>, were renewed every-where with extraordinary zeal and exultation; a short hymn having been composed on that occasion, and sung at the revival of the old worship, to this effect.

Ganticle sung in memory of
 “.

THE Ethiopian sheep are now delivered
 From western wolves, by the doctrine of the apostle St. Mark,
 And of Cyril, the two pillars of the Alexandrian church.
 Rejoice and be glad, and sing hallelujahs;
 Ethiopia hath escaped from the wolves of the West<sup>k</sup>.

It may be proper to observe, that though the proclamation above-mentioned restored the Abissinian church in statu quo, yet it did not exclude the Roman priests from the free exercise of their own. But by this time the latter were become so odious through the whole empire, and the emperor so little able, if he had been still inclined, to support them,

<sup>h</sup> Ub. sup. c. 35. LUDOLPH, ub. sup. sup. num. 51.

<sup>i</sup> De hoc, vid. sup. p. 243. & seq.

<sup>k</sup> Vid. LUDOLPH, ub.

(U) This last was so far true, that Tellez tells us, in another place, that the king of Adel, his neighbour, and a Mohammedan, who had caused two jesuits, then going into Abissinia, to be apprehended, and put to death, afterwards wrote a haughty reproachful letter, in which he styles him the apostate Susneus (48).

Neither need we wonder that Jews, Turks, and Heathens should be so exasperated at his defection; not indeed out of any particular regard they could have for the Abissinian church, but out of downright hatred against that of Rome, and the Portuguese nation, whose growing power in his dominions had justly alarmed them (49).

(48) Tellez, lib. iv. c. 29.

(49) Ludolph, . iii. c. 12. n. 16.

- a. as he was now languishing under a deep melancholy and a broken constitution, that the Abissinian clergy made no difficulty to seize on several of their new churches, such especially as came nearest to the Alexandrian model; some of which more resembled strong fortresses than Christian churches. Here the patriarch tried once more to rouse up the drooping zeal of the desponding monarch, by representing to him, that his forbearance and inactivity was going to bring a civil war into his dominions between the Alexandrians and the Romanists. An indiscrete and ill-timed intimation this at such a juncture! but to which he could only answer, What can I do? I, who have now neither empire nor authority left. His brother, Ras Sella Christos, wrote a pressing letter to him, which is still preserved by the Portuguese writers; but which, if genuine, shews more zeal and prejudice, than either reasoning, or even common sense; nor was it then a proper time to apply to him, in the bad state he was in<sup>1</sup>.

The Abissinians seize on their churches.

The emperor's low condition.

- b. THE emperor, unable to support himself longer under such a load and variety of diseases and calamities, expired on the 16th of September of the same year, in the sixty-first of his age, and 24th of his reign, not without some suspicion of his having been dispatched before his time by poison; though by what appears from all accounts we have from thence, he really died of excess of grief and a worn-out constitution, occasioned through a long series of rebellions within, and wars from without, and other murmurs and disasters which followed him closely during his whole unhappy reign; which might have proved a glorious and prosperous one, had the missionaries never set foot within his dominions. He died, we are told, in the Romish faith, and still kept two of those fathers about him to his dying hour. His body was buried with great pomp in the church of Ganeta Jesu, about four leagues from Dancaz, the place where he usually resided, and now died. We have elsewhere described the ceremony of his interment, and of his son's installation to the throne, and need not repeat it here<sup>m</sup>.

Death.

1633.

Funeral.

- c. BASILIDES, al. Facilades, his eldest son, succeeded him (who took the name of Soltan Segued); and, from the very beginning of his reign, shewed himself a mortal enemy to the church of Rome, to her missionaries, and to all her friends and converts. The very first person on whom he wreaked his resentment, was his uncle Ras Sella Christos, whom he stripped of the few lands and dignities which the late emperor had left him, and ordered him to be conducted into banishment, in chains, to the kingdom of Samen, or Cemen, where he lived like a common criminal under a guard; which severe treatment was probably less owing to the extraordinary zeal which he had always shewn for that church, than for the threatening words he uttered as he was taking the oath of allegiance to him<sup>n</sup>. Several other great men underwent the same banishment; particularly Azag-Tino, the late emperor's secretary, and the princess Vatatta Georgissa, his first cousin; and others were put to death for having spoken too vehemently against the Alexandrian church, and called that faith the religion of dogs. The fathers Mattos and Giroko, two jesuits who had continued with the emperor till his death, were ordered to depart from Dancaz, and repair to Ganeta Jesu, whence they were again turned out with four, and sent with eight more out of the monastery of Gorgorra to Cottela, where twelve of them lived for some time very hardily.

Succeeded by Basilides, who prosecutes the popish partizans. Ras Sella Christos banished.

- d. AMONG all these delinquents, one may easily imagine that the haughty patriarch was not treated more favourably than his inferior brethren. This prelate had taken the liberty to write to the emperor in favour of these fathers, whom he had stripped of all their lands, and designed to confine them at Fremona; but having now received an order from him, by two of his officers, to surrender into their hands all the fire-arms which were in his possession, and to retire immediately to the same place, he now resolved to expostulate with him in a second letter; in which, among other things, he said, "That it was not of his own accord that he was sent patriarch into Abissinia, but at the command of the pope and king of Portugal, and at the request of the emperor his father; and now he begs of him, since he is going to dismiss him out of his dominions, to let him and the world know his motives for so doing; and whether he and his brethren are condemned to banishment on account of their faith or morals. I have," continued he, "in compliance to your father, remitted all our peculiar rites, except that of the communion in both kinds, which the pope alone can dispense with; and now make you the same offers, provided you and your subjects do submit yourselves to the Roman church, as to the mother of all churches; and lastly, I beg that we may again, as at the beginning, be allowed to have the matter debated in a proper assembly of both parties, that it may be made plainly to appear which side is most in the right."

The patriarch ordered to retire to Fremona.

His letter to that monarch.

- f. To this letter, which Tellez hath inserted at full length in Portuguese, the emperor was pleased to answer in a calm and judicious manner, by reminding him, That the breach be-

The emperor's answer to it.

<sup>1</sup> TELLEZ, LUDOLPH, LOBO, &c. before, p. 294.

<sup>m</sup> See before, p. 211, & 240, & auct. sup. citat.

<sup>n</sup> See

<sup>o</sup> Histor. Ethiop. lib. v. c. 3. p. 517, & seq.

tween him and the Abissinians was not so much owing to the dispute about the two natures of a Christ, but to their denying them the cup in the communion; to their altering of the fasts and festivals; to their presuming to rebaptize their profelytes; and to re-ordain their priests and deacons; as if the former had not been true Christians, nor the others lawfully ordained before the arrival of the Portuguese. As to having any further conferences about these matters, he plainly tells him, that it was not by dint of arguments that they got their doctrines and rites established among them, but rather by persecution and tyranny, and that there was no good to be expected from any such disputes. He concluded with telling him, that he expected a new Abuna from Alexandria, and last from the kingdom of Enarea, where he was now waiting only for his departure for Fremona; he having signified to him, that he could never consent to appear in any country where there was a Roman patriarch<sup>p</sup> (W).

The patriarch obliged to depart:

robbed by his escort.

1633. Arrives safe at Fremona.

Ordered to depart out of the empire.

Hardships and cruelties they met with.

Redeemed at a vast price.

1634.

SOME other messages passed to and fro after the receipt of this letter, but which had no other effect, than to hasten the delivery of all the fire-arms, and the departure of the patriarch and his brethren to their college at Fremona; for which place they set out, without farther demur, accompanied by one Paul, the emperor's nephew, who was ordered to guard them through the deserts, which swarm with robbers; though, instead of protecting, he was the first who fell foul upon them, and would have stripped them of all their baggage and valuables, had not some of the patriarch's Portuguese killed two or three of his men, and sacred the rest away. Neither would it have been possible for them to have saved any thing that was left them, or even their lives, had not the two other governors, Tekla Salus and Azma Gerguis, who were to escort them through their own territories, proved more faithful to them. So dreadfully were they way-laid and assaulted through every place they came to; till at length, with much fatigue, loss, and danger, they safely arrived at Fremona, on the 24th of April of the following year, though in a very miserable plight. We shall follow them no farther than to this place, where they were hardly allowed a small time to refresh and recover themselves, before they received a fresh order from the emperor, expressly enjoining them to leave it, and depart instantly out of his dominions, and embark for the Indies. They staid, however, some time, to try to soften the Abissinian monarch in their behalf, and used what friends they had left to represent to him the imminent danger they must run from the Turks, Moors, and other enemies to their religion; and that it was in effect to send them as sheep to the slaughter; or, what was much more dreadful, as poor naked men into a miserable state of slavery. The emperor, though he knew all this perfectly well, was yet so exasperated by his clergy, and others of his court, that he proved inexorable to all these solicitations, and they found themselves obliged to comply with his severe commands. They were first conducted to Mazowa, and thence to Suakem, where they were most cruelly used by the rapacious and inhuman bashaw; and after having suffered the hardest imprisonment and cruelest indignities, were forced to ransom their liberty at a most exorbitant price. From thence, after many other difficulties and hardships, they arrived at Goa, and thence returned to Lisbon; where they published this most melancholy account, both of their sufferings and disappointments; though we may reasonably suppose they suppressed the main motives that occasioned it. All that we need add of the patriarch and the two jesuits, that were detained at Suakem, is, that they did not obtain their liberty till the 24th of April, 1635; when having paid 4000 pieces of eight for their ransom, they were put on board, and arrived safe at Diu; from which place Mendez soon after sailed to Goa, in order to solicit for a fresh reinforcement to be sent into Abissinia, but without any success<sup>q</sup>.

<sup>p</sup> Id ibid. c. 4. & seq. LUDOLPH, l. iii. c. 13. n. 27. & seq. LOBO, LE GRAND, & al. ub. sup. l. vi. c. 14. & seq. LUDOLPH, l. iii. c. 14.

<sup>q</sup> TELLEZ,

(W) The patriarch Mendez couches this last circumstance in much harsher terms, in his letter to the king of Spain; and tells him, "That the new Abuna staid some years incognito in the kingdom of Enarea: but that upon the news of Mendez's abdication, he had sent the emperor word, that he could not perform the functions of his dignity, unless the Latin patriarch, and the jesuits, were either killed, or banished far enough off (50)." It must be owned, however, that the emperor seems here to have used them with an unbecoming cruelty, in sending them to so distant a place, through deserts which he knew swarmed with banditti, and not leaving them any fire-arms to defend themselves against them. To which we can only answer, that it was not without good grounds that he feared to trust the Portuguese with such dangerous weapons, which they knew so well how to use upon all occasions, and might be easily induced to have turned against himself; and therefore chose a less hazardous way to secure their retreat, by ordering them a sufficient escort through every place of his dominions which they were to pass; and which, as the sequel shews, actually conducted them safe to that place.

- a clergy and laity, as well as the emperor's, would have been in some great measure allayed : but there remained still sufficient cause for it, as long as father Apollinaris d'Almeyda, the lately made bishop of Nice, and some other of the jesuit fraternity, continued still concealed in the kingdom of Tigre, and were privately protected there by the viceroy Casla Mariam. Other jesuits discovered and put to death. The emperor was soon apprised of it, who immediately sent him orders, either to deliver them up to the mercy of the Turks, or to cause them to be put to death : so that being afraid of concealing them any longer, yet unwilling to sacrifice them to his resentment, he left them at liberty to retire whither they could ; which they did, the bishop to father Rodriguez's retreat, where he continued for some time, and the other to a poor thatched cottage, where he lay concealed a whole year. About the same time Tekla Emanuel, governor of Affa, being removed for having entertained three others of the fraternity, his brother, who succeeded him, did not leave off searching after them, till he found them Tekla Emanuel removed for protecting them. in the retreat where they lay hid, and killed father Gasper Pays, and three other Portuguese youths, and left the rest dangerously wounded ; particularly F. John Pereyra, who died a week after of his wounds. Nor was the emperor less severe against such of his subjects as still persisted in their profession of the Roman faith ; six of the principals of whom he caused to be put to cruel deaths, and others to be persecuted with equal rigour : to avoid Their deaths. which, many of them either fled, or returned to the ancient church<sup>r</sup>.

- THIS continued till the year 1638, when the bishop of Nice, and his two companions, being delivered up to the emperor, he condemned them to death ; but afterwards changed their sentence into that of banishment : but this not pleasing their enemies, they were all three hanged. Several others, some of whom had lain concealed till this time, and others who were lately arrived, particularly six French Capuchins, were all likewise put to death. Notwithstanding all these severities, there remained yet some other jesuits concealed here and there ; and among them F. Lewis Cordeyra and Bruno Bruni, who, in spite of all the emperor's promises and threats, were publicly protected by the lord of Temben, an Abissinian nobleman, of the kingdom of Tigre. But he was quickly after closely besieged, and, after a vigorous defence, slain by the viceroy of that kingdom : the news of whose death was brought to Amba Salama, or the holy mountain, where those two fathers had made a vast number of such zealous proselytes, that rather than deliver up their spiritual guides, they chose to endure the greatest extremities of hunger and thirst, during more than a year ; that is, till the year 1640 ; when being reduced to mere skeletons, and having obtained of the emperor an amnesty both for themselves and their two guides, they suffered them to be conducted to a neighbouring town, where a fair was kept in the month of March, and where, we are told, they were publicly hanged, notwithstanding the emperor's solemn engagement to the contrary<sup>s</sup>. and at length publicly hanged.

- WE shall go no farther with the history of those persecutions and public executions, nor with the methods which the courts of Rome and Spain, and the society de propaganda fide, took afterwards to gain fresh footing in Abissinia ; those transactions relating rather to the church history of that country, and consequently out of our province. Those of our readers who are curious in those things, may have recourse to the authors mentioned in the following note (X) for a fuller account. We shall therefore conclude this head with a remark, no less judicious than true, of one of the learned of the Romish church, often quoted in this chapter<sup>t</sup>. “ It were to be wished that the patriarch (Mendez) who was in other respects a man of excellent talents, had never intermeddled with such a variety of affairs, and had not carried his authority to such a height, and behaved in Ethiopia as if he had been in a country where the inquisition is established ; by which means he set all the people against him, and made all catholics, and the jesuits especially, appear so odious, that the hatred which the Abissinians conceived against them, still continues to this very day.” He might have added, that they bear the same irreconcilable hatred Le Grand's character of the prelate Mendez.

<sup>r</sup> Id. ibid,<sup>s</sup> TELLEZ, ub. sup. l. vi. c. 16, & seq.<sup>t</sup> LE GRAND, relat. hist. dissert. ix. ad fin.

(X) The reader may consult on that occasion the remainder of father Tellez's history, and that of Mr. Ludolph, so far as they both go. He may also have recourse to the ecclesiastical history of Ethiopia, written in English by the Rev. M. Geddes, chancellor of the cathedral of Salisbury ; printed at London, anno 1696, 8vo ; and to an epitome of it, written by the learned Dr. Michael, professor of divinity and of the oriental languages, at Hall in Saxony ; in which he takes particular notice of all the disasters which the arrival of the jesuits occasioned in the Abissinian empire.

This last piece, which is written in High Ger- man, was first printed at Hall above-mentioned, anno 1724, at the head of another piece, intituled, The life of Peter Heyling of Lubeck, a young Lutheran gentleman, well versed in the Arabic, who passed into Ethiopia with the new Egyptian Abuna ; and during his stay at Suakem, held some disputes with the patriarch Mendez ; with which this last was so little pleased, because he explained all that was said in the Arabic tongue to the by-standers, that he cried out, after they were parted, that if that young doctor ever got into Abissinia, he would plunge the whole empire into a most dangerous heresy (51).

(51) De hoc, vid. Ludolph, Hist. Ethiop. lib. iii. c. 14. n. 6. & seq.

to all the Europeans, of what country or religion soever, whom they all confound under the common name of Franks; which they seldom pronounce without the addition of some curse or execration. But let us now take a view of the temporal state of the empire.

1640.

An eruption of the Gallas.

The emperor's
army routed.

Solicited in favour of the jesuits;

raises new persecutions against them.

The patriarch solicits the pope and king of Spain in vain.

Tries to corrupt the bashaw of Suakem;

who sides with
the emperor.

Three Capuchins put to death by him.

The patriarch and jesuits suspected at Rome.
Capuchins sent in their stead.

The patriarch still plots in India.

Soon after the death of the two fathers last mentioned, there happened a dreadful eruption of the Gallas into the kingdom of Tigre; a great part of which was laid utterly waste by those barbarians; against whom the emperor sent his son at the head of the choicest part of his army. These were to be joined by the Saentes, or lords of lands of that kingdom, and gave the enemy battle on the very spot, we are told, where the fair above-mentioned was kept: the onset was furious on both sides, till the young prince was slain, together with the Bahr-naghash Tekla Salas, and some other nobles; upon which the whole imperial army was put to the rout with a great slaughter. Flushed with their success, they returned the following year with such an additional force, that they over-ran above twelve provinces belonging to that large kingdom, and penetrated as far as the sea-coasts, where they intended to have made themselves masters of Decano, or, as the Europeans call it, the fort Arkico; but were forced back by the Turkish artillery of it, which began to fly about their ears. The cruelties and ravages they committed in this expedition, were such, if we may credit the intelligence that hath come from thence by the way of Maxwa, from some Portuguese monks, and others, that the generality of the Abissinians looked upon them as judgments from heaven, for their persecutions against the missionaries and their converts: even the empress-mother, as well as his brother Claudius, who had been their greatest enemies, became now their most zealous intercessors with her son, and even begged of him to return to that church, and prevent thereby the total ruin of the empire. To all these solicitations he lent only a deaf ear; or, as our author words it, he hardened his heart, and persisting in his old measures, resolved, if possible, to extirpate the very name and memory of papists and Portuguese out of his dominions<sup>a</sup>.

From this time forward, we hear and read of nothing but of persecutions and civil wars, and other calamities within, new projects and fruitless attempts without, to revive the mission, and get fresh footing in Abissinia; and of now-and-then some new monks discovered, and put to death, for endeavouring to procure a private admission into it; whilst the patriarch Alphonso Mendez, conscious of his having been the cause both of their expulsion, and of all avenues being so closely shut up against them, ceased not to solicit the courts of Rome and Madrid's assistance, in favour of some project or other he was hatching, not so much in hopes of regaining his lost dignity, as of retrieving his character, and the credit of his order; but met with nothing from either but discouragements, or at best fair words and fruitless promises. He was even so impolitic as to endeavour to corrupt the bashaw of Suakem, who was the greatest enemy and obstacle in their way, by great presents and pompous promises, to permit some fresh jesuits to steal into the empire in disguise, in order to supply the place of the old ones, who he knew were all dead by this time; not considering that the bashaw, being retained by the emperor, would not have failed of putting them to death, or at best to have extorted vast sums from them for their ransom: an eminent instance of which he gave in the year 1648; when having caught three Capuchin friers who were sent on that dangerous errand, he ordered them to be beheaded, their heads to be flayed, and the skins to be stuffed with straw, and sent to that monarch, as a testimony of his compliance, and a claim to his reward.

From this transaction one may draw these two inferences; 1st, That the emperor not only retained an irreconcilable prejudice against all missionaries, but took all proper precautions to prevent their even approaching his dominions. The other, That by this time both the pope, and society de propaganda fide, as well as the king of Spain, were quite dissatisfied with the proceedings of the patriarch and his jesuits, and their chusing from that time to send Capuchins, Dominicans, and men of any order but theirs, plainly shews that they had conceived some strong suspicions against that politic society. But this caution, instead of producing any good effect towards the reintroducing a mission into the country, rather proved an obstruction to it; the jesuits and their friends being no less industrious and diligent in misrepresenting and undermining all the measures of the other friers, than they were in contriving and promoting their own. The same contrast reigns between the French and other missionaries, who were pitched upon for that work, and the Portuguese, who were now set aside on account of their being become so odious to the Abissinians; although from their frequent disagreements and recriminations, a reader may much sooner perceive their measures and proceedings to favour more of the politic than apostolic spirit, than be able to assign which side is either most guilty, or most misrepresented.

As for the patriarch, though he never dared to return into Europe, after his expulsion and disgrace, but still continued in India to the day of his death, when he found that all

<sup>a</sup> Idem ibid.

- a his solicitations proved ineffectual at Rome and Madrid, he tried to set up a correspondence with the Capuchins, whom he supposed to be either still at Suakem, or to have by that time got into Abissinia, in order to know what passed there, and consult about such other measures as the present juncture should suggest; little dreaming that the Turkish bashaw had put them to death. He sent thither with this view an Italian, named Torquato Parisiano, Torquato in the disguise of an Englishman, in a ship of the same nation, to that island, where they <sup>sent into</sup> landed on the 7th of May, 1648. Here they were soon informed, though contrary to the <sup>Abissinia.</sup> bashaw's express prohibition, of the fate of the Capuchins: upon which, the English advised Torquato to return to the ship, seeing he could do no good on shore, but rather ran the <sup>Forced to go</sup> risque of his life; to which he complied, and returned in the same ship to India. Some other stratagems the old patriarch set on foot afterwards, which proved equally abortive, <sup>back.</sup>
- b till death at length put an end to them, and his life and exile, the 29th of June, anno 1656, <sup>The patriarch</sup> in the 77th year of his age, and 22d of his banishment. <sup>dies in India.</sup>

As for the remainder of the emperor's reign, and those of his successors, they are all either wrapped up in obscurity, through the general stop which has been put to all future commerce with that empire, or so differently related by the jesuitical and capuchin writers above-mentioned, that little certainty can be had from either party. If any thing can be depended upon that they have written on the subject, it is the severity with which Basilides treated all the missionaries and their converts: among the former, Tellez closes his history with, what he styles, the martyrdom of father Bernard Nogueyra, whom the patriarch Mendez had appointed his vicar-general, after the death of all the others, and was the last who suffered for that cause. As for their converts, they had not so much as the least toleration allowed them, but were obliged to return to the Alexandrian church, or to abscond themselves from punishment by retiring into mountains and deserts: but there is little reason, whatever those writers may pretend to the contrary, to suppose that the numbers of these were any thing so great as they represent them; seeing, even by their own accounts, the Abissinians were always more ready to change sides upon all emergencies, than to suffer for either. It is therefore more probable, that after the death and expulsion of those fathers, and the arrival of the new Abuna, that church resumed its ancient state; especially as Ras Sella Christos, and other great partisans of the see of Rome, were effectually deprived of the power and means of raising any new disturbances in favour of it <sup>w</sup>.

- d THIS the patriarch Mendez was so sensible of, that, whilst he lived, he ceased not soliciting the viceroy of Goa, and the king his master, to attempt a fresh invasion and revolution in that empire. His advice, which favoured more of the martial conqueror, than of the Christian apostle, was, to send a sufficient naval force into the Red Sea, to seize on the isle of Mazowa, and the port of Arkico; then to corrupt or subdue the Bahr-naghast to their side, recall the exiled Ras Sella Christos, and proclaim him emperor in the room of Basilides, and by that means to kindle a civil war throughout the empire: all which he proposed not only as a feasible, but as the only means left of reducing it under the pope's authority. The father Jerom Lobo, often quoted in this chapter, had been sent to Rome <sup>The patriarch's strange politics and advice;</sup> upon the same errand by the patriarch, and had expatiated upon that favourite subject at that court with such warm zeal, that the pope and cardinals began to suspect, that their <sup>Lobo's at Rome, suspected.</sup> expulsion and late disasters were rather owing to their having been guilty of some such
- e treasonable attempts and practices, than to any other motive they alleged to throw the blame from themselves. The very slight mention which Tellez makes of their endeavours of releasing Ras Sella Christos from his exile, and of the revolt of Za Mariam, who died sword in hand at the head of the rebellious mountaineers of Lasta, lately mentioned, may be sufficient to shew how much reason there was for such a suspicion. However, as neither the pope, nor Spanish king, were inclined, or perhaps in a capacity, to attempt any such project against the emperor, it is very likely that both church and state continued peaceable and free from any future attempt, at least from that quarter.

- BUT if we will believe the blind reports that came from thence, a more shameful disaster happened to both from the pretended Abuna, whom we left in the kingdom of Enarea, and who, we are told, proved no better than an obscure layman, who was bringing thither some horses from Nubia, and who had ventured to assume the patriarchal dignity, and to perform the functions of it undiscovered and unsuspected, till he was at length found out by an Egyptian, who knew and betrayed him; at which he was so exasperated, that he murdered him. The emperor was not long uninformed both of the crime and imposture of the pretended Abuna, whom he deposed by his own authority, and sent <sup>A false Abuna,</sup> into banishment in the barren island of Deck, where all the great criminals of state are <sup>deposed and banished.</sup> confined <sup>x</sup>. The true one arrived soon after from Alexandria, with his wife and children; but behaved in such a scandalous manner, that the emperor was obliged to depose him likewife; and sent him under a strong guard to bleach on the top of an almost inaccessible a rock.

<sup>w</sup> TELLEZ, LUDOLPH, &c.<sup>x</sup> De hac, vid. sup. p. 203.

The true one tampered with by missionaries.

Converses with the patriarch Mendez.

Proves an enemy to the Romanists.
Heyling gets into Abissinia with him.

AN express was dispatched with all speed to Alexandria for a new one; but, in the mean time, father Agathangelus de Vendosme, who was now become chief of the Capuchin mission, went thither on purpose to intreat the patriarch to consider the deplorable condition of the new converts in Abissinia, and to send thither a milder and more humane Abuna: and one who, by a prudent and charitable conduct, might soften the minds of the court and clergy in their favour, and dissipate, by degrees, those violent prejudices they had conceived against the Roman church. The patriarch not only promised to comply with his request, but even wrote a letter to desire the emperor to treat those new converts with less severity, and to abstain from shedding of Christian blood. At the same time he nominated one Mark, who professed great friendship for the Capuchin friar, to be his Abuna there. The b good old father, highly flushed with his success, sent a letter by him to the patriarch Mendez, who was then a prisoner at Suakem, full of commendations of the new prelate, and of the great expectation he had conceived from his interposition and good offices. But the Portuguese patriarch, more clear-sighted, or perhaps more suspicious, than father Agathangelus, soon discovered him, upon their conferring together, to be a strenuous Jacobite; and that, instead of favouring the Romanists, he would prove one of their bitterest enemies, as he actually did not long after. In some of these interviews it was, that the young Lutheran, Heyling, who had agreed with the Abuna to pass with him into Abissinia, had the conferences with Mendez, which we mentioned in a former note.

Two Capuchins betrayed
by the Abuna, and stoned.
Heyling's success in Ethiopia.

Leaves it after some years.

Put to death on his return.

THESE frequent visits were at length broken off by the rapaciousness of the bashaw; who, in order to extort a greater sum from the patriarch for his ransom, caused him to be c more narrowly confined; upon which the Abuna and the Lutheran made the best of their way into Abissinia, where this last was to practise physic, and by that means introduce himself to the emperor. In the mean while, father Agathangelus, and five more of his fraternity, depending upon the friendship of the Abuna Mark, had found means to ingratiate themselves with the new bashaw whom the Grand Signior had sent to Mazwa, and had actually landed with him in that island under his protection. But here Agathangelus, burning with desire to try now his success in Abissinia, and venturing to cross thither, with another of his brotherhood, in the disguise of Armenian merchants, they were both apprehended, and, at their desire, it is most likely, were conducted to the Abuna, expecting d no doubt to be cleared and set at liberty by him: instead of which, he publicly declared that he knew them to be Roman priests, sworn enemies to the Abissinian church, and come thither to oppose and subvert it; upon which they were both stoned to death without farther trial. After which, he and Heyling proceeded on their journey to the court, where they both met with a gracious reception: and it is from this last that we are informed of the death of the two Capuchins above-mentioned. He continued several years in this empire, being highly favoured by the court and clergy, both on account of his skill and success in the physical province, and his knowledge of the oriental languages, and in polemic divinity; which last Mr. Ludolph attributes, perhaps too fondly, to the great affinity of the Abissinian and Lutheran principles; adding, that he had been brought up under masters of such great and sincere piety, that they were thought to be infected with enthusiasm. Others, particularly Mendez, represent him as infected with quietism; and adds, that Mira obscuritate omnia ad spiritum referebat. However that be, he could not conceal e his religion so closely, continues that author, but he was at length found out and banished. Ludolph, on the contrary, says, that he was greatly esteemed, and raised to high preferments; and that it was with regret that the emperor suffered him to return into Europe; which, if he had lived to do, he would have obliged the public with some very curious memoirs of that country; but he fell unfortunately into the hands of the Arabs, as some say; others, of the bashaw of Suakem, who ordered him to be put to death; but whether by the order of the emperor, or not, is still in dispute between the two parties above-mentioned. All that we can say farther about it is, that if he had had any favourable credentials, or pass, from that monarch, the bashaw was too much his creature to have used him otherwise than well: but he might, peradventure, have been stripped of them by the Arabs before he reached Suakem, or might not have been able to obtain any, as he left f the country so much against that monarch's will.

THIS may suffice to shew how little dependence there is on any intelligence we have from thence; and that not only on account of the contrast we find between writers of different persuasions and interests, but likewise prejudice and resentment against those of whom they write; of which, perhaps, none have been more misrepresented than the emperor above-mentioned, merely for the disgust he had justly taken against their principles, a and the severe measures he was forced to take to prevent his church and empire from being overturned by their politics, and becoming a prey to Rome and Spain.

WE have already observed what pains the late patriarch Mendez had taken to corrupt the bashaw of Suakem into his interest, and how far the Capuchins had gained that of Mazwa to introduce them into Ethiopia: and though neither of those attempts succeeded, yet they could not but greatly alarm Basilides, especially as a report was spread through all the coasts of the Red Sea, and had reached to the heart of his empire, that the Portuguese, assisted by all the princes of Europe, were equipping a great naval force to invade his dominions; which had obliged him to keep constantly two ambassadors at Mazwa and Suakem, a third at Moca, and a fourth at Yemen; and to ply the governors of them with rich presents from time to time, to keep them steadfast in his interest, and oblige them to b seize on all suspicious persons that attempted to enter into his dominions: yet could not all these precautions prevent some of them running the imminent risk of it.

AMONG them, one father Botelko, who had been some time rector of the jesuits college at Diu, took it into his head to try whether he could not prove more successful than his brethren; and ventured to land at Suakem in a Turkish disguise: of which the Abissinian ambassador was no sooner apprised, than he set out with all possible speed to acquaint his master with it, not doubting but there were more of the same fraternity ready to follow him. This intelligence occasioned new instructions and presents to be dispatched to those bashaws and governors, to seize and put to death all the Portuguese and Franks that came into their hands, and not to suffer any of them to harbour within the neighbourhood of his dominions. The misfortune was, that Basilides suffered himself to be drawn into a suspicion that

c his brother Claudius was a party concerned in all the machinations that were former against him; that he held a clandestine correspondence with the jesuits, and was entered into a secret alliance with the Portuguese.

ON this suspicion, which, even from the jesuits own account, was not without a sufficient foundation (Y), at such a critical time, he caused him to be apprehended, and brought be-

His severities to his brother, &c. justified.

<sup>a</sup> Ibid. TELLEZ, LOBO, LE GRAND, & al.

(Y) If this young prince's accusation be not artfully contrived by the jesuitical writers, rather to raise the reputation of the banished patriarch Mendez, and his fraternity, and thereby tarnish that of the emperor and the Abissinian clergy, at the expence of his character; which, after his execution, none dared to vindicate; it plainly appears from it, that he justly drew that severe punishment upon himself. But that the reader may the better judge of it, we shall give it in the words of a late French writer, who extracted it from the works of the fathers Nogucyra, Torquato, Pisani, and the patriarch Mendez. It is to this effect:

“ The young prince's whole crime was, his being “ suspected of an attachment to the church of Rome; “ for, being little edified by the corrupt morals of the “ Abissinians, and the scandalous lives of the clergy “ and the Abuna, who led a most licentious life, he “ frequently compared their conduct with that of the “ patriarch (Mendez) and the jesuits, whose merits and “ virtues he took delight to extol; and used to say, “ that in banishing them, they had preserved the tares “ instead of the good wheat, and had foolishly ex“ changed the gold for mere copper.

“ He was for-ever commending the patriarch for his “ modesty, constancy, piety, and learning; and would “ often ask whether such another pastor was to be “ found in all his brother's dominions? All which “ discourses were reported to the emperor by a domestic “ of that young prince. It was moreover found out, “ that he had turned two or three of his officers out of “ his service for having abjured the Romish church: all “ which, concludes our author, were sufficient to prove “ him guilty, at a time when being a Roman-catholic “ was looked upon in the same view as being a traitor “ to the emperor and the state, and being guilty of every “ kind of crime (1).” Thus far our author; and we leave it to the reader to judge, whether a young prince, that could so publicly vilify the Abissinian church and clergy, and so highly extol that of Rome, and her haughty prelate and missionaries, at a time when the empire had so strong a party of these within its bowels, and was threatened with an invasion of all the Roman-catholic princes in Europe from without, supposing him to have proceeded to no other overt act, which is scarcely credible, can properly be said to have been unjustly put to death; especially in a country where the emperor is acknowledged to have an unlimited power over the lives and fortunes of all his subjects (2)? Is he to be branded with the names of tyrant and persecutor, for preventing the imminent subversion of church and state, by timely cutting off those who dare even speak and act like professed well-wishers, if not like open promoters, of it? Had the Roman-catholics made no attempt to subject both to a foreign power, but been only prosecuted for their different principles in religion, this might have been justly termed a down-right persecution; and yet not a worse than is practised, and professedly allowed, by their own. He would in this, as head of the Abissinian church, have only followed the example of the head of theirs: and the same apology which the learned Gonzales makes for the one, would have justified the lesser severities of the other, for departing so far from that Christian and charitable behaviour, which the gospel requires of us towards those that differ from us in points of faith.

His words, to give them no harsher sense than they will bear, are to this effect (3). “ If, in the primitive times, obstinate heretics were not persecuted to death, it was owing to their being then too powerful, and to the pope's not being sufficiently supported by the secular arm of Christian princes. But now, when the Christian faith is so firmly established, and those pontiffs invested with such a sovereign power, it is but just that they should proceed against them with the utmost rigour and severest punishments.” Will not, therefore, this doctrine and practice make it appear still more just in an Abissinian monarch, to exercise the same punishments on such delinquents as add the blackest treason to their heresy, and whose faith and principles so plainly tend to overturn their constitution in church and state, and to enslave their country to the declared enemies to both?

(1) Lobo suite de la relat. de l'Abissin. ap. Le Grand, p. 146. 4to edit. Paris, an. 1728. vide sup. p. 207, & seq.

(3) Gonzal. histor. pontifical. & cathol. p. 117, & seq.

(2) De hec,

fore him bound hand and foot, and accused him, before a numerous concourse, of having <sup>a</sup> renounced the religion of his forefathers, and to have conspired with the Portuguese against his crown and life, in order to overturn both church and state, and subject both to the pope and king of Spain. The prince was easily condemned by the whole assembly to be deserving of a speedy death; and was accordingly conducted to prison, where his head was cut off on that very night. This execution was followed by several others, with confiscations of estates, imprisonments, and other severities, from which persons of the highest rank, even among the fair sex, were not exempted; some of whom were banished, and others confined to some barren rocks, for no other crime than their intimacy with the deceased prince, or shewing, like him, any particular regard for the Romish religion. These severe examples the jesuitical writers have not scrupled to brand with the name of cruel and tyrannic persecutions; though the reader may see, by what we have said in the last note, there was but too just occasion for them at that time. But one may perceive clearly enough, by all this outcry, that that monarch was, at all adventures, to be branded with the most odious names, and charged with the most atrocious deeds, for having dared to save his church and empire from falling under the tyranny of Rome and Spain; and the punishing one of the chief promoters of that treasonable project, must be represented as an unjust and inhuman fratricide. But lest all this should not be sufficient to render him hateful to all European powers, they have devised another accusation against him, which, if once credited, would not fail of doing it. It is as follows:

A new crime laid to his charge.

Accused of introducing Mohammedism into his dominions.

ALL these severe punishments not being capable of quieting the emperor's mind, who rather imagined that they only increased the number of malecontents, both within and without his dominions, he had recourse to the Mohammedan Yemen, with whom he entered into <sup>c</sup> an alliance: and, the more effectually to bind him to his interest, not only offered his subjects the free exercise of their religion, but desired of him to send some able doctors to come and preach it among his people. This negotiation was occasionally discovered by the fall-out of the two persons he had intrusted with it, one of whom was a Turk, and the other a Christian; the former of whom was highly carested and honoured at the Yemen's court, and at their return was distinguished with considerable presents, whilst the latter was scarcely taken any notice of: in revenge of which, this last, taking an opportunity of going before him, spread the alarm where-ever he passed, that the emperor had sent for Mohammedan doctors to propagate their religion, and that one of that class was actually on the road thither with the other ambassador (meaning the Turk above-mentioned) and would soon be at court with him. <sup>d</sup>

A general revolt raised by the monks.

THIS news failed not to raise a general revolt, which was chiefly headed by the monks, and followed by an universal outcry that the emperor ought to be dethroned, and another prince raised to the crown, fit to maintain the ancient religion. The emperor tried in vain to disculpate himself, and throw all the fault on the empress-mother, who was the granddaughter of a Mohammedan, and still retained a strong bias for that religion. No credit was given to any thing he said, because they knew he had held several private conferences with the Turkish doctor: so that, seeing himself on the point of losing at once his life and crown, he was forced to dismiss him with as little noise as possible, though not without considerable presents <sup>b</sup>. This is the sum of the charge alleged against him; which, as well as that other of fratricide, Mr. Ludolph justly questions, as at least very improbable <sup>c</sup>, and such as in their nature, especially the last, might justly require the testimony of a much more <sup>e</sup> impartial sett of witnesses, than that of an exasperated patriarch, and a surviving jesuit or two, reduced to the lowest plight and misery, before it can gain credit with persons of common candour and judgment, at least in that hateful light in which they have represented it.

The account much to be suspected:

probably invented to stir up the European princes.

Basilides was threatened with a powerful invasion from all the catholic princes in Europe, and wisely endeavours to secure all his frontiers; retains by his largesses, or suppose it had been by an alliance with, all the Mohammedan princes on that side which lay most exposed, and at which the Romish missionaries used to slide into the empire; and might not this be sufficient to give birth to that calumny, that he was going to introduce their religion into his dominions? which, if carefully spread by their indefatigable agents, would not fail to raise new commotions within, and awaken all the European princes out of that despondency <sup>f</sup> into which the miscarriage and disasters that attended their former mission had visibly thrown them, of succeeding in it by such violent and imprudent means as had hitherto been pursued. Nothing could be more likely to alarm them than such a report; for should that rich and potent empire become Mohammedan, what hopes could there be of ever reducing it to the obedience of the pope, or king of Spain? But the sequel itself shews, that neither of them gave any credit to that report; neither was it indeed credible that Basilides would have a taken a step of this nature, which would more effectually have ruined him, than any difficulties he laboured under, or any danger that seemed to threaten him could possibly have done. However, Tellez hath affirmed it<sup>d</sup> upon the authority of father Nogueyra, who was still alive in Abissinia, tho', by his own account, in a most miserable condition (Z); upon that of father Torquato Pisani, another jesuit, who came thither, as is supposed, either about or soon after that time; and more particularly on that of the patriarch Mendez, who, though at that distance, yet might hear of it by some Abissinians, who were come into India; and these the reader may believe, if he pleases, seeing the absolute stoppage that hath been put

<sup>b</sup> TELLEZ, LUDOLPH, LOBO, LE GRAND, ubi sup. vide & comment. pr. i. 57.

<sup>c</sup> Hist. Ethiop. l. ii. c. 7. n. 67. iii. 14. 64. <sup>d</sup> TELLEZ, ubi sup. l. vi. c. 37, & seq. LOBO, et LE GRAND, p. 149.

The sad condition of the jesuits.

<sup>d</sup> TELLEZ, ubi sup. l. vi. c. 37. & seq. LOBO, & LE GRAND, p. 149.

(Z) Nothing indeed is more melancholy and dismal than the account which he gives of the distress he and all his friends and converts were in at that time; and our readers will not think it foreign to our subject, if we subjoin a letter, which he sent from Maxwa into Europe, upon that affair, written in the name of Ras Sella Christos, and his own; and runs as follows:

"Most illustrious lords, the bishops and governors of the Indies; Ras Sella Christos to all catholic Christians, and true sons of the church of God, peace and mercy in our Lord.

"I know not in what tongue or words I can sufficiently express the perils and dangers of this church, which are the more afflicting to me, as I am an eyewitness of them. I heartily beseech our Lord Jesus Christ, who was nailed to a cross, and is plentiful in mercy, to make them known to all our brethren, to all prelates, archbishops, bishops, rectors, kings, viceroys, princes, and governors, who enjoy any authority on the other side of the water. I always believed, and often flattered myself, that they would have assisted us ere now, and not have so long delayed to redeem us from the hands of barbarians, and of that perverse nation, if the multitude of my sins had not obstructed it. In former days, when there was no church here, and the names of Christian and Catholic were unknown to us, some of them have come to our assistance, and have rescued us from the power of the Mohammedans; but now when we have here such a great number of faithful, we are forgot, and not one thinks of assisting us. What! doth the sovereign pontif of Rome, our father, and so dearly-beloved shepherd, no longer sit on St. Peter's immovable chair? or doth he no longer think of comforting us? We are his sheep; and shall we not, before we quit this miserable life, have the satisfaction to hear that he thinks of us, and designs to prevent our being devoured by those heretics, who wage so bloody a war against us? Hath Portugal no longer any prince that burns with the same zeal as the great Christopher de Gama? Is there no prelate left there, to lift up his hands to heaven to obtain for us the assistance we stand in so great need of? I faint at the thoughts of it! my speech fails, and my tongue is dried up; whilst my eyes flow with a constant stream. Covered with dust and ashes, I beg and conjure all the faithful to send us a speedy succour, before we are utterly destroyed.

"My chains grow heavier and heavier every day; whilst I am told, that if I will come over to their side, and return to our old communion, we shall be recalled from our exile. These promises are made to me with no other view than to ruin me, and to involve all the catholics that are left, and the very church itself, in the same ruin. If, therefore, there be still any Christians left on the other side of the ocean, let them shew themselves such, by acknowledging us as their brethren in Jesus Christ; and since we maintain the same faith which they do, let them come and deliver us from this Egyptian heresy and bondage."

"Here," says Nogueyra, "end the words of our friend Ras Sella Christos, which he uttered to me with bitter sighs and tears, when I last visited him, in August, anno 1648. It is now my turn to weep, and a flood of tears obliges me to drop my pen. I "am unable to write, and leave you to judge of my excessive distress. I landed at this place (Maxwa) on the 26th of this month, at the greatest peril of my life. I have spared no labour, nor shunned any danger to come hither, in hopes that our faithful friends, either from Portugal or India, would, before this time, have sent us some seasonable help; but not the least have I found. I have rather been ill used by the Baneans, particularly by Xabandur and Xarcast, who are known to engross all the coin. None of them have deigned to shew me their letters, or so much as to let me know what news they had received. I have written several letters from Dembea, and have not received any answer to them; which makes me think that they all miscarried, and that God would not suffer any of them, through my sins, to come to your hands. I am now about to return to Ras Sella Christos, and shall leave here James Xaxem, a man well known by the Baneans, and who, if any answer comes, will convey the same to me.

"My fellow-labourers, Abba Melcha Christos, Abba Feuzza Christos, John Gabriel, Gregory Anthony d'Almanza, and Christopher, are now become mere skeletons, having been dragged into prison, whipped, &c. and their skins are fallen off, through excess of misery; and, if they are not dead, they have undergone the most extreme hardships, being forced to beg their bread from door to door.

"On the 21st of October, 1647, Abba Zara Christos, the disciple of Abba Keril, and brother of Abba Gregory, was put to death; as was also the senator Ando, a man eminent for his learning and piety. On the 30th of September, 1648, Dom Ithum Laca Mariam, Dom John Melcha Christos, and Dom Theodore, were imprisoned; and Captain Gabriel Donaceos hath been banished for not delivering me up into the hands of the heretics. All the Portuguese of Fremona have apostatized, and have shewn the most excessive hatred against me, and accused me before Abba Emana Christos, our most bitter enemy, and one who hath already put several catholics to death.

"To conclude; I go hence without the least glimpse of hope or comfort, having neither food nor raiment, nor daring to stay here longer, for fear of being surprised by the Turkish vessels, whom the season will quickly bring hither. I shall return again by the next year, if God permit; and I beseech God that this letter may be perused by all our prelates and churchmen, and particularly by the patriarch Mendez, and the father Emanuel d'Almeida, if they be still alive; and, with my face prostrate to the ground, do recommend myself to their blessing and prayers.

"Dated from Maxwa, January 30th, 1649.

"Signed, Bernard Nogueyra (4)."

The reader may see to what distress the missionaries and their converts were reduced; and that the emperor was fully resolved to extirpate them and theirs out of his dominions, and to prevent, by all possible means, their ever getting footing into them again. It is therefore no wonder that their resentment and despair should drive them to invent this calumny against him, of having a design to introduce Mohammedism; which could not fail, if credited in Europe, of exasperating all the Roman-catholic powers against him, and stir them up to use their utmost efforts to prevent the loss of all their hopes on that rich country.

(4) Tellez, ubi sup. Lobo, Le Grand, hist. de la relat. d'Abissin. p. 150, & seq.

MOD. HIST. VOL. VI.

4 K

to

to all future commerce with that country hath deprived us of all means of disproving it, a but such only as reason suggests against the probability of it.

They represent Basilides as unfortunate in his wars.

NEITHER are the remaining particulars of that monarch's reign reported in a more favourable manner, with respect to him : and as it plainly appears, from the contents of the letter mentioned in the last note, and some others we have taken notice of a little higher, that their main design was to animate the pope and Spain to make a fresh attempt on this empire, it could not but be their interest to represent it as reduced to the lowest degree of weakness, by revolts, invasions, and other calamities ; and these as so many just judgments inflicted by the Divine Providence, to punish that unfortunate prince both for his apostasy from the church of Rome, and for the cruel persecutions he had exercised against her most zealous votaries. Accordingly, no sooner had he, with great difficulty, suppressed the general revolt which his clergy had raised against him, on the suspicion of his going to introduce the Mohammedan religion, but he was obliged to go and quell a fresh one among the Agaus, several of whose provinces had taken up arms against him. In which expedition, however, instead of the laurels and spoils he promised to himself, he met, we are told, with a most shameful overthrow. In the same year, his general Bella Christos, who was then at the head of a powerful army, was likewise totally defeated by the mountaineers of

Defeated by
the Agaus.

Invaded by the Gallas.

Lasta°. This misfortune was soon followed by a terrible irruption of the Gallas, who entered the kingdom of Gojam at three different places, whilst Basilides was refreshing his battered troops in that of Begameder, and in the territories of the Agaus ; so that he was forced to let them commit the greatest ravages, and go off with their immense plunder, as he was not in a condition to oppose them. In short, say our authors, he was successful in

His severity to the catholics ;

nothing, but in his discovering and apprehending some of his catholic subjects, and condemning them to death, or cruel banishments ; of both which they give us a large number of instances, which we shall not trouble our readers with<sup>f</sup>. Amongst them, father Nogueira's trip to the island of Mazowa having been discovered to the emperor, and represented to him as a fresh attempt to call in a new supply of Portuguese, an order was published to have him apprehended alive or dead ; so that neither the college of Fremona, nor any of his intimate friends, dared to give him admittance ; and some of them, who had gone over to the Abissine church, proved his most inveterate enemies ; yet could none of these lay hold on him.

and to father Nogueyra.

THE imperial army had hardly refreshed itself about two months in the province of Cottella, before it revolted, and lost a good number of officers, and a much greater one of soldiers. This was followed by a revolt in some of the provinces on the west of Enarea, who refused to send the yearly tribute of horses, which they had engaged to pay, on condition that Basilides should protect them against the Portuguese°.

A new revolt.

Bella Christos
defeated.

THE following year was no less unfortunate to him, in which Bella Christos was sent against the mountaineers of Dengbis ; who, upon the first notice of his approach, seized on all the passes, and so well fortified themselves in them, that they not only stopped his further progress, but fell so suddenly on him on all sides, that they made a most dreadful slaughter among his forces. This was soon after followed with the news that a certain strange nation had penetrated through some of the Abissine frontiers, and were ravaging the maritime provinces without opposition ; upon which it was immediately concluded that these could be no other than the Portuguese, who would quickly become masters of the whole empire. However, it was not long before they found their mistake ; these new invaders being the subjects of the king of Adel, who had taken the advantage of the great losses the emperor had sustained, and made himself master of ten or twelve strong high rocks, from which he sent them to plunder and ravage the low-lands, and sometimes penetrated a good way into the neighbouring provinces.

Invaded by the king of Adel.

This account contradicted by Abbot Gregory ;

THUS far the account of those jesuits, if they may be credited, represents that monarch's reign as very unfortunate in every respect. This, we have already observed, it may have been their interest to set forth in that light, in order to stir up their friends and favourers to send them some fresh assistance. But if we believe Mr. Ludolph and Abbot Gregory, no reign could be more quiet and happy than his proved, from the time of his expelling the patriarch and missionaries, except some few severe examples he was forced to make on a few of their zealous and daring partisans. This indeed plainly appears the most reasonable account of the two, seeing all the revolts and disasters that had happened in former reigns were wholly owing to the preference which his predecessors had shewn for the Romish church, and the violent means which they used to force their clergy and laity to submit to it, as we have already seen. What cause could there be for any fresh discontents, after he had so effectually removed the occasion of all their fears, and had, in every step he took, approved himself a sincere and strenuous defender of the Abissinian church against all the

and is plainly improbable.

° LE GRAND, ubi sup. p. 154.

<sup>f</sup> Id. p. 155.

° Id. ibid.

- a open and secret attempts of the pope and Portuguese? And as to the charge laid to him of favouring Mohammedism, it is not only inconsistent with the zeal he shewed for the restoring of the ancient church, but absurd on several other accounts. And we accordingly find in the preamble and some other parts of a letter, which he, or, which is perhaps more probable, his son and successor Af Segued, sent to the governor of Batavia, circa ann. 1672, (for he there styles himself Af Segued, the son of Alam Segued, which name Basilides had taken towards the latter end of his reign), that he gives himself and father the character of Christian princes, and defenders of the Christian faith; a plain indication that it was still the established religion of the empire. This letter, a Latin version of which the reader may see in Mr. Ludolph's Commentary<sup>h</sup>, doth not indeed begin with the usual words, In the name of the Father, Son, &c. like those of his predecessors; but, In the name of God, merciful and gracious. Neither is it dated according to the Christian, but the Mohammedan æra; viz. in the moon Moharam (April), and in the year of the Hejra 1083. The reason of which appears to be, that the letter being written in the Arabic, and not in the Ethiopic tongue, the Arabian secretary made use of the Mohammedan instead of the Christian inscription and æra; but, in other respects, it runs, as all others do, in a truly Christian style.
- b But what still more confirms the steadiness of Basilides, and his two immediate successors, to the ancient Abissinian faith, is the condition which the French physician Charles Poncet found the empire in at his arrival there, and the remarks he made upon it during his short abode there, annis 1699 & 1700; of which we shall now give a short account, it being the last particular we have to relate concerning it. We shall only observe here, with respect to the state of religion, that he found the emperor to be a zealous professor of the Abissinian faith; the Abuna, clergy, and monks, though not very well versed in polemical divinity, yet strenuous asserters and rigid observers of the rites, tenets, and discipline of their church; the laity most devoutly submissive to them, and all of them intirely averse to every religion but their own; but more particularly against the church of Rome, and Mohammedism. With regard to the latter, though he found it tolerated amongst them, as they are indeed pretty numerous, and have engrossed the commerce, as hath been formerly hinted<sup>i</sup>, yet they live in separate quarters, and are styled no better than Gebertes, or slaves. The Ethiopians never eat with them, nor of any thing that is killed by them. They do not even drink out of a cup that hath been used by one of them, until the prayers of some good man have been said over it, and he, by his breathing thrice into it, drives away the evil spirit. He adds, that they never salute them but with the left-hand; which is a mark of contempt<sup>k</sup>.

Still style themselves Christians, and defenders of the faith.

1699. In Poncet's time, the Mohammedans hated in Abissinia.

- c ONE action, however, he relates of the emperor Basilides, whom he calls Ati Basili, and the grandfather of the young emperor then upon the throne; which seems, in some measure, to confirm what the jesuits laid to his charge about his favouring the Mohammedans; viz. that he caused 7000 priests and monks, who had revolted from him, to be thrown headlong from the top of the mountain Balban<sup>l</sup>: for it is hardly to be supposed that those priests raised that revolt upon any other account; and the alliances which the emperor had made with the Mohammedan princes, joined to the pensions and presents he had sent to them, in order to prevent the Portuguese entering into his dominions, might at once give birth and countenance to the false report, that he was going to introduce Mohammedism, and to stir up the whole body of the clergy against him: but whether of the two were more likely to be inventors and first spreaders of this calumny, the missionaries, who had been so severely treated by him, and whose interest it was to render him as odious to his subjects as they possibly could, or the Abissine clergy, whom he had so highly obliged by those severities, and by his strenuous zeal against the church of Rome, and all its partisans, we leave it to the reader to judge.

7000 monks precipitated from a rock.

- d We come now to speak of the voyage of Charles Poncet to the Abissinian court, and of the occasion of it, though without entering into any farther detail of it than concerns the sequel and conclusion of this history. The French court had by this time been induced by some of the missionaries of their nation to try their fortune, and to hope for better success in this empire, by their artful and insinuating address, than the Portuguese had done by their ambition and untimely zeal; and the late king, Lewis XIV. had been prevailed upon to write a most obliging letter to Adian Segued, the father of the young emperor then upon the throne; which, though we are not told by what means, found its way to that young monarch; seeing Poncet tells us, that he was pleased to shew it to him, when he was at his court<sup>m</sup>. At the same time, Monsieur Maillet, the French consul at Kairo, had orders to make what inquiries he could into the state of the empire, and to try all possible means and stratagems to open a way into it to some of his nation; and fortune at length offered

The French try their success there.

<sup>h</sup> De hoc, vide Histor. Ethiop. lib. ii. c. 7. n. 67, & seq. lib. iii. c. 14. ad fin. & Comm. p. 244. <sup>i</sup> See before, p. 198. <sup>k</sup> PONCET, Voyage Engl. p. 68. <sup>l</sup> Id ibid. p. 57. <sup>m</sup> Idem sub. init. LE GRAND, ubi sup. p. 157.

Poncet sent thither by the French consul.

Embarks on the Nile.

Reception at court.

Public audience.

The emperor's dress, &c.

Desire of an alliance with Lewis XIV.

His character.

Devotion.

The empress consults Pon-cet.

one to him, which he readily laid hold of, and carried on with success. Agi Hali, the emperor's factor in that city, complained to him of a stubborn disease, with which not only he, but his master, and the prince his son, had been afflicted for some time: upon which the consul told him, that he had a most expert physician in his service, who, he was sure, could cure him of it, if any of that profession could. Hali was easily prevailed upon to make use of him, and was effectually cured; and this was inducement enough to him to venture the sending Poncet to his master's court; to which the consul not only readily consented, but likewise sent a letter of recommendation by him to the sick monarch. The jesuits, at the same time, who were highly displeased at their being set aside from that mission, to make room for the Capuchins and other friars, made use of all their interest to be re-admitted into it, and to have some of their society permitted to accompany the said physician into Abissinia; alleging, that the catholic converts which were in that empire were their own flock: and accordingly father Fr. Xavier de Brevedent, a man of great piety, zeal, and learning, especially in astronomy, was allowed to go with him as one of his retinue. They embarked upon the Nile, along with the emperor's factor Agi Hali, on the 10th of June; and, after a long and tedious journey both by land and water, which we shall pass by as foreign to our subject, they arrived at Barko, a small town about half a day's journey from the city of Gundar, on the 3d of July of the following year; and there the good old father died of a dysentery, occasioned by his taking the seeds of the Indian pineapple, which he had brought from Tripoly in Syria, and which, it seems, are a very dangerous remedy<sup>n</sup>.

PONCET, having staid there to refresh himself till the 21st of the same month, pursued his journey, and arrived safe at Gundar on the evening, and met with a most gracious reception from the emperor, and received several private visits from him, till he was recovered of his fatigue, which was not till the 10th of August following, when he was honoured with a public audience of him, with as great ceremony as if he had been an ambassador. The apartment which had been assigned to him in the imperial palace being near that of the emperor's children, he was conducted from it about ten of the clock in the morning, through above twenty others, to the great hall, where his majesty was seated on a throne or couch, covered with a carpet of red damask, flowered with gold; round about which were several large cushions, embroidered likewise with gold. This couch, of which the four feet were of massy silver, was placed in an alcove at the bottom of the hall, and covered with a dome all shining with gold and azure.

THE emperor appeared covered with a rich silk vest with long sleeves, and also embroidered with gold; and the scarf with which he was girt was wrought in the same costly manner. His head was bare, and his hair braided with great neatness, and a large emerald glittered with singular majesty on his forehead. He was alone in the alcove, and sat cross-legged on his throne after the eastern manner; his great lords standing on each side in their ranks, with their hands across one upon the other, and observing a profound silence. Upon his approaching the foot of the throne, and paying him the usual prostration, he had the singular honour to kiss his hand, and presented him with Monsieur Maillet's letter; which being interpreted to him, he expressed himself highly in favour of the French monarch his master, inquired much after the royal family, the extent of his dominions, power, grandeur, &c. and seemed highly pleased with the account he gave him; the result of which was, that he expressed a desire of entering into an alliance with him, and to obtain one of his daughters to give in marriage to the prince his son.

THIS is the substance of this public audience, and some other private ones, he had with that prince, which we need not enter into a detail of here. The character our author gives us of him is, that he appeared to be about forty-one years of age, tall and handsome beyond any of his court, courteous and generous, wise, prudent, and warlike, and so religious, that though he had not yet finished the course of physic which the doctor had ordered him, yet he would not absent himself from church on the festival of the assumption of the Blessed Virgin; which is there celebrated with great pomp and ceremony, the Abuna officiating in his pontificalibus, and the emperor assisting at it with all his numerous court in their most pompous dress, while the army is drawn up in the best order, and accompany him to and from the church, and heighten the grandeur of the festivity by their shouts, firings, and warlike music. The emperor dining on that day in public, and Poncet being allowed a table near his own, the empress, who had likewise some ailment to consult him about, appeared in the afternoon in great pomp; upon which the whole court withdrew, except he, who was ordered to stay. She appeared magnificently cloathed, and covered all over with jewels. She had a fair complexion, and majestic porte; and, after she had consulted

<sup>n</sup> PONCET, p. 40.

him

- a him about her health, her curiosity induced her to ask many questions about the French ladies, their dress, &c.

It is plain, however, that in what he says of both their majesties, and other persons of quality, wearing of variety of jewels, and the description he gives of several of the emperor's, and some of the princes and princesses stately palaces, as well as of Gundar, which he styles the capital city of Ethiopia, and of some other towns and places of note, he contradicts the unanimous account which all the Portuguese writers have given us of that empire<sup>a</sup>, except the Dominican frier Uretta, who is universally cried down as a fabulous author. The city of Gundar, or, as Mr. Ludolph writes it, Guender<sup>b</sup>, is, according to him, an imperial camp, and not a city, much less the metropolis of the empire (A); that title belonging only to the decayed town of Axuma, as we have elsewhere shewn<sup>c</sup>. Hence it is, that his and Mr. Maillet the French consul's enemies have not scrupled to expose his account of Abissinia, and all that he hath said of it, as a piece of forgery, contrived by them to impose upon the French court, and even to affirm that the former was never in Abissinia<sup>d</sup>. This is indeed looked upon by the more candid part of mankind as an unjust and invidious reflection on them both; yet as some other difficulties have been raised against them, which are not quite removed, we shall suspend our judgment till time furnishes us with some new account or discovery, which may enable us to fix it with more certainty than we can at present.

- To come, therefore, to the conclusion of this relation, Poncet having succeeded in the cure of the emperor and his family, but enjoying only a crazy state of health in that hot country, resolved, if possible, to get out of it as soon as he could. The difficulty was, how to obtain that monarch's permission, who was by that time become very fond of him, and his medicines, and his method of treating his patients. He was therefore obliged to tell him, that, if he staid much longer in his dominions, death would soon put it out of his power to be any longer serviceable to him; but that if he could be permitted to breathe his own native air, the only expedient that could recover him, he might then be enabled, as soon as he found his health sufficiently confirmed, to return, and renew his services to him. The good emperor, softened by such powerful motives, and his most solemn oaths and promises, consented to his departure, though much against his will, and not without obliging him to swear on the holy Gospel that he would not fail of performing his promise, and returning to him as soon as he was recovered. At the same time, the vast esteem which he had inspired that monarch with for the king his master, having determined him to send an ambassador to negotiate an alliance with him, and to send him some considerable presents, he at first pitched upon one Abba Gregorios, and recommended him to Poncet to teach him the Latin tongue; but, upon second thoughts, being reminded by one Morat, that it was the custom of the Abissine monarchs to make use of strangers, rather than of their own subjects, for such commissions, he was easily persuaded by that designing minister to appoint his young nephew to that employment (B). Accordingly young Morat was

<sup>a</sup> See before, p. 172.

sup. 406, & seq. 408, & seq.

<sup>b</sup> Lib. ii. c. 13.

<sup>c</sup> See before, ibid.

<sup>d</sup> See LE GRAND, ubi

(A) And yet it is plain, that both Bernier and Thevenot had made the same mistake; the former of whom calls it Gundra, and the latter Guntar; and both style it the metropolis of Ethiopia (5), as the Arabian geographer had done before them (6). Neither need we much wonder at it, the ancient metropolis Axuma being reduced into a poor village, in which are no footsteps left of its pristine dignity, but the old church, in which the emperors are still crowned. It was natural for those foreigners to call the place in which those monarchs resided by that title. It is not so easy to account for Poncet, who resided some time in it, styling it a city, if it was no other than an imperial camp; or to mention its 100 churches, and several palaces, if they were no other than pavilions; unless we suppose that they were called so by the Ethiopians; and that he still followed the style of his interpreter.

(B) This old Morat, Mourat, or Marat, had been settled, it seems, in Abissinia ever since the reign of the emperor Basilides, whence he had made several trading voyages to India, and was at length sent to Batavia by that monarch, or his successor, with a letter to the governor, anno 1678; and there it was that he had those conferences with Paul de Roo, which

Mr. Ludolph caused afterwards to be published, giving an account of the then state of Abissinia. He was there received as an ambassador, and easily persuaded the Dutch that a very advantageous commerce might be settled between them and the Abissinians, by the way of the Red Sea; upon which they sent some vessels thither, which were obliged to fall back with all the lading they had brought.

In a second voyage he made thither soon after, he brought with him an envoy from the Dutch East India company; and upon his arrival at Moca, told him that he must go and fetch the emperor's pass, without which he could not get admission into his dominions, and was very pressing to have taken with him the presents that were designed for that monarch; but the suspicious Hollanders excused themselves from intrusting them in his hands; so that he was obliged to sail away without them. They waited a whole year for his return, to no purpose; and at length returned home as they came.

This transaction we should hardly have heard any thing of, had it not been for Mr. Poncet, who sent an account of it to the French consul at Kairo, in order to warn him against the cheats and impositions of the

(5) Voyage du Levant, p. ii. c. 68.
MOD. HIST. VOL. VI.

(6) Vide Gol. not. in Alfar. c. 9. p. 90. Ludolph. Comm. Præm. i. 102.

Presents sent. was publicly declared, and ordered to get all things ready, particularly the presents, a which consisted in a number of elephants, horses, and young Ethiopian children<sup>u</sup>, civet, and some other products of that country. His chief errand at the French court, besides the negotiating the alliance above-mentioned, was, as he informed the French consul at Kairo<sup>w</sup>, to obtain from that monarch an able engineer, a cannon-founder, an armourer, a clock-maker, some architects, masons, carpenters, locksmiths, gardeners, glaziers, and a good physician, or surgeon.

Poncet sets out before him. PONCET, being very pressing for his departure, obtained his audience of leave, which was equally pompous with the first, and much more tender on both sides. The ambassador Morat was detained some time longer by the emperor, whilst he was to wait for him at Devarowa, the capital of the kingdom of Tigre; to which he was to be conducted by a considerable escort by the emperor's orders; who had likewise dispatched his commands to all the governors of the provinces through which he passed, to receive him with all possible honours, and to furnish him with every thing he wanted, which was punctually performed by them. He set out accordingly from Gundar on the 2d of May, 1700, and, at the end of two months and a half, during which he found his health to mend gradually, he arrived safely at the capital above-mentioned, and met with an honourable reception from the Bahr-nagash of that province<sup>x</sup>.

Arrives at Devarowa.

Prince Basilides his character.

Soon after his arrival there, news came from court of the death of prince Basil, the emperor's eldest son, who was suddenly carried off by a malignant fever, in the 19th year of his age, and within eight days after his return from a campaign in which he had accompanied his father, and wherein he had highly signalized himself against the Gallas, and had killed eight of them with his own hand. His loss was so much the more regretted, as he was endowed with all the good qualities of an accomplished prince, and with such singular bravery, that one day seeing his father fall into an ambuscade of the enemy, he ran with all possible speed to his assistance, pierced through the thickest crowds, and charged them with such surprising valour, that he rescued him, and saved his life at the utmost peril of his own. But that which most endeared him to the people, was his love to them, and the concern he shewed for their poverty and misery, occasioned by the avarice and tyranny of his nobles and officers; insomuch that the messenger who brought the news of his death said, that the young prince made it his dying request to his father, on the last visit he paid him a little before he expired, that he would ease them of that grievous burden; and, to his great satisfaction, obtained a previous promise from his afflicted father, accompanied with a flood of tears<sup>y</sup>.

Funeral obsequies.

UPON the receiving the news of that prince's untimely death, the Bahr-nagashes, or governors, caused it to be published by the sound of the trumpet, both at Devarowa and through all the provinces of the Tigran kingdom; after which every one appeared in the deepest mourning. On the day following, his funeral obsequies were performed at the great church of that city with more than usual solemnity<sup>z</sup>, and lasted three whole days, according to custom. In the mean while, the emperor being obliged, upon that occasion, to abstain from all public business, prevented Morat's being dispatched so soon as was first expected; and Poncet becoming more and more uneasy at his delay, and afraid of losing the monsoon, sent word that he would wait for him at Gedda, a small sea-port on the Red Sea. From thence, among other letters which he sent to the consul at Kairo, one of them was to acquaint him with the impossibility of procuring admission to any of the missionaries into Abissinia, and informing him that, upon his first coming thither, above 100,000 priests and monks had raised a revolt against the emperor; and that they had done the same upon hearing that an English vessel had appeared upon that coast, and that the emperor was sending an ambassador, with horses, elephants, and Ethiopian children, into Europe<sup>a</sup>; which letter is dated December 6, 1700. After having waited there some time, he received a letter from Morat, that he could not come to him so soon as he designed; upon which he set out for mount Sinai, which he was desirous to visit, and where Morat agreed to join him. He came to him accordingly a month after, but in a miserable plight, having been first deprived of the Abissine children he was to carry into France by the king of Mecca; and, to complete his misfortune, the vessel in which the presents were, had been <sup>u</sup> Idem ibid. p. 88, & seq.

& seq. <sup>y</sup> Ibid. p. 103, & seq.

p. 161, & seq.

<sup>w</sup> See his Memoirs, apud LE GRAND, p. 408.

<sup>z</sup> De his, vide sup. p. 240, & seq.

<sup>x</sup> Ibid. p. 91.

<sup>a</sup> LE GRAND, ibid.

like nature, which are frequently committed by Greeks, Armenians, and others; of which he gives him some further instances in the same letter (8). But one may safely infer from that of old Morat, that his view was not much better, when he recommended his nephew Morat Ibn Magdeloon as a proper person to be sent ambassador to the French court.

a cast away. They set out from Sinai, and soon after arrived at Suez; whence Poncet sent word to the consul of his coming with the Abissinian ambassador by the caravan, consisting of 8000 camels. Poncet got to Kairo two days before the ambassador, to get all things ready for his reception<sup>b</sup>; but, upon his arrival, so many objections were raised by the consul's enemies against his credentials, the loss of his presents, and the account he gave of himself and commission, as rendered his embassy abortive, and prevented his being sent to the French court. Soon after which, new objections were raised, discoveries made, or pretended to be made, and the whole affair of Poncet's voyage, and Morat's embassy, cried down as a mere imposition<sup>c</sup>.

SINCE that time we read of nothing relating to this empire, but of fruitless and disastrous attempts made by the missionaries to get into it again, but of nothing that has been transacted in it; so careful have the Abissine monarchs been, by the help of their Mohammedan neighbours, to deprive us of all further intelligence from thence. We shall therefore, according to a former engagement, close up this history with a short abstract of the surprising account given of this celebrated empire by that romantic writer Ludovigo de Uretta, a Dominican frier, often mentioned in this chapter, and printed at Valentia, anno 1610; not doubting but such a sketch will be acceptable to our English readers, especially as his whole fraternity, notwithstanding the many and considerable approbations which his romantic performance carries in its front, as so many vouchers of its truth (C), have been since made so much ashamed of it, that they have spared neither pains nor cost to get and destroy all the copies they could get into their hands (D), in order to suppress so authentic a monument of their zeal and fertile invention to serve their cause, or the interest of their order, whenever it chanced to want some fresh support, as it seemed to do very much at that time, when the rising reputation of the jesuitical society began so effectually to eclipse their own; and if some copies have happily escaped their diligent search, and have been preserved in the hands of Protestants, we may probably suppose it to be owing to the universal outcry which the whole tribe of the missionaries, especially the jesuits, raised against it, from the moment of its appearing in print, and excited the curiosity of strangers, particularly Protestants, after so interesting and extraordinary a piece, so plainly designed to blast the credit of all that had been said or written by other hands concerning the Ethiopic church and empire; but so unhappily and injudiciously executed, and stuffed with palpable forgeries, that, but for the number of champions on the other side, and the pains they took to expose it, it might probably never have reached foreign parts, but been confined to its native soil, for whose benefit and instruction it was professedly compiled, as being more naturally disposed to swallow all such kinds of pious prodigies; though even there he hath not been negligent of such artifices as were most likely to make them pass for current; nor scrupled to introduce his romantic legend with the most solemn protestations of sincerity; and boldly appeals to heaven, and all its saints, for the truth of its contents; though we are told, by better and more impartial hands, that there is not one syllable true throughout the whole book (E). Nor hath he been less sparing of his invective

An abstract of Uretta's Ethiopic history.

The author's monstrous pretences to sincerity exploded.

<sup>b</sup> PONCET, ibid. p. 119. ad fin.

<sup>c</sup> See LE GRAND, ubi sup. & seq. 373, & seq. 393, & seq. 406, 414, 428, 441, & alibi pass. See also before, p. 161.

(C) His book came out licensed, approved, and vouched, by no less men than Don Balazar de Boria, doctor of laws, archdeacon of Xativa, canon of the church of Valentia, and vicar-general and official of the archbishop of that city; Juan Pasqual, rector of the church of St. Martin, and licensor of the patriarch of Antioch, and archbishop of Valentia; Father Raphael Riphez, prior provincial of the Dominicans in the kingdom of Arragon; Father Lupero de Huette, and Father Jeronymo Mos, licensors of the holy office of the inquisition; all of whom give the highest commendations in their several licences, both to the history and its author: to all which we may add, that it is dedicated to, and patronized by, the master of the sacred palace (1).

(D) This we have from the learned and reverend compiler of the church-history of Ethiopia, who finding that book become scarce by the destruction which the Dominicans have made of it, have favoured the world with the following short abstract of it out of the original, then in his hands, and which, he tells us, he carefully preserved, as worthy to be bequeathed, after his death, to a library; which, to use his own words, next to that of Ethiopia, is the greatest in the world (2). We may add, that his excellent history of the Ethiopic church being also become no less difficult to be met with, except in the great libraries, or in those of the curious, was the main motive that induced us to transplant the said abstract into this part of ours.

(E) These are our author's own words; to which he adds, that he doth not remember to have ever seen a history in any language that had more of the magisterial air of truth in it: the author seeming everywhere to value himself extremely on his fidelity, and his care of setting down nothing without being first well assured of its truth; appealing constantly to authentic records, though a great way off, for such falsehoods as had the least colour of truth in them.

What is still more shocking in that fabulous author, is the apostrophe, or address, with which he concludes the legend of the lives of many Dominican saints and martyrs, some of which, we have reason to believe, were never in nature, or, if they were, did never belong either to his church or order. It is as follows:

(1) See Geddes's Hist. of Ethiopia, p. 480.

(2) Ibid. p. 481.

investive censures on the jesuits Maffei and Mariana, for having, as he charges them, a laid aside that strict regard to truth which becomes a Christian historian. And as for those who shall dare to question his veracity, he makes no scruple to rank them amongst the herd of sceptics, who doubt the truth of every thing. He still falls more severely foul on Protestants, as conscious that they, of all his other Christian readers, will be the most ready to disbelieve and ridicule his pious narrative; thanking his God, that he doth not write it for the perusal of a Luther, a Calvin, or other excommunicated heretics, who ignorantly, rashly, brutishly, and blasphemously deny the profitable intercession of the most glorious saints with God; but for the comfort and benefit of his most catholic countrymen, who justly boast a faith ever untainted by all such heresy and erroneous doctrines, as his neighbours the French, English, &c. have suffered theirs to be corrupted with; and therefore hopes will more readily credit his whole narrative, especially as it comes recommended to them by so many eminent licensors, as a work of wonderful edification and comfort to all pious souls; most of whom likewise vouch for the truth of it. Who those licensors and vouchers were, we have shewn in a former note; and what character and thanks they deserve for their commendatory sanction to such a romantic heap of pious forgeries, the reader will be best able to judge from the following extract out of it.

Ethiopia
when and by whom converted.

The fable of his eight Dominican monks, and their reception at court.

AFTER a long and pompous account of the setting out of eight of his Dominican fraternity from Rome to the Holy Land, accompanied with a holy sister of the same order, anno 1316, and their visiting the holy city, sepulchre, and other places in and about Jerusalem, these nine pious pilgrims went thence down into Egypt, and passed quickly afterwards into Abissinia, where they applied themselves to the learning of the language of the country, and made such surprising progress in it, that in a few days they were able to preach to the inhabitants, to the great astonishment of all that heard them, and soon after of the whole empire. Their sermons seldom failed of being accompanied by some extraordinary miracle, which gave an irrefragable sanction and evidence to all they said; inso-much that their proselytes became nearly as numerous as their hearers. Their fame soon reached the imperial court, and Prester John, the then reigning monarch, amazed at the arrival of nine such unexpected strangers, and much more at their doctrine and miracles, thought himself obliged to send them a kind welcome into his dominions, as well as an invitation to his capital; and, as a further encouragement and mark of his esteem, he was pleased to grant them a full power not only to preach their new gospel through his whole empire, but likewise to build as many convents in it as they should think proper, to promote and accelerate the conversion of his subjects to their church. He, moreover, impowered them to exercise their inquisitorial power and authority over them all, and engaged his royal word to allow them all the privileges and immunities which their order enjoyed in the Latin church. A less encouragement from so great and absolute a monarch would have been more than sufficient to invite such zealous preachers into the heart of his empire; and they received his gracious messages with such grateful joy, as made them overlook all the fatigues and dangers of so long a journey; so that they quickly advanced

“ Most glorious, illustrious, and holy saints; who “ being now in the celestial palaces, cloathed with “ robes of immortality, do enjoy the clear vision of “ the most holy Trinity, and being divested of the “ bodily weapons wherewith you fought so manfully “ in the world, are now seated under the shade of the “ victorious palm and triumphant laurel, in the pa“ vilions of glory; pardon me all my faults, pardon “ all my errors, pardon my incapacity, and the in“ jury I have done the height of your triumph, wor“ thy of all immortal trophy, by my rude pen; and “ pray for me, O most glorious saints, who, in com“ pany of the angelic spirits, and in the ecclesiastical “ choir of God, sing the SANCTUS of the mass to “ the most holy Trinity, and are perpetually employed “ in the praises of God, pardon the unpolishedness, “ shortness, and grossness, of my tongue; your prowess “ being so great, your works so heroic, and victories “ so glorious, that nothing less than the tongues of an“ gels are fit to celebrate them. Pray for us, O exalted “ princes, who live as grandees of the celestial pa“ lace, and are as knights of the GOLDEN KEY in the “ council-chamber of God, being always in his pre“ sence. Pardon that little I have wrote of your ex“ ploits; your glory being so great, that no pen, ex“ cept it be taken from an archangel’s wing, is fit to “ celebrate them. Pray for us, most glorious stars of “ heaven, most resplendent meteors of the earth, “ golden artisans of the church, and the bright light “ of the PREDICANT ORDER, who, from your thun“ dering pulpits, awakened the world, confounding “ heretics and pagans, and converting souls to God.

“ Pardon, if the brightness of your virtues is eclipsed “ by the small part I have celebrated of them. And “ pray for us, ye apostolic preachers, who are now in “ shining glory before the Father of lights. Pardon “ me, if your travels, peregrinations, labours, ser“ mons, virtues, and prodigies, or if the glory of “ your glory is not magnified as it deserves; and “ pray for us, valiant martyrs, who, with your blood, “ confirmed the truth of the gospel, conquered tyrants, “ triumphed over wild beasts, and, with your hands “ full of palms, and your heads crowned with laurels, “ are entered into the heavenly palaces. Pardon my “ ignorance, and pray for us.

“ Sacred virgins, shining now in your religious ap“ parel, the glory of the world, the honour of hea“ ven, the brightness of human nature, and special “ ornament of the Dominican order, pardon all the “ defects of this book, with regard to your praises;
“ and pray for us *. Amen.”

Thus much may suffice to shew the lying as well as the romantic spirit of the author, and what credit is to be given to his heap of pious forgeries.

* Ibid. p. 477, & seq.

a above 600 leagues into his dominions, and came at last to the lake Caffates, on the other side of the equinoctial, where the Nile hath its spring-head, near the mountains of the moon.

HERE, with no less surprising expedition and success, they erected their first and most <sup>Their vast</sup> stately monastery. This spacious building was soon afterwards followed by others, not <sup>convents and</sup> only in the kingdom of Gojam, but in other parts of the empire, and among the Caffres, <sup>converts:</sup> quite to the Cape of Good Hope. The number of their neophytes multiplied in such a surprising proportion, that their monasteries were quickly filled and overstocked with such of them as stood candidates for the Dominican order; among whom there was no small strife to get admittance; and most of those, who obtained it, became afterwards almost as famous for learning, piety, and miracles, and many of them for their martyrdoms for the faith, as their teachers.

BUT the most remarkable for his zeal and piety, but chiefly for his extraordinary <sup>Tekla's conversion and</sup> miracles, above the rest of their profelytes, and afterwards of their professors, was the prince Tekla Haymonot, the emperor Sakazab and empress Sarah's only son, who, after having wrought sundry miracles during his infancy, preferred the Dominican habit to the Abissinian crown, as soon as he was come of age, and became in time the chief and glory of his order, being daily honoured with the visits of angels, who brought him down from heaven the bread and wine which he consecrated at mass. Neither did the angels alone express their ambition to attend upon this extraordinary person; for the very brutes, and <sup>Revered by</sup> even those of the wildest and most dangerous kind, as lions, tygers, wolves, crocodiles, <sup>brutes.</sup> serpents, and other noxious creatures, gathered after him in shoals, as often as he went out to preach, and ceased not to follow him till he had dismissed them with his blessing, which they all received with the greatest marks of respect and thankfulness they were capable of expressing. But the most surprising and extraordinary of all his miraculous feats <sup>Found a stupendous mon-</sup> was the vast monastery which he founded, and was afterwards called by his name, which <sup>astery.</sup> was capacious enough to contain nine thousand friers; in rearing of which he obliged the <sup>Forces the de-</sup> devil to serve him seven years, and to do all the most servile and hard work. Whether he <sup>vil to serve it</sup> employed any of his inferior demons in that drudgery, we are not told; but only this our <sup>seven years.</sup> author assures us, that the monastery hath never been so well served since; insomuch that <sup>Found a stupendous mon-</sup> when the emperor was told of it, he could not forbear blaming his son for not having <sup>astery.</sup> tied the devil to the same service of the convent as long as it stood.

NEITHER did the holy sister, who had been the constant companion of their travels from Rome to Abissinia, prove less diligent and successful with respect to those of her own sex; but looking upon herself as equally intitled to the emperor's promise with other fellow-labourers, erected likewise a stately nunnery, wherein she fixed five hundred Dominican Beatas of the third rule. This vast nunnery was at first called, in their language, Bado Nago, but hath been since better known by that of Sancta Clara. This may suffice as a specimen of the author's fertile brain on the subject of his nine Dominican apostles, and their miraculous success; all that needs be added to it is, that their history, like <sup>Their history</sup> Raphael's cartoons, is curiously painted in the cloisters of Plurimanos; whither any one, <sup>finely painted</sup> who questions its veracity, may repair for a full conviction, <sup>in it.</sup>

THIS monastery of Plurimanos is that very individual one which was built by Tekla Haymonot, with the devil's assistance, and big enough to contain nine thousand monks, all of <sup>One big enough</sup> his order; being full four leagues in compass, and having eighty dormitories, which have <sup>for 9000</sup> all the great church at one end, and the refectory, or dining-hall, at the other. The dormitories have likewise a great number and variety of cells; that is, some 120, others 150, and some 200; and each dormitory hath a particular chapel and library belonging to it. <sup>Its great</sup> The great church is 600 paces long, and wide in proportion: and so it had need, to hold <sup>church.</sup> nine thousand friers, who all repair to it on Sundays and holidays.

THE next grand monastery in this empire is that called Attelegab, and was built by Bartholomew de Tivoli, a Dominican frier, who was afterwards consecrated bishop of Dangola at Rome. This convent hath no more than seven thousand monks; who likewise repair to their great church, and afterwards dine all together, in their common refectory, on all high days.

THESE two monasteries are the two grand nurseries for missionaries, who are dispersed in <sup>The two grand</sup> vast numbers, not only over Africa, but likewise once a year into Arabia, Bengal, Siam, <sup>seminaries for</sup> Pegu, and as far as the vast empires of China and Tartary. It was by some of those mis- <sup>missionaries.</sup> sionaries that the kingdoms of Congo and Angola were converted to Christianity, anno 1580; and others spread their missions, though not with equal success, as far as those of Monomotapa, Mozambica, and all the vast continent called Cafraria, quite to the Cape of Good Hope.

g All these missionaries were obliged to return to their respective convents on Whitsunday every year. But here our author, being conscious that such annual returns, from such remote regions, must be supposed above the power of flesh and blood, hath taken care to ward off the objection, by seriously telling us, that they came back with nothing but skin and bones.

Vast numbers of them martyred.

Protected by the empress.

Their abbots made grand inquisitors.

The imperial library and treasury.

Hierarchy.

Prelates and priests how advanced.

Visitations and church censures.

Fine churches.

THESE two famed monasteries, if we may believe our historian, were no less fruitful in their martyrs, than in their preachers and miracle-workers. Three hundred thousand of those Dominican apostles had suffered martyrdom in various parts of India and Africa; which is more by far than any other (he might have said than all the orders of his church put together) can boast. Even within, and in the neighbouring states, of the Abissinian empire, and in the reign of the empress Helen, who was held a Dominican Beata (F), eight hundred of the monks of the Allehyab convent alone had been put to various kinds of death for preaching the gospel; at which that pious princess was so much troubled, that she sent to all the Mohammedan and heathen princes about her dominions, that she would no longer suffer any of their subjects to come and trade within her empire, if they did not abstain from molesting her friers, and suffer them to preach the gospel peaceably among them, each in their respective missions.

THE Abunas, or priors, of those two convents, are, by the pope's letters, constituted grand inquisitors of Abissinia, where they execute that power with greater rigour than in Spain; and every heretic and apostate is turned over by their tribunal to the secular arm for the very first fault, though ever so penitent, and immediately, without mercy, thrown to the lions.

WE shall not repeat here what we took occasion to mention in a former note, his pompous description of the imperial library and treasury; the former founded by the celebrated queen of Sheba, and built upon the mount Amara, which that pious queen had filled with Solomon's own works, and others written before him by the patriarchs, Noah, Abraham, Job, &c. which that magnificent Jewish monarch presented her with; and which both she and her successors have been since enriching with every thing that was valuable in that kind, in all languages, and out of all parts of the world, at an immense expence. The latter was founded by the same princess, and on the same mount; into which, as into a bottomless gulph, both she and her successors have been throwing the richest of treasures, without every drawing any thing out of it.

HIS account of the Abissinian hierarchy is no less pompous and solemn than it is notoriously false; as the reader may judge, by comparing it with that which we have given of it in a former section †. According to him, there are no less than twelve archbishops and seventy-two bishops; the former answering to the twelve apostles, and the latter to the seventy-two disciples appointed by our Divine Redeemer. In imitation of which, every cathedral likewise hath twelve canons, who all live in community with their respective dioceses, each of which latter enjoys the whole tithes of his bishoprick. When a canon dies, he is succeeded by the eldest priest in his diocese: and when the bishop dies, he is succeeded by the eldest canon of his cathedral. In like manner, an archbishop is succeeded by the eldest bishop of his province; and the eldest primate is always honoured with the dignity of the pope's legate; this privilege having been annexed to that dignity by Pope Clement VII. Over and above these there are a great number of titular bishops and archbishops, all of whom are nominated by the emperor, and confirmed by the pope. Every primate is obliged to visit his whole province at least once in six years; which is not done without great pomp and retinue, besides the crowds of laity, which flock to them for their blessing. These metropolitans are no less free of their curses and excommunications, when any thing is done amiss by the laity; and these stand in no less dread of them; especially as they are not permitted to eat or drink, till they have, by proper means, obtained a reversion of the sentence; so that none of them can despise them longer than they can live without meat and drink.

THE richness and splendor of the Abissinian churches are no less extolled by our author, but especially those of Allehyab and the Blessed Virgin; the former built by the queen of Sheba, which is in the form of Solomon's temple; and the latter by the empress Candace, mentioned in the Acts of the Apostles, built in the form of a cross. All of them, according to him, are built of the choicest materials, as marble, porphyry, and granite, and adorned with the richest carvings, paintings, and other embellishments: some of them have three, and others five ailes. The reader may, if he pleases, compare this pompous description * See before, p. 247, & note (O).

† See before, p. 219, & seq.

(F) By which must be understood not a professed nun of that order, but a kind of secular devota, who hath dedicated herself to the service of the Virgin Mary, under the ensign of St. Dominic, and obliged herself to wear her scapulary, to repeat the long rosary, and observe some other acts of devotion in honour of her. Of which kind there are millions of both sexes in the church of Rome, who being admitted into this service by the Dominican friers, and paying a certain small sum at their entrance, and another at the particular feasts observed by that order, bring a constant income to the convent,

with

a. with what we have formerly said of those structures, and their ornaments †; though this may be owned to be the only point in which the author there cited hath least deviated from the truth.

But he hath made himself ample amends for it in the account he gives of the Abissinian Doctrine and faith and doctrine. According to him, the Abissines are not such arrant heretics of the Alexandrian leaven, as they have been affirmed to be by the jesuitical tribe; but that they have ever been (or at least ever since the preaching of his eight Dominican apostles) very zealous sticklers for the Romish faith and discipline, stigmatize the Alexandrian patriarch and his adherents with the worst of epithets, and are in all points the very same with those of the church of Rome. Discipline affirmed to be the same with that of the church of Rome.

b. WHAT, he tells us, gave occasion to this base and unjust slander on the Abissinian church, may be justly deemed a master-piece of the most fertile and bare-faced invention, and is as follows: By whom, and why, misrepresented.

THE far greater part of 400 Portuguese, who were sent into Ethiopia under the command of Don Christopher de Gama, being Jews in their hearts, they had not been long in that country, before they began to imagine themselves far enough out of the reach of the inquisition, and to make open profession of Judaism, to the no small surprise and scandal of the other Portuguese; little dreaming that there had been a much more severe one established in that empire by the holy see, and at the request of the eight Dominicans, near a century before. They were soon made sensible of their mistake; and the Dominican inquisitors, being informed of their apostasy, quickly took proper measures to get them all apprehended by their familiars (G), with the greatest secrecy. But the Jews, it seems, had likewise their familiars, though of another species; our author affirming, upon this occasion, that the whole race of them were magicians, and in confederacy with the devil, who failed not to apprise them of their danger, and assist them to make their escape; so that, before the inquisitors officers could lay hands on them, they had already dispersed themselves, and got far enough out of their reach. Some of them, he tells us, got as far as the kingdom of Berno; whither, tho' they taught the natives how to make gunpowder, he wishes they had all gone; for then, says he, there would have been none left to run to Goa, and raise such scandalous lies against the Abissine church, as those who went thither did: who, merely to justify themselves, and be revenged on the Dominican inquisitors, represented the Abissines as mortal enemies to the pope and Romish church, and as holding sundry heretical tenets; which was the reason they did not care to stay any longer among them. Their character, and escape to Goa.

HERE our historian naturally enough falls into a most violent fit of railing, not only against those Portuguese Jews, but, for their sake, on their whole race; calling them an impious, cruel, malicious, pestilent, contagious, vile, infamous, nasty, and loathsome generation; and, to crown all, calls on all the devils in hell to fetch away the whole race of them, for having dared to report such impudent lies against an empire that was much more catholic and orthodox than that of the most christian king, in having received the holy inquisition and council of Trent, which the Gallican church could never be prevailed upon to do. He no less censures the old christians among the Portuguese, for giving credit to such malicious and groundless reports. The author spits his venom against them.

As to what the popes and kings of Portugal have since done, upon the supposition that the Abissinians were really heretics, and enemies to the Roman church, he endeavours to excuse their having been so miserably imposed upon by those villainous Jews, as they were also in the case of the good old patriarch Oviedo; who, at the same time that he was recalled by the pope, on the small prospect there was of his doing the church any service in Ethiopia (by reason of the emperor's and people's adherence to the Alexandrian faith) was in the highest esteem among them, revered as a saint, beloved as a father, listened to as a second Solomon, and looked upon as an apostle sent by God unto them; and was so far from being in disgrace with the Abissinian monarch, that he had raised him to the dignity of president of his Latin council. It is true, he owns that the Portuguese patriarchs and fathers had, by several indiscrete steps, so far exasperated the minds of the Abissinian clergy, and were looked upon by them with such an envious eye, that they quickly grew sick of the country, and were glad to return to the Indies; the Portuguese (adds he) being a people who cannot live long out of their country, or at least from among their own countrymen: whereas the good bishop Oviedo, being a Spaniard, and less precipitate in his resolves, would never leave his flock, nor quarrel with them about trifles; and so lived and died in Ethiopia, in great honour and esteem; and his memory is precious among them to this day. Of the truth of all which his holiness was quickly after fully satisfied; for the Abissinians of St. Stephen's college at Rome, understanding how their church had been misrepresented, dispatched with all speed one of their members The popes and kings of Portugal excused.

† See before, p. 206, & seq.

(G) So that unchristian tribunal call their officers; that of hell-hounds is by far more suitable to their which, in Latin, signifies no more than domestics; tho' office.

to the emperor Menna (Menas), the successor of Claudius, to acquaint him with it: at which news, that prince so highly resented his being misrepresented as an enemy to the church of Rome, and was so exasperated against the Portuguese, that he forthwith published a law, expressly forbidding all of that nation, upon pain of death, to come into his dominions, without a certificate of their being Old Christians, from the inquisitions of Lisbon and Goa.

The emperor Menas's letters to them.

Submission to the see of Rome.

Grand am-bassy thither.

All a heap of forgeries

HE next dispatched letters to Goa, Lisbon, and Rome, to assure those courts of the falshood of all those reports, which, he said, none but a pack of such vile and execrable Jews would have had the malice to invent, or the impudence to publish. One of his letters was addressed to the college of cardinals, and particularly to the protector of the Abissinian empire; full of the strongest professions of his inviolable zeal for the Romish faith; and this he caused to be backed by another from his council of state, to the same tenor, and in the same loyal terms: both which were sent to Rome by an ambassador. Our author adds, that Alexander III. who succeeded Menas, not reckoning all this enough, sent a fresh embassy thither, which consisted of twenty-four priests, and two noblemen, to renew and ratify his obedience to the holy see.

THUS far the abstract of the Dominican history of Ethiopia; which, in its original, contains no less than 1130 pages, in octavo, printed in a small type, and all filled with the same romantic fustian, though with the greatest pretences to sincerity, and the strictest regard to truth*. Well might his whole brotherhood be ashamed of such a heap of monstrous barefaced forgeries, and much more to see it ushered into the world with the licence and approbation of some of the eminentest dignitaries of their order. Could the most diligent endeavours have succeeded of utterly suppressing the memory of the work, as well as of its author and vouchers, we may boldly suppose scarce one copy of it would have been left undestroyed. But there were too many of their rivals concerned in preventing it, and who have effectually done it: yet hath this their victory gone but very little way towards clearing themselves of that glaring blemish, which will, in all likelihood, stick to them to the end of the world, of having, by their partial and indiscrete zeal, rendered the name not only of Romish and Portuguese, but even of European, odious through this whole empire, as they have done that of Christian in the greatest part of India. Neither is this misfortune confined to Higher, but has spread itself through Lower Ethiopia, where we shall meet with still more flagrant instances of this unchristian spirit, especially in those countries where their well-meaning proselytes were, by their means, unwarily brought under the no less insupportable tyranny of the Portuguese monarchs.

S E C T. XI.

The history of the kingdoms adjacent to Abissinia; of Dancali and Adel, on the coast of Babel Mandel, and of Magadoxo, &c. on the coast of Ajan.

Some of the kingdoms on this coast unknown, or miscaled;

as that of Barnagasso.

BEFORE we enter upon the description and history of these kingdoms, it will not be improper to apprise our readers, that all our maps of Africa, those of D'Anville, the most modern and exact, not excepted, place several kingdoms on the confines of Abissinia, along the coasts of the Red Sea, concerning which we meet with little or nothing in our geographical books but their names and precarious situation, and of which we hope we shall be readily dispensed taking any further notice in the course of this chapter; especially if they remember that we are not writing an universal body of GEOGRAPHY, but of HISTORY, into which it would therefore be impertinent to intermix some few, and perhaps uncertain, particulars of the former, where we have nothing material to add to it relating to the latter. Of this nature are the kingdoms of Balu, or Bali, Deking, or Degbin, Barnagasso, or Midrehbar, and others which crowd this coast in the maps, whilst their names are unknown even to the most voluminous compilers of geographical dictionaries. At the head of them stands the supposed one called Barnagasso, or Barnagash, on the confines of that of Tigre, belonging to the empire of Abissinia, and styled a kingdom in those maps, through mistake, or inadvertence; that compound name of Babr and Naghash, signifying no more, in the Ethiopic language, than a prefecture, or government of a maritime province, or territory<sup>a</sup>, of which there are still several which bear that title, some subject to the Abissinian emperors; and others which have withdrawn their allegiance from them, and put themselves under the protection of the Turks, as we have seen in the preceding chapter. However, both of them are in too poor and mean a condition to deserve that pompous name, each being equally under the yoke; and that of the latter being scarcely

* See GEDDES, ub. sup. p. 477, & seq.

<sup>a</sup> Vid. int. al. LUDOLPH. Ethiopia, l. i. c. 3. n. 7.

a scarcely to be supposed higher than that of the former; and what a kind of one this was, may be guessed at from the wretched reception which the Portuguese embassy to the Negus, under the famed Alvarez, met with from one of them, in his way to that court, and the miserable plight he found that maritime government in, which could hardly afford him and his retinue any better fare, through his territory, than barley bread, or barley meal, and some wine made of honey<sup>c</sup>.

THE petty kingdom of Balu, or Bali, was once subject to the same empire, but has since revolted from it; and is erroneously taken, by some geographers, for a part of that of Dancali, though this last be an ever-faithful ally, and the other a declared enemy, to the Ethiopian monarchs. However that be, his dominions, let him assume what title he will, deserve no farther mention, seeing he hath neither cities nor towns in them, but only some villages scattered through a large, and, for the most part, uncultivated territory, inhabited by the wild plundering Gallas, of whom we have elsewhere spoken<sup>d</sup>; who at first settled themselves in these maritime parts, and from thence made the most dreadful inroads into the adjacent provinces of Abissinia, and have since settled themselves, not only in several of its frontier, but likewise in some of the inland, kingdoms, as we have already observed in the history of that empire. Those who inhabit that territory are fierce, warlike, and cruel, like all the rest; only they that live near the sea have embraced Mohammedism, and live more on trade than plunder. Their prince is rich, and so powerful, that he obliges the bashaw of Suakem, which lieth over-against his dominions, to yield him one half of the customs of that island. Our author adds, that he hath plenty of gold and silver, and abundance of fine large horses<sup>e</sup>. According to Mr. Ludolph's map, the river Habesh, or Hawash, which comes down from the confines of Sberwah, crosses his territories, and, continuing in its course eastward, loses itself in the sandy deserts of the kingdom of Adel. Kingdom of Balu; inhabited by the Gallas; their dreadful plunders; king rich and powerful.

THE kingdom of Dekim, or Deghim, which lies between that of Balu, on the west, and Dancali, on the east, is still more unknown to us; for which reason we shall pass to the next<sup>f</sup>.

DANCALI, or Dancale and Dangales, is likewise situate on the Red Sea, between those of Dekim on the west, and Adel on the east. Its extent along the coast is but small; whatever it may be towards the inland, and is neither well cultivated nor inhabited. The king of it is a Mohammedan, as are most of his subjects; but in strict alliance and friendship with, or, as father Lobo adds, tributary to, the Abissinian emperor<sup>g</sup>: if so, he must, in all likelihood, be so likewise to the grand signior, who is master of all this coast. His kingdom chiefly abounds in mines of salt, of which vast quantities are made, and a great traffick carried on, both into the inland parts, and on the Red Sea. Its chief sea-port, and that no extraordinary one, is that of Baliur, or Balyur, which stands at about fourteen hours distance west of Babel Mandel. And it was in this port that the Abissinian patriarch, with his jesuits and Portuguese, first landed, and were received by the Cheyk with great civility, the emperor having chosen that port for their landing, and given proper orders for their reception (A); though that did not hinder the Cheyk, and his inferior officers, from insisting upon some considerable presents, in proportion to their rank, when they came to bring their baggage on shore, as is customary among all the Turks. Kingdom of Dancali. Port of Baliur. Portuguese land at it.

THE king, who had likewise received letters from that monarch to the same purport, sent to invite the patriarch and his retinue to his court, which was about three or four days journey from Baliur, and dispatched his own son to meet them in the way, and conduct them to the royal palace, or rather camp, which they found to consist only of half a dozen tents, about a score huts, fenced about with a thorn hedge, and shaded by some wild kinds of trees. Near the palace is a river, which, in winter, is very full and rapid; but it being then summer, was quite dried, and had no water but what was digged for at the bottom of its channel, or bed. Their reception by the king; his court.

<sup>c</sup> De hoc vid. sup. ibid. & ALVAREZ in Ramusio, vol. i. p. 196. edit. 3.

<sup>e</sup> LOBO's relat. de Abissin. p. 38.

<sup>d</sup> See before, p. 93, & seq.

<sup>f</sup> See his map, history of Ethiopia, l. i. c. 8. n. 48, 106.

<sup>g</sup> Relat. de l'Abissin. p. 48.

(A) The persons who composed this embassy, besides Alphonfus Mendez, newly created patriarch of Abissinia by the pope, were those that follow; viz. 1. Johannes Valesco Castellano. 2. Hieronymo Lupo, or Lobo. 3. Bruno de Santa Cruce. And, 4. Francesco Marchesio, all four jesuits, who had two lay brethren to attend them; viz. Emanuel Lewis and Joannes Martini. The rest of their retinue consisted of one servant, five musicians, three Abissinians, who conducted the ambassadors, two maçons, and two apprentices, who were to be employed in the building of churches, and other religious houses, as had been agreed between the emperor and the king of Portugal. All these, except Valesco and the three Abissinians, were Portuguese, and all landed at the port of Balyur, on the 3d of April; having been timely forewarned, by letters from the Abissinian, from landing either at Suakem or Mazawa, which were then in the hands of the Turks (*).

(*) De hoc vid. Gregor. in Ludolph, hist. Ethiop. l. iii. p. 11. n. 5, & seq. Jarric, Coding, Lobo, & al. plur.

audience to
them ;

THE hall of audience, where they were received by the king, was a large tent, or hut, a about a musket-shot from the rest. Two of them are for his own use ; the other four are for his mother, brothers, and chief officers. The presence-hall had, at the upper end, a kind of throne, reared only of stones and clay, and covered with a carpet, and two velvet cushions. At the other end, facing the throne, was his majesty's horse, with the saddle and other accoutrements suspended on one side ; it being the custom of this country for the master and horse to lie together, whether king or subject. Around the hall were about half a hundred young men, sitting cross-legged on the ground ; and when the Portuguese ambassadors were admitted, they were made to sit down in the same posture.

attendance ;

dress ;

greediness and arrogance ;

meanness and resentment ;

refuses to dismiss them.

Audience of leave obtained by dint of bribery.
Greediness of his court.

Other towns.

THE king came soon after, preceded by some of his domestics, one of whom carried an earthen pitcher, full of hydromel, or wine made of honey ; another a drinking-cup, b made of porcelane ; and a third carried a cocoa-nut shell, filled with tobacco ; a fourth a silver tobacco-pipe, and some fire. Next to them came the king, dressed in a light silk stuff, with a turban on his head, from the rims of which hung a parcel of rings, nicely wrought, which dangled before his forehead : he held in his hand a short kind of javelin, instead of a sceptre, and was followed by all the chief officers of his court and household, and among them his lord high steward, the superintendent of his finances, and the captain of his guard. The respect paid to him, at his coming in, was by standing on their feet, and squatting down again twice ; after which they went towards the throne to kiss his hand. The audience was short, but full of the most bombastic professions of love and esteem on his side, and of respect and gratitude on theirs ; but this behaviour soon altered, c when, on the next morning, they came to make their presents to him, and, instead of acceptance, our author, who brought them to him, met with a severe repulse and reprimand, for daring to affront a monarch like him with such trifling presents, and was bid to take them away out of his sight. Our jesuit readily obeyed, without betraying either fear or any other emotion than that of disdain, after having given him to understand, that they were of more value than he ought to have expected from religious persons, who had renounced the world, and forsaken their native country, for the sake of carrying their religion into the Abissinian empire ; and told him at parting, that, since he did not think them worth his acceptance, the next he sent for from them should be less so.

THE king, though surprised at his rough compliment, let him go away with them ; d but, being unwilling to lose them, sent one of his officers to fetch him back, with orders to insist upon some addition being made to them, but was glad to take them as they were ; the good father, on his side, insisting upon retrenching some part from them : so that when they were brought again, the greedy monarch received them with visible marks of dissatisfaction and resentment ; and it was not long before he made them feel the effects of it, not only by detaining them, upon some pretence or other, longer at his court than was necessary for getting things ready for their departure, but by privately forbidding his subjects to sell them any kind of provisions, at any price ; so that they must have been obliged either to satiate his greediness with larger gifts, or been in danger of starving, had not the good father resumed his high tone with him, and, partly by the keenest expostulations e against his behaviour, and partly by threatening him with the emperor's resentment, brought him, against his will, to comply with the patriarch's demands, and use them with more humanity. This did not hinder the black monarch from putting off their departure out of his dominions from day to day, and suffering them to be chagrined and insulted by his subjects, in hopes of finding some pretence for extorting some further presents for their dismissal ; to avoid which, they found no better expedient than to bribe one of his favourite ministers with a valuable gift, who, quickly after, obtained their audience of f leave, and such other supplies of carriages, provisions, &c. to proceed on their embassy to the Abissinian court. Neither was it possible to get rid of that of Dancali, till they had extended their largesses to all that belonged to it, from the highest officers down to the most menial servants and camel-drivers<sup>1</sup>.

THIS small kingdom hath some considerable towns besides the port of Balyur, the most considerable of which are Vella, or more probably, as Davity conjectures, Leila, another port on the Red Sea, and mentioned in the Portuguese letters of the year 1617, as one of those which belong to the allies of the Abissinian emperor ; for though Sanutius and others speak of this king of Dancali as at enmity with him, it is plain from Jarrick Codigo, and especially Lobo, who was one of the embassy, that he was, at that time, tributary to him ; though, from his being a Mohammedan, and his ill usage of his ambassadors, one may judge he could be no friend to him in his heart. The other two towns are Korkora and Manadeli<sup>2</sup>, where they have some manufactures of the linen and cotton kind, with which g they traffick with the Negroes. The river Hawash, or, as others call it, Hanazo, hath its

<sup>1</sup> LOBO, ubi sup. p. 50, & seq.

<sup>2</sup> LA CROIX Africa, l. iii. DE LISLE Atlas, DAPPER.

- a rise at some of the mountains on the south, and, running north-eastward, waters the kingdoms of Dawaro and Adel, and there is swallowed up in the quick-sands; but the country is barren, dry, and sandy, producing no kind of food for cattle but only leaves; labours under great scarcity of water, and that which their wells afford is brackish and unwholesome<sup>1</sup>. The inhabitants are Moors, and consequently lazy and indigent, fearful and diffident of all the Europeans, and especially the Portuguese. Country poor and barren.
Inhabitants black and poor.

C H A P. V.

The history of the country of Ajan, al. Axan; and of the kingdoms and states belonging it.

- b THIS large tract of land, which extends itself on the north-side, along the southern coast of the gulph of Babel mandel, quite to the utmost verge of Afric on that side, or to the cape called Guardafuy; and on the eastern side, from the said cape, on the 12th deg. north latitude, quite to the equinoctial line, which divides the last coast from that of Zanguebar, was once contiguous to, if not wholly a part of, the Abissinian empire; though long since not only dismembered from it, and divided into several inferior kingdoms, but even parted from it by the Gallas, Gaffates, and other barbarous nations, which are settled between them: and this may be the reason why the Arabs still give to these coasts the name of Abex, or Habex, or Abissinia: though others give them that of Ajan, or, as the Portuguese write it, Axan. So that, upon the whole, the last name doth not so much imply the name of a particular kingdom, as most geographers would intimate, as a general one of a maritime tract, containing several petty kingdoms and states; the principal of which are, the kingdoms of Adel, al. Zeila, Magadoxo, or Madagoxo, on the coasts, and some others in the inland, little known to us but by their names: and lastly, and what we mention for its singularity in those parts, the republic of Brava<sup>a</sup>. The coasts of Ajan described:
kingdoms belonging to it;
- c

- d THE generality of geographers have added another kingdom; viz. that of Adea, within this country of Ajan, and place it near that of Magadoxo; but we shall in the sequel shew that it is a mere imaginary one, as well as its pretended opulent capital of the same name, and seated on the same coast. All the eastern coast of Ajan is affirmed to be a mere sandy and barren tract, producing neither corn, grain, fruit, nor any animal, but of the wild kind; for which reason it is most commonly called the desert coast. But as you advance farther northward, and along the northern coast, you meet with a very fertile country, which produces great plenty of all sorts of provision, in which it drives a great commerce, and more particularly in an excellent breed of horses, in great request, and which foreign merchants fetch in great quantities, in exchange for silks, cottons, and other cloaths. soil;
produce;
commerce;

- c THE inhabitants along this last coast are mostly white, with long lank hair; but grow more tawny, or even quite black, as you proceed towards the south. Here are plenty of negroes, who live and intermarry with the Bedowin Arabs, and carry on a great commerce with them, which consists in gold, slaves, horses, ivory, &c. which they commonly bring from Abissinia, with which they are almost constantly at war, and of which they plunder and ravage whole provinces. As they are all either zealous Mohammedans, or Bedowins, an idolatrous and superstitious sect among the Arabs, so they are alike enemies to the Abissinians, who are all Christians; and the frequent inroads they make upon them, render them warlike and stout; but all of them, especially the Bedowins, who are rude and brutish, are arrant thieves; but more particularly those who live nearest to the trading coasts<sup>b</sup>. Let us now take a view of those kingdoms which are included within this tract, beginning with that of Adel, as the most considerable, and best known to us. inhabitants:
religion:
manners.

S E C T. I.

The history of the kingdom of Adel, al. Zeila.

FROM the full and copious account we have given of the vast and noble empire of Habash, or Abissinia, in the foregoing chapter, our readers must not expect the like complete history of this and other kingdoms there mentioned as contiguous, and at frequent wars with its monarchs; our Europeans being still to this day as little acquainted Kingdom of Adel, al. Zeila.

<sup>1</sup> Idem ibid. LUDOLPH, Ethiop. l. i. c. 2. n. 11. <sup>a</sup> MARMOL, Afric. l. x. c. 10. SANUT. l. xii. DAVITY, DAPPER, & al. <sup>b</sup> Idem ibid. SOMMAR. regn. Axan. tr. 3. ap. DAVITY, MAGIN. geogr. & al.

Why so little known to the Europeans.

with the one, as they were formerly with the other: that is, till the Portuguese and their missionaries were invited thither by the Abissinian court, and met with such encouragement from them, as enabled them to give the world so uncommon a history of it, and which might have been much more extensive still, had those fathers been as intent upon that as they were upon reducing the Ethiopian church to the see of Rome; which if they could once have compassed, according to their sanguine hopes, would have afforded them more time and opportunities of enlarging their description of it.

How these became suspected by the Adelite
kings.

BUT it was this extraordinary welcome, and the unusual caresses of the Ethiopic court, which rendered them suspected and odious, and with them all other Europeans, to all the adjacent kingdoms above-mentioned; and to a higher degree, as they were mostly either zealous Mohammedans, or barbarous idolaters, given to all kinds of superstitions and cruelties, and irreconcilable enemies to the Christian religion, or, to speak more properly, to the Romish church; for that was all the Christianity they knew. So that it is no wonder both Moslems and Heathens did so unanimously join in guarding all the avenues into their own dominions against all those so odious and dreaded interlopers, and in exercising the most cruel severities against as many of them as found means to elude their vigilance, and ventured to penetrate, under various disguises and pretences, into any part of their territories (A). We have seen, at the close of the last chapter, how few, if any, of those infatuated zealots, who have attempted it, have escaped a discovery, and how dreadfully those have been treated, who have fallen into their hands<sup>a</sup>. Our readers, therefore, need not be surpris'd, all these things duly weigh'd, if we hitherto are able to say so little of those kingdoms; though their nearness to, and their commerce, or more properly wars and irruptions into the Abissinian empire, of which we have had frequent occasion to speak in the course of that history, will hardly permit us to pass over so many potent princes and states as were there mentioned, without giving the best account we can meet with concerning them.

OF all the neighbouring enemies which the Abissinian monarchs have had for some centuries past, the king of Adel hath been the most powerful and inveterate, and that especially on account of religion. Both he and his subjects, being zealous Mohammedans, not only cultivated, but carefully intailed the bitter rancour on his successors against the Abissinians and their faith; and this hostile animosity increased still more, from the time that these emperors applied to the Portuguese for help, and were enabled, by their superior skill and valour, to give their Mohammedan enemies several considerable overthrows, of which we have given an account in the preceding chapter<sup>b</sup>.

Their resentment against the Abissinian
emperors,

BUT nothing did so effectually alarm and confirm the Adelite princes, and their allies, in their jealousy and resentment against the Ethiopic court, as that mean and unworthy offer of the emperor above-mentioned to submit the Abissinian church to the authority of the Roman see, which they doubted not would infallibly engage all the Christian, that is, as they imagined, all the European powers to their assistance, to destroy at once Mohammedism and Heathenish superstition, and reduce all their dominions under the Ethiopic yoke.

and hatred to the Portuguese.
Dread of their arms.

They had by that time had many smarting proofs of the superiority of the Portuguese, in point both of valour and martial discipline; and it was become an usual saying, among their dastardly troops, and those of their allies, that those new-comers were not men, but devils incarnate, and that it was impossible to make head against them. And if such a small army of them, scarcely amounting to 300, could perform such unheard-of wonders in favour of the Abissinian monarchs, what could they expect less from the united forces of all the European princes, but unavoidable destruction? What method, therefore, was more likely to ward off so fatal a blow, than to engage all his allies, and other powers far and near, who were equally threatened with the same ruin, to join with him not only all their home forces, but likewise in the same caution and vigilance, to stop every avenue to their respective dominions against all strangers, under whatsoever disguise or pretence.

Care of guarding their coasts
against them.

<sup>a</sup> See before, p. 302, & seq.

<sup>b</sup> Ibid. p. 261, & seq. 266, & seq.

(A) To this we may add another no less stinging and cogent motive for this jealousy and hatred; viz. the many and swift conquests which the Portuguese have made, both on the eastern and western coasts of Africa (to say nothing of those they made also in India); the inhuman treatment they shewed to those princes and states who refused to submit to their superior force, by reducing their stately cities into ashes with their artillery, putting all to fire and sword that opposed them, carrying off all they found of value amongst them, as lawful plunder; and what was as bad, if not still worse, the cruel tyranny and oppression they exercised on all those who submitted to that yoke (1), and for which they quickly became, and, on their account, all the Europeans in general, and the very name of Christian, odious through all those parts, as we have already shewn in several parts of this work*, and shall have still farther occasion to shew in the sequel.

(1) De his vid. Ossorio hist. Portug. per tot. likewise hereafter our history of Congo, Angola, &c.

* Vid. int. al. vol. iii. p. 235. 571. 665. & alib. pass. See a All which was so punctually and effectually done, that if the so much wished-for alliance between the Abissinian monarch and the European powers had taken place, which it did not, and these had thought fit to send him a new reinforcement of men and arms, they would have found the landing them upon any of their coasts, and much more their penetrating through their dominions, altogether impracticable. Neither did its unexpected miscarriage permit these princes to abate of their care and vigilance; but they have followed the same precautionous method ever since, and with all possible success.

THE kingdom of Adel, so called from its metropolis (B), and Zeila, from another eminent sea-port of that kingdom, is situate along the southern coast of the Red Sea, which bounds it on the north; from the streights of Mean, or Babel Mandel, on the west; <sup>Situation, boundaries,</sup> to the cape of Guardafuy, on the east; which is the utmost verge of this coast, on this side, from which it begins to wind itself south-west, along the Indian sea, by which it is bounded on the east. Its limits on the south extend to the kingdom of Magadoxo, from which it is divided by the river of that name, and on the west hath the Gallas, or Callas, the kingdoms of Bali, Dovaro, and Dancali. Its full extent, on the other side, is not certainly known; the longest is along the coast, from east to west, and is supposed to be 160 leagues; and the least, from north to south, about 72<sup>d</sup>. Ancient geographers, however, give it a much larger extent; and it had, according to them, many more considerable provinces, which the Turkish conquests have since dismembered from it, as we shall see in the sequel. We meet with but an imperfect account of the inland part of the kingdom, except that Marmol, or rather his French translator<sup>c</sup>, mentions six cities in it, besides that of Zeila, and the two capitals of Adel and Aran above-mentioned; viz. Bali, Doara, Comizara, Novorata, and Socel; to which a modern geographer adds three more; viz. Aussagurella, situate on a high hill in the center of that kingdom; Barbora, situate on the bottom of a bay, into which the river Howacha formerly discharged itself; and Meta, on the eastern banks of the river Soal, on the northern coast<sup>f</sup>. The most considerable places on the eastern coast are Asum, or Ason (C). It is a small town, <sup>metropolis and other towns.</sup> but abounds with provisions and other refreshments for mariners; but, having no haven, is not much resorted to. The next to it is the cape of Guardafuy, supposed to be the Aromata of Ptolemy; it lies north of Asum about 12 degrees and half of latitude, over-d against the island of Sucotra, or Zocotora, in Arabia Felix. Turning south-westward from the said cape, one meets with the towns of Salin, the ancient Mosilon of Ptolemy; then Barbora, Metba, and last of all, Zeila, said to be the finest and richest in that kingdom<sup>e</sup>, and the only one we meet with any account of worth inserting.

ZEILA is seated on a spacious bay, just upon coming out of the streights of Babel Man- <sup>Zeila de-</sup> del, and, from its situation, seems to be the Avarita of Ptolemy. It retains still some noble <sup>scribed.</sup> relicks of its ancient splendor. The houses are built of stone and mortar, the streets wide and regular, its haven very commodious, and well frequented, and is both populous, and carries on a considerable commerce, it being the place through which the greatest part of the <sup>Its commerce.</sup> merchandizes, which are carried into the Abissinian empire, commonly pass, as well as those which are consumed in the kingdom of Adel; the revenue of which is so considerable, that the kings of it are often at war with those of Aden about it; upon which account the former keeps constantly a strong garrison in it; but more particularly on account of being the chief place by which the European missionaries endeavour to get into Abissinia; and here it was that two of them, viz. Franc. Muchado and Bernard Ferreira, having attempted to land with that design, were apprehended and put to death, an. 1624, by order of the king of Adel, as we have hinted in the preceding chapter †.

THIS sea-port had indeed, at that time, all the advantages of commerce over that of Aden, till the arrival of the Portuguese fleet, in the year 1517, which utterly destroyed it:

<sup>d</sup> SANUT, MARMOL, DAVITY, DAPPER, Afric. & al. sub Adel. MARMOL, l. x. c. 7. De la CROIX, vol. iv. c. 11.
† See before, p. 261, & alib. pass.

<sup>e</sup> Afric. l. x. c. 7.

<sup>f</sup> LA MARTINIÈRE

<sup>g</sup> SANUT, MARMOL, & al. sup. citat.

(B) Marmol calls the metropolis of this kingdom Aran (6), but neither describes it, nor takes any other notice of that of Adel, than giving it the title of a royal city, which we are told is the name of the kingdom and its capital. As for that of Zeyla, or Zeila, by which he says the kingdom is called, it is very likely, as the judicious Mr. Ludolph conjectures, that it was given to it by some Europeans, from an eminent sea-port which it hath on the northern coast, and was, perhaps, the only place of note they knew in it (7).

(C) This city Mr. Corneille, by mistake, places near the kingdom of Melinda, beyond the river Ghimauchi, on the coast of Aden (8); being probably led into the error by a French collection of travels, intituled, La Voyageur curieux, or curious traveller, chap. 8. This shews how little dependence is to be had on such collectors, Ason being the same with Asum, or Asuma, and far enough from the kingdom of Melinda, or the coast of Aden (9).

(6) Afric. lib. x. c. 7.

(7) See his map of Abissinia.

(8) Diction. sub voc.

(9) Vid. Dapper

Africa, sub Adel. Sanjon, La Martiniere, &c. sub Asum & Ason.

MOD. HIST. VOL. VI.

Commodities
in, and exports.

since which time Aden hath gained that advantage. There was, however, some considerable traffick carried on in it by the Arabs, who brought thither negro slaves, elephants teeth, gold dust, meyron, and other gums, which they bought in Abissinia, and sold to the merchants that came from other parts thither to purchase them.

Want of water.

THE territory about Zeila is rich and fertile, if we may believe Marmol; but others represent it as dry, sandy, and barren, and so destitute of water, that the inhabitants are obliged to go two days journey for it<sup>h</sup>. Much of the same nature is the whole canton it belongs to; in which, however, we are told there are two other cities, named Dalaca and Malaca, but nothing further relating to them.

THE next city of note is Barbora, situate at the bottom of a convenient bay, on an island of its name, but called by De Lisle Alondi. It hath been all along a kind of rival in commerce with that of Zeila, and is no less resorted to by foreign merchants, who carry on much the same traffick. It is situate over-against the city of Aden, and made once a considerable figure, but was plundered and burnt by the Portuguese fleet, an. 1518, who expected to have found a considerable spoil in it, but were happily disappointed, the inhabitants having had time enough before-hand to convey themselves and their most valuable effects away. The island, which is almost contiguous to the Terra Firma, is very fertile, and produces plenty of corn, fruits, and cattle; great part of which is exported, by the same merchants, into other countries<sup>i</sup>. The other parts of the kingdom of Adel being mostly flat, and with very few high hills; they have seldom any rains; but that defect is abundantly supplied by the rivers which run through it in great plenty<sup>k</sup>.

Rivers.

THERE is one among the rest, named the Hawash, which comes down from the Abissinian mountains, on the confines of the provinces of Xaoa and Ogge, which receives some other rivers into it, and takes a considerable circuit before it comes into the kingdom of Adel.

That of Kilmanci described.

It is called Kilmanci, and is very broad and deep, and hardly inferior to the Nile, excepting in the length of its course; for it hath scarcely run six miles through it, before the inhabitants divide it into such a great number of canals, that it is in some measure exhausted before it reaches the sea.

Soil and produce.

This renders the country so rich in grain, fruits, and other provisions, as are more than sufficient for the people, and part of it is conveyed into other neighbouring kingdoms, especially those of Aden and Zeiden. They have plenty of wheat, barley, and millet; they have variety of sheep, cows, and other beasts. Some of their sheep, like those of Syria, Arabia, and other parts, have large tails, which commonly weigh between 20 and 30 pounds<sup>l</sup>.

Inroads into Abissinia.

BUT their main traffick consists in gold-dust, elephants teeth, frankincense, and negro slaves; all which they fetch chiefly from Abissinia, with whom they are continually at war, and miss no opportunities of making inroads into some of their provinces, and whence they seldom return without great quantities of that kind of plunder. This is afterwards conveyed, as was lately observed, to the port of Zeila, where they never fail of meeting with merchants from Arabia, Camboya, and other parts, ready to exchange them for cloths of cotton, silk, and linen, of various sorts; collars, bracelets, and other ornaments, of amber, chrystal, and other materials; dates, raisins, fire-arms, Arabian horses, and other such commodities<sup>m</sup>.

Inhabitants
described.

THE Adelites are stout and warlike, and fight with surprising intrepidity against the Abissinians, as well out of zeal for religion, as in hopes of plunder; the former being all staunch Mohammedans, and the latter a pusillanimous sort of Christians, in no-wise equal to them;

Weapons and discipline.

either in valour, discipline, or warlike weapons; those of the Abissinians, especially in the remote parts, consisting chiefly of bows and arrows, lances and javelins, all wretchedly fabricated; and the ordinary sort among them having hardly any thing better than long staves, sharp-pointed at one or both ends, and hardened in the fire, to fence against their enemies; whereas the Adelites are furnished by the Turks and Arabs with variety of fire-arms, and other offensive weapons, which they exchange, as we hinted above, for slaves, gold-dust, and other Abissinian plunder; and, by their frequent incursions into that empire, are much better trained up to the martial, or rather plundering trade. Their complexion,

Fire-arms.

Complexion, and dress.

along the northern coast, is of a tawny brown; but the farther one proceeds towards the southern parts, the more one finds them approach to a downright black. Their dress chiefly consists of a piece of cotton cloth, which covers them only from the girdle to a little below the knee; all the rest of the body being naked; except the king, and nobles of both sexes, who wear a kind of loose garment, which covers their whole body, and a cap over their head: all the rest go bare-headed and bare-footed. They are, however, very fond, the women especially, of adorning their necks, arms, wrists, and ankles, with bracelets of glass, amber, and other such trinkets.

<sup>h</sup> DAVITY, DAPPER, & al. ubi supra.

<sup>i</sup> MARMOL, c. 8. DAPPER, & al.

<sup>k</sup> MARMOL,

ubi supra.

<sup>l</sup> MARMOL, DAVITY, & al. ubi sup.

<sup>m</sup> BERMUD. MARMOL. & al.

- a We have already hinted that their religion is Mohammedism, and their government Religion.
monarchical and despotic, though under the protection of the grand signor, to whom the kings of it pay a kind of homage and tribute for it. It was at first founded, as we are Government told<sup>n</sup>, by one of the princes of the blood of the imperial family of Abissinia, named Salatru; despotic.
who having found means to escape out of the rocky prison, in which those unhappy By whom first princes were heretofore wont to be confined<sup>o</sup>, into this kingdom, or then perhaps only province, of Adel, put himself under the protection of the then king of Zeila, who soon after gave him his only daughter in marriage, upon his turning Mohammedan; and it was by his assistance that he made himself master of the first, and after his death succeeded him in the other, and made of both one kingdom. This prince, like most renegadoes, b became a most inveterate enemy to all Christians, and was continually at war with some of them, and narrowly escaped falling into the hands of the Portuguese, upon their landing at his old capital of Zeila, and plundering and setting it on fire: concerning which transaction we have the following account from some of their writers<sup>p</sup>.

- THEIR fleet had suffered greatly through want of provisions; and amongst them that lost their lives by it, was Don Duarte de Galvan, who was sent ambassador to Abissinia by king Emanuel. Suarez, who commanded the fleet, having dispatched some of his ships in quest of a fresh supply without success, resolved to sail to Zeila, then very rich and populous; but, to his great surprize, found it deserted by its inhabitants, who carried off all their valuable effects, and left only a good garrison to defend it. The Portuguese, finding c it impossible to get any provisions, either for love or money, unanimously agreed to storm it; which they might the more easily do, as it had neither walls, towers, or any other fortifications. They landed accordingly some of their forces, who stood drawn up in arms along the shore, expecting with impatience the rest, which Suarez was to send after them:
but, finding that he did not dispatch them so soon as he might have done, whilst themselves were exposed to all the insults of the garrison, they at length resolved to enter it with sword in hand; and having with difficulty mastered one part, and repulsed the other, they fell a plundering the houses, and carried off a considerable quantity of provisions; the best part of which they sent on board the fleet, and destroyed the rest, together with the city, which they set on fire, and reduced to ashes. This is the plausible account these authors Salatru de- d give of their countrymens destroying this and many other fair and opulent cities and their feated by the inhabitants, on that and other coasts: and who can wonder, after this, at their very name Portuguese; having become execrable all over those parts, and, upon their account, that of Frank, who plunder European, and Christian? We have hinted above, that the new king of Adel was defeated, and burn and narrowly escaped being taken prisoner by them about this time<sup>q</sup>; but whether it was Zeila.
at the plundering of Zeila, or at some other encounter with them, we cannot be certain. Hatred to the However, what we have here related is more than sufficient to justify his rancour and re- Christians.
sentment against them.

- HIS successor, whom some call Gradabemett<sup>r</sup>, Bermudez Goranbo, or Gorbanna, but others Succeeded by most commonly Granba, or Grainbe, was a prince who inherited all the irreconcilable hatred Grainbe; an e against the Christians in general, but more particularly against the Portuguese; and we may enemy to the add, who proved one of the most formidable enemies they had to encounter after their Portuguese.
landing in these parts, and put their valour and politics to the severest proof: for, being timely apprised of their fleet's approach, he had taken all necessary precautions, and given the proper orders to his officers, in what manner to act against such of them as should venture within their reach. Accordingly the first who fell a sacrifice to his revenge, were a company of about sixty of their deserters; who having left their fleet, and gained the shore in a boat, had unhappily landed in some creek near the port of Zeila, and found themselves quickly after ready to perish with heat and drought in that sultry barren quarter.
One of the king's commanders, being informed of it, sent them word, that if they would Cruel strata- f deliver up their arms, and surrender themselves to him, he would immediately supply gem against them with water, victuals, and other necessaries. Their desperate condition not permitting them.
them to hesitate about his offer, they readily complied: which they had no sooner done, than he ordered them all to be butchered upon the spot<sup>s</sup>. We may justly question whether any Mohammedan commander would have been guilty of so horrid a piece of treachery, especially against a parcel of poor perishing deserters from an invading enemy, against any other nation, or on so important a crisis.

THE next engine they played off against the Portuguese would have proved of much A fresh one worse consequence, could it have taken effect so soon after the former. We shall give it, disappointed as nearly as we can, in the words of our author. by the jealous patriarch.

<sup>n</sup> Lett. di AND. CONSALI.

<sup>o</sup> De hoc, vide sup. p. 209, & seq. & (E).

<sup>p</sup> CODINGO, de rebus

Abissin. l. ii. OSSORIO's Portuguese conquests, & al.

<sup>q</sup> See DAVITY, and the authors cited by him.

<sup>r</sup> BALTH. TELLEZ Hist. Ethiop. LUDOLPH, & al.

<sup>s</sup> BERMUD. relat. apud PURCH. Pilgr. l. vii. c. 7.

p. 1149, & seq.

WHILST these things were transacting, the admiral of the Portuguese fleet sent a galley to a Arkico, to exchange a thousand ells of cotton cloth for a certain quantity of beeves, and other provisions they wanted. The bargain being made, the cattle was seized on at once by a Bahr-nagash<sup>1</sup> named Nero, belonging to the king of Adel, as they were driving them by land from Arkico to the place where the Portuguese vessels were waiting to receive them. Immediately after which, the Bahr-nagash dispatched one of his captains to tell the Portuguese commander, that the king his master was now in possession of the whole Abissinian empire, which he had lately conquered from the Negus, or emperor, and to invite the Portuguese to conclude a treaty of peace and commerce with him; assuring them that they should be supplied from thence with plenty of gold, slaves, ivory, myrrh, and other valuable drugs, sufficient to carry on a very profitable traffick; whilst he on his part would take care to furnish them with what provisions they wanted, and at the same time restore to them the cattle he had seized from them, and make them full satisfaction for the sixty deserters he had caused to be put to death.

The Turkish
Bahr-nagash out-witted by the Portuguese.

HERE the good patriarch Bermudez failed not to caution the Portuguese captain against relying on the fair offers of the treacherous Bahr-nagash, and to advise him to use art against art, and to outwit him in his own way. The result of which was, that they sent him a present of a barrel of wine, and a fresh quantity of cotton cloth, in exchange for a new supply of cattle and provisions, instead of that which they had taken as a lawful prize from them: that as to the sixty deserters, they had but a due punishment from him for their treachery: and as to the proposed treaty of peace and commerce, it being then the holy week, they were not permitted to treat about it, but would apply themselves intirely to it, as soon as the holy days were ended; and bring their merchandizes on shore, for the more easy and speedy conclusion of it.

Camp surprised.

The Bahr-nagash slain by a marksman.

THE captain, pursuant to the same advice, forbade any long-boat to go to land, lest any of them should betray their design, or give the Bahr-nagash notice of it; and at the same time ordered all his soldiers to hold themselves ready to get on board all the light vessels belonging to the fleet, with all possible secrecy, and without any lights, to prevent their being discovered. Their measures being thus taken, captain Martin Corea, at the head of 600 armed men, went on shore about ten of the clock at night, and seized on all the avenues at which the enemy might escape. In this descent some of the Turks and Fartaks were slain, and part of their baggage seized, Corea not having had time to secure a sufficient quantity of carriages. At the same time the Bahr-nagash, observing that the king his master betook himself to flight, marched directly against the Portuguese; and was no sooner known, than he was shot to death by a Portuguese marksman; whilst a number of Turks, both on foot and horseback, coming to his rescue, were part cut in pieces, and the rest were put to flight. Corea and the patriarch sent the head of the Bahr-nagash to the empress of Abissinia, with an account of their successful descent, and first defeat of her enemy the king of Adel; who received both with no small joy, and dispatched soon after one of her chief noblemen to congratulate them upon it.

Don Christopher de Gama made general of the Portuguese.

THIS glorious beginning, which, by a well-concerted counter-plot, at once freed them from the hostile designs of the Mohammedan Bahr-nagash, opened a way to their troops thro' the territories of the Adelite monarch, and gave him and his subjects so early a proof of the Portuguese superior valour and policy, as excited a good number of young gentlemen in the viceroy's fleet to beg his leave to lift themselves in this Abissinian expedition. To this he not only readily agreed, but begged of the patriarch Bermudez to admit into that number his own brother, the brave Don Christopher de Gama, and recommended him as a proper person to command his little army under him; which was agreed to with no less readiness on that prelate's part. It consisted only of 400 men well armed, disciplined after the European manner, and some small artillery; but was considerably augmented by the number of these volunteers, and their servants and equipage, which proved of no small service in the process of this arduous enterprize, both against the opposing force of the Adelites, and in the assistance they lent in getting the artillery over a great number of rocky mountains and difficult passes; which either fell in their way, or which they were obliged to betake themselves to, to avoid the arms of the Adelite troops, which were every-where posted in the most advantageous passes in their way.

Arrival at Devarowa.

FOR the disconcerted king had no sooner recovered himself from his panic at his late surprize and defeat, than he collected all his forces, as well as those of his allies, resolving, at all hazards to obstruct the passage of the little Portuguese army through his dominions into those of Abissinia. But whilst these preparations were making to stop their progress, the enemy had not only gained the city of Devarowa<sup>2</sup>, belonging to the Abissinians, where the Bahr-nagash, who commanded in the province, had furnished them with plenty

<sup>1</sup> De his, vide sup. p. 261, 273, 276. & al. pass.

<sup>2</sup> BERMUD. ubi sup.

<sup>3</sup> De hac, vide sup. p. 314. of

- a of provisions, carriages, and other conveniencies for their march, by order of the empress, who was come thither to meet and accompany them; but had already proceeded about eight days journey through a very rough and rocky territory, which the king of Adel had lately conquered from the Abissinians, and were arrived at a fine spacious plain, full of Christian inhabitants, who then groaning under a Mohammedan yoke, readily submitted to Don Christopher. He had not marched above three days through their territories, and encamped on a pleasant spot near a spring of fresh water, before they received a haughty message from the king of Adel (D), to enquire of them who they were, whither, Granhe's and on what errand bound; and to inform them, that those kingdoms through which they haughty mes- had passed, by his and his soldiers valour, and the favour of his prophet Mahomet, were sage to him.
- b become his by right of conquest; but nevertheless to tell them, that seeing they had presumed to penetrate so far, if they would consent to list into his service, they should not only be received as friends and allies, but be moreover enriched with lands, pensions, and preferments suitable to their respective stations; but if they refused his offers, he ordered them immediately to depart out of his dominions, otherwise they should be treated as invaders, and be all cut to pieces.

- THE answer which Don Christopher, to whom the message was delivered, and who was Gama's an- made commander of that expedition by the patriarch, sent back to the Adelite king, was swer to it; such as became his birth and station, and expressed a singular contempt of that prince, as well as of his offers and threats; the import of which was, that he was a general of
- c the king of Portugal's forces, and was sent thither with express orders from him to restore the Abissinian empire to its pristine state, and to recover those kingdoms and provinces which his invading arms had dismembered from it. This answer, joined to the con- and mean pre- temptible presents he sent with it, whether to him or to his general Granhe we cannot sents to him. be certain, added to the rich and sumptuous ones which he bestowed on the messenger*, soon determined the Moorish king to come to a fierce engagement, in which he appeared A fierce en- at the head of 1000 horse, 5000 foot, besides 50 Turkish musqueteers, and the same agement be- number of archers. We shall not repeat here what we have elsewhere related concerning tween them, the disposition, success, and other particulars of this action, in which both sides engaged in which both with such fury, that both generals, who fought foremost in it, were wounded, but the are wounded.
- d Moorish the more dangerously of the two, having had his horse killed under him, and received a shot in his leg from a carbine aimed directly at him by one of the Portuguese marksmen*. This proved a lucky hit for the Portuguese, whose commander was likewise wounded in the leg, though not dismounted; for the Moorish army had then surrounded them so closely on all sides, and being all stout soldiers, and so much superior in number, would in all probability have cut them in pieces, had not the fall of their general, and his being obliged to retire to a neighbouring hill to have his wound dressed, joined to the enemies erecting a pavilion and other signs of victory on the field of battle, as if already gained, so far disconcerted them, that they immediately faced about, and followed The Portu- their commander. This is at least the account which a cousin-german of the Abissinian guese gain the victory. Bahr-nagash (but who, upon the reduction of that province by the Moors, had apostatized to Mohammedism) gave to the patriarch and Portuguese general, upon his coming to congratulate them on the next day upon their signal victory, and unexpected success.

- e THIS person having first given them some evident tokens of his penitence and earnest Reduced pro- desire of being again received into the church, engaged for himself, and all that were vinces. under his government, that they should thenceforward renounce Mohammedism, and pay the same tribute to their lawful prince as they did to their Moorish conqueror; after which he went immediately to his own territory, whence he sent them a plentiful supply of cattle and other provisions: and indeed, as he had been made governor of all the great tract of ground by the conquering Moor, and had been base enough to renounce his Christianity,

* De his vid. sup. p. 261.

* Ibid. p. 261, &amp; seq. vid. &amp; BERMUD. TELLEZ, &amp; al. sup. citat.

(D) It will not be amiss to observe here, that Tellez, and those who have followed him (6), whether out of contempt, or why, we need not concern ourselves, constantly style this brave warrior only general, or grand vazier of the king of Adel, without ever naming his royal master, or once bringing him upon the stage (7). But we think we have a much better authority in the patriarch Bermudez; who, being at the head of this Abissinian expedition, directing almost every step of it, and being present at every encounter which Gama and his Portuguese had with that Moorish commander, must have been better acquainted with his quality, and on every occasion styles him king of Adel. And as a farther proof of his being really such, he tells us, that when he was killed, and his widow taken prisoner, the Abissinian emperor, willing to gratify the Portuguese general who then commanded with that beautiful princess, presented him with two of his tributary kingdoms, with the title and insignia of the regal dignity, to prevent her descending from her former dignity, as we have seen in the preceding chapter (8).

(6) Tellez, hist. Ethiop. lib. ii. c. 8. p. 70, & 113, & seq. & al. pass. c. 16. n. 44. not. (A) & alib. pass.

(8) See before, p. 268.

(7) Ludolph hist. Ethiop. lib. i.

it was the least he could do or engage, to prevent the fatal effects of military execution, and avoid the punishment which his apostasy and ill example to his subjects justly deserved. But the Portuguese were the more ready to agree to his own offers, as there was a kind of famine reigning through all the country, and their camp had already felt the effects of it so far, that, it being then the season of Lent, they had been obliged to obtain a dispensation from the patriarch for eating of flesh, and even to kill some of their beasts of burden to subsist; and must have been obliged to ravage the country for sustenance, had not that nobleman's relief come so seasonably into their hands<sup>y</sup>.

LENT was scarcely over, and the two chief commanders cured of their wounds, before Granbe sent a fresh message to Don Christopher, advising him to get himself in readiness, for that he designed to pay him a visit sooner than he expected. He did so accordingly; but at the head of a superior force than he had before, and with the very flower of his horse and foot, which amounted to double their former number. At the first sight of it the frightened empress would have gladly left the Portuguese camp, and fled to some place of safety, and had prevailed upon the patriarch to accompany her; but Don Christopher, who foresaw that his flight would not fail of disheartening his small army, obliged him to return, and be at hand to give them his blessing before they engaged.

ON the next morning, by break of day, both armies began their march, and met on a plain, where the Moors gave the first attack, having first surrounded that of the Portuguese on every side. The onset was carried on with great fury on both sides; but the fire of the Portuguese artillery gave the enemy so warm a repulse, that, not being used to it, they quickly gave way, and were no less annoyed in their retreat; for the Portuguese had taken care, before the armies engaged, to strew the ground with a good quantity of gunpowder in the highways and lanes through which they retired, with a train to each, to set it on fire; so that a great number of these poor wretches had their legs and feet terribly scorched and burned, the slight cotton garments about their middle set on fire, their breath stifled by the smoke and stench, and being wholly ignorant of the cause, they imputed the dire effect to some infernal power, which helped to complete their disconcertment; especially if we add the joint and equally surprising annoyance of the enemy's hand-grenades and fire-pots, which still continued to make a most terrible havock amongst them. By all these means the field of battle was soon covered with dead and wounded, horses as well as men: whilst the continual discharge of the Moorish fire-arms, and all the volleys of their arrows, had done no other execution on the enemy, than the killing about 20 of their men, among whom was their head cannoneer. At length both horse and foot gave way; Granbe retreated to a neighbouring hill, followed by them, and once more left the enemy in possession of the field of battle, and saw himself obliged to abandon his noble camp, being forced to fly with such precipitation from their pursuers, that they had no time nor heart to secure any of their baggage, provisions, or rich furniture; in-somuch that finding it impossible, in spite of their utmost efforts, to overtake them, they returned, and fell a plundering of their richest tents, in which they found a very considerable spoil, in utensils, clothes, furniture, money, ammunition and provisions. And it is on occasion of this fresh defeat that he is reported to have palliated his disgrace and precipitate flight, by saying, that the Portuguese fought not like men, but like incarnate devils<sup>z</sup>.

HE had indeed, in the last defeat, lost so great a number of men and horses (for besides those that were killed of the latter in the field of battle, a great number of them, scared by the fire and the noise of the enemy's artillery, had overthrown their riders, ran wild over the plain, and into the neighbouring woods, where they were lost), that he was obliged to apply to the grand signor, to whom he paid a kind of homage and small tribute, for a fresh supply of both; and, the more effectually to obtain it, he sent a very considerable quantity of gold to the Porte, and another to Zebid the basha, who then commanded in the neighbouring government. Whilst this was transacting he kept himself encamped on an advantageous hill with the broken remains of his army; whilst the Portuguese, to avoid being surprised by him, with much difficulty gained the top of a very rocky and almost inaccessible mountain, on which they found a spacious plain, and there fortified their small camp<sup>a</sup>.

No sooner had the Adelite king received the desired reinforcement from Zebid, consisting of 600 Turks, and 200 Moors on horseback, some say 1000 arquebusiers, and 10 pieces of field cannon<sup>b</sup>, than he resolved at all hazards to attack the enemy's intrenchments; whilst Don Christopher, who did not then think that situation safe enough, was gone at the head of a detachment to take possession of another and higher mountain, inhabited

<sup>y</sup> Idem, ibid. <sup>z</sup> BERMUDEZ, ubi sup. TELLEZ, LUDOLPH, vid. & sup. p. 228, & seq. before, ibid. & seq. VINCENT LE BLANC, & al.

<sup>a</sup> See DAVITY and his authors.

<sup>b</sup> See by a by Jews; and guarded by a Moorish garrison of 150 men, commanded by an officer of the Adelite king. Him Don Christopher attacked and defeated, killed 60 of his men, took 30 of his horses, and some prisoners, and put the rest to flight. He was, however, soon obliged to go back to the assistance of the rest of his army, who sent him word of the approach of that of the Moors, who were already encamped at the foot of that high mountain.

HERE Granbe sent one of his officers in the disguise of a pedlar, laden with beads and other trinkets, to tell that general, that his master would not fail to be with him in two or three days, with much more valuable wares. The man being seized by some of the Portuguese vanguard, was stripped of all his load, and delivered his master's message: b and this occasioned Don Christopher's being sent for with all speed. At his arrival, a proposal was made in council, and approved by much the greater majority, of surprising the Moorish camp in the dead of night, as the only expedient they had left to get out of their territories, and to save their handful of men against so superior a force. But that young warrior, scorning to take such a dishonourable advantage against an enemy who never yet had attacked him without sending some previous notice of his coming, peremptorily refused to fall on him till break of day, which, though greatly against their will, they were forced to comply with. The consequence of which was their total defeat, and the loss of their brave commander; who being desperately wounded, and soon after discovered and taken by the Moors, was brought to their camp; where Granbe having in vain tempted c him to apostatize, both by vast promises on the one hand, and cruel indignities on the other, of which we have given a full account in the Abissinian history, being at length enraged at his surprising constancy and singular valour, caused him to be conducted to the field of battle, and there to be beheaded in the manner we have before related. There the reader will also find a fuller account of that battle, and of the defeat of the Portuguese, as well as of the dreadful difficulties and perplexities they were obliged to undergo, before their small remainder got safe into the Abissinian dominions: Granbe and his Moors following and harrassing them all the way; Bermudez says, as far as the Nile, near the place where it falls into the lake Dambea d. It was not long after this that they were met by the young Abissinian emperor, who gave them a most gracious reception, and with d their assistance resolved to recover some of the provinces which Granbe had conquered from him; who, on his part, had taken all proper precautions to make a most vigorous opposition, and lay encamped on a spacious plain, having a very high and difficult mountain between him and the Abissinian army, whose passes he did not think worth guarding against them, but trusted to a stratagem, which he thought would do more execution among them than his Moors. Accordingly the Portuguese and Abissinians having with great difficulty gained the top of the mountain, were not a little surprised to find it altogether abandoned by its inhabitants, and that to all appearance with such precipitation, as to leave a great quantity of provisions, and particularly of wine. But, to their great surprise, they found them all poisoned; and it was happy for them that the effects of it e were so soon felt as to give timely warning to the rest; for as many of them as had ventured upon them died so quickly after, that the rest fell immediately on breaking all the wine-vessels in pieces, and destroying the other victuals.

HERE finding a proper place to encamp, they made a short halt after their laborious ascent, which had taken up a whole day; and on the next morning they were no sooner got to the opposite brow, than they were in full view of the Moorish army, which had by that time advanced to the foot of it, and were both within hearing of each other's clamorous threatenings and shouts; those in particular which came from the Moorish camp were, as is usual among them, of the most vapouring and deterring kind, importing no less than the utter extirpation of the imperial army, and its foreign auxiliaries, the impaling alive of the Portuguese patriarch, and the castration of the young emperor, in order to qualify him for one of the eunuchs in Granbe's court f.

THESE menaces so far intimidated that young prince and his pusillanimous soldiers, that they would gladly have avoided attacking the enemy; but were in some measure forced to follow them down the mountain, for fear of being abandoned by them. On the other hand, Granbe no sooner observed them approaching, than he appeared at the head of his army, accoutred cap-a-pie, and mounted on a stately white horse, with a Turk on each side, directing his march against them. The Portuguese, who led the van, suffered him to advance towards them, till he was near enough to be within musquet-shot; when one of their expertest marksmen fired at him, and brought him down dead off his horse, to the great surprise and terror of his Moorish troops. His two Turks were likewise killed by g

Sends them notice of it.

Don Christopher's fatal pride and defeat.

Put to death by Granbe.

Pursues the Portuguese, forming a bloody stratagem against them.

Comes in full sight of them.

His threatening words against them and the emperor.

Marches against them.

Is slain by a marksman.

c See before, p. 264, & seq. & auct. sup. citat.

d BERMUDEZ, TELLEZ, & al. sup. citat.

e De hoc vid. sup. p. 174, & seq. 208, & seq.

some fresh shot; and the next discharge, which was a general one, made so terrible an execution among them, that the whole Moorish army was quickly thrown into the utmost confusion; so that between those who ran away from, and those who still pushed forwards towards the enemy, they only opposed each other; whilst the Portuguese following their advantage, made still a greater havock, and increased the disorder amongst them.

AND now it was that the Abissine troops, which had stood aloof off, ventured to fall upon the disconcerted Moors, and helped their brave auxiliaries to gain a complete victory over them. Both the field of battle and the camp were quickly abandoned by the Turks and Moors, and plundered of all its wealth and plenty of provisions by the victors; as was soon after the whole province of Dembea, from which they likewise brought away the richest spoils, and a great number of prisoners, both Turks and Moors, and, among the latter, the son of the king of Adel, as we have elsewhere shewn; his queen narrowly escaping being of that number, by retiring into the province of Dagoa<sup>f</sup>. After this second action, the young emperor was easily induced to pursue his good fortune, and reduce several other rich kingdoms, which the king of Adel had conquered from him; all which, by the assistance of the European auxiliaries, and the great dread which their surprising victories had spread through the whole empire, was completed to his wish, with no less facility than speed; but for which we shall refer our readers to the account we have already given of it in the Abissinian history<sup>g</sup>.

The king of Aden's message to the emperor.

BUT whilst they were thus successfully employed, they received a message from the new king of Adel, or, as Bermudez styles him†, king of Aden, a firm ally of the late Granbe, and as zealous a Mohammedan, which was likely to have put a stop to their progress. It was directed to the young emperor, and imported, that he should not be too much elated at his late defeat of the king of Adel, for that he would find in him a successor both able and willing to repair his losses, and revenge his death; assuring him, at the same time, that he would not fail paying him a warm and speedy visit. This obliged the young monarch to give him the meeting, and, if possible, to be beforehand with him; and accordingly he ordered his army, preceded by the Portuguese van-guard, to march against him with all diligence, in order to surprise and fall upon him when he least expected it. There being a large river between them, they spent the whole night in crossing it, the horse by swimming, and the rest by the help of pontons, which they quickly made of the hides of their oxen, which were flayed for that purpose, and drawn backwards and forwards by ropes; all which was performed with such expedition and secrecy, that they were able to attack the enemy by the next morning, long before day-break. The king of Aden, surprised beyond measure at their unexpected approach, was one of the foremost to head his Turks and Moors against them; but was shot to death on the very first onset, probably by the same way as the Adelite king, if not by the same hand. A bloody action ensued, in which there were many lives lost on both sides; and the young Abissinian emperor received a wound, and was in no small danger of losing his life, through the confusion and disorder that reigned in both armies, and the difficulty of distinguishing objects at that early hour. All that needs be added to what we have said heretofore on the subject of this action is, that the Moorish army were no sooner apprised of the king of Aden's death, than they betook themselves to a hasty flight, in which fresh numbers were slain by the fire of the pursuing Portuguese, who, among other prisoners of note, brought away the lady Diana Ambura, widow to the late king of Adel, or Aden, who quickly after turned Christian, and was married to a Portuguese chief, as we have formerly shewn<sup>h</sup>.

Is surprised by him;
defeated and killed.

The Moors defeated and routed.

AFTER this fresh victory, the Portuguese, whose name was become terrible all over those parts, and who had by this time so greatly improved the Abissinian soldiery in the art of war, had a fair opportunity to have established the emperor in all his dismembered dominions, and to have helped to suppress, if not extirpate, all his invading enemies round about, had that been the main end and design of their and the patriarch's commission: whereas their order was to oblige the young monarch to make an open submission of himself, church, and people to the see of Rome; a step which they now found him absolutely determined to ward off as long as he could by any means, and to amuse them, by fair promises and delays, till they had put him in a condition to give them an absolute denial. And hence arose that irreconcilable breach between them, which deprived him of all further assistance, and exposed him afresh to the attempts of the Mohammedan princes above-mentioned, as well as to the fresh inroads of the rebellious Gallas, Gafates, and other barbarous nations, within and about his dominions<sup>i</sup>. But what hostilities ensued after this epocha, between the two former kingdoms and the Abissinian empire, or what other wars <sup>f</sup> See before, p. 267, 268, & auct. sup. citat.

(D), p. 329.

<sup>h</sup> See before, p. 268, & seq. & auct. sup. citat.

<sup>g</sup> Ibid. p. 242, & seq.

† See the foregoing note
<sup>i</sup> De his vid. sup. p. 175, & seq.

they

- a they waged against any other state, is as much beyond our power to guess, as it is to give any other particulars of their history. Could we indeed rely on the report which some Abissinians, who were at Rome anno 1620, made to the pope and college, their master had by that time, reconquered the greatest part of the Adelite kingdom, and reduced the prince to so low a condition, that they were no longer in danger of him<sup>k</sup>. But it is too plain that they represented matters rather as suited with their interest, than as they really were. Their business was to encourage his holiness, and other European powers, to send thither a strong supply of men and other assistance, in order to dispossess the Mohammedans of their conquests on that coast, that they might open a free commerce to the Christians into their empire, by representing that enterprise as easy and half completed; and to avoid saying any thing that might justify their delay and apparent reluctance to it.
- b HOWEVER that be, as the fatal breach between their emperor and the patriarch and his Portuguese, ended in the total expulsion of the Portuguese, from whom alone we have all this intelligence, out of the empire, and the shutting up all avenues into it against all the Europeans, with the utmost care and precaution; all further correspondence with those parts hath been so effectually stopped, that we have been ever since wholly in the dark about what is transacted in them. Only thus much we may add, with respect to the kings of Adel and Aden, and the Turkish basha, who commands along the coasts of the Red Sea, that the Abissinian monarchs have been obliged to pay them a kind of pension, in order to keep them more vigilant and severe against all strangers, who shall attempt to penetrate into any part of that empire, in any disguise, or under any pretence.
- c In all which they have shewn themselves the more strict and careful, as they receive the same express commands from the grand signor, whose tributaries they are, and under his protection. Those of Adel in particular have been for a long time in high favour at the Porte, and dignified with the title of saints, on account of, and as an encouragement to, their singular zeal, and frequent wars against the Christians. But that specious title hath not been able to save them from being stripped, by these sultans, of their most considerable ports and maritime towns on the Red Sea, and being confined by degrees, and closely shut up in the inland. So that they have now no part left in that kingdom, except that of Zeila, the rest being all in the hands of the Turks<sup>l</sup>: by which means they not only keep the kings of Adel closely shut up on that side, but lock up all possible intelligence from
- d coming from thence into Europe, and likewise all avenues through all those coasts into Abissinia, against the attempts of the Roman missionaries to re-enter into that empire. Here, therefore, we must be obliged to conclude our Adelite history, and shall only add a remark or two from what has been said hitherto; viz. That the kings of Adel appear to have been the most powerful and formidable of all that belong to the territory of Ajan; seeing they could engage not only all the other princes of it into their wars against the Abissinian empire, but even draw into their alliance the king of Aden, though situate at a greater distance, and on the opposite shore of the streights or gulph of Babel Mandel (E). But the main tie that unites all these inferior kingdoms so closely into one interest, is their religion, which, as we observed a little higher, being either Mohammedism or Bedowism, both
- e equally averse to every branch of Christianity, must equally inspire each with a hostile zeal against so potent and extensive an empire as that of Abissinia, whose monarchs have been so long famed for their strict and firm adherence to their church, as well as for their equal zeal against idolatry and Mohammedism.

f ADD to this, that the Ottoman court, under whose protection they live, is no less concerned, as well from motives of policy as religion, to suppress as much as they can the power and grandeur of the Abissinian monarchs; and having, for that end, seized on all the sea-ports on that coast, and thereby shut up all these Moorish princes, their vassals, within their inland territories; they not only encourage but oblige them to be continually at war with that empire, by furnishing them with all the necessary supplies of men, artillery, fire and other arms, and ammunition, without which it would be next to impossible to stand out long against them, there being no way left for them to procure them by any other means.

<sup>k</sup> Lettres de COREAL, DAVITY Afric. & al. sup. citat,

<sup>l</sup> RAMUSES, PIGAFET, MARMOL, DAVITY, DAPPER,

(E) Having had occasion to mention that king as a zealous ally to that of Adel against the Abissinians, tho' situate in Arabia Felix, and separated from this by the gulph above-mentioned, it might not be deemed amiss to give our readers some farther account of that kingdom as we go along, though out of the limits of the Ajanic tract we are upon: especially as all the account we find concerning it in our Arabic and other authors, is too inconsiderable to be made into a separate article, it chiefly relating to its famed ancient metropolis and mart, as well as its present state. But these and other curious particulars have been so amply described in our Ancient History of Arabia Felix (9), from the celebrated voyages of Mr. La Roque, into Arabia Felix, that we cannot add any thing more to it.

C H A P. VI.

S E C T. I.

The history of the kingdom of Magadoxa, and the republic of Brava; with an account of the fabulous kingdom of Adea.

The kingdom of Magadoxa. Its situation, length, &c.

THE next considerable kingdom along these coasts of Ajan, is that of Magadoxa, or, <sup>a</sup> as it is indifferently spelt by other geographers, Madagoxa, and Madagocho, is contiguous to that of Adel, extending itself, according to our latest maps, from 5 degr. 40 min. of north latitude quite to the equinox, where the river or gulph of Jubo divides the Ajan coast from that of Zanguebar, as that of Magadoxa doth from those of Adel <sup>a</sup>. But how far it extends itself inwards, or west, is but mere conjecture; though the generality of geographers scruple not to adjust its limits in their maps, on that side, rather as their fancy leads them, than upon any probable foundation. It hath its name from its capital, situate on a large bay, formed by the mouth of the river of the same name, which, we are told, is called by the Arabs the Nile of Magadoxow, by reason of its annual overflowing, like that of Egypt.

Soil and produce.

SOME authors tell us it has its spring-head as far as the mountains of the kingdom of Machidas; others bring it down as high as from the Mountains of the Moon <sup>b</sup>. The truth is, we are so little acquainted with those inland countries, that its head is as much unknown to us as that of the Nile formerly was *. However that be, we cannot but suppose its course to be a very long one, though not perhaps so winding as the other, not only by its considerable chanel, which forms a large convenient bay a little below the capital, but likewise from its regular and extensive inundations, which fertilize that whole country to such a degree, by the numberless canals which are cut from it, that it produces a great quantity of wheat and barley, variety of fruits, and breeds great numbers of horses, oxen, sheep, and other animals, wild and tame.

Religion and government.

THE city of Magadoxa is a place of great commerce, and vast resort from the kingdoms of Aden, Camboya, and other parts; whence their merchants bring cotton, silk, and other cloaths, spices, and variety of drugs, which they exchange with the inhabitants for gold, ivory, wax, and other commodities <sup>c</sup>. It is chiefly inhabited by Mohammedans, who came and settled there in the time of the khalifs <sup>d</sup>. The rest of the inhabitants for the most part are become of the same religion; though there are yet a great number of Bedowin Arabs, who still follow their old heathenish superstitions; and further in the inland a still greater, who are Abissine Christians, subject or tributary to that empire.

THE king and his court are Mohammedans; and yet are affirmed by some to be likewise tributary to it, and by others to be continually at war with it. However that be, his subjects, of what extract soever (for some of them are white, others tawny and olive, and others quite black) all speak the Arabic tongue: they are stout and warlike, and, among other weapons, use poisoned arrows and lances <sup>e</sup>.

Cugna the Portuguese admiral's attempt against Magadoxa.

THE only remarkable piece of history we meet with concerning this kingdom, is the hostile attempt which the Portuguese fleet made upon its metropolis, under the command of admiral Tristan de Cugna, as he sailed along these coasts in his way to the Indies. He had already reduced several maritime places, some to tribute, and others to ashes, particularly the city of Brava, of which we shall speak in the next section, which he caused to be plundered and burnt, and had proceeded as far as this city of Magadoxa, which he caused to be summoned, as usual, to accept of peace and friendship; that is, in plainer terms, of subjection and tribute to Portugal. But here he found the inhabitants ready prepared to give him a suitable reception; great numbers of foot and cuirassiers were patrolling along the shore; the walls were covered with armed men, and a considerable body of troops were drawn up before the town, which made Contingo, the officer sent with the summons, afraid of going on shore; instead of which, he dispatched one of the Bravan captives to assure the Magadoxans that the Portuguese came not to denounce war, but to offer peace to them. But they, knowing what dreadful execution had been made at the city of Brava, fell furiously upon the messenger, and tore him in pieces; and threatened to serve Contingo in the same way, if he offered to land; which obliged him to return to his admiral, and acquaint him with his ill success, and the insolent menaces of the enemy. Cugna, upon this, was resolv- <sup>f</sup>

Is bravely repulsed.

<sup>a</sup> SANUT. Afric. lib. ii. c. 12. DAVITY, DAPPER, & al.

* See Anc. Hist. vol. i. p. 177.

sup.

<sup>c</sup> RAMUS, DAVITY, & al. ubi sup.

<sup>e</sup> SANUT, DAVITY, OSSOR. Portug. conq. vol. i. & al. ubi sup.

<sup>b</sup> D'HERBELOT, Biblioth. Orient.

<sup>d</sup> D'HERBELOT, ubi

- a. ing, in a great rage, to bombard and storm the place, but was happily diverted from his bloody design, by the persuasion of his officers and pilots; the former of whom represented to him the natural strength of the place, numerousness of the garrison, plenty of ammunition, and the valour and resolution of the inhabitants; and the others, the extreme danger of the ships, both from the fire of the town, and boisterousness of the sea, especially as winter was then coming on, and the season for sailing nearly expired; so that, if his troops should miscarry in their attempt against the place, their fleet and army must inevitably perish: upon which he gave immediate orders for sailing to the island of Socotora, where he arrived soon after with all his ships, leaving the brave Magadoxans to rejoice at their deliverance. This is the account which their countryman Ossorio, bishop of Sylves, gives of b this transaction<sup>f</sup>; from which we may conclude, that this kingdom cannot be tributary to Abissinia, as some pretend; seeing, if it had been so, neither would the Portuguese have attempted its metropolis in that hostile manner, nor the inhabitants have repulsed them with such noble resentment.

S E C T. II.

The republic of Brava.

- WITHIN the kingdom of Magadoxa, and on the southern verge of it, was formerly Republic of Brava, founded this republican state, the only one we know of that kind in all Africa, by seven Arabian brethren, who fled thither from the tyranny of their king Lacab, one of the petty monarchs of Arabia Felix. Here they found a most convenient and delightful situation on the same coast, being bounded on each side by a river; upon which account Sanut affirms it to be an island*; and properly enough might he have styled it such, if the two rivers, which bound it on each side, were really no other than two branches of the Kilmanzi, c as some affirm, though at random<sup>g</sup>, as we think; that river running a quite contrary way out, far enough from this coast, as we have lately shewn. However that be, whether they be two distinct rivers, or only branches of one, it is likely that this republic doth not extend itself far into the inland; its chief dependance being on the great commerce of its capital of the same name, which is conveniently situated on a bay, formed by the mouth of the northern branch of that river, about the distance of one degree, according to our newest d maps, from the equator.

- THIS city, the only one we know belonging to this republic, is large and well peopled, chiefly by rich merchants, the descendants of the seven Arabs lately mentioned, whose main traffick consists in gold, silver, silk, cotton, and other cloths, elephants teeth, gums, and other drugs, particularly ambergrise, with which this coast abounds; and if we may credit our authors<sup>h</sup>, some pieces have been found here of such an extraordinary bigness, that if a man stood on one side, he could not see a camel that stood on the other. The houses here are large and well built, after the Moreisco style, and the town strong and well fortified, and accounted one of the most celebrated and frequented marts in the whole Habessan coast. Both the city and republic are governed by twelve cheyks or magistrates, chosen (but whether annually, or how, we are not told) out of the principal families of their seven e founders above-mentioned, and to whom the administration of justice and the management of all public affairs is committed. The people are mostly Mohammedans, but under the protection of the kings of Portugal, to whom they annually pay a small tribute of 500 mitti-gates, amounting to about 400 French livres<sup>i</sup>. This, however, they did not submit to, till after they had undergone a severe execution from the Portuguese fleet, bound for India, of which the same bishop, Ossorio, gives us the following account<sup>k</sup>:

- TRISTAN DE CUGNA, admiral of that fleet, having set on shore at Melinda three ambassadors, sent by king Emanuel to the emperor of Abissinia, and recommended them to the care and protection of the king of it, continued his course northward along the coast, till he came to the city of Brava (situate about 200 leagues from that of Melinda), and cast
 f anchor at the port. Here he dispatched, according to the Portuguese custom, one of his officers, named Lionel Codingo, to wait on the heads of the republic, and offer them peace, and the friendship and alliance of the king his master. To this the cheyks answered, that they had no objection against entering into such a treaty: but, says our author, this was only a piece of dissimulation, calculated to detain our people; the season being then almost at hand, when such boisterous winds usually blew in these parts, as would dash in pieces all their ships, even in the very harbour. Cugna, having discovered this artifice, resolved immediately to assault the city; and, before day-break, had drawn up his men on the shore, and formed them into two lines, the first whereof consisted of 600 men, the command of which he gave to Alphonso Albuquerque, whilst he reserved to himself the command of the others, which consisted of about 600 soldiers.

<sup>f</sup> OSSOR. conq. Port. vol. i. p. 286, Eng. edit. & seq.    * Ubi sup.    <sup>g</sup> RAMUS, vol. xiii. 3d. edit. LA CROIX Afric. part iii. § 10.    <sup>h</sup> TEXEIRA, RAMUS, DAVITY, LA CROIX, & al. sup. cit. DAPPER Afric.    <sup>i</sup> Id. ubi sup.    <sup>k</sup> OSSOR. hist. Port. conq. Eng. edit. vol. i. p. 285, & seq.

Brava was then garrisoned by 4000 men, half of whom immediately sallied out against them. The conflict was severe on both sides; but the Portuguese charged them with such fury, that they found themselves obliged to give ground, yet made a very regular retreat into the city; after which the gates were shut up against the enemy. These immediately surrounded the place, examining, with the utmost diligence, where they could best force an entrance; but were all that time terribly annoyed from within with burning torches, and other missile weapons. In the mean time, Albuquerque, having discovered a weak part in the wall, began his attack there; but was quickly opposed by the besieged, who flocked thither with all speed, and defended it with surprising intrepidity. The contest was kept up with very great fury on both sides; when, luckily for Albuquerque, the admiral came up, at whose approach the Moors were struck with such a panic, that they fled with the greatest precipitation; whilst the Portuguese soldiers, eager for their prey, would have pursued them into the city, but were restrained by their commanders. The city was presently after entered, and plundered of a vast and valuable booty, which was conveyed on board their ships. Great numbers of the besieged were slain and wounded, and many of them taken prisoners, but most of these were released quickly after. The Portuguese had about 50 of their men killed, and many dangerously wounded, besides eighteen others, who perished in the long-boat, which, through their insatiable avarice, they had loaded so immoderately, that it overset with them. Nay, such and so enormous was the inhumanity of the Portuguese soldiers and sailors, and their eagerness after spoil, that they cut off the arms of seven women, to come at their rings and bracelets the more readily. But Cugna, having severely punished the authors of this cruelty, thereby deterred the rest from the like barbarity. The city being thus plundered, Cugna ordered it to be set on fire; and it was quickly reduced to ashes, in the sight of the inhabitants, who stood at a small distance, beholding the dismal spectacle.

Thus far Ossorio's account of the catastrophe of this capital; which, by what appears in the sequel, was forced to become tributary to its destroyers, before it could recover its pristine grandeur and liberties. But when, how, and by what means, those noble Bravans were brought to submit to those harsh terms, we can no-where find: for Cugna, having set it in flames, is said to have sailed immediately to Magadoxa, upon the same errand, as we have shewn in the last section.

S E C T. III.

A confutation of the pretended kingdom of Adea.

The kingdom of Adea imaginary;

THE generality of geographers unanimously add a third kingdom, which they call Adea, upon this coast of Ajan, or Habash, and commonly place it, with its pretended capital of the same name, between those of Adel and Magadoxa; whilst some make this last to be a part of it, and the name of its capital; though Barraboa be said to be the chief place of the king's residence<sup>a</sup>: which word is of Portuguese extract, and signifies a good coast, situated between the two branches of the Kilmanci. They add, that, tho' a Mohammedan, he is tributary to the negus, or emperor, of Abissinia. One of them in particular not only affirms positively that there is such a kingdom, and situated and subject as above, but is more explicit in his description of it than the rest<sup>b</sup>.

and mistaken for the tract of Ajan.

THE chief cities belonging to it, according to him, or according to Sanfon's maps, by which he steers, are Zachet, Orgabra, Barraboa, Quilmunca, seated at the mouth of the river of that name; the lake and isle of Monks, situate more towards the north; Hugel and Bandel, situate on the coast; Magadoxa, a large city, formerly taken and plundered by the Portuguese, the metropolis of the whole kingdom of Adea, and the residence of the kings of it; having a large haven, and a fortress at the mouth of the river of its name, &c. He then goes on, describing its great concourse of merchants, commerce, inhabitants, and religion, in the same manner which we have done in the second section of this chapter, and proceeds to the city and republic of Brava, which he places between Magadoxa and Barraboa, and describes as we have done in other respects. He quotes likewise abundance of authors for what he writes, more particularly Sanfon and Robe; but, upon the whole, he seems to have confounded the greatest part of this territory of Ajan into one kingdom, under the name of Adea.

ANOTHER author, already quoted<sup>c</sup>, adds, from some of the authors quoted by Luyts, another city, a little above the port of Kilmanci, which, he says, is called Oby, and gives its name to that river from thence upwards. He mentions also the lordship of Granza, situate more towards the inland, and contiguous to the kingdoms of Ogia, Xoa,

<sup>a</sup> De his vid. RAMUS, ubi sup. p. 249, 3d edit. LA MARTINIERE sub voc. Adea. LA CROIX Afric. part vi. cap. 9. § 10. DAVITY, DAPPER, & al. <sup>b</sup> LUYTS's introd. ad geogr. p. 608. <sup>c</sup> LA CROIX, ubi sup.

- a and Goraga; that is, as we more properly write it, Ogge, Xaoa, and Guragna, belonging to the Abissinian empire, but all of them at an immense distance from these coasts; and yet this author makes it reach to them, and to the sea-port of Barraboa, adds another, called in the same language, Bara-maa, or the bad coast. This he places at the mouth of another river, which he names Sabala, and whose coast is difficult of access. Lastly, he tells us that this Adean kingdom extends itself westward to that of Agaboa: which still more confirms us, that he, as well as those other authors we have mentioned before, confounded the large tract of Ajan with this imaginary one of Adea, who have bounded, divided, and described it, according to the best memoirs they had; and, where those failed, have supplied the rest according to their fancy.
- b If it be asked, why we insert such a long descant on a kingdom which exists only in geographical books, and maps inaccurately concerted? we answer, that, though it doth not exist under the name and title they have given to it, yet it doth really so, at least for the greatest part, under the description we have given of the territory of Ajan, at the beginning of this chapter. But besides all this, our readers will be the better able to judge of the origin of this mistake, from what a learned author, well acquainted with those parts, hath published about it<sup>d</sup>, in these words: The inhabitants of the kingdom of Cambat call themselves Seb-a-hadja, or Hadians: hence it is, that Adea, or Hadea, is inserted in maps for a kingdom. It is the last kingdom belonging to Abissinia on the south, and not far distant from that of Enarea. The king of it is a Christian, and his subjects partly the same, and partly Mohammedans and Pagans. Accordingly, the said author hath observed the same thing in his map of Ethiopia, where, under the word Cambat, he adds, Cujus incolæ vocantur Seb-a-Hedya, malè Adea. And that not without good reason, seeing it is several hundreds of miles from Magadoca, and the coast of Ajan. This may serve to shew the danger of following authors, though ever so unanimous, in subjects of this nature, too implicitly; seeing they only copy one another's errors, which it should have been their study and business to discover and correct. Thus we meet likewise with the name of the city of Adea on the coast of Zanguebar, which the author<sup>e</sup> styles one of the most celebrated in all Africa; though, for aught we can find, it hath no better foundation than the imaginary kingdom we have been speaking of. Here, therefore, we shall conclude this chapter, without venturing to pened trate farther into the inland kingdoms; for if our knowledge of the coasts, the most obvious and frequented by Europeans, is so small and precarious, we doubt not being dispensed with by our readers from giving a worse description of this extensive nature, of wild countries and kingdoms, concerning which we cannot inform them of any thing with the least tolerable certainty. Those whose curiosity cannot be confined within the rules, may have recourse to a sufficient variety of maps and geographical books, to answer their purpose; whilst we closely pursue our own, of inserting nothing here without sufficient authority.

<sup>d</sup> LUDOLPH. hist. Ethiop. l. i. c. 3. p. 13.

<sup>e</sup> BAUDRAND, Dict. sub voc.

C H A P. VII.

The history of the principal kingdoms on the coast of Zanguebar.

- e THIS coast, supposed the Agisimba of Ptolemy, is, by the Arabs, called Zanguebar, and corruptly, by M. Paulo the Venetian, Zengobar, from the Arabic word Zengue, or Zanguebar; Zengui, or, as Leo Africanus writes it, page 5. Zabangi; which word signifies black or negro; so that the word Zanguebar properly imports the coast of the Blacks, or Negroes, all its inhabitants being of that colour, and having curled or woolly hair. Its northern boundary is variously fixed by authors; by some, at the mouth of the river Kilmanci, or Quilmanci<sup>a</sup>, of which we shall speak in the sequel; and others<sup>b</sup> as high as the cape of Guardafui, in the kingdom of Adel, mentioned in the foregoing chapter; by which he would seem to comprehend all the other long tract of Ajan under the same general name. Whereas we have there observed its inhabitants were a mixture of white, tawny, and olive, f till we come almost under the equator, where, therefore, we have fixed the boundaries between them with great reason, as well as from better authority; this coast being much better known than it was in the time of Sanutus, and other authors above quoted: and we find it now fixed between the river and kingdom of Jubo, about half a degree above the equinoctial line, to the kingdom of Mauruca, or river of Fernao Velozo, according to D'Anville, scarcely known in other maps, or that more considerable one of Cuama, the boundary of that kingdom, according to Dapper and others.

<sup>a</sup> SANUT. l. xii. RAMUS. ubi sup. p. 386.

<sup>b</sup> MARMOL. Afric.

Principal kingdoms, &c. on the coast.

ACCORDING to this dimension the coast of Zanguebar will contain the following kingdoms, rivers, bays, and other remarkable places, as the reader will find them ranged in D'Anville's map, agreeably to the latest discoveries. 1. The kingdom and river of Jubo.
2. The kingdom of Abaquas. 3. The bay of Fermosa. 4. The kingdom of Sio. 5. Ampata. 6. The river of Lamo. 7. The kingdom and city of Melinda. 8. The town or fort of Quilmanca. 9. The river and kingdom of Quilifo. 10. Amxambas de Motuapa, a town. 11. The river of Monbaca. 12. Ancinche. 13. Of Langon. 14. The country of Maraugalo. 15. Of Atundo. 16. The territory of Rafade. 17, 18, 19. The rivers called Los tres Hermanos, or three Brethren. 20. Cabo falso, or the deceitful Cape. 21. The river of Enabo, or Cuavo. 22. Of Quizimajugo. 23. The kingdom of Quiloo. 24. Country of Mongedo. 25. The river of Mongalla. 26. Cabo Delgado. 27. The town of Changa.
28. The country of Macuas. 29. The town of Querimba. 30. Of Ato. 31. The river of Pembo. 32. The town and river of Sirano Capa. 33. The river Sangaya. 34. The country of the Pices. 35. River Famovo. 36. Frayaseland. 37. The river Pinda. 38. Fernao Velozo.

Chief islands,
&c.

THE principal islands and kingdoms situate upon the Zanguebar coast, are as follow, according to the same author. 1. The island of Mandra. 2. The isle and kingdom of Pute. 3. The isle of Illheos. 4. Isle and kingdom of Lamo. 5. Isle and city of Monbaca, 6. Isle and kingdom of Pemba. 7. Of Zanzebar. 8. Isle of Cobra. 9. The shallows of St. Roch. 10. Isle of Monfia. 11. Isle and city of Quiloo. 12. Isles of Cape Delgado.
13. Of Melinda. 14. Changa. 15. Of Macoloe. 16. Of Materno. 17. Of Obi. 18. c Island and town of Querimba. 19. Isles of Fumbo. 20. Of Cabras. 21. The flats of Pindar.
Thus much may suffice for a description of these coasts, for which we are chiefly indebted to the discoveries, conquests, and ravages which the Portuguese have made on them. As for the further account of the several places above-mentioned, we shall postpone it till we come to speak of the several kingdoms to which they belong, and therein confine ourselves only to the most remarkable and useful, and such of which we have the most authentic account<sup>d</sup>.

Inland parts,
why so little known.

As to those belonging to the inland parts, such as towns, rivers, mountains, lakes, &c.
we are still more unacquainted with them; this only we know in general, that this whole tract is barren and unhealthy; the lands lying low, and intersected with rivers, lakes, thick woods, forests, and marshy grounds; the fruits of it are very unwholesome; the rivers, d for the most part, covered or choaked up with weeds, bushes, and thickets; all which so stagnate the air, and corrupt the product of the earth, and render the inhabitants so sickly and indolent, that they receive little or no benefit from its produce. The Bedowin Arabs are the only ones that do; and that chiefly by breeding multitudes of cattle, and living mostly upon their flesh and milk; whilst the negroes, or Zanges, content themselves with feeding upon wild beasts and fowls, which swarm all over those parts.

The air unwholesome.

To supply the want of corn, pulse, roots, and other wholesome food, of which they are destitute, the Divine Providence hath interspersed that whole country with mines of gold, easily got, by the help of which they can purchase all the necessaries and conveniences of life from other parts. But this is the very thing that makes them so extremely jealous of e letting any strangers penetrate into the inland; and more especially since the Portuguese have made themselves masters of such a number of places along this coast; insomuch, that they make no scruple to murder all they catch attempting it<sup>e</sup>. Hence it is that we have gained so small an insight into the interior intelligence of those parts. Nor can we justly blame those natives, if, apprized as they are, by long experience, what labours and hazards they will expose themselves to, and what outrages and cruelties they will not scruple to commit, to dispossess the natural proprietors of that precious and bewitching metal, they are so jealous and watchful to shut up all avenues to their mines against all strangers.

The people jealous of the Portuguese.

Cassers why so called.

THEY are, moreover, in their nature fierce and stout, ignorant and brutish, and without any religion, especially the Negroes; upon which last account they have the name of Cassers f given to them. As for the Bedowins, they have some kind of religion, or, rather, observe a variety of superstitious rites, as has been already observed, but are no less ignorant and uncivilized than the Cassers; yet they chiefly herd among themselves, and live at a greater distance from the coasts, and by the sides of lakes and rivers, for the convenience of pasture for their numerous herds. They go all naked both Cassers and Arabs; excepting that they wrap a piece of cotton cloth round their middle, which descends a little below the knee; but those who live along the coasts, and are somewhat more civilized, affect a little more finery in their dress, and, instead of cotton cloth, cover themselves with the skins of wild beasts, more or less rich, according to their rank, and with animals tails trailing behind on the ground. They likewise adorn their necks, arms, and legs, with variety of beads, g bugles, and other trinkets, of amber, jett, glass, and other materials, which they exchange

Dress of the natives.

Skins of wild beasts the finest dress.

<sup>d</sup> D'ANVILLE, MARTINIERE, SANUT. & al.

<sup>e</sup> RAMUS. ubi sup. DAPPER, Afric. & al. sup. cit.

with

- a with the merchants for their gold, furs, ivory, and other commodities of their country. There are among these coasters a great number of Mohammedans, but a much greater number still among the islanders along this coast; they being, for the most part, descended from those Arabs who were banished out of their country, on account of their adherence to the sect of Ali<sup>f</sup>, of which they still are zealous professors.

THIS is all we know, or can insert with any certainty, concerning this long tract of Zanguebar<sup>g</sup>; to which we have only to add the description of the river Kilmanci, or, as the Portuguese, who have given it that name, from a fort and town built at the mouth of it, <sup>The river Quilmanci described,</sup> write it, Quilmanca, or Quilmanci: for though, in the list of remarkable places along this coast, which we have given a little higher, we have had occasion to mention several other

- b rivers; yet is this the only one concerning which we can mention any thing worth our reader's notice, and that chiefly consists in the few following particulars. It hath its source <sup>Its source, course, &c.</sup> near the mountain of Gravo, in the kingdom of Narea, subject to the Abissinian empire, and near a village called Bochia, or Boxa, and is one of the most considerable in all this part of Africa, especially on account of the length and vast winding of its course, it making a kind of circle toward the north and east, as it were to enclose into a kind of peninsula the kingdom of Gingiro, and divides the wild Gallas settlement from Abissinia; and thus far that river is called by the name of Zebea. It then winds its course through the country of the Makorites, and leaves it on the east side, crosses the equinoctial line, through those of the Mossogay Caffers, a barbarous nation, and thence continuing its course along the coasts of Zanguebar, discharges itself into the ocean in the kingdom of Melinda, on the south side of <sup>Mouth and</sup> the fort or town, which gives it its new name of Quilman, and is by most authors supposed <sup>forts.</sup> to be the Rapte, mentioned by Ptolemy in his description of this coast. Thus far the account which De Lisle gives us of the course of that river, from the Portuguese books and maps; yet so far are they from being agreed in it, that several of them affirm the mouth of it to be but about a mile southward of the city of Melinda<sup>h</sup>. To this we shall only add what the last quoted author, and some others, say, that the Abissinians give that river the name of Obeg through some parts of its course along their territories<sup>i</sup>, from a town of that name situate on its banks, as we have lately seen in a preceding chapter.

- d It is time now to speak of the several kingdoms we have given in the list above, as be- <sup>Kingdoms of</sup> longing to this tract of Zanguebar; and therein shall confine ourselves within the limits of Zanguebar, our system; which being chiefly historical, will of course excuse us from entering into a particular detail, not only of such of which we know nothing more than the bare geography, without any other particular relating to their history, but much more of those concerning which we know little else than their names and situation, or perhaps some few other particulars; but neither essential enough, nor so certainly known, as to deserve a place in a <sup>many of them</sup> work like this: of which nature are a great part of those contained in the above-mentioned <sup>unknown.</sup> list, which the reader will find distinguished from the rest in Italic character; that he may, if he pleases, consult the many books of travels where they are more particularly described, but on such authorities as we can neither vouch for nor depend upon. Those therefore <sup>e</sup> which we intend to speak of in this chapter, are these that follow.

<sup>f</sup> De hac, vid. sup. vol. i. p. 132, & seq.

SANUT. l. xi. DAVITY, DAPPER, & al.

<sup>1</sup> DAPPER, ubi sup. LA CROIX, ubi sup. part iii. c. 9. sect. 1.

<sup>g</sup> JUAN DE BARROS, l. viii. c. 4. RAMUS. & al. pass.

<sup>h</sup> De his, vid. RAMUS. ubi sup. DAPPER, ubi sup.

S E C T. I.

The history of the kingdom of Melinda.

- f THIS kingdom, according to the generality of the geographers<sup>a</sup>, lies under the equi- <sup>The kingdom</sup> noctial line, and extends itself from the northern boundaries of that of Mombaso, <sup>of Melinda,</sup> which they place about the 2d degree south of the river Quilmanci, lately described, whose course extends itself from the north side of it; though its mouth, according to the latest observations, is placed between the 3d and 4th deg. south; we have already taken notice of the difference of authors about that point. We are no less uncertain about its extent westward into the inland, and are only told, that it is bounded on that side by the country of the Mossogays, a barbarous race of Caffers; and on the east it has the western ocean for its boundary; about the extent of which we meet with no less disagreement between authors, <sup>its boundaries</sup> seeing some of them, who include the kingdom of Mombaso as part of that of Melinda, <sup>different.</sup> <sup>g</sup> extend the sea-coasts of it quite to the Cape of Gada, which they place in the 10th deg. of south lat<sup>b</sup>. So little exactness is there in these accounts of the kingdom, even among the

<sup>a</sup> ORTEL, RAMUS. ubi sup. PIGAFET, DAVITY, DAPPER, LA CROIX, & al. MARTINIERE, sub VOC. MELINDA.

<sup>b</sup> DE LISLE Atlas,

Portuguese, notwithstanding their having carried on so constant a commerce with it ever since their first discovery of it, that is since an. 1520, as we shall see in the sequel. We shall not therefore take upon us to assert any thing upon that subject, but leave it to time and opportunity for farther and more exact discoveries concerning it.

Dangerous coasts.

Kingdom and isle of Lamo.

The king beheaded by the Portuguese.

The soil and produce of Melinda.

City of Melinda described.

Dress of men and women.

HOWEVER that be, it is agreed on all hands, that these coasts, especially near the capital of Melinda, are exceedingly dangerous and difficult of access; being full of rocks and shelves, and the sea thereabouts very often tempestuous at certain seasons<sup>c</sup>. At a small distance from the mouth of the river above-mentioned, is the island, kingdom, and city of Lamo; whose king, a Mohammedan, was beheaded by the Portuguese, an. 1589. His name was Panebaxita, and his crime, whether real or pretended, his having basely betrayed Rock Britto, governor of the Melindan coast; for which he was seized, with four other of his Mohammedan subjects, in his capital, by their admiral Souza Contingo, and carried to the next island and kingdom of Pate, and there publicly executed, in presence of that and some other petty kings of the neighbouring islands; from which time, that of Lamo hath continued tributary to Portugal<sup>d</sup>, as are also most of those on this coast.

THE kingdom of Melinda is for the most part rich and fertile, producing almost all the necessaries of life, except wheat and rice, both which are brought thither from Cambaya and other parts; and those who cannot purchase them, make use of potatoes in their stead, which are here fine, large, and in great plenty. They likewise abound with great variety of fruit-trees, roots, plants, and other esculents, and with melons of exquisite taste. The country is covered with citron-trees, with whose odoriferous smell the air is agreeably perfumed almost all the year. They have also great plenty of venison, game, oxen, sheep, geese, hens, and other poultry, &c. and one breed of sheep, whose tails are like some of those we have already spoken of, commonly weighing between 20 and 30 pounds<sup>e</sup>.

THE city of Melinda is pleasantly situated on a beautiful plain, surrounded with a great variety of fine gardens and orchards, stored with all sorts of fruit trees, especially citrons and oranges. The houses are built of square stone, and for the most part stately, and some even magnificent, and all of them richly furnished, being inhabited chiefly by rich merchants, and much resorted to by foreigners, who drive a great commerce with it in gold, copper, quicksilver, ivory, wax, drugs, &c. which are here exchanged for silks, cottons, and other cloths, corn and other commodities. The only inconvenience attending this metropolis is, that the anchorage stands at some distance from it, on account of the rocks and shelves which surround it towards the sea side, which render the access to it difficult and dangerous<sup>f</sup>. This city is supposed by the learned to be the Mondel mentioned by Avicenna, as the place whence they had their aloes<sup>g</sup>.

THE inhabitants of this city are a mixture of blacks, swarthy, tawny, and white. This last chiefly among the women, who are mostly of that, or of an olive complexion. Their dress is no less taking than their complexion; for they never stir out but in fine silks, girt about with a rich gold or silver girdle, a collar and bracelet of the same, or something still more valuable, and their heads covered with a veil. The men go not bare-headed, as in many other parts of Africa, but wear a kind of turban on their heads. In other respects, their dress is much the same; that is, a piece of cotton wrapped about their middle, and descending a little below their knees; their legs, feet, and the rest of the body, quite bare<sup>h</sup>. As to the meaner sort, as well as those who live farther from the coasts, they wear little else than a piece of cloth about their middle; if we except their shield and weapons, which are the bow and arrows, the scymitar and the javelin, at all which they are very expert, being reckoned the best and stoutest soldiers in all that coast. They go to war with undaunted spirit, and maintain their ground with greater intrepidity than any of their neighbours; yet we are told, those of the adjoining kingdom of Monbasa would have proved too strong for them, had they not been assisted by the Portuguese, to bring them into subjection<sup>i</sup>. In other respects, the Melindans, at least the coasters (for we are not so well acquainted with the inlanders) are said to be very courteous and obliging, free from fraud or flattery, and live very friendly with the Portuguese, who commonly are buried amongst them, without any other mark of distinction than that of a cross over their tomb<sup>k</sup>. Their language, as far as we can judge from the Lord's prayer in it, which Grammay hath given us in his curious collection, seems far enough from barbarous or disagreeable. The reader may see the specimen in the margin (A).

<sup>c</sup> OSSORIO, & al. sup. citat. <sup>d</sup> ODVAR, BARBOS, RAMUS, DAVITY, & al. <sup>e</sup> SANUT. BARBOS. OSSORIO, DAPPER, LA CROIX, & al. <sup>f</sup> Ibid. <sup>g</sup> SCALIG. ad lib. iv. MANIL. DAVITY, & al. citat. <sup>h</sup> OSSOR. lib. i. OD. BARBOS. PIGAFET, DAVITY, DAPPER <sup>i</sup> Ibid. <sup>k</sup> TURS. in vit. Xavier.

(A) Aban ladi fissan avari, et cades esmoelali mala tajano nagfar ceman lena galiaca tuata tadchol nal lagatutoca tacuna mascitoca choma fissa, me childaleca, ghla-rabe, lache nagna min fci ratri *.

* Vid. Chamberlan Orat. Dominic. in C. ling.

- a THEIR religion is variously described by authors; some representing the people as altogether Mohammedans, and others as idolaters. The truth is, as Linschot rightly observes, there are some of both religions. The Bedowins, as we have formerly hinted, are a superstitious and ignorant race of idolaters; the Negroes are for the most part Mohammedans, but of the Emorawidic sect, which reject some parts of the Koran<sup>1</sup>, following the doctrine of Zeyd the son of Hosheim<sup>m</sup>; a sect not unlike that of the Sadducees among the Jews, of which, notwithstanding, some of the Khalifs of Babylon have made open profession<sup>n</sup>. As for the Roman-catholics, they have been settled almost ever since the Portuguese came thither. We do not however hear of any proselytes they have made to their faith among the natives, as they have at Congo, Angola, and other African parts; but content themselves with the free exercise of it, and are so numerous in the city of Melinda, that they have built no less than seventeen churches and chapels in it, and have erected a stately cross of gilt marble before one of them; and we hear moreover, that in the year 1602, three ladies, relations to the king, were publicly baptized<sup>o</sup>.

Religion partly Mohammedism and partly Paganism.

Roman-catholics numerous. Their churches.

- b THE government is monarchical; and in such veneration is the king held by his subjects, that whenever he stirs out of his palace, he is always carried in a sedan, on the shoulders of four or more of the greatest nobles of the kingdom; and incense and other perfumes are burned before him as he goes along the streets of any city, by a great number of ladies, who come to welcome him with songs in his praise, accompanied with several kinds of musical instruments; which though not of the most harmonious kind, they touch with much dexterity and cadence. If he sets out upon any expedition, whether civil or military, he then appears mounted on a stately horse, richly caparisoned, and with a numerous retinue, attended with great crouds of his subjects, who fill the air with their loud huzzas and loyal acclamations. His labis or priests meet him at his setting out with a deer, recently sacrificed, and still reeking; over which he and his horse take three leaps; which is no sooner done, than these pretended conjurers set about examining the entrails of the creature, and from them pretend to foretell whether his expedition will be prosperous or not<sup>p</sup>.

The government. High regard to their kings.

Vast retinue. Superstitious ceremonies.

- c THE same kind of superstitious ceremonies are also to be used when any prince, or ambassador from a prince, comes to his court, in order to know whether the visit or negotiation will be attended with good or bad success. Upon this occasion also the prince or ambassador is accompanied by a great number of ladies along the streets, some burning perfumes before him, others singing or playing on instruments. These monarchs are in some measure obliged to submit to the superstitious ceremonies above-mentioned, and to regulate their resolutions according to the report of those jugglers, whether it be for peace or war, or any other exigence, and whether they give any credit to them or not; for on this chiefly depends the allegiance and honour they pay to, and the affection and veneration they have for them; which would, upon their non-compliance, quickly degenerate into hatred and contempt, if not into downright disloyalty or open rebellion, through the uncontrollable influence which those juggling miscreants have over the people.

Reception of ambassadors.

- d BUT besides this absurd and ill-placed confidence, for such it cannot but be deemed by men of sense, (unless we will suppose that their pretended predictions, calculated only to amuse the subjects, are privately directed by the prince, which is far from improbable; and the only way perhaps those cheats have of saving themselves from the dangers that would attend a contrary event) the Melindan kings have, we are told, a much surer way of securing their subjects loyalty and affection; namely, by their constant application to public affairs, their vigilance over their ministers, governors, and other magistrates; by their assiduity and attention in receiving and hearing the complaints of their subjects; and their strict and severe administration of justice on all delinquents, of what rank or degree of favour soever with them; but more particularly on such as attempt to impose upon or mislead them by fraud or artifice<sup>q</sup>.

Singular justice.

how administered.

